When you feel pain on your back or on your knee, you must observe that pain as it really is. You must not try to make it go away. You must not make it disappear because the pain will help you to attain Nibbana. In other words pain is the key to the door of Nibbana. So, if you feel a painful sensation you are very lucky. Why? That pain will lead you to the Cessation of Suffering because the pain is one of the five aggregates to be thoroughly realised. What kind of aggregate is it? It is an aggregate of sensation. The aggregate of sensation, which is the truth of suffering, is to be thoroughly understood. If we realise this painful sensation in its true nature - in its specific as well as in its general characteristic - we see it as just a natural process arising and passing away from moment to moment. It does not last even a second. Then, through the realisation of this pain or aggregate of sensation, you can attain Enlightenment by which you can destroy all defilements and get rid of suffering. That is why I said if you feel a painful sensation you are very lucky. Why? Because you have a mental process together with a physical process to watch, to observe and to realise. That pain gives you a very good opportunity for realisation of its true nature, that leads you to the cessation of Dukkha - Nibbana.

It is here needed to explain the specific characteristics of mentality and physicality and their general or common characteristics. The specific characteristics of mentality and physicality here mean that every mental or physical process has its own specific characteristics which have nothing in common with any other mental or physical process. You know 'Lobha' - greed, craving, desire, lust, attachment - ('Lobha' covers all the meanings of these words in English). Lobha has its own characteristics or specific characteristic which does not belong to any other mental or physical process. What is that? I think you know because you have had experience in meditation as well as studying the scripture. What is the specific characteristic of 'Lobha'? If you have love or desire for that Rolls Royce car, will you then go away from that car and never approach it? Or am I right in saying that because you have a desire for the Rolls Royce car, you will not run away from that car? Will you rather approach it, because you are attached to it? Am I right? How? If you have 'Lobha' for this car, you are always attached to it. So here we know what the characteristic of Lobha is: Lobha has the characteristic of clinging. Does 'Dosa', "anger" have the characteristic of clinging? No. 'Dosa' has the characteristic of rudeness. 'Lobha' draws things towards it. 'Dosa' expels from it. So this clinging is the specific characteristic of 'Lobha' - Rudeness is the specific characteristic of 'Dosa'.

Physical and mental processes which constitute a so-called person are Pathavi Dhatu, Apo Dhatu, Tejo Dhatu, Vayo Dhatu, Akasa Dhatu and Vinnana Dhatu. How many elements are included in this so-called person? There are six. What are they? They are earth, water, fire, air, space and consciousness. Of these six elements, Pathavi Dhatu, the element of earth, has hardness and softness as its characteristic. This characteristic belongs only to the element of earth, not to the element of water, not to fire, not to air; so that is the earth's specific characteristic.

When a meditator has obtained deep concentration of mind, his mind is purified; then he begins to realise the specific characteristics of mental and physical processes. So, when you observe your abdominal movement, a physical process, as taught by the Venerable Mahasi Sayadaw in accordance with the Discourse of Maha Satipatthana Sutta and when your concentration is good enough you begin to realise the rising and falling movements very clearly. Motion of movement is the characteristic of the wind or air element. When you rightly understand this rising movement or falling movement very clearly and very penetratingly, you are not aware of the form of your body or abdomen, you have lost the sense of your bodily form. What you are realising at that moment is just the movement - upward movement and downward movement. Then you begin to realise the specific characteristic of the air element - Vayo Dhatu.

What, then, are the general common characteristics of material and mental phenomena? Those are, you know, Anicca, Dukkha and Anatta - Impermanence, Suffering and No-Soul or No-self nature. Every mental state, emotional state and every physical process has these three characteristics. So they are common characteristics because they belong to every mental and emotional state and physical process. After you have passed two stages of insight-knowledge, you come to realise the three common characteristics of mentality and physicality. The insight-knowledge is known as "Knowledge of Comprehension". This insight-knowledge comprehends all these general characteristics of mental and physical phenomena. When your insight-knowledge becomes mature because you practise studiously and your mindfulness becomes continuous, uninterrupted and constant for the whole day, with better and deeper concentration, you are sure to go through all the stages of Insight with your personal experience of them. Then your bodily and mental process that notes it - cease to exist. Then you get into the Cessation of compounded things, Sankhara.

There, at the moment you get into the state of Cessation of all Sankhara, compounded things, you have abandoned attachment, the cause of Suffering, because you have rightly and perfectly understood Dukkha. So, the Truth of Suffering has been perfectly understood. The Cause of Suffering, attachment, has been abandoned at that moment. The Truth of the Way leading to the Cessation of Suffering, that is the Noble Eightfold Path, has been developed. So you have got the state of cessation of compounded things - Sankhara. Here you reach the third level of Right Understanding, that is, the Enlightenment, by realising the Four Noble Truths. Then you reach 'the ocean' because you have been carried away by the 'middle current' - the Noble Eightfold Path. You are not kept on 'this bank' nor 'that bank'. You are not 'submerged into the river'. You do not 'land on the island'. You have reached the ocean. This is my brief explanation of the discourse of the Parable of the Log, expounded by the Omniscient Buddha.

After the Lord Buddha had delivered this discourse sitting under a tree on the bank of the River Ganges, there was a cowherd who was listening to the discourse. His name was Nanda. He was very pleased with the discourse and wanted to be 'carried away' by the 'middle current' so he approached the Lord Buddha and requested Him to ordain him as a Bhikkhu. "Venerable Sir, I am afraid of being kept on 'that bank' or 'this bank' or 'submerged into the river' so I want to be 'carried away by the middle current' and to 'reach the ocean'. Please be kind enough to ordain me as a Bhikkhu so that I can develop the Noble Eightfold Path."

Then the Omniscient Buddha said, "No, boy, you are a cowherd. You have a duty to drive your cows back home. You should entrust them to their owner. Unless you do that, I cannot ordain you."

So the cowherd did as the Omniscient Buddha said. Then he returned to the Buddha. Then the Omniscient Buddha ordained him a Bhikkhu. Then, Bhikkhu Nanda went into a forest, a secluded place, and developed the Noble Eightfold Path by being aware of all mental and physical phenomena that were arising moment to moment. Because he was willing to be 'carried away by the middle current', he meditated strenuously; then in a very short time, he was carried away by the 'middle current' and reached the ocean of Nibbana. Why did Bhikkhu Nanda reach the ocean of Nibbana? Because he had none of those eightfold faults and was carried away by the 'middle current' of the Noble Eightfold Path that runs towards the 'Ocean'.

So, I would like you to remember what the Lord Buddha repeatedly said: "Be MINDFUL of what is happening at this moment as it really is, or be AWARE of what arises in your body and mind as it really is. Then all of you will be 'carried away by the middle current' and attain Nibbana, the Ocean."

* * * * * * * 25th July, 1982

Chapter I

BIRTH

In times long past, fully twenty-five hundred years ago, where are now the border-lands between Nepal and the northern parts of the provinces of Oudh and North Bihar, there were a number of little kingdoms inhabited by different races of people, each ruled over by its own Raja or King. One of these little kingdoms which lay some distance north of the present-day town of Gorakhpore, on the north side of the river Rapti, was the land of a race called the Sakyas, the king who ruled over them at that time being called Suddhodana. The family to which King Suddhodana of the Sakyas belonged was called the Gotama family, so that his full name was King Suddhodana Gotama; and the name of the chief city in his kingdom where he had his chief palace, was Kapilavatthu.

This King Suddhodana had a chief queen whose name was Mahamaya. And after they had lived together for some time in married happiness, the Queen became aware that the day was drawing near when she should bring forth a child. So, before time came upon her, she asked her husband to give her leave to go and pay a visit to her own people who belonged to a city not very far away called Devadaha. King Suddhodana very willingly granted his chief Queen her wish, and sent out his men with orders to prepare the way for her, and do everything needed to make the journey to her father's house a pleasant and comfortable one for her.

Now half way between Kapilavatthu and the town of Devadaha there was a very fine forest garden called Lumbini where the people of both places used to go in the hot weather to enjoy the cool shade of the great Sal trees of which there were many in the grove. Here in the month of May, these great trees were covered from top to bottom with lovely blossoms. In among their long branches flew many kinds of birds singing their sweetest songs so that the whole air was full of the sound of their warbling. And over and through the myriads of flowers, swarms of bees went cheerfully humming, busily gathering honey on every hand.

When, as her bearers carried her along the road to Devadaha in her royal litter, Queen Mahamaya came to this pleasant place, she thought she would like to rest there a while in the cool shade for it was a hot day, and so she told her bearers to carry her in among the trees. But she had not been there long, walking about and enjoying the pleasing sights and sounds all round her, when suddenly and unexpectedly the pangs of child-birth came upon her, and in a little while, there in the Lumbini Grove, under the Sal trees, among the birds and bees and flowers, she brought forth a son.

The place where this Lumbini Grove stood at that far off time can still be seen to-day. For a great king called Asoka, who ruled over a large part of India about three or four hundred years after King Suddhodana's time, caused a tall pillar to be set up in the forest-garden where thus was born the son of King Suddhodana and Queen Maya of Kapilavatthu, in order to mark the place; and on it he had a writing carved in deep-cut letters which can still be read, saying that he had put it there in order that men in the future should know where the great event had taken place. And although in the course of the two thousand and more years that have passed since King Asoka set up this pillar, the upper half of it has been broken off, and the half that is left leans all on one side, it still stands to this day in the place where King Asoka put it with his inscription on it for any one to see. And many people go to see it every day.

Now on the hills outside Kapilavatthu there lived many hermits; and among them there was one old hermit whom every one in Kapilavatthu admired and esteemed for his goodness, King Suddhodana himself being especially fond of him and showing his esteem and affection for him in many ways. This old hermit, when he heard that his great friend the King now had a little son, came down to the King's palace in the city to see the babe; and when he had come, the King asked him to give the babe his blessing, and, as he made his request, he held the infant out toward the hermit in a posture of doing homage to the old man. But the hermit said:

"Nay, Maharaja, it is not your son who should bow his head to me, but I who ought to bow my head before your son. For I see well that he is no ordinary child. I see well that as he grows up to manhood's years he will become a very great religious teacher. Yes, I believe he will become the greatest religious teacher the world has yet seen."

Having said this, the old man sat silent for a little while smiling to himself with a pleased and happy look. Then his eyes slowly filled with tears and he began to weep, the tears trickling down his cheeks.

"Why!" said the King in great bewilderment and some alarm, "What is the matter with you? Just a moment ago you were smiling and now you are weeping. Is anything wrong? Do you foresee some evil thing that is going to happen to my boy?"

"No, no, Maharaja," said the hermit, "do not be alarmed. No evil thing will ever come near your son. All-prosperous shall be his name, and all-prosperous he will be."

"Then why do you weep?" asked the King.

"I weep," said the hermit, "to think that I am now so old I must soon pass away, and I shall not live to see your son become the great teacher I know he one day will be. You Maharaja, will live to see that great and happy day, and so will many another person now alive, but I shall not live to see it. That, Maharaja, is why I cannot help weeping."

With these words the old man rose from his seat, and putting his two hands together, palm to palm, be bowed down before the little infant.

King Suddhodana was very much astonished at all the hermit had said and to see him bowing down his old grey head before the little baby; but he thought so much of him that he felt that he himself must do the same as the hermit had done, so he too bowed down and with folded hands, did obeisance to his own baby son.

Now in India in those days, it was the custom when a boy-baby was born, to gather together the wise men, and on the fifth day after the boy's birth, to bathe his head and give him the name that had been chosen for him by the wise men. And this was done with King Suddhodana's son also. The name the wise men chose for him was Siddhattha, a word which means all-prosperous or all-successful, one who will prosper or succeed in everything he sets out to do. For they said they could see that this boy was not going to be like any ordinary boy. They said they could see that if he followed the ordinary life of the world and in due time became king like his father before him, then he would become a very great king indeed. But, they said, if he did not follow his father on the throne of his country but instead turned to follow the religious life, then he would become a very great religious teacher. One of the wise men, however, spoke a little differently from the others. He said that he, for his part, was quite sure that when the boy grew up he would be certain not to follow the worldly life and take his father's place, but would leave throne and kingdom and everything behind him, and following the religious life, become the very greatest religious teacher in the world. This particular wise man thus said the very same thing that the old hermit had said about the boy's future.

The king, of course, was very much pleased that so many people, and these the wisest and most learned in his kingdom, should think that his little son was going to grow up to be a very great man. But he was not so highly pleased at the thought that he might not follow him upon the throne, but only become a great hermit. He wanted his son to grow up living the ordinary life of the world that every body lives; he wanted him to marry and get children; and when he himself was too old to govern the kingdom any longer he wanted to see his son mount the throne after him and rule the people as he had done, wisely and well. "And then, after a time," he thought to himself, "who knows? Perhaps my son may, become as great a king as any that have ever been, and rule, not only over little Kapilavatthu, but over the whole of India!" Thus did King Suddhodana consider within himself; and the bare thought of such a thing happening to a son of his filled him with the greatest delight; and he resolved to do all in his power to make sure that Siddhattha should live the ordinary worldly life and never think about anything else.

But in the meantime he had cause to be anxious about something else. Ever since she had given birth to Siddhattha, Queen Mahamaya had been ill. She had never recovered her former strength. She received all the best care that a queen could get, all the best doctors, all the most skilled attendants and nurses, but in spite of everything she died just two days after the day on which her baby had been given his name, and seven days after she had brought him into the world. Every one, especially her husband the king, grieved very much at her death, for she had been a good woman and a good queen beyond most women and queens. So now the sorrowful king had to give his motherless baby into the care of his mother's sister, Princess Mahapajapati, and she took care of him now and brought him up just as if he had been her own son. Thus the little boy Siddhattha never knew his own real mother.

* * *

Chapter II

BOYHOOD

The old hermit and the wise men who gathered together on Siddhattha's name-giving day had agreed in saying that King Suddhodana's son was no ordinary boy, and their words were very soon proved true. After being brought up under the kind care of his aunt Mahapajapati who nursed and attended to her dead sister's child as if he had been her own, until he reached the age of eight years, teachers then were got for the young prince in order that he might learn reading and writing and arithmetic. Under these teachers' instructions he quickly learned all each had to teach in his own subject. Indeed, he learned so quickly and well that every one was astonished, his teachers and his father and foster-mother as well, at the rapid progress he made. For no matter what subject he was being taught, as soon as he was told anything, at once his mind took hold of what he was told and he never again forgot it, in this way showing himself particularly apt at arithmetic. Thus it was easily seen by all that as regarded the power of his mind he was well endowed, indeed, very much beyond the common. Yet with all his so superior ability in learning, and the high position he held in the country as the heir to the throne, he never failed to show to his teachers that respect which a pupil always should show, seeing that it is through them they gain. The prince was always gentle and dignified in his usual bearing towards every one about him, and towards his teachers in particular, ever modest and deferent and respectful.

In bodily attainments also, he was no less well endowed than he was in mind and character. Notwithstanding the gentleness of his manners, notwithstanding that he was a gentle man in the very best sense of the words, he was bold and fearless in the practice of all the manly sports of his country. He was a cool and daring horseman and an able and skillful chariot-driver in this latter sport winning many chariot races against the best drivers in the country. Yet for all his keenness in trying to win a race, he was kind and compassionate towards the horses who helped him to win so often, and frequently would let a race be lost rather than urge his weary, panting horses beyond their strength. And not only towards his horses but towards all creatures he seemed to have a heart full of tenderness and compassion. He was a king's son and had never himself had to suffer hardship or distress, yet in his kind heart he seemed to know by sympathy how others felt when they were afflicted or in pain, whether these others were men or animals; and when he was quite to others as far as he could {sic}, and where it was possible, tried to relieve any suffering they already were enduring.

Thus, once when he was out walking in the country with his cousin Devadatta who had his bow and arrows with him, Devadatta shot a swan that was flying over their head. His arrow hit the swan and it fluttered down, painfully wounded, to the ground. Both boys ran forward to pick it up, but Siddhattha reached it first and holding it gently, he pulled the arrow out of its wing, put some cool leaves on the wound to stop it from bleeding, and with his soft hand stroked and soothed the hurt and frightened bird. But Devadatta was very much annoyed to see his cousin take the swan from him in this way, and he called to Siddhattha to give the swan to him because he had brought it down with his arrow. Siddhattha, however, refused to give it to him, saying that if the bird had been killed, then it would have been his; but as it was alive and not dead, it belonged to the one who actually secured possession of it, and so he meant to keep it. But still Devadatta maintained that it should belong to him because it was his arrow that had brought it down to the ground.

So Siddhattha proposed and Devadatta agreed that their dispute should be sent for settlement to a full council of the wise men of the country. The council, accordingly, was called and the question put before them; and some in the council argued one way and some the other; some said the bird should be Devadatta's, and others said that Siddhattha was quite right to keep it. But at last one man in the council whom nobody had ever seen before rose and said: "A life certainly must belong to him who tries to save it; a life cannot belong to one who is only trying to destroy it. The wounded bird by right belongs to the one who saved its life. Let the swan be given to Siddhattha." All the others in the council agreed with these wise words, and Prince Siddhattha was allowed to keep the swan whose life he thus had saved. And he cared for it tenderly until it was quite cured of its wound; then he set it free and let it fly back once more well and happy to its mates on the forest-lake.

* * *

Chapter III

YOUTH

In those days in India everybody knew that everything man needs for his life comes out of the ground, and that, therefore, the man who cultivates the ground and makes it bring forth food without which men cannot live at all, is the man who does the most useful and necessary work in any nation. So, once a year it was the custom in those days for the king of the country himself, along with his ministers, to go out to the fields and with his own royal hands, plow a field, and so set an example to all his people not to be ashamed of honest, honorable labor.

And one day in the spring, at the beginning of the plowing season, King Suddhodana went out from Kapilavatthu in full regal state, to carry through this yearly observance of the "Royal Plowing," as it was called. And all the people of the city went out after him, for this was their great annual holiday festival, in order to see their King plowing and to share in the feasting and merry-making that always followed. And the King took his young son with him out to the fields, and leaving him in the care of some attendants, he went to the plowing place and taking hold of the shafts of his own plow which was all decorated with gold, he plowed up and down the fallow field, followed by his ministers with their plows and oxen ornamented with silver, the ordinary farmers coming last with their common plows and yokes of oxen, all of them turning over the rich, fat, brown soil so that it might be made ready for the seed.

After a time, when the feasting began, Prince Suddhodana's attendants went off to share in it; and by and by all of them had gone away, quite forgetting the young prince, and leaving him alone by himself. Then, seeing himself thus left alone, the prince felt rather pleased, for already he was a thoughtful boy, and he wanted to get a chance to think quietly about what he had seen on this day of feasting and rejoicing, so he wandered away quietly by himself till he came to a nice, shady apple tree, and there he sat down and began to turn everything over in his mind.

First, so his thoughts ran, there was his father the king and all his ministers and the cultivators after them, plowing the land, and all were very happy and pleased looking; but he had noticed that the oxen did not look as if they were very happy. They had to pull their very hardest to make the plow go through the tough, turfy soil; they had to tug and strain at it till they were all perspiring and panting for breath. Evidently life was not easy for them, not even on a holiday like this when everybody else was making merry. They had to work hard; and often when they did not do exactly as their masters wished, they had to take harsh words and harsher blows. And young Prince Siddhattha thought that even amid the pleasures of a great holiday, there is always something that is not so pleasant.

And then from under his apple tree he looked at the movements of the birds and beasts and insects around him, and he noticed a lizard ran out near his feet and with its quick, darting tongue begin to lick up and eat the little, harmless, busy ants. And then, in a little while, a sly snake came along and caught the lizard in its jaws and swallowed it. And then a hawk swooped down from the sky and picked up and killed and devoured the snake. And again the prince began to think deeply and ask himself if it really was so, that all the prettiness and beauty of the shows of life have all got some thing at the back of them that is not pretty and beautiful at all. In all his own young life yet, he himself had not suffered anything, but as he looked round him now and pondered on what he saw, he perceived that there was a good deal of suffering going on all the time for somebody or something, even though he himself happened to be free from it. And he sat there intently until he became so wrapt up in his thoughts that he forgot everything else, forgot all about the day's festival, and his father, and the plowing, and everything.

In the meantime the "Royal Plowing" was done, and the feasting that followed it was all over. But when the young prince's attendants came back to where they had left him, they could not find him; he was not there. Very much frightened, they started looking for him everywhere, for soon his father the king would be asking for him in order to take him home with him. At last, they found him sitting as quiet and still as a stone statue under his apple tree, so completely absorbed in his thoughts that at first he did not know they were speaking to him. But when at length they succeeded in making him understand that his father was calling for him, that the hour was getting late and it was time to go home, then he rose and went back with them to his father; but all the way home his heart and thoughts were filled with pity and concern for all living things that love their lives so much, and yet find it so hard to live.

But the king was far from pleased to find that his son was beginning so early to think seriously about life and what it really means. He began very much to fear that what the old hermit had said was already beginning to come true, that his son's thoughts already were turning in the direction of the religious life, and that if they were not soon turned away from it, what he was so much afraid of would come to pass, and Siddhattha would leave his father's house, and he would have no son left to follow him on the throne of the country. So he resolved at once to do something to turn his son's mind away from such serious thoughts. He resolved to make life in every possible way so pleasant and comfortable for his son that in his own pleasure and enjoyment, he would stop thinking so much about how other beings fared in life.

So he ordered his workmen to build three splendid palaces for his son. The first one was built of good, stout blocks of wood outside, and lined inside with fine, sweet-smelling cedar. In this warm, comfortable palace, he meant his son to live during the cold winter season. The second palace was built of cool, polished marble, so as to be nice and pleasant to live in during the hot season when everything outside was burning in the hot sun. And the third palace was built of good hard bricks and had a roof of blue tiles on it to keep out the heavy monsoon rains. In this last palace the king meant his son to pass the rainy season safe from its damp and chills. Round each of these palaces, also, he caused to be laid out a splendid pleasure-garden planted with every kind of shady and flowering tree, with many ponds and running streams in it where there grew lotuses of all colors, so that the prince might be able to go out walking or riding in it when he chose, and always find coolness and shade and flowering beauty wherever he looked.

But all these pleasant things, palaces, gardens, ponds, walks and rides, and the hosts of pleasant companions that were provided along with them, were all of no use to stop the young prince from thinking. And the king saw this. He saw that all he had contrived to turn his son's thoughts towards his own pleasure only, had completely failed, and he called his ministers to him and asked them what else he could do to make sure that the old hermit's prophecy should not come true.

His ministers replied that, in their opinion, the best way to occupy a young man's mind so that he would not think about such things as leaving the worldly life, would be to get him married to a nice, pretty young wife. Then, so they said, he would be so taken up with her that he would have no time or inclination to think of anything else; and in due time, when his father wished it, he would take his place on the throne in the regular way, and live in the world just like everybody else.

This seemed to the king to be very good advice; but how could he make sure of getting for his son a wife so lovely and attractive that once he was married he would be completely to her, altogether charmed with her loveliness, and henceforth live with no other object but to make her perfectly happy?

After considering the matter for some time, the king hit upon a good plan. He sent out an order that all the most beautiful maidens in the country were to come to Kapilavathu on a certain day and pass before Prince Siddhattha in order that he might say which of them was the most beautiful and give her a prize for her beauty; while each of the others who came and showed themselves would receive, each one, a gift from the hand of the Prince, great or small, according as he thought her to come near or fall below the chief of them all in beauty.

Now when King Suddhodana gave this order, he also arranged that some of his ministers should keep a close watch on his son as the procession of beautiful maidens passed before him, and if they saw him show any sign of special pleasure when any particular maiden came forward to receive her gift, then they were to take note who she was and come and let him know.

So the day came for the beauty competition, and all the fairest, most beautiful girls in the kingdom passed in a brilliant, dazzling procession of loveliness before the prince, one after another, and each received from his hands the gift which he thought her beauty deserved. But instead of being pleased thus to come close and touch the hand of their sovereign's son, each girl seemed to be almost afraid as she approached him, and glad, when, having got her gift, she was at liberty to pass on and run back among her companions again.

And there was a good reason for their behaving in this unusual way. For this prince of theirs was not at all like any other young man they knew. He did not seem to be looking at them, or indeed, thinking of them at all! He handed each girl her gift, but he seemed to be thinking of something else altogether, something great and solemn it seemed, far far beyond their smiling faces and dainty ways. Indeed, some of them said that as he sat there on his prince's throne, he seemed to them to be more like a god than a human being. And the ministers who, by the king's command, were watching him, felt almost afraid at the thought that they would have to go back and tell King Suddhodana that his and their plan had failed, that his son had not shown the least pleasure at the sight of a single one of all the beauties who had passed before him. For now nearly all the girls had passed, nearly all the prizes had been given away, and the prince still sat there unmoved, his mind evidently far away from this scene of delight for everybody else, this gay procession of one beauty after another.

But now, just as the last girl took the last prize from the prince's hand, and curtsied and passed on, there came along hastily, a little late, one more girl; and those who were watching the prince noticed that he gave a little start as she drew near. The girl too on her part, instead of passing him with her eyes timidly turned on the ground as all the other girls before her had done, looked Prince Siddhattha straight in the face, and with a smile asked "Is there no gift left for me, too?"

"Sorry am I," said the prince smiling back to her, "that all the gifts I had to give out are finished but take this." And with that he took a string of splendid jewels from his neck and clasped them round the girl's waist.

Then the king's ministers, when they saw this, were very glad; and after they had found out that the name of this young girl who had come last, was Yasodhara, and had learned where her father Suppabuddha lived, they went back to king and told him all about it; and they very next day the king sent off messengers to Suppabuddha, asking that his daughter Yasodhara might be given in marriage to Prince Siddhattha.

Now it was the custom among the Sakya people who were a strong, vigorous, mountain folk, that when any young man wanted to marry, he first must show himself as clever and skillful in horse-riding, shooting with the bow and arrow, and wielding the sword, as any other young man in the kingdom; and Prince Siddhattha, although he was the heir to the throne, had to follow this custom just the same as every other young man.

So one day there came to the //maidan// of Kapilavatthu, all the strongest and cleverest young men of the Sakya kingdom, all the best horsemen and archers and swordsmen. And each of them before the assembled crowd of ministers and people, showed what he could do with horse, with bow and arrow and with sword. And Prince Siddhattha, mounted on his white horse Kanthaka, showed what he could do, also; and in the contest with the others he showed that he was as good as, and even better than, the best in the country.

At shooting with the bow and arrow, he sent an arrow farther than the young man who up till then had been considered the best archer in the kingdom, his own cousin Devadatta.

At the exercise or test with the sword, he cut a young, growing tree through so neatly and cleanly at one stroke, that after his sword had passed through it, it still remained standing for several moments, so that those who were judging the contest at first thought it had not been cut through at all. But then there came a puff of wind, and the tree fell over to the ground, and everybody saw that it had been cut through as smooth and even as a piece of butter. At this test, Prince Siddhattha beat his own half-brother Nanda, who, so everybody thought, could not be beaten at swordsmanship by anyone in the country.

The next test was in horse-racing; and on his fast white horse

Kanthaka, Prince Siddhattha easily left all the others behind. But they were not satisfied to see him win this test so easily. They said: "O, if we had a swift horse like that to ride, we could win a race to. This is only the merit of the horse; it is not the merit of the man. But we have here a wild, black stallion which has never yet allowed any man to get on his back. Let us now see which of us can mount him and stay on his back longest."

So all the youths tried hard, one after another, to catch hold of the stallion and swing himself on to its back, but all of them were flung to the ground by the proud, fierce animal, until it came to the turn of Arjuna, the best rider in the kingdom. After a little struggle, this Arjuna managed to get on the stallion's back and stay there while he whipped it once round the race-course. Then, before anybody knew what it was going to do, the savage animal bent its head round quickly, and catching Arjuna by the foot with its big strong teeth, it pulled him by main force out of the saddle and dashed him to the ground, and if some of the syces had not run forward quickly and dragged him away, while others beat off the stallion, it would have trampled Arjuna to death. Then it Siddhattha's turn to try to ride the stallion, and everybody thought he would be sure to be killed, since Arjuna the best rider in the country had just missed being killed by it. But Prince Siddhattha just walked quietly up to the stallion, laid one hand on its neck and the other on its nose as he spoke a few soft, gentle words to it; then he patted it on its sides, and to the surprise of everybody, it stood still and allowed the prince to mount it and ride backward and forward just as he wished, subdued entirely to his will. It was the first time anybody had come near it who was not afraid of it and did not want to beat it, but instead spoke and acted kindly to it; and in its surprise at this new kind of treatment, the stallion allowed the prince who was neither afraid of, nor angry at, it, to do as he pleased with it.

Then every one admitted that Prince Siddhattha was the best horseman in the kingdom, too, and well worthy to be the husband of so fair a maiden as beautiful Yasodhara. And Suppabuddha, Yasodhara's father, also agreed that this was so, and he willingly gave his daughter as wife to so handsome and manly a young prince. And so Prince Siddhattha was married amid scenes of great rejoicing to beautiful Yasodhara, and went with her to live in a new and splendid palace which the king had caused to be built for them, surrounded by everything delightful and pleasing that any young man's heart could desire.

And now King Suddhodana was beginning to feel satisfied that his son would no longer think about giving up his chance of getting a throne and becoming a religious man. But in order to make quite sure that his thoughts would never turn in this direction, the king ordered that nobody about the prince, none of his servants or attendants within the palace walls or grounds, were ever to speak a single word about such things as old age, or sickness, or death. They were always to act as if there were no such unpleasant things in the world.

More than that. The king sent away from his son's palace all the servants and attendants who showed the least sign of getting old or weak or sickly. He arranged that there should be nobody in the palace and the gardens round it but young, happy, pleasant, smiling people. Those who happened to fall ill were at once taken away and not allowed to come back until they were perfectly well again. The king also gave strict orders that no one when at the princes' presence, was to show any sign of weariness or sadness. Everybody round him was required to be cheerful and merry and bright all day long. And at night too, when his attendants danced and sang before the prince, they were never to show any signs of weariness or fatigue with their exertions. In short: King Suddhodana tried so to arrange everything and everybody around the prince that he should not know or even suspect that there was anything else in the world but smiles and laughter and joyous, happy youth. For, to complete his arrangements, he caused a high wall to be build round the prince's palace and gardens, and gave strict command to the keepers of the gates that on no account were they to allow the prince to pass outside.

In these ways did King Suddhodana think to make sure that his son would never come to see anything but the pleasing sight of youth and beauty, never hear anything but the pleasant sounds of songs and laughter, and so be content to live as his father had done before him, and never wish to become a religious ascetic, or seek any other higher good than the life of a King's favorite son.

* * *

Chapter IV

LEAVING HOME

But in spite of all the luxury with which he was surrounded, and the pains that were taken too keep from him anything that might make him think the least unhappy thought, the young prince Siddhattha did not feel altogether as happy as his father wished him to feel. He wanted to know what lay outside these palace walls he was never allowed to pass. To distract his attention from any such questions about the outside world, his father planned new festivals and merrymakings of all kinds; but it was all of no use. The prince continued to become more and more dissatisfied with his shut-in life. He wanted to see more of the world than was contained within his own palace and pleasuregrounds, even though the life he led there was full of delights. He wanted to see how other people who were not princes, lived their lives, and told his father again and again that he could not be really happy until he had seen this. Until a day came when the king annoyed by his continual request to be allowed to go outside the palace grounds, could refuse his wish no longer, and said to him: "Very well, my son. You shall go outside the palace walls and see how our people live; but first I must prepare things so that everything may be made fit and proper for my noble son's eyes to look at."

So the king sent out his messengers through the city to tell the people that on a certain day his son was coming out to see the city; and that everybody must hang flags and banners and gay bunting out of all their windows, and clean up their houses and paint them afresh, and put flowers over their doors and in front of them, and make everything as bright and gay as they possibly could. He also gave strict orders that nobody was to show himself in the streets who had anything in the least the matter with him. Nobody who was blind or lame or sick in any way, no old folk and no lepers were to appear in the streets of the city anywhere that day, but all such people must stay at home indoors all the time the prince was riding through the streets. Only the young, the strong, the healthy and happy looking people were to come out and give the prince a welcome to the city. Orders were also given that on this day no dead were to be carried through the streets on their way to the burning place, but all dead bodies were to be kept till the next day.

And the people did as the king commanded them. They swept all the streets and watered them to keep the dust from rising. They put new coats of whitewash on their houses and made them bright with wreaths and festoons of flowers hung in front of their doors. They hung streamers of many colored cloth from the trees that grew along the road by which the prince would come. In short, they did all they could think of to make their city look to the eyes of their prince as if it were not a city of this world at all but one of the cities of the gods in the heaven worlds.

Then when everything was all ready, Prince Siddhattha came forth from his palace and, mounting his splendid car, passed slowly through all the streets of the city, looking everywhere about him, and everywhere seeing nothing but the glad, smiling faces of the people, all pleased to see their prince come among them, some of the crowd standing and shouting as he passed: "Victory, victory to our Prince!" while others ran in front of his chariot throwing flowers before the horses' feet. And the king, as he saw how well the people had obeyed his commands, felt highly pleased, and thought that now that his son had seen the city, and had seen nothing but what was pleasant and happy-looking, now surely he would feel more contented in mind, and once for all give up his brooding thoughts.

And then, suddenly, all that he had planned so well was completely spoiled, all his hopes and desires for his son brought to nothing. From a little hut by the roadside before any one could prevent him, there tottered out a man, with grey hair and nothing on him but a few wretched rags. His face was all withered and wrinkled, his eyes dim and bleary, there were no teeth in his mouth. And as he learned, trembling and half doubled up, on a staff, he had to hold it hard with his two skinny hands to save himself from falling. Then dragging himself along the street and paying no attention to the scenes of rejoicing all round him, he let a few, weak, stammering sounds come from between his pale lips. He was begging the people to give him something to eat or else he would die that very day.

Of course everybody round him was very angry at him for daring to come out of his house on this day when the king's son was visiting the city for the first time, and the king had commanded that people like him were not to show themselves in the street, and they tried to drive him back into his house before the prince should see him. But they were not quick enough. Prince Siddhattha saw the man, and he was horrified at the sight. He hardly knew what he was looking at.

"What is that, Channa?" he hurriedly said to his favorite attendant at his elbow. "Surely that cannot be a man! Why is he all bent? Why does he not stand up straight like you and me? What is he trembling for? Why is his hair that strange colour and not black like mine? What is wrong with his eyes? Where are his teeth? Is this how some men are born? Tell me, good Channa, what does this mean?"

Then Channa spoke to his master and said:

"My Prince, this man is what is called an old man. He was not born like this. He was born like everybody else, and at one time, when he was young, he was straight and strong and black-haired and clear-eyed. But now he has been a long time in the world, and so he has become like this. Do not concern yourself about him, my Prince. This is just old age."

"What do you mean, Channa?" said the Prince. "Do you mean that this is quite common? Do you mean that everybody who has been a long time in the world becomes like this? Surely no! I never saw anything like this before. Old age! What is old age?"

"My Prince," said Channa, the charioteer, "every one in the world who lives a long time becomes just like this man."

"Everybody, Channa? You? I? My father? My wife? Shall we all become like this and have no teeth or black hair, and be bowed and trembling, and have to lean on a stick when we want to move about instead of standing up straight?"

"Yes, my Prince," said Channa. "Everybody in the world, if they live long enough, become just like this man. It cannot be stopped. It is old age."

Then Prince Siddhattha ordered Channa to drive him home again at once. He did not want to see any more of the city that day. He could not take any more pleasure in the sight of the laughing crowds and the gaily decorated streets. He wanted to get away by himself and think about this terrible thing he had just heard for the first time, that he, a prince, heir to a throne, he and everybody he loved, one day must grow weak and feeble and have no more joy in living because they would be old, and there was nothing that could stop this from happening to them, no matter who they were, no matter how rich and great and powerful.

And when he got home to his palace, although his servants set out before him a royal feast of everything delightful to eat, he could not eat, for he was thinking all the time: "Some day I will grow old." And then, when the dishes he had hardly tasted were taken away, and the dancers and singers came before him to try to please him with their songs and dances, he hardly could bear to look at their graceful poses or listen to their instruments and voices, for he was thinking: "Some day you will all grow old, every one of you, even the prettiest." And when at length he had sent them all away, and lay down to rest, he could not sleep, but lay awake all night thinking of himself and his beautiful wife Yasodhara, and how that one day they would both grow grey and wrinkled and toothless and ugly like that man he had seen to-day in the streets of the city, and have no more pleasure in one another. And as he thought of this, he began to wonder if out of all the millions and millions of men in the world somebody or another among them all had not found some way of escaping this terrible thing, old age. More than that; he began to wonder if, supposing he tried, tried very hard, stopped trying to do anything else, and gave all his thoughts and energies to this one thing, might he not himself find out such a way for the benefit of himself and Yasodhara and his father and everybody in the world?

Of course the King was told about what had happened, and was very much distressed to hear it. And he, to, lay awake all that night trying to think of some new pleasures with which to distract his son's attention from these thoughts which, if they were not soon stopped, would surely lead him to leave his home behind and go and live the lonely life of a religious hermit or wanderer. And the King did devise and offer his son new pleasures, but it was all useless. The young Prince refused them. Instead, he pleaded with his father that he might be allowed to go out and visit the city another time without any one being told that he was coming, so that he might be able to see it just as everybody else saw it, following its usual every-day life.

As first King Suddhodana was very unwilling to give his son his wish, for he feared now more than ever, that if once Siddhattha saw the kind of life that is lived by people who are not fortunate enough to be king's or rich men's sons, but have to earn all they get by the sweat of their brow, then the old hermit's prophecy would come true, and Siddhattha would not succeed him on his throne. However, he knew quite well, that having seen so much, his son would never be happy again until he had seen more, whatever the result might be. So once more, though very unwillingly, he gave permission for his son to leave the palace and see the life of the city; and once more Prince Siddhattha went forth beyond the walls that were meant to shut out from him all knowledge of any unpleasant thing. This time, so that the people would not know him as he passed among them, he did not go out dressed like a prince, and nobody was told he was coming. This time, too, he went on foot, not in his chariot, and dressed just like a young man of good family. And nobody went with him but Channa, he also in a dress different from his ordinary one, so that the people would not know him either, and through him, recognize his master.

No huzza-ing crowds, no flower-decked houses, no waving flags did the eyes of the young Prince look upon this time, but just the ordinary sights of a city full of common folk all busy about the various occupations by which men earn their bread. Here a blacksmith was perspiring over his anvil as he hammered and beat out a plowshare or a sickle or a cart-wheel tire. There, in a richer quarter, in their little shops sat the jewelers and goldsmiths, cunningly fitting jewels and precious stones into chasings of silver and gold, skillfully fashioning out of the yellow metal, necklaces and bangles and anklets. There, in another street, the dyers were hanging out to dry in long lines, lengths of newly dyed brilliantly colored cloths, blue and rose-red and green, and many another pretty colour, that one day would drape the form of beauty making it yet more beautiful. And there, too, were the bakers busily baking their cakes and serving them out to customers waiting to get and eat them while they were yet fresh and warm from the baking. At these and similar sights the young Prince now looked with the keen interest of one who had never seen such sights before; and his heart found pleasure in seeing how busy every one seemed, and so interested and seemingly contented and happy in their work. And then, again, something happened that spoiled all his pleasure in this day of new and interesting sights, and sent the Prince home a second time, sad and sorrowful at heart.

For as he was passing along one of the streets with Channa, a little way behind him, he heard a cry as of some one calling for help. He looked around to see what was the matter, and there on the ground near him he saw a man lying twisting his body about in the dust in a very strange way. And all over his face and his body there were ugly looking purple blotches, and his eyes were rolling queerly in his head, and he gasped for breath as he tried to get on to his feet; and every time he got up a little way, he fell helplessly down again.

In the kindness of his heart the Prince at once ran forward to the man and picked him up, and resting his head on his knee, tried to comfort the man, asking him what was wrong with him, and why he did not stand up. The man tried to speak but he could not. He had no breath left for speaking; he could only moan.

"You, Channa," said the Prince to his servant who had now come up to him, "tell my why this man is like this. What is the matter with his breath? Why does he not answer me?"

"O, my Prince," cried Channa, "do not hold the man like that. This man is ill. His blood is poisoned. He has the plague-fever, and it is burning him up so that he cannot do anything but just draw hard breath until his breath too is burnt up by the fever."

"But are there any other men who become like this? Might I become like this?" the Prince asked Channa.

"Indeed you may, my Prince. If you hold the man so close as that. Pray put him down and do not touch him, or the plague will come out from him and go into you, and then you will become the same as he is."

"Are there any other bad things that come on men besides this plague, Channa?"

"Yes, my Prince, there are others, many many others, of many different kinds, and all of them painful, as this is."

"And can no one help it? Does sickness like this come on men without their knowing it, by surprise?"

"Yes, Prince, that is what it does. Nobody knows what day he may fall ill like this. It may happen at any time to anybody."

"To anybody, Channa? To Princes, too? To me?"

"Yes, even to you, my Prince."

"Then everybody in the world must be afraid all the time, since nobody knows when he goes to bed at night, if he may not awake in the morning ill like this poor man?"

"That is so, my Prince. No one in the world knows what day he may fall ill, and after much suffering, die."

"Die! That is a strange word! What is 'die,' Channa?"

"Look, my Prince," said Channa.

The Prince looked where Channa pointed, and saw a little crowd of people coming along the street weeping, while behind them came four men carrying on a board a terribly lean-looking man who lay there flat and still, his cheeks fallen in, his mouth set in a strangely ugly grin, but never turning, never saying anything in complaint to those who were carrying him when they gave him a hard jolt on his hard board as they stumbled over a stone in their way. The Prince looked after the little crowd as it passed him wondering why they were all crying, and why the man on the board did not tell those who were carrying him to be more careful and not shake him so much. And when they had gone a little further, to his astonishment, he saw the man's bearers lay him on a pile of wood, and then put a light to the wood so that it blazed up in a fierce flame, and still the man did not move, though the flames were licking all round his head and feet.

"But what is this, Channa? Why does that man lie there so still and let these people burn him? Why does he not get up and run away?" asked the Prince in horror and bewilderment.

"My Prince," said Channa, "that man has died. He has feet but he cannot run with them. He has eyes but they do not see anything now. He has ears but he will never hear anything with them again. He cannot feel anything any more, neither heat nor cold, neither fire nor frost. He does not know anything any more. He is dead."

"Dead, Channa? Is this what it means to be dead? And I -- shall I too, a king's son, one day be dead like this? And my father, and Yasodhara, and every one I know -- shall we, every one of us, some day lie dead like that poor man on that pile of burning wood?"

"Yes, my Prince," said Channa. "Everybody who is alive must some day die. There is no help for it. There is nothing more sure and certain. No one can stop death from coming."

The Prince was struck dumb. He could say no more. It seemed to him such a terrible thing that there should be no way of escape from this devouring monster death who ate up everybody, even kings and the sons of kings. He turned home in silence, and going to his room in the palace, sat there by himself thinking and brooding hour after hour about what he had seen that day.

"But this is awful," said the Prince to himself as he sat pondering alone. "Every single person in the world must some day die, and there is no help for it, so Channa says! O, there must be help somewhere, for such a state of things! I must find help; I will find help, for myself and my father and Yasodhara and everybody. I must find some way by which we shall not always be under the power of these hateful things, old age, and sickness, and death."

On another occasion as the Prince was driving to the Royal Gardens, he came face to face with a man garbed in the flowing orange-colored robes of the recluse. The Prince observed the Monk closely, and, feeling an inward pleasure at the calm and the dignified mien and the noble bearing of the man, he questioned Channa about the life led by such a person. The charioteer replied that the man belonged to the class of people who had "left the world" to seek a remedy for the sufferings and sorrows of the world. The Prince was highly elated over this, and going to the Gardens, spent the day happily, himself having made up his mind to leave home.

As the Prince thus sat thinking and talking to himself, news was brought to him that his wife had given birth to a fine baby boy. But the Prince showed no signs of gladness at the tidings. He only murmured with distracted look: "A Rahula has been born to me, a fetter has been born to me." And because this was what his father had said when he heard that he was born, the baby was called on his name-giving day, Prince Rahula.

After this day, King Suddhodana saw that it was of no more use trying to shut Prince Siddhattha up in his pleasant palace and keep him occupied only with his own pleasure and delight, so now he allowed him to go out into the city as much as he pleased. And very often the Prince drove round the city, seeing everything, and thinking, always thinking about what he saw, and trying to make up his mind what to do.

After one of these drives through the city, as, on his way home again, he was passing the rooms of the palace where the ladies lived, one of the Princesses called Kisagotami happened to be looking out of her window, and seeing the Prince, she was much struck by his handsome, noble appearance, and exclaimed to herself: "O how happy, how cool, how content must be the mother, and the father, and the wife of such a splendid young Prince?"

But she spoke louder than she thought she was speaking, and the Prince, as he passed, heard what she was saying. And he thought to himself: "Yes, mother and father and wife have happiness and comfort and content in their hearts at having such a son and husband. But what is real true happiness and comfort and content?"

And the Prince's mind, being already turned away from delight in worldly things by the sights he had seen and the thoughts about them that filled his mind all the time, he said low to himself: "Real true happiness and comfort and content come when the fever of craving and of hating and of delusion is cured. When the fires of pride and false notions and passions are all put out, then comes real true happiness and coolness and content. And that is what I and all men need to get. That is what I must now go forth and seek. I cannot stay any longer in this palace leading this life of pleasure. I must go forth at once and seek, and go on seeking till I find it -- that real true happiness which will put me and all men beyond the power of old age and sickness and death. This lady had taught me a good lesson. Without meaning it she has been a good teacher to me. I must send her a teacher's fee."

So he took from his neck a fine pearl necklace he was wearing at the time, and sent it with his compliments to Princess Kisagotami. And the princess accepted it from the Prince's messenger and sent him back with her warmest thanks to the Prince, for she thought it was meant for a token that the handsome and clever young Prince Siddhattha had fallen in love with her and wished to make her his second wife.

But the Prince's thoughts were very far indeed from any such thing, and his father and his wife knew it very well. Indeed, every one about the Prince could see that he was now completely changed, more serious and thoughtful than he had ever been, when he came home from this day's ride about the city. But the father could not bear to lose his son without making one more, one last attempt to keep him. So he caused all the cleverest and most entrancingly beautiful singers and dancers in the kingdom to be brought to his son's palace, and they sang and danced before Prince Siddhattha as King Suddhodana commanded, doing their very best with their gayest, sweetest songs, their most enchanting and alluring postures to draw from his son smiles of approval and pleasure. And for a time the Prince looked at, and listened to them, not wishing to disappoint his father by a flat refusal to see them. But his eyes only half saw the beautiful, enticing forms before him, for his mind was taken up with something else that never left it alone now; he was thinking of the one only thing that now seemed worth thinking about at all -- how old age and sickness and death might be escaped by him and by all men, for ever. And at last, weary with so much thinking, worn out with so much brooding, in the midst of the music and loveliness that no longer now had power to charm or please, he fell into a dozing sleep.

The singers and dancers soon noticed that he whom they were supposed to be amusing, cared so little for their efforts, that he did not even take the trouble to keep awake and look at, and listened to them. So they stopped their dancing and singing, and lay down just where they were to wait till the Prince woke again. And soon they, too, like the Prince, fell asleep without knowing it, leaving the lights in the room all burning.

After some time the Prince woke from his doze and looked round him in astonishment, and also in disgust; for what did he see? All those girls who were supposed to be the prettiest and most charming in the country, and only a little while before had been posing before him in the most enchanting attitudes, now were scattered about the floor of the apartment in the ugliest, the most ungainly positions imaginable; some snoring like so many pigs, some with their mouths gaping wide open, some with the spittle oozing from the corners of their lips dribbling down over their dresses, some grinding their teeth in their sleep like hungry demons. So ugly, so repulsive did they look, one and all, that the Prince wondered how he ever could have taken any pleasure in them. The sight of all this that he once had thought loveliness so completely turned to loathsomeness, was the last thing needed to fill his mind with complete disgust for the life he was leading. His mind was now fully made up to leave all this repulsiveness behind him, and to go forth immediately to look for that real happiness which would bring to an end all evil things.

Rising quietly, so as not to disturb and wake any of the sleeping girls, he stole out of his room, and called his servant Channa to him, and told him to saddle his favorite white horse, Kanthaka, for now, at once, he was going out on a long journey.

While Channa was away getting ready Kanthaka, Siddhattha thought he would go and take a last look at his little son before he left. So he went to the room where his wife lay sleeping with her babe beside her. But when he opened the door and looked in, he saw that his wife was sleeping with her hand so placed that it rested on and was covering the baby's head.

"If I try to move her hand," said the Prince to himself, "so as to see my boy's face, I fear I may wake her. And if she wakes, she will not let me go away. No, I must go now without seeing my son's face this time; but when I have found what I am going forth to seek, I shall come back and see him and his mother again."

Then, very quietly, so as to wake nobody, the Prince slipped out of the palace, and in the stillness of the midnight hour mounted his white horse Kanthaka who also kept quite quiet, and neither neighed nor made any other sound that might wake any one. Then, with faithful Channa holding on to Kanthaka's tail, Siddhattha came to the city gate, and, passing through without any one trying to stop him, rode away from all who knew and loved him.

When he had gone a little distance, he pulled up Kanthaka and, turning round, took a last look at the city of Kapilavatthu sleeping there so calm and quiet in the moonlight, while he, its Prince, was leaving it like this, not knowing when he should see it again. It was the city of his fathers, the city where he was leaving behind him a young and beloved wife, and a precious infant son, but he did not weaken in his resolve one jot; no thought of turning back to them entered his mind. That mind was now thoroughly made up. Again he turned his face in the direction he had to go, and rode on till he came to the banks of a river called the Anoma. Here he dismounted, and standing on the sandy beach, that on both hands, stretched away, white as silver, in the moonlight, he took off all his jewels and ornaments, and giving them to Channa, said: "Here, good Channa. Take these adornments of mine and white Kanthaka, and take them back home. The hour has now come for me to give up the worldly life."

"O my dear master," cried Channa, "do not go away like this all by yourself. Let me too leave the world and come with you."

But although Channa again, and yet once more, asked to be allowed to stay with his master and to go with him wherever he went, the Prince was firm and refused to take him with him.

"It is not yet the time for you to retire from the worldly life," he said to Channa. "Go back to the city at once and tell my father and mother from me that I am quite well." And he forced him to take all his jewelry from him and also his horse Kanthaka.

Channa could not now refuse to do what his master commanded him, so with a heavy heart and weeping sorely, he turned back along the white moonlit road to the city leading Kanthaka by the bridle to take the sad news to Kapilavatthu that his beloved master, their prince, at last as he long had threatened, had left parents and wife and children and kingdom behind him, and had gone away to be a wanderer without a home.

In this way it was that at the age of twenty-nine, in the full flush of early manhood, while still black-haired and young and strong,

Prince Siddhattha Gotama of the noble house of the Sakya race, went forth from home into homelessness, in order to seek for himself and for all men, some way whereby he and they might win forever beyond the reach of all ill, all distress, all grief, all sorrow, all despair.

* * *

PART ONE: INNER WEALTH ==========

Last Sermon ========== "On February 19, 1956, Khun Nai Thawngmuan Siasa Lee Dhammadharo to deliver a sermon for Khun Thao Satyanurak in Nekkhamma House, sermon--which Khun Thao Satya listened to quietly, with her hands folded in respect as sh sickbed--was the last sermon she ever heard. When the sermon was over, I approached h die, I 'd like to jot down this sermon and have it printed to distribute at your funeral.' She s with her eyes, nodded slightly to show her approval, and asked, 'Can you remember it all?'
' I answered, 'but at least some of it.' So she reviewed a few of the points for me. She se delighted and moved by the taste of the Dhamma all the while she spoke. Thus I have writ summary of what I can remember of the sermon: namo tassa bhagavato arahato samma-sambuddhassa. ayudo balado dhiro'ti. Now I will discuss a point the Buddha's teachings for you to listen to briefly as a means of fostering strength of body strength of mind. All of us live in dependence on strength of body and strength of mind. W two things, life couldn't last. Strength of body, no matter how much we may foster it four necessities and with worldly wealth, can't help but waste away and vanish by its very can't escape from ageing, illness and death. And for strength of body to exist, it needs help strength of mind. But strength of mind doesn't need to depend on the four necessities or w and it doesn't need to depend on strength of body at all. It can get along solely on 'Noble V So strength of mind is more important than strength of body. People who don't have strength of their own have to start out by hoping to depend on others until they reach the po they can stand on their own. In depending on others, we have to be careful in choosing a g line with the Pali phrase, asevana ca balanam, panditananca sevana: We have to choose associate with. If we associate with wise people and sages, they'll teach us to be good. If with fools, we'll suffer for it. So searching for a mainstay of this sort doesn't rank a being really good, because it's like shooting a bird: We might hit it on the wing or on the t we really want to be right on target, we have to depend on another sort of mainstay: atta h we have to depend on ourselves. This sort of mainstay the Lord Buddha praised as being because it will teach us to have a sense of our own good and bad actions--'kammassako'm need to go placing our hopes on other people any more. To create this sort of main have to develop five qualities--conviction, persistence, mindfulness, concentration and discernment--which are called bala, or strengths, that will help give us the strength of mind towards the good. All five of these qualities can be gathered under the headings of virtue, and discernment. Conviction comes under virtue; persistence, mindfulness and concentra concentration; and discernment is discernment. To have conviction is tantamount t wealth. Virtue is like a white cloth that enwraps the body and makes it beautiful, just as th of a lotus enwrap the scent of its pollen. Virtue is the act of abandoning that cuts away evil corruption from our deeds so that our deeds will be honest and upright. This is virtue, but the ultimate good. When our body has virtue, our mind needs rectitude to go with it.

Persistence means diligence, determination, perseverance, being audacious and unrelenti as to be strong in progressing toward what is good. Mindfulness means care and r make sure that our thoughts, words and deeds don't go off the mark; being conscious of g that our behavior doesn't fall into ways that are bad and unwise. Concentration me keeping the mind firmly centered in a single object--the direct path (ekayana-magga)--not l lean or waver under the influence of its preoccupations, whether good or bad, past or futu the mind honest and upright. All three of these qualities form the rectitude of the mir abstains from thoughts of sensuality, ill-will and harm. This is termed the intention of renu (nekkhamma-sankappo): The mind isn't pleased or displeased with sensual moods or sen whether good or bad. This is a mind that has gone forth from the home life. Whether or no whether we live at home or in a monastery, we are classed as having gone forth. T quality, which the Buddha classed as the highest good, is discernment. Once we have virt concentration, discernment will arise from the mind in the first, second, third and fourth leve jhana. This is the light of discernment that enables us to see the Dhamma both within us a can see ourself from both sides. We can see that the aspect that takes birth, takes birth; a there is also an aspect that doesn't take birth. The aspect that ages, ages; and there is als that doesn't age. The aspect that's ill, is ill; and there is also an aspect that isn't ill. The as that dies, dies; and the aspect that doesn't die, doesn't die. This is change-of-lineage know (gotarabhu-nana), which sees both sides, like having two eyes. Whichever side we look at but we aren't stuck on either side. We simply know things in line with their nature as fashio they have to take birth, age, grow ill and die. These four facts have made arahants of the r who have contemplated them and seen their true nature clearly to the point of working free unawareness. The nature of the body is that it flows in one direction--toward decay--b won't flow along with it. The mind is sure to progress in line with its strength. Whoever has strength will go far. Whoever gets stuck on birth will have to take birth. Whoever gets stu ageing will have to age. Whoever gets stuck on illness will have to be ill. Whoever gets st will have to die. But whoever isn't stuck on birth, ageing, illness and death is bound for a doesn't take birth, doesn't age, doesn't grow ill and doesn't die. When we can do we're said to have found a hunk of Noble Wealth in birth, ageing, illness and death. We ne poverty. Even though the body may age, our mind doesn't age. If the body is going to gr let it grow ill and die, but our mind doesn't grow ill, our mind doesn't die. The mind of an ar such that, even if someone were to break his head open, his mind wouldn't be pained. the mind is involved with the world, it's bound to meet with collisions; and once it collides, it shaken and roll back and forth, just as round stones in a large pile roll back and forth. So how good or bad other people may be, we don't store it up in our mind to give rise to feelin dislike. Dismiss it completely as being their business, and none of ours. The five Hindrances are five diseases that fasten on and eat into the mind, leaving it thin and famish has concentration reaching deep into the heart will be able to kill off all five of these disea

Such a person is sure to be full in body and mind--free from hunger, poverty and want--and asking for goodness from anyone. The results we'll receive are: (1) We'll make ou rich in Noble Wealth. (2) If the Buddha were still alive, he'd be sure to be pleased, just as whose child is wealthy and self-sufficient can stop being anxious and thus sleep in peace. To summarize: Worldly wealth is what fosters strength of body; Noble Wealth is what foste mind. So I ask that we all put this teaching into practice, training ourselves and polishing o thoughts, words and deeds so that they are worthy and pure, reaching the stage of Noble V the path to the highest happiness: nibbana. A Mind of Pure Gold (July, 1958) ========== The mind, the Buddha said, is like gold. An i gold adulterated with various minerals that will make it hard and unmalleable. Before it car in any way, it first has to be melted down and its impurities--the various adulterations--remo completely. Only then will it be genuine gold, soft and malleable. Our mind, which is adult various preoccupations, first has to be put into shape, and its impurities--its various defilements--completely removed. Only then will it be a pure mind, becoming a thing of su usefulness, like genuine gold malleable enough to be melted and poured into anything at a mind can pour around the world without getting snagged, and can roll all around itself, like water on a lotus leaf, which will roll around without seeping into the leaf. This is what is me mind that is Dhamma. Or you might compare a pure mind to genuine beeswax, which in order to melt. No matter how large or small a lump it may be, all it needs is a little sunlig the warmth of your hand, and it will be soft and malleable enough for you to form it into ar all. A pure mind can be put to every sort of use in line with your aspirations in just the sam is why the Buddha taught that every sort of achievement depends completely on the pow Things that are genuine or pure, even though they may be small, can give rise to en results, just as a piece of genuine paper money--a tiny little slip of paper with the state sea put to use in all sorts of ways. But if it's newsprint, even a bushel of it wouldn't be able to thing. In the same way, a pure mind--even if we can make it pure for only a little while--car way in excess of its size. People who are really intent on purifying the mind may even lift over and beyond the world. So we're taught that people whose minds aren't pure--re of whether they've given donations or observed precepts by the tens or hundreds of thousa escape going to hell. At best, they may make it back only as human beings. A mind adulte preoccupations will have to go to a bad bourn. A mind adulterated with good preoccupatio good bourn, as a heavenly being. A pure mind, though, will go above and beyond all this. For this reason, you should focus on watching only your mind. Don't let your attention go l ears, eyes, nose, tongue and body. If the mind is murky, make it clear. Keep trying to cha various preoccupations until they're completely gone, leaving only the genuine gold: a pur your heart on doing it right now. Just as we have to give rise to goodness in our actions, we have to give rise to goodness in our minds, by letting go of physical and phenomena, which are a heavy load. This is why the Buddha taught, bhara have pancakk khandhas are truly a burden.' The body is heavier than rock. How is it heavy? It's big. W Enormous. Its mouth can eat cattle by the herd, rice by the ton, and yet never be full for a have to keep finding things to stuff in it all the time, which is a burden to the heart. We've shoring up this body ever since we were little and red, so that it will stay with us, and yet it stay. What does stay is nothing more than scraps. What's good leaves us completely. Do that it'll stay. The part that's left loads us down, creating stress and pain. So we're taught Caga: Relinquish what's outside, i.e., the body; and let go of what's in the mind, i.e., its v preoccupations that follow along with the world. If we can let go of these things, we'll be lig and mind. And when we're light in this way, we can be at our ease. Then we can c further that all these things fall under the truths of the world. That is, they're inconstant, str and not the self. They make us misconstrue everything, just as when we let ourselves ge spending our money. There are people, for instance, who make sugar water with various c drink at 10, 20 or 30 cents a glass. Actually, it's no different from the ordinary water we d we have it all misconstrued, and think that it's something special--so we'll come back to spe to drink it again. This is inconstancy. It's like waves that keep rising and falling, causing u waver, keeping us from being still and at peace. When we see this, we should incline our h being trained in the Dhamma. A person who lets the mind be defiled is like someone his children play in the mud: They're bound to cause hardships for their parents, and not o they're bound to cause hardships for themselves, because they have no livelihood, no basi themselves up in life. So we should train our hearts to be adults in order to outgrow our de corruptions . We shouldn't let ourselves get tied up in worldly affairs, because they good only from age 20 to 40. From that point on, our mouth gets smaller and smaller, our we can scarcely open them. Whatever we say doesn't get past our lips. Our hands get s have to give them a one-meter extension called a 'cane'. Our back gets crooked--and with run down like this, what are we going to want out of it? It's enough to make you heartsick should develop what's good and becoming within ourselves. Develop goodness into a Nob other words, relinquishment (caga) and virtue (sila) are two things we should foster in our that we can begin to grow up, unfold and go beyond being children... Once we've r middle of life, things start getting shorter and shorter, so we're taught not to be complacent will give rise to knowledge, we should stir ourselves to pursue, like a child who studies ma playing truant or thinking only of fun and games. Such a child is sure to have a high level o in the future. People in this world--even though they may be 80 years old--if they s sunk in worldly matters, are still children. Relinquishment and virtue: Once we give rise to things, we're headed for adulthood. Otherwise, we're still children. So we shouldn't let the settle on things that aren't good for it. Sometimes there are both good and bad things. Th are hard to latch onto; the bad are easy. If we give our children free rein to go playing, th the most part bring us nothing but trouble. Sometimes they hang around doing nothing at a back with other people's belongings in their pockets. In other words, sometimes other pe something, and yet we let it get stuck in our hearts. This is being infantile. Our minds are a defilements, which is why we're said to be children. So we should consider things carefully. Whatever will benefit us, we should take an interest in. If a poor person wanders shiftlessly about, nobody pays any mind; but if a rich person behaves that way, people real In other words, we shouldn't let our hearts go lurking about in shoddy or unwise preoccupa have to practice tranquillity meditation to make the mind still. That's when we'll begin to en adulthood. When the mind is still, it gradually gives rise to discernment, just as a kerosene lantern we keep looking after--adding kerosene, making sure that nothing disturb bound to grow bright. The wick is the breath, the theme of our meditation. The effort we the kerosene: We keep looking after the mind, making sure that the various preoccupation of the eyes, ears, nose, etc., don't collide with the heart. The mind will become bright and like the wick of a kerosene lantern that we keep fed with fuel and whose burnt parts we kee If liberating insight arises, we'll see the absolute truth--that all our preoccupations are inconstant, stressful and not the self--appearing in our heart. When we can see things way, we'll be able to let go of our various preoccupations. The mind will give rise to a brill radiance--termed dhammo pajjoto, the light of the Dhamma--and we'll attain to the transcen mind. When we reach this point, that's when we're said to have grown up. We can go whe no one will be able to pull the wool over our eyes. Fashionings (February 6, 1956) ========== (Delivered at a funeral service for Somdet Phra M Uan), Wat Boromnivas.) anicca vata sankhara uppada-vaya-dhammino uppajjitva .... The Dhamma, in one sense, is a means of nourishing the heart to make it pure. I sense, the Dhamma is ourself. Every part of our body is a piece of the world, and the worl of the Dhamma. But it's not the essence of the Dhamma. The essence of the Dhamma li

The development of all that is good and worthwhile comes from our own thoughts, deeds. The good that comes from our words and deeds, such as the development of chari goodness on the crude and intermediate levels. The refined level, goodness developed b heart, is meditation. For this reason, the issues of the heart are the most important things to understand. There are two issues to the heart: the aspect of the heart that take birth and dies, and the aspect of the heart that doesn't take birth and doesn't die. If the hea for fashionings (sankhara), it's bound to take birth and die repeatedly. But the heart that tru and clearly knows all fashionings can then let go of them, and thus won't take birth and wo want to go beyond suffering and stress--not to take birth and not to die--then we first have the true nature of fashionings so that we can understand them. Fashionings, as the in actuality, are of two sorts: fashionings on the level of the world, and fashionings on the l the Dhamma. Both sorts have their reality, but they're things that arise and then decay. Th Buddha said, 'anicca vata sankhara...'--which means, 'All fashionings are inconstant...'--be sorts of these fashionings begin by arising, then change, and finally disband. Whoever can know clearly and truly see this condition, curb the mind and become wise to all fashionings gain release from all suffering and stress. Fashionings on the level of the world are that people create and conjure into being, such as wealth, status, pleasure and praise. A fashionings on the level of the Dhamma, whether or not we dress them up, we all have the measure--i.e., properties (dhatu), khandhas and sense media. Fashionings on the lev world and of the Dhamma are like the changing colors on a movie screen. They flicker and Red. Yellow. White. Changing back and forth. When we watch, our eyes have to chang follow them--and this is what gives rise to misunderstandings. When the mind fastens on fashionings, it gives rise to feelings of satisfaction and dissatisfaction. When they change f bad, our mind changes along with them--and so it falls into the characteristics of inconstan and not-self. From another point of view, fashionings can be divided into two sorts: with a mind in possession, such as people or animals; and those without a mind in possess trees. But though this may be the standard interpretation of fashionings without a mind in I don't agree with it. Take the stairway to this hall: If you say that it doesn't have a mind in possession of it, try smashing it and see whether or not there'll be an uproar. The same h with fields--try planting rice in someone else's field--or with banana and other fruit trees pla orchard: Try hacking them with a knife to see whether or not their owner will have you thr Everything in the world to which attachment extends has to have a mind in possession. Or Mars, to which the sphere of attachment doesn't yet extend, doesn't have a mind in posse sort of fashioning has a mind in possession--except for arahants, who don't have a mind in because they aren't attached to any fashionings at all. Attachment to fashionings is source of stress, because fashionings are inconstant, as we've already explained. So only go and not be attached to fashionings will we meet with happiness and ease--ease in the s Dhamma, ease that is cool, quiet, solid and unchanging. Ease in the worldly sense isn't a from sitting in a chair: Only if the chair doesn't wobble will we have any ease. The wobblin is of two sorts: wobbling naturally and wobbling under the influence of intention and its fru many times does the mind wobble in a day? Sometimes it wobbles from intentions in the p from intentions in the past, but how it's wobbling, we don't know. This is avijja, the unawar causes fashionings--thoughts--to arise. The other side to all this is non-fashioning (visankhara). What is non-fashioning? No wobbling, no changing, no disbanding: That's Fashionings change, but our mind doesn't change. Fashionings are stress, but our mind is Fashionings are not-self, but our mind isn't not-self. Fashionings without a mind in posses That's non-fashioning. Most of us, by and large, are aware only of the knowledge of the Six Teachers--the senses of sight, hearing, smell, taste, feeling and ideation--which are change, uncertainty, stress, unawareness and fashionings. So we should close off these fashionings can't see other fashionings. Only if we get on the other side will we be able to

The Tree is in its Seed (August 27, 1956) ==========
The purpose of sitting and meditating is to cut away the various thoughts that preoccupy ou more preoccupations we can cut away, the lighter we'll feel. All of the various burdens that our hearts--all the stresses and strains we feel--will lessen and disappear. Goodness come from concepts. Concepts of past and future are what obstruct and destroy our goodn said, atitam nanvagameyya nappatikankhe anagatam paccuppannanca yo dh tatha vipassati: If we don't go conceiving the past or the future, leaving only the present, we'll be able to see the truth of the Dhamma. Concepts, even if the with the Dhamma, are fashionings, because they fall in the area of mental concoction. The types of mental fashionings: (1) If we think in ways that are good, they're called meritorious (punnabhisankhara). (2) If we think in ways that are evil, they're called demeritorious conc (apunnabhisankhara). (3) If we think in ways that are neither good nor evil, they're called in concoctions (anenjabhisankhara) or avyakata--neutral and indeterminate. Actually, anenja a higher meaning, because it refers to the four levels of absorption in formlessness (arupa Avyakata refers to such things as thinking about eating a meal or taking a bath, things that completely unrelated to good and evil. All of these fashionings come from unawareness an we're really intelligent and aware. we shouldn't go conceiving them. To cut off conc means to let our mental fashionings disband, to let our trains of thought disband. We sit in making the body and mind quiet. When the body is still, the mind stays with the stillness. heart is at peace, the mind stays with the peace. Concentration develops. The mind come forefront. Mental fashionings disappear, but the mind is still there. Goodness is still there nibbana, nothing disappears anywhere, or gets annihilated, except for unawareness.

mental fashionings and unawareness disband, awareness arises. For example, knowledge see the mind's ancestry--its past lifetimes. Knowledge of death and rebirth: We know the actions of our fellow beings, how they die and are reborn. A mind trained to maturity in con develops quality, like a mature mango seed, which is capable of containing all its ancestry and children, in itself. If anyone plants it, it'll break out into roots, stems, branches, leaves, and more fruits just like before. A mind not yet trained to maturity is like the seed of an un mango that has fallen from the tree. If you plant it, it won't grow. It'll just rot there in the dir Since it's not yet ripe, it isn't capable of containing its ancestry and descendants.

People who are aware of their own birth and death in this way are said not to be lacking. N what? Not lacking in birth. They're acquainted with the births they've experienced through and states of being in the past--so many that they're weary of it all, to the point where they to take birth again. As for people who don't know, who don't have this awareness, they fee they're lacking. They want to take birth again, and so they keep on creating birth over and As for those who do have awareness, they've had enough. They're smart enough. They w any more births or states of being. Whatever is good, they keep within themselves, like pu mango seed in a showcase to look at, or peeling off its hard outer shell and then putting it i storeroom. No one will be able to plant it again, and we can take it out for a look whenever

To train the mind to a higher level is the apex of all that is good and worthwhile. To rais level of our heart is like coming up and sitting here in the meditation hall. Once we've gotte the level of the ground, we've escaped from the rain, the heat of the sun, and from all sorts Dogs, for instance, can't jump up to claw us or bite us. Or we can make a compar a tall mountain top. Nothing filthy or dirty can stay on a mountain top. Whether it's rain, de fog, when it comes into contact with the summit, it all has to flow down to the lowlands and It can't stay and form puddles on the summit. At the same time, fresh breezes come blowi four directions, keeping the mountain top dry and free from dampness. Or we can n comparison with a tall treetop. Ordinarily, nobody--human or animal--can urinate or defeca anything dirty on a tall treetop. And since the treetop is tall, its flowers and fruits are born Anyone who wants to pick the topmost leaves or destroy the fruits and flowers will have a h because the height of the tree makes it hard to climb. In the same way, once we'v heart full with what is good and worthwhile, then no matter if people praise or condemn us, want anything of what they have to say. If they say we're not good, it flows right back to th what's really good within us, it stays as it always was. A person whose heart is fed full with good and worthwhile is like a person whose stomach is full of food, and is thus bound to be not want to eat anything more: free from hunger and craving. No matter what fantastic foo people may bring him, he won't want any of it. Or if anyone brings him poison, he won't ta other words, we aren't interested in the goodness or evil that comes from other people. We the goodness that we build up within ourselves. Ignorant people think that good and things we have to get from other people, and not that they come from within us--and so th eyes and keep on groping. They have no sense of the good that lies within them, like the p groping for a mango tree without realizing that the mango tree lies in its seed. Once we r though, all we have to do is take the seed and plant it, and soon it'll sprout roots and becom with leaves and branches, flowers and fruits that will keep on multiplying into hundreds of no time at all, we'll be millionaires, because mangoes, even when they've grown only to the thumb, already begin to fetch a price. People buy and sell mangoes from the time they're until they're half-ripe, fully ripe and even over-ripe. Sometimes mangoes that are half-rotte get a price, although not as much as mangoes that are still good. People whose mi haven't yet really reached a high level, when they meet with criticism, will usually keep it an

it. By and large, we like to think that we're intelligent, and yet we let our minds feed on ba and preoccupations. Bad moods are like scraps and bones that other people have spit out poor and starving, to the point where we have to beg others for food, we should feed on th they have to offer us, which are like food that hasn't been spit out by anyone. But even the counted as poor, as stupid and ignorant, because even though we have genuine goodnes still go running off to gather good and evil from other people. This has to be wrong.
right way is that no matter what anyone else may say, we let it pass. We should view what their property, and as none of ours. As for the goodness we're developing, it's bound to sta Like eating a wormy mango: An intelligent person will eat only the good flesh, and leave th to the worms. In other words, don't go moving in with the worms. To be intelligent in this qualify as a human being--which means a high-minded being--just as when we come up th meditation hall, we escape the cats and dogs that would otherwise bother us. Here, they and pounce on us. But if we sit on the ground, we're exposed to the sun and rain and all s disturbances. We're mixed up with sages and fools. When wise people practice t they have to be selective and choose only what's good. They won't let their minds feed on spoiled, because spoiled things, when we feed on them, can be toxic and harmful. As for g we eat them, they don't cause any harm. They can only benefit us. Good evil, purity--all come from within us. The Buddha thus taught that each of us has his or her What he said on this point is absolutely true. There's no way you can argue with it. 'Kam good and bad actions that come from intentions. Intentions are thoughts that come from th mind lies at the essence of intention and kamma, because the mind is what thinks and giv

When an intention is shoddy or dishonest, the resulting action is bad kamma, and will resul
When an intention is good, proper and honest, the action will be good kamma and will res
So whether we're to suffer or to experience pleasure, to be good or shoddy, pure or impur our own actions and intentions, not on anything anyone else may do for us. Once we reali no more confusion. The Lessons of Unawareness (August 21, 1956) ========== "The sermon this afternoon was 'vijja-carana-sampanno sugato lokavidu.' I didn't listen to the beginning. All I can rememb this:" ....The real nature of the Dhamma isn't all that difficult for people who have awareness; but it is hard for people who don't. It's hard because it goes against our wishes followed our wishes, it'd be easy. The genuine Dhamma is something that goes against ou good things ordinarily are bound to be that way. It's the nature of things that are beneficial to us that they're hard and require effort. Even worldly things are this way. Things actual beneficial are usually hard to obtain. But as for things of no real use to us, there's no need any great trouble to search for them. There are heaps of them right in our own back yard.
I'm referring here to unawareness--ignorance of what's real. But this ignorance of what's re wellspring that can give rise to awareness, or knowledge of what's real. This knowledge of exists everywhere, like water vapor that rises into the atmosphere. Whoever has the ingen and bring it inwards will feel cool, content and refreshed. This is called vijja-carana-sampa is the opposite of unawareness. So I'd like to explain one more point in the theme, vijja-ca which means, 'Those who really search for the Dhamma are sure to be always giving rise t within themselves.' Here we first have to explain the word 'dhamma'. Dhamma is so exists in each and every one of us. It can be divided into three sorts: wholesome, unwhole neutral. 1. Wholesomeness (kusala-dhamma) means the goodness that exists nat or not there's a Buddha to point it out. This dhamma is what gives comfort and benefit to li proportion to how much they practice it. Don't go thinking that goodness comes from hav formulated by the Buddha, or that it comes from his teachings. Goodness has been in the long before the time of the Buddha, but no one was really acquainted with it because no s to identify it. But when the Buddha came and ferreted out awareness itself, he was able to dhamma that has existed in the world from time immemorial. This sort of dhamma didn't a he said or taught. It's the goodness that exists naturally in the world. If this sort of goodne didn't exist as a normal part of the world, the human race would have died out long ago. T have any peace and well-being at all comes from our having imbued our hearts with this go have been able to discover it. Otherwise we wouldn't be able to withstand all the fires of w

2. Unwholesomeness (akusala-dhamma): The same holds true with evil. It doesn't anything the Buddha said or taught. It exists on its own in the world, by its nature. But peo haven't thought about it or observed it misunderstand things. They think that evil comes f Buddha taught, and so they don't pay it any attention because they think good and evil wer Buddha. In this way, good and evil get all mixed up together, without anyone knowing the

But the Buddha was endowed with supreme intelligence, and so was able to tell wha rice, what was husked rice, what was bran, and what was chaff. He then sorted them into that people could choose whichever they prefer, with the realization that each of us is resp his or her own kamma: Whoever does good will have to meet with good; whoever does ev with evil. All dhammas--the good and evil that exist naturally--ultimately come dow mind right here in this very body. It's not the case that we have to go searching for them a outside. If we were to ask where it all came from, the Buddha would probably be able to it'd be like hitting the earth with your fist. If we were to ask where the mind comes from, we answer that it comes from us. And where do we come from? From our parents. That's a

If we were to answer on a different level--one that's more difficult to see, and that people of awareness can manage--we'd say that the mind comes from unawareness. And come from? From mental fashionings. And what do mental fashionings come from? Fro like the old question, where does the chicken come from? The egg. And the egg? From t we keep asking and answering, we simply go around in circles without ever coming to the how things are on the level of the world. The issues of the mind all boil down to two one that likes to do good, and one that likes to do evil. One mind, but there's two of it. S an inclination to do good takes hold of us, and so we want to do good. This is called being wholesomeness. Sometimes an inclination to do evil takes hold of us, and so we want to called being possessed by unwholesomeness. In this way, our mind is kept always unsettl

So the Buddha taught us to develop our awareness in order to know what's good worthwhile, and what's evil and worthless. If unawareness obscures our mind, we can't se clearly, just as when haze obscures our eyesight. If our knowledge gets really far up awa world, we'll have even less chance of seeing anything, just as a person who goes up high i then looks down below won't be able to see houses or other objects as clearly as when h the ground. The higher he goes, the more everything becomes a haze. He won't be able t human life at all. This is why the Buddha taught us to fill ourselves with as much awarene possible, so that our ears and eyes will be bright and clear, unobscured by fog or haze. Av sort taught by the Buddha, can arise in three ways: 1. Sutamaya-panna: This is th awareness in which we study and listen to what other people say so that we can understan things will lead us in the direction of suffering and stress, and what good things will lead us direction of well-being and ease. Once we know, we can then ask ourselves, 'Do we want direction of suffering?' If we answer, 'No, we don't, because it's a hardship. We'd rather go direction of well-being,' we have to set our hearts on giving rise to goodness. That goodne to lead us in the direction of well-being. For example, some people are born way out in th yet they train and educate themselves to the point where they end up important and influen same holds true with us. If we train and educate ourselves, we're all bound to end up as g

This is education on the elementary level--our ABC's--called sutamaya-panna. 2.
Cintamaya-panna: Once we've learned that certain things are good, we should try each of good results arising within us. Don't go jumping to any fixed conclusions that this or that good or right. For example, some things may be correct in terms of the Dhamma you've le try them out, they may be wrong in terms of other people's feelings. So when we're taugh that seems right, we should remember it. When we're taught something that seems wrong it. We then take these things and evaluate them on our own until we give rise to an unde Only then can we be called intelligent. In other words, we don't simply believe what books, what other people say or what our teachers tell us. Before we do anything, we sho carefully until it's certain and clear to us. Only then should we go ahead and do it. This is believing in our own sense of reason. This is the second level of awareness, but it's not t It can eliminate only some of the unawareness that exists within us. Both of the levels men are awareness on the low level. 3. The truly high level of awareness is called bhavanamaya-panna. This level of awareness arises in a trained mind. This is what is me vijja-carana-sampanno sugato lokavidu. The awareness here includes knowledge of one's knowledge of death and rebirth--knowing the mental stream of other people, what sort of they've done, and where they will go after death; and knowledge of the end of mental ferme develops the mind to the point of Right Concentration, giving rise to intuitive insight, will b let go of: (i) Self-identification (sakkaya-ditthi). They'll see that the body isn't really theirs. (ii) Uncertainty (vicikiccha). Their doubts about the virtues of the Buddha, D and Sangha will be gone for good. They'll have no more doubts about the paths and their phala). The paths, their fruitions and nibbana will have to exist for whoever is true in prac Dhamma, no matter what the time or season. This is termed akaliko: The Dhamma gives what the time or season. Opanayiko: People who give rise to virtue, concentration and d within themselves are sure to see that the qualities of the Buddha, Dhamma and Sangha c insecurity and dread. Such people will also let go of: (iii) Attachment to the formali of virtue (silabbata-paramasa). The virtues of the five precepts will be firmly established i hearts. To let go in this way is called knowledge of the end of mental fermentation (asavakkhaya-nana), or vijja-carana-sampanno--being consummate in knowledge and con these three primary forms of awareness, we may also develop clairvoyance, clairaudience powers. But unless we can still our mind in concentration, we won't be able to gain any of awareness, even if we study all 84,000 divisions of the Canon, because all of these forms depend on the stillness of concentration. The ability to put away all forms of evil depends o stillness of concentration. When awareness arises within us, we are sure to see the truth o and what's evil. As long as this awareness doesn't arise, we're still deluded and groping.

For example, we may latch on to the body as being our own, or to the five khandhas--sens labels, mental fashionings and cognizance--as being our own. Some people identify thems greed, anger or delusion. For example, when greed arises, they identify with the greed. W arises, they identify with the anger. When delusion arises, they identify with the delusion. things arise only at certain times. Sometimes when lack of anger arises, these people iden with the lack of anger. And when lack of greed or delusion arises, they identify with the lac or delusion--and so these things get all mixed up because of unawareness, or ignorance o

But once we've developed awareness, then when greed arises, we won't identify with holds true with anger and delusion. This is a step we have to master so that we can catch these three defilements actually come and go. In other words, when greed comes, we sit a the greed until it dies of its own accord. We'll then be able to know exactly what ugly featu when it comes, and exactly how good it is when it goes. We just sit there and watch it until and we'll feel an immediate sense of relief. When anger or delusion comes, we sit and kee anger or delusion--don't go running off anywhere else--and we'll be able to see exactly how when it comes, and how good it is when it goes. What delusion is like when it comes--no side it's going to be deluded about--we make a point of keeping our gaze fixed on it. When ourselves in check this way, that's awareness. But if, when greed comes, we get along with the greed, or when anger or delusion comes, we get carried along with the ange that's unawareness. If we're constantly on the look-out for these three defilements, the day come when they grow ashamed of themselves. We'll know how they arise, we'll see how t we'll perceive how they disband. This is the awareness that comes from unawareness. can contemplate things in this way, we'll be able to gain all eight forms of cognitive skill. If hold ourselves in check in the midst of our defilements, without feeling obliged to let them our actions, we'll give rise to awareness within. This is what is meant by vijja-carana-samp hearts will be pure, free from greed, anger and delusion. Sugato lokavidu: We'll fare well come or go, and wherever we stay. This sort of awareness is the real thing. It's the aware bring us success in the sphere of the Dhamma.

THE WAY OF WISDOM

The Five Spiritual Faculties

by

EDWARD CONZE

Buddhist Publication Society

Kandy Sri Lanka

Buddhist Publication Society
P.O. Box 61
54, Sangharaja Mawatha
Kandy, Sri Lanka

First published 1964
Reprinted 1980, 1993

ISBN 955-24-0110-0

The text of this booklet was, with some modifications, first published in The Middle Way, Vol. XXVIII (1953).

DharmaNet edition published 1993

This electronic edition is offered for free distribution via DharmaNet by arrangement with the publisher.

Formatted for DharmaNet by John Bullitt.

THE WHEEL PUBLICATION No. 65/66

PART I:
~~~~~~~

THE FIVE SPIRITUAL FACULTIES
~~~ ~~~~ ~~~~~~~~~~ ~~~~~~~~~~

Spiritual progress depends on the emergence of five cardinal virtues--faith, vigour, mindfulness, concentration and wisdom. The conduct of the ordinary worldling is governed by his sense-based instincts and impulses. As we progress, new spiritual forces gradually take over, until in the end the five cardinal virtues dominate and shape everything we do feel and think. These virtues are called, in

Sanskrit and Pali, //indriya//, variously translated by faculties, controlling faculties, or spiritual faculties.[1] The same five virtues are called powers (//bala//) if emphasis is on the fact that they are "unshakable by their opposites."

I. Faith

Faith is called "the seed," and without it the plant of spiritual life cannot start at all. Without faith one can, as a matter of fact, do nothing worthwhile at all. This is true not only of Buddhism, but of all religions, and even the pseudo-religions of modern times, such as Communism. And this faith is much more than the mere acceptance of beliefs. It requires the combination of four factors--intellectual, volitional, emotional and social.

1. //Intellectually//, faith is an assent to doctrines which are not substantiated by immediately available direct factual evidence. To be a matter of faith, a belief must go beyond the available evidence and the believer must be willing and ready to fill up the gaps in the evidence with an attitude of patient and trusting acceptance. Faith, taken in this sense, has two opposites, i.e. a dull unawareness of the things which are worth believing in, and doubt or perplexity. In any kind of religion some assumptions are taken on trust and accepted on the authority of scriptures or teachers.

Generally speaking, faith is, however, regarded as only a preliminary step, as a merely provisional state. In due course direct spiritual awareness will know that which faith took on trust, and longed to know: "Now we see through a glass darkly, but then face to face." Much time must usually elapse before the virtue of wisdom has become strong enough to support a vigorous insight into the true nature of reality. Until then quite a number of doctrinal points must be taken on faith.

What then in Buddhism are the objects of faith? They are essentially four: (1) the belief in karma and rebirth; (2) the acceptance of the basic teachings about the nature of reality, such as conditioned co-production, emptiness, etc.; (3) confidence in the "Three Refuges," the Buddha, the Dharma and the Order; and (4) a belief in the efficacy of the prescribed practices, and in Nirvana as the final way out of our difficulties. I shall say more about them when I have dealt with the other aspects of faith.

2. In this sceptical age we, anyway, dwell far too much on the intellectual side of faith. //shraddha//(Pali: //saddha//) the word we render as "faith," is etymologically akin to Latin //cor//, "the heart," and faith is far more a matter of the heart than of the intellect. It is, as Prof. Radhakrishnan incisively puts it, the "striving after self-realization by concentrating the powers of the mind on a given idea." //Volitionally//, faith implies a resolute and courageous act of will. It combines the steadfast resolution that one //will//do a thing with the self-confidence that one //can//do it. Suppose that people living on the one side of a river are doomed to perish from many enemies, diseases and famine. Safety lies on the other shore. The man of faith is then likened to the person who swims across the river, braving its dangers, saving himself and inspiring others by his example. Those without faith will go on dithering along the hither bank. The opposites to this aspect of faith are timidity, cowardice, fear, wavering, and a shabby, mean and calculating mentality.

3. //Emotionally//, faith is an attitude of serenity and lucidity. Its opposite here is worry, the state of being troubled by many things. It is said that someone who has faith loses the "five terrors," i.e. he ceases to worry about the necessities of life, about loss of reputation, death, unhappy rebirth and the impression he may make on an audience. It is fairly obvious that the burden of life must be greatly lightened by belief in karma, emptiness, or not-self. Even an unpleasant fate can be accepted more easily when it is understood as a dispensation of justice, when vexations are explained as an inevitable retribution, when law seems to rule instead of blind chance, when even apparent loss is bound to turn into true gain. And if there is no self, what and whom do we worry about? If there is only one vast emptiness, what is there to disturb our radiance?

4. //Socially//, and that is more difficult to understand, faith involves trust and confidence in the Buddha and the Sangha. Its opposite here is the state of being submerged in cares about one's sensory social environment, cares which spring from either social pressure or social isolation. The break with the normal social environment is, of course, complete only in the case of the monk who, as the formula goes, "in faith forsakes his home." To a lesser extent it must be carried out by every practitioner of the Dharma, who must "live apart" from his society, in spirit if not in fact. The company of others and the help we expect from them are usually a mainstay of our sense of security. By going for refuge to the Buddha and the Sangha one turns from the visible and tangible to the invisible and elusive. By placing one's reliance on spiritual forces one gains the strength to disregard public opinion and social discouragement. Some measure of defiant contempt for the world and its ways is inseparable from a spiritual life. The spiritual man does not "belong" to his visible environment, in which he is bound to feel rather a stranger. He belongs to the community of the saints, to the family of the Buddha. Buddhism substitutes a spiritual for the natural environment, with the Buddha for the father, the //Prajnaparamita// for the mother, the fellow-seekers for brothers and sisters, relatives and friends. It is with these more invisible forces that one must learn to establish satisfactory social relations. In carrying out this task, faith requires a considerable capacity for renunciation.

This concludes our survey of the four factors which go into the making of faith. Like other spiritual qualities, faith is somewhat paradoxical in that in one sense it is a //gift//which one cannot obtain by merely wanting to, and in another sense it is a //virtue//that can be cultivated. The capacity for faith varies with the constitution of the individual and his social circumstances. It is usual to classify types of personality according to whether they are dominated by greed, hatred or confusion. Those who walk in greed are said to be more susceptible to faith than the other two, because of the kinship which exists between faith and greed. To quote Buddhaghosa (//Visuddhimagga//III,75): "As on the unwholesome plane greed clings and takes no offence, so faith on the wholesome plane. As greed searches for objects of sense-desire, so faith for the qualities of morality, etc. As greed does not let go that which is harmful, so faith does not let go that which is beneficial."

As regards social conditions, there are ages of faith and ages of unbelief. The present age rather fosters unbelief. It puts a premium on intellectual smartness, so that faith is easily held to indicate nothing but a weak head or a lack of intellectual integrity. It multiplies the distractions from the sensory world to such an extent that the calm of the invisible world is harder to reach than ever. It exposes the citizen to so great a variety of conflicting viewpoints that he finds it hard to make a choice. The prestige of science, the concern with a high standard of living, and the disappearance of all institutions of uncontested authority are the chief foes of faith in our present-day society. It is largely a matter of temperament whether we believe that matters will improve in the near future.

As a virtue, faith is strengthened and built up by self-discipline, and not by discussing opinions. Intellectual difficulties are by no means the most powerful among the obstacles to faith. Doubts are inevitable, but how one deals with them depends on one's character. The first of our four "articles of faith" well illustrates this situation. There are many sound reasons for accepting the rebirth doctrine. This is not the place to expound them, and I must be content to refer the reader to the very impressive "East-West Anthology" on //Reincarnation//which J. Head and S.L. Cranston have published in 1961 (New York, The Julian Press Inc.). Yet, although belief in rebirth is perfectly rational and does not conflict with any known fact, the range of the average person's vision is so limited that he has no access to the decisive evidence, which is direct and immediate experience.

The rebirth doctrine assumes at least two things: (1) that behind the natural causality which links together events in the world of sense there are other, invisible chains of a moral causality, which assures that all good acts are rewarded, all bad actions punished; and

(2) that this chain of moral sequences is not interrupted by death, but continues from rebirth to rebirth. To the average person these two assumptions cannot be proved absolutely, conclusively and beyond the possibility of a doubt. However plausible they may seem on rational grounds, Buddhism teaches that they become a matter of direct experience only after the "superknowledges" (//abhijna//, //abhinna//) have been developed. The fourth "superknowledge" is the recollection of one's own previous rebirths, and the fifth the knowledge of the rebirths of other people, by which one "sees that whatever happens to them happens in accordance with their deeds." There are many well-authenticated cases of persons spontaneously remembering certain details of one or the other of their own previous lives, and these people obviously have an additional reason for belief in rebirth which is lacking in those who cannot recall ever having lived before. Full certitude on the issue is, however, given to those only who can, on the basis of the fourth //jhana//and by taking definite prescribed and disciplined steps on emerging from that //jhana//, "recall their manifold former lives," according to the well-known formula: "There I was, that was my name, that was my family, that was my caste, such was my food, this was the happiness, this the suffering which I experienced, this was the duration of my life-span. Deceased there I was born elsewhere and there had this name, etc." When a monk has practised properly and successfully, "these things become as clear to him as if lit up by a lamp" (//Visuddhimagga//, xiii, 23).

Until that time comes, we cannot claim that we //fully know//the doctrine of karma and rebirth to be true. We take it partly on faith. And this faith of ours is maintained less by our dialectical skill as by the virtues of patience and courage. For we must be willing to wait patiently until we are spiritually ripe for the emergence of the super-knowledges, however far off that might seem to be. And secondly, we must be willing to take risks. Life nowhere offers a one hundred per cent security, and for our convictions least of all. Employed in gaining wealth a merchant must risk his property. Employed in taking life, a soldier must risk his own life. Employed in saving his soul, the spiritual man must risk his own soul. The stake automatically increases with the prospect of gain. Of course, we may be mistaken. I sometimes wonder what I would think if, on dying, I would not, as I now fondly imagine, wake up on the Bardo plane, but find myself confronted with Acheron and the three-headed Cerberus, or, worse still, were ill-treated with fire and brimstone in a Christian hell. The experience would, I admit, be rather disconcerting. All that I can say in the face of such uncertainty is that I am willing to take the consequences, and that I hope that my fund of boldness, audacity and good humour will not run out.

One has the choice to magnify intellectual doubts, or to minimize them. It seems not unreasonable that one should blame the difficulties of the teaching on one's own distance from the truth, one's own intellectual and moral imperfections. How can one expect to remember one's past lives, if at present one cannot even recall hour by hour what one did during one single day a mere month ago? If one hesitates to accept, as not immediately obvious, the doctrine that this world is the result of ignorance and of the craving of non-existent individuals for non-existent objects--is this not perhaps due to the very denseness of one's own ignorance, for which one can collect plenty of proofs all day long? Doubts are effectively overcome when one purifies one's own life, so as to become more worthy of knowledge. It is a condition of all learning that one accepts a great deal on trust, that one gives the teacher the benefit of the doubt. Otherwise one can learn nothing at all, and remains shut out from all truth. To have faith means to take a deep breath, to tear oneself away from the daily cares and concerns, and to turn resolutely to a wider and more abiding reality. At first we are, by ourselves, too stupid and inexperienced to see the tracks which lead to salvation. So we must put our trust in the Sages of the past, and listen intently to their words, dimmed by distance and the noise of the present day, but still just audible.

One last word about tolerance, without which faith remains raw and unsure of itself. It is a perpetual trial to our faith that we should constantly meet with people who believe differently. We are easily tempted to wish this irritant removed, to coerce others, if only by argument, and to annihilate them, if only by dubbing them fools. Intolerance for people of other faiths, though often mistaken for ardour, betrays nothing so much as doubts within oneself. We can, of course, always console ourselves by assuming that the others, in their own way, believe what we do, and that in the end it all comes to the same thing. But that does not always sound very convincing, and what we must, I am afraid, learn to do is to bear with their presence.

II. Vigour

Next to faith, vigour (Skr.: //virya//; Pali: //viriya//). Little need be said about the need for being energetic if one wants to achieve something. Without vigour, without strenuous effort, without perseverance, one obviously cannot make much progress. Everybody knows what "vigour" is, although a generation which made the fortune of the discoverers of "night-starvation" might wish that it had more of it.

The fact that faith and vigour are virtues does not, however, imply that they are good all through, and that, regardless of the consequences, they should be strengthened at all times. Excess is to be deprecated, even in virtues. All the five virtues must be regarded as one whole. Their balance and harmony is almost as important as the virtues themselves.[2] They support each other to some extent, but they also stand in each other's way. The one must sometimes be used to correct the excess of the other. In this way, concentration must come to the rescue of the latent faults of vigour. When vigour and energy have it all their own way, tranquillity is in danger. We all know people with a large dash of adrenalin in their blood, who are always busy, perhaps even "madly efficient," but not particularly restful. Vigour by itself leads to excitement, and has to be controlled by a development of concentrated calm.

Similarly, faith alone, without wisdom, can easily become mere credulity. Wisdom alone can teach what is worth believing. This can be illustrated by Don Quixote, who in literature is perhaps the purest embodiment of faith, and whose actions demonstrate that too much faith, by itself, is not necessarily a good thing. Cervantes' novel gives a fine and detailed description of all the chief attributes of faith. Don Quixote vigorously, fearlessly, without complaining, and even serenely endures all tribulations because he wants to help others, all of them equally, according to their needs. When he dashes into the middle of the boiling lake, he reaches the very height of self-abandonment of which faith as such is capable. "And just when he does not know what will happen to him, he finds himself among flowery fields beautiful beyond those of Elysium." His faith has conquered the senses, it transmutes the data of common-sense experience, and the barber's basin becomes Mambrino's helmet.[3] And yet, when we consider the intellectual basis of his faith, we find that it consists in nothing more than a belief in the truth and veracity of the Romances which describe the fictitious and not particularly edifying doings of the knight-errants of the past. This is the reason why his adventures form a sorry sight, why he is a caricature even of a knight of the Middle Ages, why, shorn of all common-sense, faith in this case becomes slightly pathological.

Mr. Blyth claims that "the Don Quixote of the First Part is Zen incarnate,"[4] that "the man who surpasses Hakuin, Rinzai, Eno, Daruma and Shakyamuni himself is Don Quixote de la Mancha, Knight Errant."[5] Zen, it seems, like all good things, can be abused. It is not very probable that, when the cloak of "Zen" is thrown over them, all donkeys do become tigers, all absurdities profundities. Irrationalism is not without its attractions, but can be overdone. To suggest that one scripture, one conviction, one faith is as good as another, smacks rather more of the spiritual nihilism of our present age, than of the wisdom of Seng-t'san. I admit that I have always liked Don Quixote for saying that the "perfection" of madness does not consist in going "mad for some actual reason or other" but "in running mad without the least constraint or necessity." But still I cannot help feeling that there is some difference, intangible perhaps, but nevertheless real, between the perfection of madness and the perfection of wisdom. Don Quixote's faith was a rather puerile one, because he had no judgment, and his vision was defective. Blyth himself admits in the end that Don Quixote "lacks the Confucian virtue of Prudence, the balance of the powers of the mind" (p.210). I am not so sure about prudence, but the "balance of the powers of the mind" is certainly not only a Confucian, but also a Buddhist virtue, and a very essential one. Buddhaghosa, whom I am expounding here, leaves us in no doubt on this matter.[6] What distinguishes a bhikkhu from a knight-errant is that he is essentially sober and calm, that his view of the world is sweetly rational, that he avoids violence in the pursuit of his aims, and that his estimate of his own role in the world does not greatly exceed his actual size in relation to the universe.

III. Mindfulness

A Buddhist owes his soberness to the cultivation of the third virtue of //mindfulness//(Skr.: //smriti//, Pali: //sati//). Whereas faith and vigour, when driven to excess, must be restrained by their counterparts, i.e. wisdom and tranquil concentration, the virtue of mindfulness does not share this disability. "Mindfulness should be strong everywhere. For it protects the mind from excitedness, into which it might fall since faith, vigour and wisdom may excite us;[7] and from indolence, into which it might fall since concentration favours indolence. Therefore, mindfulness is desirable everywhere, like a seasoning of salt in all sauces, like the prime minister in all state functions. Hence it is said: 'The Lord has declared mindfulness to be useful everywhere, for the mind finds refuge in mindfulness and mindfulness is its protector. Without mindfulness there can be no exertion or restraint of the mind.' "[8]

Although traces of it are not altogether absent in other religious and philosophical disciplines, in Buddhism alone mindfulness occupies a central position. If one were asked what distinguishes Buddhism from all other systems of thought, one would have to answer that it is the //dharma//-theory and the stress laid on mindfulness. Mindfulness is not only the seventh of the steps of the holy eightfold path, the third of the five virtues, and the first of the seven limbs of enlightenment. On occasions it is almost equated with Buddhism itself. So we read at the beginning of the Satipatthana Sutta[9] that "the four applications of mindfulness are the one and only way (//ekayano maggo//) that leads beings to purity, to the transcending of sorrow and lamentation, to the appeasement of pain and sadness, to entrance upon the right method and to the realization of Nirvana."[10]

What then is "mindfulness"? The Abhidharma, guided by the etymology of the Sanskrit term (//smriti//from //smri//, "to remember"), defines it as an act of remembering which prevents ideas from "floating away," and which fights forgetfulness, carelessness and distraction. This definition by itself, though correct, does not really make the function of this virtue very clear to us today. The theoretical assumptions which underlie the various practices summed up in the word "mindfulness" are too much taken for granted. What one assumes is that the mind consists of two disparate parts--a depth which is calm and quiet, and a surface which is disturbed. The surface layer is in perpetual agitation and turmoil. The centre, at the bottom of the mind, beyond both the conscious and the unconscious mind as modern psychologists understand it, is quite still. The depth is, however, usually overlaid to such an extent that people remain incredulous when told of a submerged spot of stillness in their inmost hearts. In most cases the surface is so turbulent that the calm of the depth can be realized only in rare intervals.

Mindfulness and concentration are the two virtues which are concerned with the development of inward calm. The principal enemies of spiritual quietude are: (1) the senses; (2) the movements of the body; (3) the passions, wants and desires; and (4) discursive thinking. They have the power to be enemies when: (1) they are not subjected to any discipline; and (2) when the ego identifies itself with what takes place on the surface of the mind, participating heartily in it, and the illusion arises that these activities are "my" doings, "my" concerns and the sphere in which "I" live and have my being. When thus busy with worldly things, we have neither strength nor freedom. In order to conquer these enemies of spiritual quietude we must: (1) withdraw the senses from their objects, as the tortoise draws in its limbs; (2) keep watch on our muscular movements; (3) cease wanting anything, and dissociate all wants from the ego; and (4) cut off discursive thinking.

By an effort of the imagination one must try to see oneself at rest, floating freely, with no force exerted on one's spiritual self.

The practice of mindfulness then is a series of efforts which aim at maintaining this isolation. Mindfulness is the name given to the measures which we take to protect the patch of inner calm, which may at first not seem very large. One, as it were, draws a line round this domain and at its boundaries keeps watch on trespassers. The expectation is that conscious attention will disintegrate the power of the enemies, diminish their number, and dissociate them from the ego. However diverse in nature the numerous exercises which come under the heading of mindfulness may seem to be, they all have in common this one purpose, that of guarding the incipient and growing calm in one's heart.

1. First, as regards the //sensory stimuli//, there is the "restraint of the senses," also called the "guarding of the doors of the senses." For two reasons sense stimulation may disturb inner calm: (1) because it gives an occasion for undesirable states, like greed, hate, etc., to invade and flood the mind; (2) because attention to the sensory world, however necessary and apparently innocuous, distracts from the object of wisdom, which is the emptiness of //dharmas//. One cannot grasp what is meant by "restraint of the sense dominants," if one regards it as quite a natural thing that the mind should dwell on sense-linked objects. This is, indeed, most unnatural. In its natural purity thought abides in the calm contemplation of emptiness. The mind which sees, hears, etc., is a fallen mind.

The capacity of sense-experience to compel the mind to act in a certain way is greatly diminished if each sensory stimulus is examined at the point where it passes the threshold of consciousness. Attention, normally passive, involuntary and compulsive, is subjected to voluntary control. In the process of imposing some control on the senses one will be surprised to find how keen they are to function, how eager to find suitable objects with which to feed one's impulses and instincts, one's hopes and fears, one's interests and appetites, satisfactions and grievances. It is not so bad that one should see things, hear sounds, etc., but it is a threat to spiritual health when one gets interested and entranced, when one takes up what is seen and heard and seizes on it as a sign of what matters.

The practice of mindfulness is not confined to taking note of what enters the mind by way of the sense-organs. One also tries to determine what is allowed to enter, and to generally reduce the number of sensory impacts by restraining the use of the physical organ, for instance, when one walks with eyes directed only a few feet or yards ahead. In addition, by an effort of the will one refuses to co-operate with one's habitual impulses in building up a mere casual observation into a thing of moment to which one returns again and again. Finally the intruder is weakened and worn down by appropriate reflections. He is kept out of the heart and devalued--as trivial, as already passed, as nothing in particular, and by thinking that "this does not concern me at all, this means nothing to me, it is only a waste when salvation and Nirvana are considered."

2. Secondly, as regards the //muscular movements of the body//--an unquiet body is a concomitant of a disturbed mind, both its cause and symptom. It is important to mindfulness that one should consciously notice the position and movement of the body when walking, eating, speaking, etc., and suppress and correct those movements which are uncontrolled, hasty and uncoordinated. This practice can, it is true, not be carried out at all times. In London traffic, for instance, the unhurried and unflurried demeanour of the mindful has little survival value. Where, however, it can be applied, we come to cherish this exercise which pulls us together, sometimes to an amazing extent in an amazingly short time. Insignificant as it may seem, compared with the splendours of Buddhist art and metaphysics, this training is their indispensable foundation stone. It is by his dignified and self-possessed deportment that the bhikkhu is recognized. And, of course, we should not forget that the mindful attention to muscular movements includes the breathing practices, which are a most fruitful source of insight.

3. Where we have to face the disturbance of the passions and of //stray thoughts//in general, the defence of our inward calm becomes more difficult. Mindfulness itself turns into incipient concentration.

At this point one may ask whether the practice of the five cardinal virtues, from faith to wisdom, is at all likely to be furthered by writing articles about them. It is, of course, not an entirely useless undertaking to guard the traditional teaching from current misunderstandings, quite apart from the pleasure of putting fleas into peoples' ears, and fomenting discussions about the importance of faith, or the value of erudition. But what about the virtues themselves? Thomas a Kempis once said that he would rather feel compunction than know the definition of it. What matters to a Buddhist is that he should be strong in faith, vigour, mindfulness, concentration and wisdom, and what use to him is the knowledge of how they are defined? Detailed advice on how these virtues should be practised, it is true, can never be given in articles written for the general reader. Such advice must always be addressed to one person at a time, must take their individual constitution into account, and can, therefore, be given only by word of mouth.

On the other hand, if mindfulness is a virtue, then the ability to recollect one's own virtues is also a feature of the Buddhist life. And how can one attend to the presence or absence of mental states in oneself if one is unable to recognize them for what they are? The Satipatthana Sutta recommends systematic meditation on the wholesome and unwholesome mental states which arise in the mind. To quote the Sutta, one knows, for instance: (1) when there is vigour that there is vigour; (2) when there is no vigour that there is no vigour; (3) how the vigour which did not exist came to be produced; and (4) how and under what conditions it will grow to greater perfection. Psychology is so vital to Buddhist instruction because one cannot know anything definite about the furniture of one's mind unless one is acquainted with the categories into which mental conditions can be analysed. A mindful man is well informed about his own mental condition. His capacity for introspection is highly developed. And his interest in his own mind will not really make him self-centered as long as he remembers that he has to deal with the rise and fall of impersonal processes. In addition, in the case of the higher mental states, rational clarity is imperative if constant self-deception and wasteful groping in the dark are to be avoided. In a new country a map is helpful so that one may know where one is. The manuals of mystical theology written by the practising contemplatives of the Catholic Church are also rich in descriptions of the sublimer virtues.

But this is not all. Where the Buddhist virtues are described for a lay audience one must not omit to mention the all-important fact that the upper ranges of these virtues demand a reformation of the conduct of life which is greater than almost any layman is willing to undertake. The higher mindfulness, and nearly the whole range of concentration and wisdom, presuppose a degree of withdrawal from the world which is incompatible with the life of an ordinary citizen. Those who are unwilling to achieve a radical seclusion from the world can practise these virtues only in a very rudimentary form. It is quite idle to pretend that they do not involve a complete break with the established habits of life and thought. Unless we make the sacrifices involved in withdrawing from the world, we are bound to remain strangers to the fullness of mindfulness, concentration and wisdom.

But if the monastic life is a necessary condition for these virtues, why talk about them at all? Partly because it is salutary, though painful, that we should see their absence in us, and partly because they constitute the subjective counterpart of the scriptures which we read. The Suttas describe the world as it appears on a spiritual level on which concentration and wisdom have come to maturity. The understanding of the scriptures is furthered by an understanding of the subjective attitude which corresponds to them. And so, although we are forced to go beyond the range of our immediate experience, and although the description tends to become more intangible as it rises to loftier heights, we will now, leaving aside the higher ranges of mindfulness, try to explain the traditional definitions of concentration and wisdom, as they are handed down to us.

IV. Concentration

Concentration (//samadhi//) continues the work of mindfulness. It deepens our capacity to regain the peaceful calm of our inner nature.

But here we are at once faced with the difficulty that in Buddhist psychology "concentration" occurs twice: (1) as a factor essential to all thought; and (2) as a special, and rather rare, virtue.

1. In its simplest form, concentration is the narrowing of the field of attention in a manner and for a time determined by the will. The mind is made one-pointed, does not waver, does not scatter itself, and it becomes steady like the flame of a lamp in the absence of wind. Without a certain degree of one-pointedness no mental activity at all can take place. Each mental act lasts, strictly speaking, for one moment only, and is at once followed by another. The function of concentration is to provide some stability in this perpetual flux, by enabling the mind to stand in, or on, the same object, without distraction, for more than one moment. In addition it is a synthetic quality (//sam-a-dhi//= syn-thesis), that binds together a number of mental states which arise at the same time, "as water binds the lather of soap."

Buddhaghosa stresses the fact that intellectual concentration is also found in unwholesome thoughts. The mind must be undistracted so that the murderer's knife does not miss, the theft does not miscarry. A mind of single intent is capable of doing what it does more effectively, be it good or bad. The higher degrees of this kind of concentration owe much to the presence of the "hunting instinct," and can best be observed in a stoat following a rabbit. Intellectual concentration is a quality which is ethically and spiritually neutral. Many scientific workers have an unusually high capacity for concentrated thought. Anyone acquainted with the "scientific humanists" who inhabit our big cities will, however, agree that their intellectual achievements are not conducive to either peace of mind or spiritual progress. When Sir Isaac Newton boiled his watch instead of the egg his landlady had given him, he thereby showed the intensity with which he focussed his mind on his intellectual task. But the result of his intellectual labours has been to cast a dark shadow over the spiritual radiance of the universe, and ever since, the celestial harmonies have become nearly inaudible. As H.W. Longfellow, in his poem on "The Arsenal at Springfield," has put it:

Is it, O man, with such discordant noises,
With such accursed instruments as these,
Thou drownest Nature's sweet and kindly voices,
And jarrest the celestial harmonies?

2. How then does concentration as a spiritual virtue differ from concentration as a condition of the intellect? Spiritual or transic concentration results less from intellectual effort than from a rebirth of the whole personality, including the body, the emotions, and the will. It cannot possibly be achieved without some discipline over the body, since we must be able to endure the prescribed posture, practise the prescribed breathing exercises, and so on. It is further built on a change of outlook which we can well describe as "ethical." Tradition is quite unambiguous on this point. Before spiritual concentration can be even approached, we must have stilled or suppressed five vices, which are known as the "five hindrances": sense desire, ill will, sloth and torpor, excitedness and sense of guilt, and doubt. Where these hindrances are present, where concentrated thought is fused with greed, the desire to excel, to get a good job, etc., there concentration as a spiritual virtue is not found.

In this sense physical ease and self-purification are the first two distinctive features of spiritual concentration. The third is the shift in attention from the sensory world to another subtler realm. The methods by which this shift is effected are traditionally known as the four trances (//jhana//) and the four formless attainments. They are essentially a training in increasing introversion, achieved by progressively diminishing the impact of the outer stimuli. As a result of their successful withdrawal and renunciation the spiritually concentrated release the inward calm which dwells in their hearts. This concentration cannot be won, however, unless no attention is given to sensory data, and everything sensory is viewed as equally unimportant. Subjectively it is marked by a soft, tranquil and pacified passivity, objectively by the abstraction into an unearthly world of experience which lifts one above the world, and bestows a certainty greater than anything the senses may teach. The experience is so satisfying that it burns up the world, and only its cold ashes are found when one returns to it.

V. Wisdom

~~ ~~~~~~

And so we come to wisdom (Skr.: //prajna//; Pali //panna//), the highest virtue of all.

"Wisdom is based on concentration, because of the saying: 'One who is concentrated knows, sees what really is'."[11] Is concentration then an indispensable pre-condition of wisdom? The answer lies in distinguishing three stages of wisdom, according to whether it operates on the level of: (1) //learning//about what tradition has to say concerning the psychological and ontological categories which form the subject-matter of wisdom; (2) //discursive reflection//on the basic facts of life; and (3) //meditational development//.[12] The third alone requires the aid of transic concentration,[13] whereas without it there can be proficiency in the first two. And the wisdom which consists of learning and reflection should not be despised.

The main stream of Buddhist tradition has always greatly esteemed //learning//. Our attitude to the apple of knowledge differs from that of many Christians. On the whole, we regard it as rather more nourishing than baneful. The wisdom, which is the fifth and crowning virtue, is not the wisdom that can be found in the untutored child of nature, the corny sage of the backwoods, or the self-made philosopher of the suburbs. It can operate only after a great deal of traditional information has been absorbed, a great deal of sound learning acquired. The required skill in metaphysical and psychological analysis would be impossible without a good knowledge of the material on which this skill ought to be exercised. From this point of view learning is perhaps less to be regretted than its absence.

The second stage, after learning, is //reflection//, which is an operation of the intellect. Even the relative beginner can greatly increase his wisdom by discursive meditations on the basic facts of life. Finally, it is on the level of //mental development//

(//bhavana//) that this meditational technique reaches its maturity, and then it does, indeed, require the aid of mindfulness and concentration.

"Wisdom" is, of course, only a very approximate equivalent of //prajna//. To the average person nowadays "wisdom" seems to denote a compound made up of such qualities as sagacity, prudence, a well-developed sense of values, serenity, and sovereignty over the world won by the understanding of the mode of its operation. The Buddhist conception of "wisdom" is not unlike this, but more precise. It is best clarified by first giving its connotations, and then its actual definition.

As for the connotations, we read in the //Dhammasangani//:[14] "On that occasion the dominant[15] of wisdom is wisdom, understanding,[16] search, research, search for //dharma//;[17] discernment, discrimination, differentiation, erudition, expert skill, subtlety, clarity,[18] reflection, investigation,[19] amplitude,[20] sagacity,[21] a guide (to true welfare and to the marks as they truly are), insight, comprehension, a goad (which urges the mind to move back on the right track); wisdom, wisdom as virtue, wisdom as strength (because ignorance cannot dislodge it), the sword of wisdom (which cuts through the defilements), the lofty (and overtowering) height of wisdom, the light,[22] lustre and splendour of wisdom, the treasure[23] of wisdom, absence of delusion, search for //dharmas//, right view." From mere cleverness wisdom is distinguished by its spiritual purpose, and we are told expressly[24] that it is designed "to cut off the defilements."

Now to the actual definition: "Wisdom penetrates[25] into //dharmas// as they are in themselves. It disperses the darkness of delusion, which covers up the own-being of dharmas."[26]

What then does wisdom meditate about? Wisdom may be held to concern itself with three possible topics: (1) true reality; (2) the meaning of life; (3) the conduct of life. Buddhist tradition assumes that the second and third depend on the first. In its essence wisdom is the strength of mind which permits contact with the true reality, which is also called the realm of //dharmas//. Delusion, folly, confusion, ignorance and self-deception are the opposites of wisdom. It is because ignorance, and not sin, is the root evil that wisdom is regarded as the highest virtue. A holiness which is devoid of wisdom is not considered impossible, but it cannot be gained by the path of knowledge, to which alone these descriptions apply. The paths of faith, of love, of works, etc., have each their own several laws.

As the unfaltering penetration into the true nature of objects, wisdom is the capacity to meditate in certain ways about the dharmic constituents of the universe. The rules of that meditation have been laid down in the scriptures, particularly in the Abhidharma, and a superb description can be found in the latter part of Buddhaghosa's //Path of Purification//. Mindfulness and concentration were, as we saw, based on the assumption of a duality in the mind--between its calm depth and its excited surface. Wisdom similarly assumes a duality between the surface and depth of all things. Objects are not what they appear to be. Their true reality, in which they stand out as //dharmas//, is opposed to their appearance to commonsense, and much strength of wisdom is required to go beyond the deceptive appearance and to penetrate to the reality of //dharmas// themselves.

THE WAY OF WISDOM

~~~ ~~~ ~~ ~~~~~~ The Five Spiritual Faculties ~~~ ~~~~ ~~~~~~~~~~ ~~~~~~~~~~

by

EDWARD CONZE

Buddhist Publication Society
Kandy Sri Lanka

Buddhist Publication Society P.O. Box 61 54, Sangharaja Mawatha Kandy, Sri Lanka published 1964 Reprinted 1980, 1993 ISBN 955-24-0110-0 The text of this booklet was modifications, first published in The Middle Way, Vol. XXVIII (1953). DharmaNet edition p 1993 This electronic edition is offered for free distribution via DharmaNet by arrangemen publisher. Formatted for DharmaNet by John Bullitt. THE WHEEL PUBLIC No. 65/66

PART I:

~~~~~~~ THE FIVE SPIRITUAL FACULTIES ~~~ ~~~~ ~~~~~~~~~~ ~~~~~~~~~~

Spiritual progress depends on the emergence of five cardinal virtues--faith, vigour, mindf concentration and wisdom. The conduct of the ordinary worldling is governed by his sense-and impulses. As we progress, new spiritual forces gradually take over, until in the end the virtues dominate and shape everything we do feel and think. These virtues are called, in S Pali, //indriya//, variously translated by faculties, controlling faculties, or spiritual faculties.[1 same five virtues are called powers (//bala//) if emphasis is on the fact that they are "unsh their opposites."

I. Faith ~~ ~~~~~

Faith is called "the seed," and without it the plant of spiritual life cannot start at all. Without faith one can, as a matter of fact, do nothing wo at all. This is true not only of Buddhism, but of all religions, and even the pseudo-religions o times, such as Communism. And this faith is much more than the mere acceptance of bel the combination of four factors--intellectual, volitional, emotional and social.

1. //Intellectually//, faith is an assent to doctrines which are not substantiated by immediately a direct factual evidence. To be a matter of faith, a belief must go beyond the available evide believer must be willing and ready to fill up the gaps in the evidence with an attitude of pati trusting acceptance. Faith, taken in this sense, has two opposites, i.e. a dull unawareness things which are worth believing in, and doubt or perplexity. In any kind of religion some as taken on trust and accepted on the authority of scriptures or teachers. Generally speak is, however, regarded as only a preliminary step, as a merely provisional state. In due cour spiritual awareness will know that which faith took on trust, and longed to know: "Now we s glass darkly, but then face to face." Much time must usually elapse before the virtue of wis become strong enough to support a vigorous insight into the true nature of reality. Until the number of doctrinal points must be taken on faith. What then in Buddhism are the ol faith? They are essentially four: (1) the belief in karma and rebirth; (2) the acceptance of t teachings about the nature of reality, such as conditioned co-production, emptiness, etc.; (3 in the "Three Refuges," the Buddha, the Dharma and the Order; and (4) a belief in the effi prescribed practices, and in Nirvana as the final way out of our difficulties. I shall say more when I have dealt with the other aspects of faith. 2. In this sceptical age we, anyway far too much on the intellectual side of faith. //shraddha//(Pali: //saddha//) the word we ren "faith," is etymologically akin to Latin //cor//, "the heart," and faith is far more a matter of the than of the intellect. It is, as Prof. Radhakrishnan incisively puts it, the "striving after self-realization by concentrating the powers of the mind on a given idea." //Volitionally//, fai a resolute and courageous act of will. It combines the steadfast resolution that one //will//c with the self-confidence that one //can//do it. Suppose that people living on the one side of doomed to perish from many enemies, diseases and famine. Safety lies on the other shor faith is then likened to the person who swims across the river, braving its dangers, saving h inspiring others by his example. Those without faith will go on dithering along the hither ba opposites to this aspect of faith are timidity, cowardice, fear, wavering, and a shabby, mean calculating mentality. 3. //Emotionally//, faith is an attitude of serenity and lucidity. Its opposite here is worry, the state of being troubled by many things. It is said that someone w loses the "five terrors," i.e. he ceases to worry about the necessities of life, about loss of reputation, death, unhappy rebirth and the impression he may make on an audience. It is fa the burden of life must be greatly lightened by belief in karma, emptiness, or not-self. Even unpleasant fate can be accepted more easily when it is understood as a dispensation of jus vexations are explained as an inevitable retribution, when law seems to rule instead of blin when even apparent loss is bound to turn into true gain. And if there is no self, what and wh about? If there is only one vast emptiness, what is there to disturb our radiance? 4.

//Socially//, and that is more difficult to understand, faith involves trust and confidence in the and the Sangha. Its opposite here is the state of being submerged in cares about one's se environment, cares which spring from either social pressure or social isolation. The break w social environment is, of course, complete only in the case of the monk who, as the formu faith forsakes his home." To a lesser extent it must be carried out by every practitioner of th who must "live apart" from his society, in spirit if not in fact. The company of others and th expect from them are usually a mainstay of our sense of security. By going for refuge to the Sangha one turns from the visible and tangible to the invisible and elusive. By placing one on spiritual forces one gains the strength to disregard public opinion and social discourage measure of defiant contempt for the world and its ways is inseparable from a spiritual life. T man does not "belong" to his visible environment, in which he is bound to feel rather a stran belongs to the community of the saints, to the family of the Buddha. Buddhism substitutes a the natural environment, with the Buddha for the father, the //Prajnaparamita// for the moth fellow-seekers for brothers and sisters, relatives and friends. It is with these more invisible one must learn to establish satisfactory social relations. In carrying out this task, faith requ considerable capacity for renunciation. This concludes our survey of the four factors into the making of faith. Like other spiritual qualities, faith is somewhat paradoxical in that sense it is a //gift//which one cannot obtain by merely wanting to, and in another sense it is //virtue//that can be cultivated. The capacity for faith varies with the constitution of the indiv his social circumstances. It is usual to classify types of personality according to whether the dominated by greed, hatred or confusion. Those who walk in greed are said to be more sus than the other two, because of the kinship which exists between faith and greed. To quote (//Visuddhimagga//III,75): "As on the unwholesome plane greed clings and takes no offenc wholesome plane. As greed searches for objects of sense-desire, so faith for the qualities etc. As greed does not let go that which is harmful, so faith does not let go that which is be

As regards social conditions, there are ages of faith and ages of unbelief. The presen rather fosters unbelief. It puts a premium on intellectual smartness, so that faith is easily he indicate nothing but a weak head or a lack of intellectual integrity. It multiplies the distracti from the sensory world to such an extent that the calm of the invisible world is harder to rea It exposes the citizen to so great a variety of conflicting viewpoints that he finds it hard to choice. The prestige of science, the concern with a high standard of living, and the disappe institutions of uncontested authority are the chief foes of faith in our present-day society. It largely a matter of temperament whether we believe that matters will improve in the near fu As a virtue, faith is strengthened and built up by self-discipline, and not by discussing opini Intellectual difficulties are by no means the most powerful among the obstacles to faith. D inevitable, but how one deals with them depends on one's character. The first of our four "a faith" well illustrates this situation. There are many sound reasons for accepting the rebirt This is not the place to expound them, and I must be content to refer the reader to the very "East-West Anthology" on //Reincarnation//which J. Head and S.L. Cranston have publish York, The Julian Press Inc.). Yet, although belief in rebirth is perfectly rational and does no with any known fact, the range of the average person's vision is so limited that he has no decisive evidence, which is direct and immediate experience. The rebirth doctrine as least two things: (1) that behind the natural causality which links together events in the wor sense there are other, invisible chains of a moral causality, which assures that all good act rewarded, all bad actions punished; and (2) that this chain of moral sequences is not interr but continues from rebirth to rebirth. To the average person these two assumptions canno absolutely, conclusively and beyond the possibility of a doubt. However plausible they may grounds, Buddhism teaches that they become a matter of direct experience only after the "superknowledges" (//abhijna//, //abhinna//) have been developed. The fourth "superknowle recollection of one's own previous rebirths, and the fifth the knowledge of the rebirths of o people, by which one "sees that whatever happens to them happens in accordance with th many well-authenticated cases of persons spontaneously remembering certain details of

of their own previous lives, and these people obviously have an additional reason for belief which is lacking in those who cannot recall ever having lived before. Full certitude on the i however, given to those only who can, on the basis of the fourth //jhana//and by taking defi and disciplined steps on emerging from that //jhana//, "recall their manifold former lives," a to the well-known formula: "There I was, that was my name, that was my family, that was m my food, this was the happiness, this the suffering which I experienced, this was the dura life-span. Deceased there I was born elsewhere and there had this name, etc." When a mo properly and successfully, "these things become as clear to him as if lit up by a lamp" (//Vis xiii, 23). Until that time comes, we cannot claim that we //fully know//the doctrine of and rebirth to be true. We take it partly on faith. And this faith of ours is maintained less by dialectical skill as by the virtues of patience and courage. For we must be willing to wait p until we are spiritually ripe for the emergence of the super-knowledges, however far off tha be. And secondly, we must be willing to take risks. Life nowhere offers a one hundred per and for our convictions least of all. Employed in gaining wealth a merchant must risk his pr Employed in taking life, a soldier must risk his own life. Employed in saving his soul, the s man must risk his own soul. The stake automatically increases with the prospect of gain. O be mistaken. I sometimes wonder what I would think if, on dying, I would not, as I now for wake up on the Bardo plane, but find myself confronted with Acheron and the three-headed worse still, were ill-treated with fire and brimstone in a Christian hell. The experience wou admit, be rather disconcerting. All that I can say in the face of such uncertainty is that I am take the consequences, and that I hope that my fund of boldness, audacity and good hum out. One has the choice to magnify intellectual doubts, or to minimize them. It seems n unreasonable that one should blame the difficulties of the teaching on one's own distance f one's own intellectual and moral imperfections. How can one expect to remember one's p present one cannot even recall hour by hour what one did during one single day a mere mo hesitates to accept, as not immediately obvious, the doctrine that this world is the result o and of the craving of non-existent individuals for non-existent objects--is this not perhaps d very denseness of one's own ignorance, for which one can collect plenty of proofs all day are effectively overcome when one purifies one's own life, so as to become more worthy of a condition of all learning that one accepts a great deal on trust, that one gives the teache benefit of the doubt. Otherwise one can learn nothing at all, and remains shut out from all t faith means to take a deep breath, to tear oneself away from the daily cares and concerns resolutely to a wider and more abiding reality. At first we are, by ourselves, too stupid and i to see the tracks which lead to salvation. So we must put our trust in the Sages of the pas intently to their words, dimmed by distance and the noise of the present day, but still just au One last word about tolerance, without which faith remains raw and unsure of itself. It is perpetual trial to our faith that we should constantly meet with people who believe differentl easily tempted to wish this irritant removed, to coerce others, if only by argument, and to a them, if only by dubbing them fools. Intolerance for people of other faiths, though often mis ardour, betrays nothing so much as doubts within oneself. We can, of course, always cons assuming that the others, in their own way, believe what we do, and that in the end it all co same thing. But that does not always sound very convincing, and what we must, I am afrai to bear with their presence.

II. Vigour

~~ ~~~~~~ Next to faith, vigour (Skr.: //virya//; Pali: //viriya//). Little need be said abo the need for being energetic if one wants to achieve something. Without vigour, without str without perseverance, one obviously cannot make much progress. Everybody knows wha although a generation which made the fortune of the discoverers of "night-starvation" migh had more of it. The fact that faith and vigour are virtues does not, however, imply that t good all through, and that, regardless of the consequences, they should be strengthened a Excess is to be deprecated, even in virtues. All the five virtues must be regarded as one w balance and harmony is almost as important as the virtues themselves.[2] They support ea extent, but they also stand in each other's way. The one must sometimes be used to corre the other. In this way, concentration must come to the rescue of the latent faults of vigour. W and energy have it all their own way, tranquillity is in danger. We all know people with a la adrenalin in their blood, who are always busy, perhaps even "madly efficient," but not partic restful. Vigour by itself leads to excitement, and has to be controlled by a development of calm. Similarly, faith alone, without wisdom, can easily become mere credulity. Wisd can teach what is worth believing. This can be illustrated by Don Quixote, who in literature purest embodiment of faith, and whose actions demonstrate that too much faith, by itself, necessarily a good thing. Cervantes' novel gives a fine and detailed description of all the ch attributes of faith. Don Quixote vigorously, fearlessly, without complaining, and even seren all tribulations because he wants to help others, all of them equally, according to their need dashes into the middle of the boiling lake, he reaches the very height of self-abandonmen faith as such is capable. "And just when he does not know what will happen to him, he find flowery fields beautiful beyond those of Elysium." His faith has conquered the senses, it tr data of common-sense experience, and the barber's basin becomes Mambrino's helmet.[3] consider the intellectual basis of his faith, we find that it consists in nothing more than a be the truth and veracity of the Romances which describe the fictitious and not particularly edi of the knight-errants of the past. This is the reason why his adventures form a sorry sight, caricature even of a knight of the Middle Ages, why, shorn of all common-sense, faith in thi becomes slightly pathological. Mr. Blyth claims that "the Don Quixote of the First Part incarnate,"[4] that "the man who surpasses Hakuin, Rinzai, Eno, Daruma and Shakyamuni Quixote de la Mancha, Knight Errant."[5] Zen, it seems, like all good things, can be abused probable that, when the cloak of "Zen" is thrown over them, all donkeys do become tigers absurdities profundities. Irrationalism is not without its attractions, but can be overdone. To that one scripture, one conviction, one faith is as good as another, smacks rather more of nihilism of our present age, than of the wisdom of Seng-t'san. I admit that I have always lik for saying that the "perfection" of madness does not consist in going "mad for some actua other" but "in running mad without the least constraint or necessity." But still I cannot help f there is some difference, intangible perhaps, but nevertheless real, between the perfectio and the perfection of wisdom. Don Quixote's faith was a rather puerile one, because he ha his vision was defective. Blyth himself admits in the end that Don Quixote "lacks the Conf of Prudence, the balance of the powers of the mind" (p.210). I am not so sure about pruder "balance of the powers of the mind" is certainly not only a Confucian, but also a Buddhist very essential one. Buddhaghosa, whom I am expounding here, leaves us in no doubt on t distinguishes a bhikkhu from a knight-errant is that he is essentially sober and calm, that h the world is sweetly rational, that he avoids violence in the pursuit of his aims, and that his of his own role in the world does not greatly exceed his actual size in relation to the univers

III. Mindfulness ~~~~ ~~~~~~~~~~~~ A Buddhist owes his soberness to the cultivation of the third virtue of //mindfulness//(Skr.: //smriti//, Pali: //sat Whereas faith and vigour, when driven to excess, must be restrained by their counterparts and tranquil concentration, the virtue of mindfulness does not share this disability. "Mindful be strong everywhere. For it protects the mind from excitedness, into which it might fall si vigour and wisdom may excite us;[7] and from indolence, into which it might fall since conc favours indolence. Therefore, mindfulness is desirable everywhere, like a seasoning of salt like the prime minister in all state functions. Hence it is said: 'The Lord has declared mindfu be useful everywhere, for the mind finds refuge in mindfulness and mindfulness is its prote mindfulness there can be no exertion or restraint of the mind.' "[8] Although traces of it altogether absent in other religious and philosophical disciplines, in Buddhism alone mindfu a central position. If one were asked what distinguishes Buddhism from all other systems would have to answer that it is the //dharma//-theory and the stress laid on mindfulness. Mi not only the seventh of the steps of the holy eightfold path, the third of the five virtues, and of the seven limbs of enlightenment. On occasions it is almost equated with Buddhism itsel at the beginning of the Satipatthana Sutta[9] that "the four applications of mindfulness are t only way (//ekayano maggo//) that leads beings to purity, to the transcending of sorrow an to the appeasement of pain and sadness, to entrance upon the right method and to the rea Nirvana."[10] What then is "mindfulness"? The Abhidharma, guided by the etymolog Sanskrit term (//smriti//from //smri//, "to remember"), defines it as an act of remembering wh ideas from "floating away," and which fights forgetfulness, carelessness and distraction. T definition by itself, though correct, does not really make the function of this virtue very clear today. The theoretical assumptions which underlie the various practices summed up in th "mindfulness" are too much taken for granted. What one assumes is that the mind consists parts--a depth which is calm and quiet, and a surface which is disturbed. The surface laye perpetual agitation and turmoil. The centre, at the bottom of the mind, beyond both the con unconscious mind as modern psychologists understand it, is quite still. The depth is, howe overlaid to such an extent that people remain incredulous when told of a submerged spot o their inmost hearts. In most cases the surface is so turbulent that the calm of the depth ca realized only in rare intervals. Mindfulness and concentration are the two virtues whic concerned with the development of inward calm. The principal enemies of spiritual quietude senses; (2) the movements of the body; (3) the passions, wants and desires; and (4) discu They have the power to be enemies when: (1) they are not subjected to any discipline; and identifies itself with what takes place on the surface of the mind, participating heartily in it, the illusion arises that these activities are "my" doings, "my" concerns and the sphere in wh and have my being. When thus busy with worldly things, we have neither strength nor free conquer these enemies of spiritual quietude we must: (1) withdraw the senses from their ob tortoise draws in its limbs; (2) keep watch on our muscular movements; (3) cease wanting dissociate all wants from the ego; and (4) cut off discursive thinking. By an effort of the imagination one must try to see oneself at rest, floating freely, with no force exerted on one self. The practice of mindfulness then is a series of efforts which aim at maintaining this is Mindfulness is the name given to the measures which we take to protect the patch of inner at first not seem very large. One, as it were, draws a line round this domain and at its boun watch on trespassers. The expectation is that conscious attention will disintegrate the powe enemies, diminish their number, and dissociate them from the ego. However diverse in nat exercises which come under the heading of mindfulness may seem to be, they all have in c purpose, that of guarding the incipient and growing calm in one's heart. 1. First, as r the //sensory stimuli//, there is the "restraint of the senses," also called the "guarding of the the senses." For two reasons sense stimulation may disturb inner calm: (1) because it giv for undesirable states, like greed, hate, etc., to invade and flood the mind; (2) because atte sensory world, however necessary and apparently innocuous, distracts from the object of the emptiness of //dharmas//. One cannot grasp what is meant by "restraint of the sense do one regards it as quite a natural thing that the mind should dwell on sense-linked objects. T indeed, most unnatural. In its natural purity thought abides in the calm contemplation of em mind which sees, hears, etc., is a fallen mind. The capacity of sense-experience to c mind to act in a certain way is greatly diminished if each sensory stimulus is examined at where it passes the threshold of consciousness. Attention, normally passive, involuntary an subjected to voluntary control. In the process of imposing some control on the senses one surprised to find how keen they are to function, how eager to find suitable objects with whic one's impulses and instincts, one's hopes and fears, one's interests and appetites, satisfa grievances. It is not so bad that one should see things, hear sounds, etc., but it is a threat t health when one gets interested and entranced, when one takes up what is seen and hea as a sign of what matters. The practice of mindfulness is not confined to taking note o enters the mind by way of the sense-organs. One also tries to determine what is allowed to generally reduce the number of sensory impacts by restraining the use of the physical orga instance, when one walks with eyes directed only a few feet or yards ahead. In addition, by the will one refuses to co-operate with one's habitual impulses in building up a mere casua into a thing of moment to which one returns again and again. Finally the intruder is weaken by appropriate reflections. He is kept out of the heart and devalued--as trivial, as already pa nothing in particular, and by thinking that "this does not concern me at all, this means nothi is only a waste when salvation and Nirvana are considered." 2. Secondly, as regards t movements of the body//--an unquiet body is a concomitant of a disturbed mind, both its ca symptom. It is important to mindfulness that one should consciously notice the position and body when walking, eating, speaking, etc., and suppress and correct those movements wh uncontrolled, hasty and uncoordinated. This practice can, it is true, not be carried out at all London traffic, for instance, the unhurried and unflurried demeanour of the mindful has little value. Where, however, it can be applied, we come to cherish this exercise which pulls us t sometimes to an amazing extent in an amazingly short time. Insignificant as it may seem, c splendours of Buddhist art and metaphysics, this training is their indispensable foundation by his dignified and self-possessed deportment that the bhikkhu is recognized. And, of co not forget that the mindful attention to muscular movements includes the breathing practice most fruitful source of insight. 3. Where we have to face the disturbance of the pass of //stray thoughts//in general, the defence of our inward calm becomes more difficult. Min itself turns into incipient concentration. At this point one may ask whether the practice five cardinal virtues, from faith to wisdom, is at all likely to be furthered by writing articles a them. It is, of course, not an entirely useless undertaking to guard the traditional teaching fr current misunderstandings, quite apart from the pleasure of putting fleas into peoples' ears discussions about the importance of faith, or the value of erudition. But what about the vir themselves? Thomas a Kempis once said that he would rather feel compunction than know What matters to a Buddhist is that he should be strong in faith, vigour, mindfulness, conce wisdom, and what use to him is the knowledge of how they are defined? Detailed advice on should be practised, it is true, can never be given in articles written for the general reader advice must always be addressed to one person at a time, must take their individual consti account, and can, therefore, be given only by word of mouth. On the other hand, if m is a virtue, then the ability to recollect one's own virtues is also a feature of the Buddhist life how can one attend to the presence or absence of mental states in oneself if one is unable them for what they are? The Satipatthana Sutta recommends systematic meditation on the unwholesome mental states which arise in the mind. To quote the Sutta, one knows, for ins there is vigour that there is vigour; (2) when there is no vigour that there is no vigour; (3) ho vigour which did not exist came to be produced; and (4) how and under what conditions it w greater perfection. Psychology is so vital to Buddhist instruction because one cannot know definite about the furniture of one's mind unless one is acquainted with the categories into conditions can be analysed. A mindful man is well informed about his own mental conditior for introspection is highly developed. And his interest in his own mind will not really make h self-centered as long as he remembers that he has to deal with the rise and fall of imperso processes. In addition, in the case of the higher mental states, rational clarity is imperative self-deception and wasteful groping in the dark are to be avoided. In a new country a map that one may know where one is. The manuals of mystical theology written by the practisin of the Catholic Church are also rich in descriptions of the sublimer virtues. But this is all. Where the Buddhist virtues are described for a lay audience one must not omit to ment all-important fact that the upper ranges of these virtues demand a reformation of the cond which is greater than almost any layman is willing to undertake. The higher mindfulness, ar whole range of concentration and wisdom, presuppose a degree of withdrawal from the w incompatible with the life of an ordinary citizen. Those who are unwilling to achieve a radica from the world can practise these virtues only in a very rudimentary form. It is quite idle to that they do not involve a complete break with the established habits of life and thought. Ur the sacrifices involved in withdrawing from the world, we are bound to remain strangers to of mindfulness, concentration and wisdom. But if the monastic life is a necessary co for these virtues, why talk about them at all? Partly because it is salutary, though painful, should see their absence in us, and partly because they constitute the subjective counterpa scriptures which we read. The Suttas describe the world as it appears on a spiritual level concentration and wisdom have come to maturity. The understanding of the scriptures is fu understanding of the subjective attitude which corresponds to them. And so, although we a beyond the range of our immediate experience, and although the description tends to beco intangible as it rises to loftier heights, we will now, leaving aside the higher ranges of mindf to explain the traditional definitions of concentration and wisdom, as they are handed down

IV. Concentration

~~~ ~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Concentration (//samadhi//) continues the work of mindfulness. It deepens our capacity to r peaceful calm of our inner nature. But here we are at once faced with the difficulty that in B psychology "concentration" occurs twice: (1) as a factor essential to all thought; and (2) as and rather rare, virtue. 1. In its simplest form, concentration is the narrowing of the f of attention in a manner and for a time determined by the will. The mind is made one-pointe waver, does not scatter itself, and it becomes steady like the flame of a lamp in the absenc Without a certain degree of one-pointedness no mental activity at all can take place. Each lasts, strictly speaking, for one moment only, and is at once followed by another. The functi concentration is to provide some stability in this perpetual flux, by enabling the mind to star the same object, without distraction, for more than one moment. In addition it is a synthetic (//sam-a-dhi//= syn-thesis), that binds together a number of mental states which arise at the
"as water binds the lather of soap." Buddhaghosa stresses the fact that intellectual concentration is also found in unwholesome thoughts. The mind must be undistracted so murderer's knife does not miss, the theft does not miscarry. A mind of single intent is capab what it does more effectively, be it good or bad. The higher degrees of this kind of concen much to the presence of the "hunting instinct," and can best be observed in a stoat followin Intellectual concentration is a quality which is ethically and spiritually neutral. Many scient workers have an unusually high capacity for concentrated thought. Anyone acquainted with humanists" who inhabit our big cities will, however, agree that their intellectual achievemen conducive to either peace of mind or spiritual progress. When Sir Isaac Newton boiled his w the egg his landlady had given him, he thereby showed the intensity with which he focuss his intellectual task. But the result of his intellectual labours has been to cast a dark shadow the spiritual radiance of the universe, and ever since, the celestial harmonies have become inaudible. As H.W. Longfellow, in his poem on "The Arsenal at Springfield," has put it:
~~~

it, O man, with such discordant noises, With such accursed instruments as these, drownest Nature's sweet and kindly voices, And jarrest the celestial harmonies?

then does concentration as a spiritual virtue differ from concentration as a condition of the i Spiritual or transic concentration results less from intellectual effort than from a rebirth of t whole personality, including the body, the emotions, and the will. It cannot possibly be achi some discipline over the body, since we must be able to endure the prescribed posture, p prescribed breathing exercises, and so on. It is further built on a change of outlook which w describe as "ethical." Tradition is quite unambiguous on this point. Before spiritual concen be even approached, we must have stilled or suppressed five vices, which are known as th hindrances": sense desire, ill will, sloth and torpor, excitedness and sense of guilt, and do these hindrances are present, where concentrated thought is fused with greed, the desire t good job, etc., there concentration as a spiritual virtue is not found. In this sense phy ease and self-purification are the first two distinctive features of spiritual concentration. The the shift in attention from the sensory world to another subtler realm. The methods by whi is effected are traditionally known as the four trances (//jhana//) and the four formless attain are essentially a training in increasing introversion, achieved by progressively diminishing of the outer stimuli. As a result of their successful withdrawal and renunciation the spiritualli concentrated release the inward calm which dwells in their hearts. This concentration cann however, unless no attention is given to sensory data, and everything sensory is viewed as unimportant. Subjectively it is marked by a soft, tranquil and pacified passivity, objectively abstraction into an unearthly world of experience which lifts one above the world, and beste certainty greater than anything the senses may teach. The experience is so satisfying that world, and only its cold ashes are found when one returns to it.

V. Wisdom ~~ ~~~~~~

And so we come to wisdom (Skr.: //prajna//; Pali //panna//), the highest virtue of all. "Wisdom is based on concentration, because of the 'One who is concentrated knows, sees what really is'."[11] Is concentration then an indisp pre-condition of wisdom? The answer lies in distinguishing three stages of wisdom, accord operates on the level of: (1) //learning//about what tradition has to say concerning the psy and ontological categories which form the subject-matter of wisdom; (2) //discursive reflecti basic facts of life; and (3) //meditational development//.[12] The third alone requires the aid concentration,[13] whereas without it there can be proficiency in the first two. And the wisd consists of learning and reflection should not be despised. The main stream of Buddh has always greatly esteemed //learning//. Our attitude to the apple of knowledge differs fro many Christians. On the whole, we regard it as rather more nourishing than baneful. The w the fifth and crowning virtue, is not the wisdom that can be found in the untutored child of corny sage of the backwoods, or the self-made philosopher of the suburbs. It can operate deal of traditional information has been absorbed, a great deal of sound learning acquire skill in metaphysical and psychological analysis would be impossible without a good knowl material on which this skill ought to be exercised. From this point of view learning is perha be regretted than its absence. The second stage, after learning, is //reflection//, which is operation of the intellect. Even the relative beginner can greatly increase his wisdom by dis meditations on the basic facts of life. Finally, it is on the level of //mental development// (//bhavana//) that this meditational technique reaches its maturity, and then it does, indeed aid of mindfulness and concentration. "Wisdom" is, of course, only a very approxima equivalent of //prajna//. To the average person nowadays "wisdom" seems to denote a co such qualities as sagacity, prudence, a well-developed sense of values, serenity, and sove world won by the understanding of the mode of its operation. The Buddhist conception of unlike this, but more precise. It is best clarified by first giving its connotations, and then its actual definition. As for the connotations, we read in the //Dhammasangani//:[14] "On occasion the dominant[15] of wisdom is wisdom, understanding,[16] search, research, sea //dharma//;[17] discernment, discrimination, differentiation, erudition, expert skill, subtlety, clarity,[18] reflection, investigation,[19] amplitude,[20] sagacity,[21] a guide (to true welfare the marks as they truly are), insight, comprehension, a goad (which urges the mind to mov right track); wisdom, wisdom as virtue, wisdom as strength (because ignorance cannot dis sword of wisdom (which cuts through the defilements), the lofty (and overtowering) height light,[22] lustre and splendour of wisdom, the treasure[23] of wisdom, absence of delusion, //dharmas//, right view." From mere cleverness wisdom is distinguished by its spiritual pur are told expressly[24] that it is designed "to cut off the defilements." Now to the actu definition: "Wisdom penetrates[25] into //dharmas// as they are in themselves. It disperses delusion, which covers up the own-being of dharmas."[26] What then does wisdom Wisdom may be held to concern itself with three possible topics: (1) true reality; (2) the m life; (3) the conduct of life. Buddhist tradition assumes that the second and third depend on its essence wisdom is the strength of mind which permits contact with the true reality, whi called the realm of //dharmas//. Delusion, folly, confusion, ignorance and self-deception are of wisdom. It is because ignorance, and not sin, is the root evil that wisdom is regarded as virtue. A holiness which is devoid of wisdom is not considered impossible, but it cannot be path of knowledge, to which alone these descriptions apply. The paths of faith, of love, of have each their own several laws. As the unfaltering penetration into the true nature o wisdom is the capacity to meditate in certain ways about the dharmic constituents of the u rules of that meditation have been laid down in the scriptures, particularly in the Abhidharm superb description can be found in the latter part of Buddhaghosa's //Path of Purification//. and concentration were, as we saw, based on the assumption of a duality in the mind--betw depth and its excited surface. Wisdom similarly assumes a duality between the surface and things. Objects are not what they appear to be. Their true reality, in which they stand out as //dharmas//, is opposed to their appearance to commonsense, and much strength of wisdo beyond the deceptive appearance and to penetrate to the reality of //dharmas// themselves

Chapter V

COMPASSION

After a short period of quiet reflection in a grove near the river bank where he had parted from Channa, the young Prince who was now only a wandering beggar, turned his steps southward towards the Magadha country, and in due time reached the chief city of that country, Rajagaha by name, where the King of the country, Bimbisara, had his principal palace. Here, with begging bowl in hand, Siddhattha went round the streets of the city, begging his food from door to door like any other religious mendicant. But he did not look like a common beggar. Those who saw him pass along could see by his very look that he was no ordinary religious mendicant, and they put into his bowl the best food they had.

When he had gathered enough, the prince-beggar left the city again, and in a retired spot outside the walls, sat down to eat what he had collected. But O, what a meal it was! Never in his life before had he, a prince by birth, and accustomed to the best of food served up in the most attractive and tempting way, had such a mixed mess as this set before him. His stomach simply turned in disgust at the sight of that bowl full of scraps and portions of all kinds of different foods, all flung together into one dish. He simply could not bring himself to eat the repulsive mixture. He wanted to throw it away and eat nothing rather than such a mess.

And then he stopped and began to think: and this is what he thought and said to himself:

"Siddhattha, you were born of a good family, in a king's house, where you got everything good to eat that you could wish, the very best of rice, the richest and tastiest of curries, in all abundance. But in spite of this you made up your mind deliberately to live the life of a homeless beggar, and fare the same as every such beggar fares on what-ever was given you by the charitable. And you carried out your resolve: you became a homeless beggar: yet now, what are you doing? You do not want to eat the food proper for homeless beggars to eat -- the food that is given them, whatever it may be. Do you think that is a right thing to do?"

In these and in other words the prince-beggar reasoned with himself, chiding and scolding himself for his daintiness and fastidiousness in the matter of food, so unfitting in a beggar. And in the end, after a struggle with himself, he succeeded in overcoming his repugnance to the food lying in his bowl before him, and he ate it up without further ado, and never afterwards had any more trouble about eating what was given him to eat.

Meanwhile, the people of Rajagaha, King Bimbisara's city, were all talking about the new religious mendicant who had been begging in their streets that morning, he had looked so different from the common run of religious mendicants, so refined, so noble looking! The talk even reached the ears of King Bimbisara in his palace, and he sent his servants to make enquiries and find out who the stranger mendicant could be. Very soon his messengers learned all about Siddhattha, and came back and told their master that he was the eldest son of the King of the Sakyas, the heir to the throne; and that he had left everything behind him in order to become a beggar and try to discover if he could, some way that would lead men beyond the reach of old age and sickness and death. As his servants told King Bimbisara this, he listened to them very much perplexed. Never before had he heard of a religious mendicant looking for anything so strange, so extraordinary. But it sounded great and grand, and worthy of a prince's looking for it and perhaps is was not so impossible as it seemed, he thought. So he sent his men to ask the prince-beggar to stay in his city, and and he would provide a place for him to live in, and food, and everything else he required for his comfort; and he could settle down there and study and meditate and carry on his search. But Siddhattha declined the King's kind offer, saying that he could not stay still anywhere until he had found what he sought. After he had found it, perhaps then he might be able to stay in one place. So then the King made him promise that when he had found what he was seeking, he would come and stay in his city and let him and his people know about it first.

So the prince-beggar left Rajagaha behind him, and passed upon his wandering way into the open country towards a hill on which a great many hermits were living from whom he thought he might be able to learn something about life and death and how all the ills connected with them might be overcome.

And as he went along the road, he saw a cloud of dust coming down the mountain side, and heard the patter of feet; and then out of the dust there came into sight a herd of sheep and goats making their way to the plain. But behind them all, painfully limping along, came a little lamb, its leg hurt, and bleeding, but still trying hard to keep up with its mates. And when Siddhattha saw it, and noticed how anxious about it the mother sheep was, his heart was filled with pity.

He picked up the little creature and walked alongside the rest of the sheep carrying the lame lamb in his arms. "Poor little thing," he said, speaking to the lamb, "I was going to join the hermits on the hills, but it is at least as good a deed to ease your little heart of suffering as to sit up there with these praying hermits."

Then he saw the men who were driving the herd and he asked them where they were going and why they were driving their flocks away from pasture in the heat of the day instead of in the cool of the evening. They answered him that they had been ordered to bring a hundred sheep and a hundred goats down to the city during the day in order that they might be on hand and ready for the great sacrifice that was going to be offered that night by the King. "I will go with you," said the prince-beggar; and he walked along with them and their flock, still carrying the lame lamb in his arms.

And now, as he came near to the riverside, a young woman came up to him, and after saluting him with great respect, said to him: "O Reverend Lord, have pity on me and tell me where I shall be able to find that seed which keeps away death."

Siddhattha looked at her as if he would ask her what she meant.

The woman noticed his look, and went on:

"Do you not remember, Lord? Yesterday I brought you my little son who was sick, so sick that he was near to dying, and asked your reverence if there was no medicine at all that would keep him alive, for he is my only son. And your reverence said yes, there was something that might save him from dying, if I could get it -- a tola's weight of black mustard seed got from a house in which no one ever had died."

"And did you get that seed, sister?" said Siddhattha with a tender, wistful smile.

"Nay, Lord, I did not," said the woman sadly. "I went round all our village to every house asking for black mustard seed, and everybody was very willing to give me some, but when I told them that I only wanted it from them if no one had ever died in their house, they said that that was a queer thing for me to say, for everybody knew there had been a death in their house, and sometimes more then one death. Some said a slave had died with them. In some houses it was the father who had died; in some the son; in some the mother; in some the daughter. But in every home, every house, some one had died. I could not get my seed. O Reverend Sir, tell me where I may get that seed before my little son dies. Are there no homes at all where death has not been?"

"You have said it," Siddhattha answered the now weeping woman. "In all the wide world there are no homes where death has not been. Now you have found this out for yourself. Now you know that yours is not the only grief in the world. Now you know with your own knowledge that all the world weeps along with you for some dear one dead. Go home and bury your child. As for me, sister, I go to find if I can, what will put an end to your and all men's sorrow; and if I find it, I will come again and tell it to you."

So Siddhattha passed on his way and entered the city along with the herd of animals that were going to be killed, and still went with them right up to the palace where the sacrifice was to be made. Here the King was standing with the priests all round him chanting their hymns to the gods; and soon the altar fires were lit and the priests made ready to kill the animals that had now arrived. But just as the chief priest was about to plunge his knife into the throat of the first goat that had been picked for the sacrifice, Siddhattha stepped forward and stopped him. "No, Maharaja,' he said to King Bimbisara, "do not let the priest strike that poor goat." And before any one knew what he was going to do, he untied the rope of grass with which it was fastened, and let it go back to its mates. And no one, not even the King nor the chief priest, thought of trying to stop him from doing it, so great and noble did he look as he set the goat free and allowed it to run back to the rest of its fellows.

Then the Prince-beggar began to speak to the King and the priests and all who had gathered there to see the great sacrifice of blood, about what a wonderful thing life is; how anybody can destroy it, but how impossible it is for any one to restore it once it has been destroyed. Every creature that lives, so he told those round him, is fond of its life, fears to die, just as much as men do. Why then should men use their power over these poor brothers of theirs only to rob them of what man himself is most fond of -- the wonderful thing, life. If men wish to receive mercy, he said, they ought to show mercy. If men kill, then according to the law that rules in the world, they will be killed. And what kind of gods, he asked them, can they be who are pleased with and take delight in blood? Certainly not good gods, he said. Rather they must be demons to take pleasure in suffering and death. No, he ended, if men wish to taste happiness themselves in the hereafter, they must not cause unhappiness to any living creature, even the meanest, here in this world. Those who sow the seed of unhappiness, of pain and suffering, will certainly have to reap a full-grown crop of the same in the future.

In this way did Siddhattha speak to the King and the priests and people of Rajagaha, and did it so gently and kindly, and yet so powerfully, that the minds and hearts of the King and the priests were quite changed. There and then the King issued an order that henceforth throughout the whole of his Kingdom there were to be no more sacrifices in which living creatures were deprived of life. After this day, everybody in his realm, King and priests and people alike, were to offer to the gods only such gifts as did not involve the taking of any living creature's life. They were only to offer as sacrifices to gods, flowers and fruits and cakes, and other similarly bloodless offerings.

And now once more King Bimbisara begged Siddhattha to stay in his kingdom and teach him and his people the good way of kindliness and pity and compassion towards everything that has life. The prince-beggar thanked him for his kind offer but told him that he had not yet found what he was seeking, and until he had found it, he could not rest, but must still go on searching for it everywhere among all the wise men of India, in case any of them knew or in any way could help him in his search.

* * *

Chapter VI

FIRST ENDEAVORS

In those days in ancient India there were very, many different teachers of religion, the same as there are now, who took pupils and taught these pupils all they themselves knew. One of these religious teachers, well known for his knowledge and attainments, was called Alara Kalama, and to this teacher Siddhattha now went in order to learn what he had to teach. And Siddhattha stayed with Alara Kalama a long time and studied under him and practiced the practices his master taught him so diligently that at length he had learned and practiced everything his master knew and practiced. And his master Alara Kalama thought so highly of him and of his great ability that one day he said to him: "Now you know everything I know. Whether you teach my doctrine or whether I teach it, it is all the same. You are the same as I: I am the same as you. There is no difference between us. Stay with me and take my place as teacher to my disciples along with me."

"But have you nothing more you can teach me?" said Siddhattha. "Can you not teach me the way to get beyond the reach of life and death?"

"No," said Alara Kalama. "That is a thing I do not know myself, so how can I teach it to you? I do not believe that anybody in the whole world knows that."

Alara Kalama only knew what he had already taught Siddhattha -- the way to a state of consciousness called "the realm of neither perception nor nonperception," which was a very high state of consciousness, but one which does not save the man who reaches it from the necessity of being born, and therefore of growing old, and falling ill, and eventually dying, over and over again. So, very much disappointed, Siddhattha left his master Alara Kalama, and went away again to wander this way and that throughout the country, looking for some one who knew and could teach him more than he had learned from Alara Kalama.

And after a time he came to hear of another famous teacher of the name of Uddaka, who was said by everybody to possess great knowledge and powers. So Siddhattha now went to this Uddaka and became his pupil and diligently studied and practiced under him until as with Alara Kalama, he was as clever and learned as his master, and knew and practiced all that his master knew and practiced. And Uddaka also, just like Alara Kalama, was so pleased with Siddhattha's quickness and ability, that he also wanted him to stay with him, and along with him become the leader and teacher of his band of disciples. And Siddhattha asked him the same question that he had asked of Alara Kalama. He asked him if he had no more to teach him, if he could not teach him how to overcome birth and death and all the disagreeable things connected with the same. But Uddaka was in the same position as Alara Kalama in this matter. He did not know how men could get out of the round of birth and death altogether, and had never heard of any one who did know such a thing. So disappointed once more, Siddhattha took leave of Uddaka too, and made up his mind that he would not go to any more teachers to ask about what he wanted to know but henceforth would try to find it out for himself, by his own labor and efforts.

Now it was quite a common thing then in India, as indeed it still is to-day, for those men who leave their homes and follow a religious life to imagine that by going without food and making their bodies uncomfortable and miserable in a number of other ways, that they would earn the right to a long period of peace and happiness hereafter in the world of the gods. They thought that if only a man made himself unhappy enough here, he would make sure of being happy hereafter; and that the more unhappy he made himself now, the more happy he would be in the future. And they carried out this belief of theirs in actual practice just as many of them still do in India to-day.

Some of them reduced the quantity of food they ate, little by little, day after day, until at last they were eating hardly anything at all, so that their poor bodies became mere skin and bones. Some practiced standing on one leg all the time until it turned stiff and lifeless with the continual strain. Others held one arm up in the air all the time until it withered and dried up through the blood not flowing into it properly in that unnatural position. Others, again, held their fists tightly clenched, never letting them loose, until the nails at the ends of their fingers actually grew into the palms of their hands, and through the flesh, and out at the backs of their hands! Others never lay down at night except on a bed of thorns, or else on a board with sharp nails all over it, their points sticking upwards.

And Siddhattha, because he was anxious and determined to find out what he wanted to know, and did not care how much trouble and pain he had to go through if only at last he might succeed, did very much the same as these other ascetics who were seeking religious truth. He did not know any better way than to do just as the others did. He honestly hoped and believed that if only he tortured and tormented his body enough, at last as reward he would obtain enlightenment of mind.

Here is part of the story of what he did in those days, as he told it himself in after years to one of his foremost disciples, the Thera Sariputta.

"I practiced the holding in of my breath," said the Buddha to Sariputta, "until it made a great roaring in my ears, and gave me a pain in my head as if some one was boring into it with a sharp sword, or lashing me over the head with a leather whip. In my body also, I suffered pains as if a butcher were ripping me up with a knife, or some one had flung me into a pit of red-hot coals.

"And then I practiced loneliness. On the nights of the new moon and of the full moon, I went out to lonely places among the trees where the dead lay buried, and stayed there all the night through hearing the leaves rustling and the twigs dropping when a breeze blew, with my hair all standing on end with fright. When a bird came and lighted on a bough, or a deer or other animal came running past, I shook with terror, for I did not know what it was that was coming up to me in the dark. But I did not run away. I made myself stay there and face the fear and terror I felt until I had mastered it.

"I also went without food. I practiced eating only once a day, then only once in two days, then only once in three days, and so on until I was only eating once in fourteen days. I have lived eating nothing but grass, nothing but moss, wild fruits and roots, wild herbs and mushrooms, wild rice, and the dust I scraped up of thrashing floors. I covered my body only with garments made out of rags from graveyards and dust-heaps, with old skins of animals that had died in the fields, with woven grass, with patches made of birds' wings and tails that I found lying here and there.

"In the lonely forests I lived alone never seeing a human being for weeks and months. In winter, when it was cold at night, I stayed out in the open without a fire to keep me warm. And in the day-time, when the sun came out, I hid myself among the cold trees. And in the burning heat of summer, I stayed out by day in the open under the hot sun; and at night I went into the close, stifling thickets.

"I also practiced what was called 'purification by food'. I lived on nothing but beans, then on nothing but sesamum seed, then on nothing but rice. And I reduced the quantity I ate of these day by day, until at last I was eating only one bean a day, one sesamum seed a day, one grain of rice a day.

"And through eating so little food, my body became terribly thin and lean. My legs became like reeds, my hips like camel's hoofs. My backbone stood out on my back like a rope, and on my sides my ribs showed like the rafters of a ruined house. My eyes sank so far in my head that they looked like water at the bottom of a deep well and almost disappeared altogether. The skin of my head grew all withered and shrunken like a pumpkin that has been cut and laid out in the sun. And when I tried to rub my arms and legs to make them feel a little better, the hair on them was so rotted at the roots that it all came away in my hands.

"And yet, Sariputta, in spite of all these pains and sufferings, I did not reach the knowledge I wanted to reach, because that knowledge and insight was not to be found that way, but could only be got by profound reasoning and reflection, and by turning away from everything in the world."

In this way, for six or seven long years, Siddhattha put his body to all kinds of torment, thinking that by doing this, if only he went on long enough, at last he would get to know what he wanted, all the while wandering about here and there through the country of Northern India.

At length, in the course of these wanderings, he came to the land of Magadha again, to a nice quiet place in a bamboo grove beside a broad, smooth-flowing river, with a good bathing-place, and a village close by where he could easily go and beg food. He liked the look of this place as soon as he saw it. "This is a good place to stay in," he said to himself, "for any ascetic like myself who wants to strive and struggle for knowledge. Here I will stay."

So in this place, called Uruvela, Siddhattha now took up his fixed residence, under the trees meditating and striving hard, fasting and otherwise treating his poor body very badly, all in the hope that by such pains and endeavors he would gain a knowledge of the truth he sought.

Meanwhile there had gathered round him a little band of disciples who admired him very much as they saw how he starved himself and otherwise made himself undergo severe hardships. And these disciples, five in number, waited upon him and attended to his few wants, for they thought that an ascetic who could make himself suffer such pains and privations, and persevere in them as did Siddhattha, must be no common man. They thought, indeed, they felt sure, that an ascetic with so much endurance and determination, must be certain to get what he was looking for, and that when he had found it, then he would tell it to them, his pupils and followers.

But one day it happened that as he sat alone under a tree, the poor prince-ascetic, all worn out with fasting and hardships, and added to that, the strain of intense and prolonged meditation, fell down in a dead faint, and lay there on the ground so completely exhausted and without strength that perhaps he would never have risen again but died there just where he lay. Fortunately, however, a boy who was watching some goats near by happened to come along by the tree under which Siddhattha lay in a swoon; and when he saw the holy man lying there, the boy at once guessed that he was dying for want of proper food, for everybody round about knew that he was a very holy man, and went without food for days and days. So the boy ran back to his goats and brought up one of them, and milked some milk from its teats into the half-open mouth of the holy man, without touching him with his hands, for he did not dare, he a common herd-boy, to lay his hands on a saint.

Very soon the good, fresh milk began to produce its effect upon the half-dead Siddhattha. After a little while he was able to sit up, feeling very much better than he had felt for a long time. And he began to think about why it was he had fainted, and why he was now feeling so much refreshed in body and mind. And these are the thoughts that passed through his mind:

"O how foolish I have been! I left my wife and family and home and everything, and became a homeless wanderer because I wanted to get to know the truth about man's life and how he must live it to the best purpose. But in order to gain a knowledge so difficult to gain as this, I needed to have a brain and a mind as strong and vigorous as I possibly could get, so that I might be able to think and meditate steadily and strongly. And then I went and made my body weak and wretched with starvation and those other practices I practiced! But how can a man have a strong and healthy mind if his body is weak and miserable and unhealthy? O how foolish I have been to make myself weak just when I need all the strength I can get to carry through the great task I have set myself to perform! After this I shall eat all the food my body requires to keep it in god condition. I shall not eat too much, for that will make me dull and heavy and sleepy, and then I shall not be able to think and meditate properly. But I shall eat enough to keep me well and strong, so that I may have a clear, unclouded mind, and so perhaps, at last, I shall be able to gain the truth I want to reach."

So, with thoughts like this in his mind, Siddhattha turned to the goat-herd boy who now was kneeling before him in veneration, and asked him if he would kindly give him a little more of his goat's milk in a dish, as it was doing him very much good.

"O Reverend Lord," said the boy, "I cannot do that. I cannot give you milk in a dish that has been touched by my hand. I am only a common herd-boy of low caste, and you are a holy man, a Brahmin. If I were to touch you with anything I had touched, it would be a crime."

But Siddhattha replied: "My dear boy, I am not asking you for caste: I am asking you for milk. There is no real difference between us two, even although you are a goat-herd and I am a hermit. It is blood that flows in the veins of both of us. If some robbers were to come and cut us both with swords, the blood that would flow from both our bodies would be of the same red colour. And if it went on running and nobody stopped it, we should both of us die with no difference between us. If a man does high and noble deeds, then he is a high and noble man. And if a man does low and ignoble deeds, then he is a low and ignoble man. That is all the real caste there is. You have done a good kind deed in giving me milk when I was almost dead for want of food; therefore you are of good caste to me. Give me some more milk in a dish."

The herd-boy did not know what to say to these strange but so very pleasant words from this extraordinary hermit who did not send him away from him because he was a low-caste herd-boy, but instead wanted more milk from him, and would take it out of a dish. But he went off, and soon came back with a bowl full of his best goat's milk which he joyfully offered to the kind hermit who had told him that he was of as good a caste to him. Then he took back his empty bowl, and after bowing down before the hermit and asking his blessing, went back glad and happy to his goats.

But the prince-ascetic, now thoroughly refreshed with the good drink of milk, sat on beneath the tree, meditating more successfully than he had done for a long time. And as he still sat there in the dark after the sun had gone down, he heard the sound of girls' voices singing. It was a band of professional singers and dancers going to a neighboring town to give an entertainment; and as they passed along close to where he sat, he distinctly heard the words of their song which was about the instrument they played when they sang, called a lute. They were saying, in their song, that if the strings of the lute were hung too slack, they made very poor music; and if they were stretched too tight, then they broke and made no music at all. Therefore, so they sang, it was best to stretch the strings neither too slack nor too tight, but just medium, and then they would give proper music.

"That is true what these girls sing," thought the prince-ascetic as he heard them. "These girls have taught me something. I have been stretching the strings of my poor body far too tight this long time, and they have come very near to breaking altogether. If that boy had not come and brought me the milk to-day, I should have died, and then what would have become of my search for the Truth? There and then it would have come to an end. My search for that which I and all men need to know would have failed miserably just for want of a little food for my body. This harsh way of treating the body cannot be the proper way to find Truth. I will give it up at once and treat my body with proper care and attention henceforth."

So when, next day, a young woman called Sujata, who lived near by, came to him in his hermitage among the trees with a bowl full of extra good rice boiled with very good rich milk, which she had specially prepared for him, saying as she gave it to him: "May you be successful in obtaining your wishes as I have been!" He did not refuse her gift, but accepted it with pleasure, and felt the benefit of it at once in a greatly strengthened body and mind.

After this, Siddhattha went out again every morning to the village to beg food, and eating what he got there each day, he soon became strong again and his skin became a good colour, almost as clear and golden as it used to be in the old days when he lived in his father's palace.

But although he himself now saw that the pains and hardships to which he subjected himself were just like trying to tie air into knots, or weave ropes out of soft sand, for all the help it was to him in his search for the Truth, the five disciples who believed in him and had hitherto stayed with him through everything did not think this at all. They still believed, like everybody else in India in those days, that the one only way to find the Truth in religious matters was to make yourself miserable in body.

So when they saw the master and teacher they had hitherto admired, so much for the way in which he starved and in other ways ill-treated and tormented his body, beginning to eat all his body required of the rice and curry he got when he went out begging, they were very much disappointed with him, and they said among themselves: "Ah, this Sakya ascetic has given up striving and struggling. He has gone back to a life of ease and comfort." And the whole five of them turned away from their old master and left him, for they felt sure that there was no use in staying any longer with a teacher who did not starve himself and in other ways make himself miserable. Such an ascetic, they were sure, could never possibly attain to any great knowledge of religious truth.

How very much mistaken, how very far wrong, these five disciples of the prince-ascetic were, was soon made clear to them. Their master and teacher, far from having turned back from his goal, was now on the very point of reaching it.

* * *

Chapter VII

SUCCESS

Any one to-day who wishes to see the very spot where, twenty-five hundred years ago, Prince Siddhattha of the Sakya race at last found the Truth he had sought so long and with such painful efforts, need only go to the town of Buddha Gaya in Behar, and from there walk six or seven miles along a road which more or less follows the course of a broad, sandy stream now called the river Phalgu, but which in those days was called the Neranjara. As he comes near his destination, he will see rising above the neighboring flat fields on a slight elevation, a tall solid structure of dark stone, with a few terraces running round its oblong form, which rises into the air, growing smaller and smaller towards the top where there is a small open platform from which rises a spire of stone, of the solid Hindu pattern, the whole structure being decorated with a great variety of sculptured work of all descriptions. This is the celebrated monument of Buddha Gaya. And in the shadow of this great memorial structure, surrounded by a low stone wall, the visitor yet may see the tree beneath whose branches Prince Siddhattha at last obtained the light he sought; for it was towards this tree that he turned his steps one evening, having resolved to make one last mighty effort of mind and will, and penetrate the final secret of life and all existence.

And as he went towards that tree -- in memory of Siddhattha's great achievement ever since called the Bodhi Tree, or Tree of Enlightenment -- Sujata's words to him must have been in his ears: "May you be successful in obtaining your wishes as I have been!" For now he sat down beneath the tree and made a solemn vow to himself that even if all the blood in his veins dried up, and all his flesh wasted away, and nothing was left of his body but skin and sinews and bones, from this seat he would not rise again until he had found what he sought, reached his goal, discovered for himself and for all men the way by which they might gain the highest happiness, be delivered once and for all from the need to be born and to die, again and again in a wearisome, never-ending round of the same pleasures and pains, over and over again. He sat down there under the Bodhi Tree, resolved to sit there, no matter what might happen to him, until he had discovered the way that leads out of Samsara, the world of birth and death and change, to the constant, lasting, deathless state called Nibbana.

This was a tremendous resolve to make. It had never been made before by any mortal man of our epoch of the world. There were indeed many other ascetics and hermits in Siddhattha's native land of India, who had spent long years of bodily hardship and severe mental labor, in order to obtain what they thought was the highest good possible. But what they won after all their years of toil and struggle of mind and will, was the attainment of a very great happiness, only it was not a constant, lasting happiness. It was not permanent. It was not for ever secure against all chance and change. After a time, when the energy they had put forth in order to bring them to these high states of bliss in the heaven-worlds was all exhausted; all spent, then these people, these ascetics and hermits, fell down again from these blissful states to lower states of existence, to life on this earth again, with all its unpleasantness and disappointments. It was with them as it might be with a man who had gathered together a lot of money in a box, and started spending it all. Very soon it would all be spent, the box would be empty, and he would have to begin getting more. And so with these hermits and ascetics, if they wanted to enjoy great happiness again, they had to begin all over again the painful things they had done before, so as to get to the heaven-world again and enjoy its delights. And this they would have to do again and again as long as they wanted such delights. Again and again they would have to go through a course of misery endured on earth so as to get happiness in heaven, and then the same again, always and always, without any end. Their way of doing was like that of a man who with great trouble rolls a heavy ball to the top of a high hill, only to find it roll back to the bottom again; whereupon he has to go through all the labor of rolling it up the hill again, and has to do this over and over again, without any end to his labor.

But what Siddhattha wanted was to find some way by which he and all men would not need any more to be for ever rolling the ball of life to the top of some high peak of happiness, see it roll down again into the valley of unhappiness, and then have all their work to do over again, if they wanted happiness again; and this for ever and ever, without any end to it. He wanted to find some state that would be permanent and lasting, some kind of wellbeing that would not be lost again, so that those who reached it once, would not need any more to be always striving and struggling to get it again. And on this great night under the Bodhi Tree at Uruvela he was determined to find such a state of lasting wellbeing, or perish in trying to find it. And now when Siddhattha wished to give the whole force of his mind to this great work, his mind fought against his will, and turned itself to dwell upon all the unlasting, all the passing, temporary delights and pleasure of life that he ever had tasted. He wanted to leave aside whole thoughts of worldly things, and concentrate all his attention upon trying to find out how all things arise, but his thoughts, in spite of all he could do, turned back to his former pleasant life, and brought before his mind's eye the most attractive pictures of the happy life he used to live in his father's palace before he came out on this painful search for Truth.

Again he saw before the eye of his mind, the splendid rooms and halls of his palace, its beautiful grounds and gardens, its lovely lotus-ponds and bowers of delight; and the many attendants who had nothing else to do but wait upon his will and minister to his pleasure. And then he saw his beautiful young wife; her lovely pleading eyes, her pleasant charming ways rose before him in vision; her very voice, so low and sweet, sounded in his ears. And then he saw his little son, his only child, a merry little babe who might grow up to be a son of which any father might be proud. And he saw his father, too, grey-haired now, and getting on in years, and grieving that his eldest son was not beside him to help him to govern the country and take his place when soon he would have to give it up through sheer old age.

With his mind's eye the prince-ascetic Siddhattha Gotama saw all this, and his heart misgave him as the thought he did not wish to think, forced itself into his mind:

"You might have had great glory and power as a famous king if you had stayed in household life like everybody else. But you have gone and left behind you all that sensible people prize and value, in search of something nobody but yourself has ever even thought about, something that perhaps never can be found at all, perhaps does not even exist for anybody to find! How do you know you are not a fool or a madman to leave behind all these real, solid things you certainly once had and enjoyed, to look for something you cannot even be sure exists for you to find?

"But even if you so want to leave the good things of the world behind you and go in search of something beyond them which you think is better, why could you not continue to search for it in the same way that other religious men search by fasting and mortification and the other religious practices all the other ascetics and religious men of the country follow? Is it likely that they are all wrong in their way of looking for religious truth, and that only you are right? And any way, why cannot you be content to gain the same kind of happiness they are content to gain, even if it is not as lasting as you would like it to be?

"Life is short. Men soon die: soon you too will die. Why do you not use the little time you have to live in getting all the pleasure you can out of it before the night of death comes on, when you cannot have pleasure any more? There is love: there is fame: there is glory: there is the praise of man: all to be had if you try for them: all solid, certain things: all of them things you can feel, not dreams and visions made out of thin air. Why should you make yourself wretched in this lonely forest looking for something nobody has ever found?"

Thus did Siddhattha's thoughts torment him on that great night when he sat down beneath the Bodhi Tree to seek the way of deliverance from birth and death, tormenting him with the keen memory of the pleasures he had left behind, with doubts about his power ever to find what he sought, with uncertainty about whether he was seeking it in the right way. But he did not allow himself to be turned from his purpose. Rather did he the more strenuously pull his mind together for a yet stronger effort to discover what he wanted.

"Begone, Mara, Evil One!" he cried. "I know you who you are. You are the evil spirit that would keep men back from everything that is good and great and noble. Try no more to keep me back from what I have set out and am determined to do. My mind is made up. Here I sit until I have found what I seek, even if I have to sit until all the blood in my body dries up, and my flesh wastes all away, and nothing is left of my but dry skin and bone."

And there Siddhattha sat and still continued sitting, striving and struggling, laboring and wrestling with all his mind and will to find what would bring to an end all infelicity, all undesirable and unpleasant things, searching for what would end all evil things for ever, and bring in their place a wellbeing, a happiness that would not pass away, a felicity that would be sure and lasting, eternally beyond the reach of any change.

And he was successful. After a time as he still persisted in his meditations, putting away out of his thoughts all evil things that were trying to disturb him and distract his mind, at length his mind became still and quiet like a still and quiet lake. It ceased to trouble him with memories and suggestions of pleasures he once had owned and enjoyed. It vexed him no more with doubts and uncertainties about what he now was seeking. In the calm, close concentration of his mind, now wholly calmed and collected, in the intense power of his will now directed towards one thing only, there where he sat under the Bodhi Tree, Prince Siddhattha, the ascetic of the face of the Sakyas, of the family of Gotama, became the Enlightened One, the Awakened One, the All-Knowing One; he became Gotama the Buddha, the bringer of the light of truth to the men of this epoch of the world, to the whole human race that now lives on the earth. For now He was enlightened in a way compared with which all other men were stumbling and groping in the dark. Now He was awake in a way compared with which all other men are asleep and dreaming. Now He knew with a knowledge compared with which all that other men know is but a kind of ignorance.

For now He had penetrated the real true meaning of life through and through from its root upward. Now He knew how and why men were born and died again and again, and how they might cease thus to suffer repeated birth and death. But the first thing He saw clearly with His new and penetrating insight this night as He sat meditating under the Bodhi Tree, was the long line of His own lives and deaths through ages after ages, in all kinds of bodies, in all kinds of conditions of life, low and high, humble and exalted, gross and refined, until at last He was born in this present life as the son of King Suddhodana and Queen Mahamaya.

Then with His keen, penetrating power of mind, He next perceived how all men are born and pass away again, to be born elsewhere anew, strictly according to the deeds they do. He saw how some are born to happy lives because their deeds were good deeds; and He saw how others were born to lives of unhappiness because the deeds they did were evil. He saw as plainly as anything that it is men's own actions and nothing else whatever which make them happy or unhappy in this and in all worlds.

And then, last and greatest of all He saw on this great night, He saw and understood clearly, beyond all doubt, that is it not well for men always to be at the mercy of the continual changes of the world; that it is not good that they should be now happy and now unhappy, now up and now down, like boats tossed on a sea. He perceived that the reason why men come in to existence to be thus tossed about on the waves of the changing world, is because they are fond of, and cling to all the little bits of happiness that existence in the world provides at times. He saw that men are caught in the snare of existence in the world because like deer they fling themselves greedily upon any little bit of pleasure they see. Then He saw that if men do not want to be caught in the snare of existence, the only way for them to do is not to jump heedlessly upon every scrap of pleasure they see, not to abandon themselves recklessly to its enjoyment, not to set their hearts so eagerly upon the things existence offers. And then He saw the Way by following which men at length would be able to refrain from flinging themselves recklessly into enjoyment of pleasure, because they would have learnt to know and like something better, and so they would no longer be bound to come back to the world where such pleasures are found, to the world of change and disappointment and uncertain happiness, and would be able to attain the true and certain happiness of Nibbana. And this Way or Path, He called the Noble Eightfold Path, because it is the Path followed by everybody who has noble aims and desires; and it has eight distinct branches or parts or members.

The first branch or part or member of this Noble Eightfold Path to deliverance from all things evil taught by the Buddha is called -- Right Seeing. This Right Seeing means, to see that everything in the world, even one's own existence, is changeable, not really solid and lasting, and so only leads to disappointment and pain when we cling to it too closely. Right Seeing also means to see that good deeds always lead to happiness and evil deeds to unhappiness, both here and hereafter.

The second member of the Noble Eightfold Path was called by the Buddha -- Right Mindedness. This means an attitude which, because it sees rightly the nature of the world and everything in it, turns away from clinging tightly to it. Right Mindedness also means a right attitude of mind in which we have pity and compassion for all beings who, through clinging too close to worldly things, are suffering distress of body or mind, while at the same time we have a keen desire to relieve their suffering and help them as far as possible.

Right Speaking, the third part of the Buddha's Noble Eightfold Path, means speaking only what is true and kindly and sensible. It means to avoid lying and rude and slanderous and silly talk.

Right Doing, the fourth part of the Noble Eightfold Path, means to refrain from killing, and stealing, and impurity, and the drinking of intoxicating liquors which make men mad and reckless so that they do things they otherwise would never have done.

Right Living, the fifth part of the Eightfold Path, means earning one's living in any way that does not cause hurt or harm to any other living creature.

Right Endeavour the sixth part of the Noble Eightfold Path, means endeavoring, trying to control one's thoughts and feelings in such a way that bad, harmful thoughts and feelings may not arise, and that those which unhappily may have arisen, may die out. It also means trying to keep alive and strong in our minds all good and helpful thoughts and feelings that already are there and causing to arise in our minds and hearts as many as we can of new, good and helpful thoughts and feelings.

Right Remembering, the seventh member of the Noble Eightfold Path, means always remembering, never forgetting, what our bodies really are, not thinking of them as finer and grander than they are actually. It also means remembering all the movements and actions and functions of the body as being just the movements and actions and functions of the body, and nothing else beside. Right Remembering also means remembering what our minds are, a constantly changing succession of thoughts and feelings in which nothing is the same for two moments together. And it means, lastly, bearing in mind and never forgetting the various steps Buddha has taught us we must take in order to set the mind free from all bondage and bring it at last to the state of perfect freedom -- Nibbana.

And Right Concentration, the eight and last member of this Noble Eightfold Way to Nibbana made known by the Buddha means not allowing our minds to wander about as they like, but fixing them firmly upon whatever we are thinking about, so as to arrive in this way at a correct understanding or whatever we are trying to understand.

Such are all the eight parts or members of the Noble Eightfold Path which Prince Siddhattha Gotama, who now became the Buddha Gotama, discovered under the Bodhi Tree at Uruvela twenty-five hundred years ago. The last three parts or members, Right Endeavoring, Right Remembering and Right Concentration, in their full and perfect meaning are mainly intended to be practiced by men who are trying to follow the Buddha closely, and in order to do this better and more easily, have left the household life and become Bhikkhus. But every one, whether he is a Bhikkhu or not, can practice them to a certain extent as they are here described.

The first two members of the Eightfold Path, also, Right Seeing and Right Mindedness, in their full perfection are only possessed by those men who, after many years of training and practice of meditations, at last have come very near to understanding and realizing the true nature of things in the same way that the Buddha did. Yet still, every one who wishes to follow the Buddha, must have a little of Right Seeing, and a little of Right Mindedness. They must think sometimes how all things round them are not really so fine and splendid as they often seem to be. And they must sometimes entertain in their minds the thought that some day they will turn away from the transient things of the world to something better, to something more sure and lasting.

But the three middle members of the Noble Eightfold Path are for everybody to practice to the fullest extent of their powers. Everyone ought to try to live without doing harm to any one either in word or in act. Every one ought to try, and can try to avoid wrong-speaking and wrong-doing; and according as they do this, they prepare the way for some day controlling their thoughts and properly training their minds, and so coming at last to true knowledge and insight, that knowledge and insight which the Buddha discovered and teaches, which is truly called Wisdom.

And when they come to this true wisdom, then the mind is delivered from clinging any more to anything in any world. And because it does not cling any more to such things, therefore it does not any more for ever take shape or form in any world. That is to say: For if there is no more being born into the world, and so no more of all the troubles and unpleasant things that follow men who are born into the world; and so the whole mass of distress of any kind is brought to an end for ever. All this the Buddha discovered beneath the Bodhi Tree: He discovered the Noble Eightfold Path of Right Seeing and Right Mindedness, of Right Speaking and Doing and Living, of Right Endeavoring and Remembering and Concentration, which is also called by the name of the Triple Path of Right Behavior, Mind-culture and Wisdom; or in the Pali, Sila, Samadhi, and Panna.

* * *

PART TWO: INNER SKILL ==========

The ABC's of the Breath (September 27, 1957) ========== are three important parts to meditating: thinking, awareness and the breath. All three of th have to be kept right together at all times. Don't let any one of them come loose from the 'Thinking' refers to thinking 'buddho' together with the breath. 'Awareness' means knowing it goes in and out. Only when thinking and awareness are kept fastened constantly with t you say that you're meditating. The in-and-out breath is the most important part of the b other words, (1) it's like the earth, which acts as the support for all the various things in the

(2) It's like the joists or girders that hold up a floor and keep it sturdy. (3) It's like a board sheet of paper: When we think 'bud-' with an in-breath, it's as if we rubbed our hand once and when we think 'dho' with an out-breath, it's as if we rubbed the board once again. Ea the board, some of the dust is bound to stick to our hand, so if we keep rubbing it back and board is going to become glossy. When it's very glossy, it'll be so clear that we can see o reflection in it. These are the results that come from our thinking. But if we go rubbing hit-won't be able to see our reflection even in a mirror, much less in a board. In anoth sense, the breath is like a piece of paper. When we think 'bud-' in with the breath, it's as if pencil and wrote a letter of the alphabet on a piece of paper. If we keep doing this, event be able to read what we've written. But if our mind doesn't stay constantly with the breath, wrote sometimes right and sometimes wrong. The letters we'd write would be a mess, an letters. No matter how large our piece of paper might be, the whole thing would be a mess able to read what letters we had written, or what they were supposed to say. If we intent, though, and think of the breath as a piece of paper, we'll write down whatever mess the paper and know for ourselves what we've written. For example, thinking 'bud-' is like to our paper. It'll give us knowledge. Even after we've stopped writing, we'll still benefit. B we're not really intent on our writing, our letters won't be letters. If we draw a picture of a it won't be a person. If we draw an animal, it won't be an animal. When w start learning to write, we have to use chalk because it's big, easy to write with and easy to is like thinking 'buddho.' Once we advance in our studies, we start using a pencil because clear and longer-lasting. For example, the sentence, 'Where's Dad?' is a piece of knowled only read the separate letters, 'W' or 'D', it doesn't really count as knowledge. So we then our chalk. In other words, we don't have to repeat 'buddho.' We use our powers of evalua see, as we're breathing: Is the in-breath good? Is the out-breath good? What kind of bre comfortable? What kind of breathing isn't? Then we correct and adjust the breath out whichever way of breathing seems good, and then observe it to see if it gives comfort
If it does, keep that sense of comfort steady and put it to use. When it's really good, benef arise, perfecting our knowledge. Once we've obtained knowledge, we can erase the penci notebooks, because we've seen the benefits that come from what we've done. When we g take our knowledge with us and make it our homework. We can do it on our own at home; at the monastery, we can keep at it constantly. So the breath is like a piece of paper mind is like a person, knowledge is like a note: Even just this much can serve as our star we're intent on just these three things--thinking, awareness and breath--we'll give rise to kn within ourselves that has no fixed limits and can't possibly be told to anyone else.

As the Mind Turns (August 9, 1958)

========== Every person has both awareness and una who has studied various diseases: He's knowledgeable about the diseases he's studied, b ones he hasn't. We human beings have both darkness and brightness. The darkness is brightness, awareness. The affairs of the world keep spinning around like a wheel. live in the world, we thus have both pleasure and pain in line with worldly conditions--the w rebirth. Whenever we spin around and run into the cycle of pain, we feel that the world is r and confining. Whenever we spin around and run into the cycle of pleasure, we feel that t and refreshing, an inviting place to live. This happens because we spin along with the wor don't really know the world as it actually is. Once we stop spinning, though, we'll come to k of the world and the true nature of the Dhamma. Whenever we run along after the can't see the world easily. For this reason, we first have to stop running, and then we'll se clearly. If the world is spinning and we're spinning too, how can we expect to see it? It's lik persons running: They'll have a hard time seeing each other's faces. If one stops but the running, they can see each other somewhat, but not clearly. But if they're both running, the other even less clearly. For example, if we're sitting or standing still, and someone sneak us over the head and then runs off, we'll have a hard time catching him. In the same way, around or get involved in the spinning of the world, we'll have even less chance of knowin anything. The Dhamma thus teaches us to stop spinning the wheel of rebirth so that we ca clearly. When an airplane propeller or any bladed wheel is spinning, we can't see h blades it has, what shape they are or how fine they are. The faster it spins, the less we ca shape. Only when it slows down or stops spinning can we see clearly what shape it has.
analogy for the spinning of the currents of the world--the outer world--and for our own spinn live in the world. The outer world refers to the earth in which we live. The world of fashionings refers to ourself: our body and mind, which are separate things but have to de other, just as the world and people, which are separate things, have to depend on each oth a body but not a mind, we wouldn't be able to accomplish anything. The same would be tru without a body. So the mind is like a person dwelling in the world. The mind is the craftsm body, its work of art. The mind is what creates the body. It's what creates the world. world is something broad and always spinning, something hard to see clearly. This is why teaches us to stop spinning after the world, and to look only at ourself. That's when we'll b see the world. We ourself are something small--a fathom long, a span thick, a cubit wide-- belly is big. No matter how much we eat, we're never full. We never have enough. This s greed of the mind, which causes us to suffer because of our lack of enough, our desires, o

To see ourself or to see the world, the Buddha teaches us to survey ourself from the feet, from the feet to the head, just as if we're going to plant a tree: We have to survey thin the ground on up to the tips of the branches. The ground stands for the purity of our livelih to examine the ground to see if it has any termites or other pests that will destroy the roots tree. Then we have to add the right amount of fertilizer--not too little, and not too much. W care for it correctly in line with its size. For example, how do we observe the five precepts they're pure? How do we observe the eight, the ten and the 227 precepts so that they're p should we abstain from doing? What things should we do? This is called Right Livelihood. If we attend too much to our physical pleasure, we tend not to give rise to virtue, like certai trees that are very healthy, with large branches and lush foliage, but tend not to bear fruit. person eats a lot and sleeps a lot, if he's concerned only with matters of eating and sleepin will be large and hefty, like a tree with a large trunk, large branches and large leaves, but hardly any fruit. We human beings--once our bodies are well-nourished with food--if we the sermon or sit in meditation, tend to get drowsy because we're too well nourished. If we si time, we feel uncomfortable. If we listen to a sermon, we don't know what's being said, bec sleepy. This ruins our chance to do good. People who are too well nourished tend to get and addicted to pleasure. If they sit in meditation, they tend to get numb, tired and drowsy.

This is why we're taught to observe the eight uposatha precepts as a middle path. We e half of the day, only half full. That's enough. This is called having a sense of moderation w regard to food. We don't have to load up, or to compensate for missing the evening meal. enough. 'I abstain from eating at the wrong time:' After noon we don't have to turn to anot so that the heart won't turn after the world. This is like giving just enough fertilizer to our tre

'I abstain from dancing, singing and ornamenting the body:' The Buddha doesn't ha beautify the body with cosmetics and perfumes, or ornament it with jewelry. This is like giv just the right amount of water. Don't let the soil get water-logged. Otherwise the roots wil other words, if we get attached to scents and to beauty of this sort, it'll make us so infatuat our virtue will suffer. This is like taking scraps of food and pouring them around the foot of Dogs will come to trample over the tree, chickens will peck at the leaves and flowers, and f will eat into the roots, causing our tree to wither or die. All sorts of complications will come us. 'I abstain from high and large beds:' When we lie down to sleep, the Buddha d have us use soft mattresses or cushions that are too comfortable, because if we have a lot we'll sleep a lot and not want to get up to do good. The results of our concentration pract meager, and our laziness will grow rampant. This is like caterpillars and worms that burrow the soil: They'll keep whispering to us, teaching us all sorts of things until ultimately they te stop doing good--and so we stop. This is like insects crawling up from the ground and eati tree, climbing higher and higher up until they reach the tiptop branches: the mind. Ultimat eat the tips of the branches, the tree won't bear flowers. When it has no flowers, it won't b In the same way, if we lack a sense of moderation in caring for ourself, we won't be practic

Livelihood. If we don't have a proper sense of how to nourish and care for the body, our c have to degenerate. But if we have a proper sense of how to nourish and care for the body will have to develop in the direction of purity, and the mind will have to develop along with by step. The world has its highs and lows, its good and evil, and we're jus like the world. Our body--no matter how much we care for it to make it strong and healthy, comfortable--will have to be good in some ways, and to malfunction in others. What's impo we don't let the mind malfunction. Don't let it go branching out after its various preoccupati let the mind go around thinking good and evil in line with its preoccupations, it won't be ab advance to a higher level. So we have to make our tree have a single tip: We have to cen firmly in a single preoccupation. Don't let your moods hold sway over the mind. We have mind from its preoccupations with sights, sounds, smells, tastes and tactile sensations, lea single mental preoccupation. Let a preoccupation with what's good and worthwhile arise Don't let any of the forms of mental corruption arise. Mental corruption refers to (1 greed for sights, sounds, smells, tastes, etc.; (2) ill will--focusing on this matter or that per not being good, which develops into a desire for retribution, leading to a confrontation or to
(3) wrong views--seeing that doing good doesn't lead to good results; for example, seeing generous, observing the precepts or practicing meditation doesn't make one rich or happy, stops doing good. We have to rid the heart of these three forms of mental corruption. Whe freed from corruption, it will have to enter mental rectitude, becoming a worthwhile mind, pu Right Undertaking: in other words, meditation. In practicing meditation, we really ha true in our work if we want results. We have to be true in our body, true in our speech, tru heart. Our body has to sit straight and unmoving in a half-lotus position. Our speech has t not saying a thing. Our heart has to be set straight and still, not flitting out after allusions past or future. If we can be true in our work in this way, we'll have to succeed and see resu we're slipshod and desultory, our work won't succeed. This is why we're taught, anakula ca kammanta edam mangalam uttamam: 'Undertakings that are not left u supreme good omen.' In practicing meditation, the mind is what gives the orde other words, we should have a base or a frame of reference, contemplating the breath so refined--because the more refined something is, the higher its value. Our breath sensation sorts: (1) The first are the breath sensations that flow from the head down to the t our feet. (2) The second are those that flow from the tips of the feet to the head. These tw turns running back and forth like a rope over a pulley that we pull up and down. (3 third sort are the breath sensations that flow throughout the body. These are the sensation ventilate the body, receiving our guests--the breath permeating in through the skin--and e inner breath, keeping the pure, beneficial breath in the body and expelling the harmful brea the pores. (4) The fourth sort is the breath in the upper abdomen, guarding betwe heart, lungs and liver on the one hand, and the stomach and intestines on the other. It sup organs so that they don't press down on the lower ones, and keeps the lower organs dow don't push up and crowd the upper ones. This sort of breath we have to observe in order t it's heavy on the left or right side. (5) The fifth sort are the breath sensations flowi in the intestines, helping to warm the fires of digestion, just as if we were steaming fish or foods to keep them from spoiling. When our food is cooked, it can be of use--like the stear the lid of a pot--to enrich the blood that nourishes the various parts of the body. Whichev nourishment should become hair, nails, teeth, skin, etc., the blood sends to those parts.

These breath sensations are always flowing in waves through the intestines to disperse the digestion. When we eat, it's like putting food in a pot on the stove and then closing the lid.
there's no ventilation in the pot at all, and we simply add fire, it won't be long before our sto wrecked and our intestines ruined, because we've closed the lid so tightly that no air can p out, until the heat becomes too strong and burns our food to a crisp. Our body won't get ar it. On the other hand, if the heat is too low, our food won't cook through. It'll spoil, we'll ge upset stomach, and again our body won't get any benefit. These sorts of breath sensation digestive fires just right for the body. If we look at these five sorts of breath sensati in the correct way, we're sure to reap two sorts of results: (1) In terms of the body, those many diseases will have fewer diseases; those of us with few diseases may recover compl that haven't yet arisen will have a hard time arising. (2) In terms of the mind, we'll becom contented, happy and refreshed. At the same time, meditation can help free us from bad k unwholesome mental states won't have a chance to infiltrate the mind. Our life will be lon healthy. If we keep developing our meditation to higher and higher levels, the four properti the body will become clear and pure. If we practice meditation by keeping the breath in mind until the breath is refined and the mind is refined, the breath settles dow stop and the mind settles down to be still, then we'll be able to see our body and mind clea and mind will separate from each other, each existing independently--just as when outside entering in and insiders don't go out. Awareness will arise within us as to how the body is f how the mind is functioning. How has our body come into being? We'll know. And where here? We'll know where it came from, where it's going--we'll know it completely. What act our past lives that caused us to be born in this state, we'll know. This is called knowledge lives. 2. The people and other living beings who've been our parents, brothers, sis relatives and friends: Where have they come from? When they die, what sorts of pleasure they meet with? And where? We might be able to make contact with them and send curr energy to help them. This is called knowledge of death and rebirth. 3. We'll see th body and mind are inconstant, stressful and not self, to the point where we become disenc This will cause us to let go of the body, and free us from the fetters of attachment. These include such things as attachment to worldly phenomena (loka-dhamma): When we let ou with gain, status, pleasure and praise, it's no different from the King of Death tying our han Then when he gives a single lash with his whip--i.e., we suffer loss, disgrace, pain and ce come tumbling right down. Another kind of fetter is self-identification--attachment to body, seeing it as 'us' or as an entity, which gives rise to misconceptions. Another fetter is uncertainty--doubts and hesitation, running back and forth, not knowing which way to go, a spinning around along with the world. Once we know the ways of the body and minc released from these fetters. The mind will gain release from the body and shed the ferme defilement. This is called knowledge of the end of mental fermentation. The mind will gain insight and flow into the current of Dhamma leading ultimately to nibbana. When w spinning along with the world, we'll be able to see the world--our body--clearly. Once the n can then see the body. For this reason, we should slow down the spinning of the body by filtering its properties, making them more and more refined; slow down the spinning of our silent; and slow down the spinning of the mind, making it firm and still by centering it in concentration, thinking about and evaluating the breath. When the mind stops spinning aft concepts and preoccupations, our words and body will stop along with it. When each one can see them all clearly. The mind will know the affairs of the body through and through, g liberating insight that will slow down the spinning of the wheel of rebirth. Our births will be less and less until ultimately we won't have to come back to live in a world ever again.

To practice meditation is one sort of food for the heart. Food for the body is not any lasting. We eat in the morning and are hungry by noon. We eat at noon and are hungry ag evening. If we're full today, tomorrow morning we'll be hungry again. We keep eating and like this, and the day will never come when we've had enough. We'll have to keep looking things to eat. As for food for the heart, if we prepare it really well, even for a little space o time, we'll be full for the rest of our life. Mental Power, Step by Step (July 26, 1956) ========== you keep track of the breath going in and out. Don't let yourself forget or be distracted. Tr of all allusions to past or future. Silently repeat 'buddho' in your mind--'bud-' in with every in-breath, and 'dho' out with every out--until the mind settles down and is still. Then you ca mental repetition, and begin observing the in-and-out breath to see how fast or slow, long heavy or light, broad or narrow, crude or subtle it is. Stick with whichever way of breathing comfortable. Adjust whichever way of breathing isn't comfortable or easy until it's just right own discrimination--dhamma-vicaya-sambojjhanga--as your standard of judgment. (Whe adjustments in this way, you don't have to do any mental repetition. You can let 'buddho' g

You have to keep an eye on your mind to make sure that it doesn't wander, waver or fly external concepts. Keep the mind still, indifferent and unconcerned, as if there were only y alone in the world. Let the breath spread throughout every part of the body, from the head the fingers and toes, in front, in back, in the middle of the stomach, all the way through the intestines, along the blood vessels and out through every pore. Breathe long and deep un full. The body will feel light, open and spacious, just like a sponge full of water: When we the water out, it all comes out easily without any interference. At this point, the bo will feel light and at ease. The mind will feel as cool as the water that permeates the soil, s the roots of trees, keeping them nourished and fresh. The mind will be set straight and up leaning to the left or right, forward or back. In other words, it doesn't stretch out to any con outside preoccupations at all. Concepts lie at the essence of mental fashioning. Th thinks of matters either past or future, and then starts elaborating on them as good or bad, disliking them. If we see them as good, we get pleased and taken with them: This is delus see them as bad, we get displeased, which clouds and defiles the mind, making it irritated, annoyed: This is ill will. The things that give rise to unrest and disturbance in the mind are classed as Hindrances (nivarana)--fashionings that fashion the mind, destroying whatever practice of concentration. So we have to do away with them all. Mental fashionin think in terms of the world, are world-fashionings. If we think in terms of dhamma, they're dhamma-fashionings. Both sorts come from avijja, unawareness. If this unawareness disb will arise in its stead. So we have to try to increase the strength of our concentration to the where fashionings disband--and at that point, unawareness will disband as well, leaving on This awareness is identical with discernment, but it's a discernment that arises from It doesn't come from anything our teachers have taught us. It comes from the stillness of m on events in the present. It's an awareness that's very profound, but it's still mundane--not transcendent--discernment, because it comes from concepts and allusions. It's still tied up affairs of being and birth. Perhaps we may become aware of matters of the past, k seeing the states of being and birth we've been through. This is called knowledge of past we may become aware of the future, knowing the affairs of other people, how they die and This is called knowledge of death and rebirth. Both these forms of knowledge still have att infiltrating them, causing the mind to waver in line with its likes and dislikes. This is what our insight. Some people, when they learn of the good states of being and birth in past, get engrossed, pleased and elated with the various things they see. If they meet up w aren't so good, they feel disgruntled or upset. This is simply because the mind still has at its states of being and birth. To like the things that strike us as good or satisfying is self-inc To dislike the things that strike us as bad or dissatisfying is self-affliction. Both of these attitudes are classed as wrong paths that deviate from the right path, or Right View.

Matters of the past or future, even if they deal with the Dhamma, are still fashionings, and s the mark. Thus the next step is to use the power of our concentration to make the mind ev to the point where it can snuff out these mundane forms of discernment. The mind will ther transcendent discernment--a higher form of discernment, an awareness that can be used from attachment--Right Mindfulness, the right path. Even though we may learn good or ba ourself or others, we don't become pleased or upset. We feel nothing but disenchantmen and dismay over the way living beings in the world are born and die. We see it as somethi without any substance. We're through with feelings of liking and disliking. We've run out o for ourself and everything else. The mind has moderation. It's neutral. Even. This is calle six-factored equanimity (chalang'upekkha). We let go of the things that happen, that we kn letting them follow their own regular course without our feeling caught up with them. The m then move up to liberating insight. At this point, make your strength of mind even mo powerful, to the point where it is freed from attachment even to the realizations it has com Knowing is simply knowing; seeing is simply seeing. Keep the mind as something separate flow out after its knowing. We know, and then leave it at that. We see, and then leave it a don't latch on to these things as being ours. The mind will then gain full power and grow st accord--not involved, not dependent on anything at all. Fashionings disappear co leaving just a pure condition of dhamma: voidness. This is the phenomenon of non-fashio The mind is free from the world--exclusively within the current of the Dhamma, without goi forward or back, progressing or regressing. The mind is a stake driven firmly in place. Ju tree is attached to a stake by a rope: When the tree is cut down, the rope snaps in two, bu stays put. The mind stays put, unaffected by any objects or preoccupations. This is the r Noble Disciple, a person free from the fermentations of defilement. Whoever trains her heart in line with what has been mentioned here will meet with security, contentment an from every sort of trouble or stress. What we have discussed briefly here is enough to be u in the practice of training the mind to gain release from suffering and stress in this lifetime.

take an interest in these things will be to our advantage in the times to come.

Observe & Evaluate (July 24, 1956)

========== In fixing our attention on the breath, the im use our powers of observation and evaluation and to gain a sense of how to alter and adjus that we can keep it going just right. Only then will we get results that are agreeable to body mind. Observe how the breath runs along its entire length, from the tip of the nose on dow Adam's apple, windpipe, heart, lungs, down to the stomach and intestines. Observe it as it the head, down past your shoulders, ribs, spine and tail bone. Observe the breath going o your fingers and toes, and out the entire body through every pore. Imagine that your body candle or a Coleman lantern. The breath is the mantle in the lantern; mindfulness, the fuel light. Your body, from the skeleton out to the skin, is like the wax of the candle surroundin wick. We have to try make the mind bright and radiant like a candle if we want to get good Everything in the world has its pair: There's dark, and so there has to be bright.
There's the sun, and there's the moon. There's appearing, and there's disappearing. Ther there are results. Thus, in dealing with the breath, the mind is the cause, and mindfulness In other words, the mind is what acts, mindfulness is what knows, so mindfulness is the re mind. As for the properties of the body--earth, water, fire and wind--the breath is the caus the mind makes the cause good, the physical result is that all the properties become radian comfortable. Strong. Free from disease. The results that arise by way of the body and m by the act of adjusting. The result is that we notice and observe. When we sit and meditate, we have to observe the breath as it goes in and out to see what it feels like as it it moves or exerts pressure on the different parts of the body, and in what ways it gives ris sense of comfort. Is breathing in long and out long easy and comfortable, or is breathing in long easy and comfortable? Is breathing in fast and out fast comfortable, or is breathing i out slow? Is heavy breathing comfortable, or is light breathing comfortable? We have to u powers of observation and evaluation, and gain a sense of how to correct, adjust and eas that it's stable, balanced and just right. If, for example, slow breathing is uncomfortable, ad that it's faster. If long breathing is uncomfortable, change to short breathing. If the breath gentle or weak--making you drowsy or your mind drift--breathe more heavily and strongly.

This is like adjusting the air pressure on a Coleman lantern. As soon as the air and the ker mixed in the right proportions, the lantern will give off light at full strength--white and dazzling--able to spread its radiance far. In the same way, as long as mindfulness is firmly breath, and we have a sense of how to care for the breath so that it's just right for the vario of the body, the mind will be stable and one, not flying out after any thoughts or concepts. develop a power, a radiance called discernment--or, to call it by its result, knowledge.
This knowledge is a special form of awareness that doesn't come from anything our teache or anyone has told us. Instead, it's a special form of understanding praised by the Buddha View. This form of understanding is coupled with mindfulness and presence of mind. It ran Mindfulness and Right Concentration as well. When a mind rightly concentrated gains inc the results can lead to intuitive insight, direct realization, purity of knowledge and ultimately release, free from any sort of doubt. The mind will be independent, quiet, light and ease--self-contained, like a flame in a glass lantern. Even though insects may come and s lantern, they can't put out the flame; and at the same time, the flame can't lick out to burn th of the person carrying it. A mind that has mindfulness constantly watching over it is bound incapable of stretching or reaching out to take up with any preoccupations at all. It won't lic front or flicker back behind, and external preoccupations won't be able to come barging into Our eyes--the eyes of our discernment--will be clear and far-seeing, just as if we were sittin interstices of a net, able to see clearly in whichever direction we looked.
What does discernment come from? You might compare it with learning to become a potte basket weaver. The teacher will start out by telling you how to make a pot, sew a shirt or a pants, or weave different patterns, but the proportions and beauty of the object you make w depend on your own powers of observation. Suppose you weave a basket and then take a proportions, to see if it's too short or too tall. If it's too short, weave another one, a little tall and then take a good look at it to see if there's anything that still needs improving, to see if too thin or too fat. Then weave another one, better-looking than the last. Keep this up unti one that's as beautiful and well-proportioned as possible, one with nothing to criticize from This last basket you can take as your standard. You can now set yourself up in business. What you've done is to learn from your own actions. As for your previous efforts, you need yourself with them any longer. Throw them out. This is a sense of discernment that arises accord, an ingenuity and sense of judgment that come not from anything your teachers hav from observing and evaluating on your own the object that you yourself have made. holds true in practicing meditation. For discernment to arise, you have to be observant as of the breath and to gain a sense of how to adjust and improve it so that it's well-proportio throughout the body--to the point where it flows evenly without faltering, so that it' s comfor slow and out slow, in fast and out fast, long, short, heavy or refined. Get so that both the and the out-breath are comfortable no matter what way you breathe, so that--no matter wh feel a sense of ease the moment you focus on the breath. When you can do this, physica appear: a sense of ease and lightness, open and spacious. The body will be strong, the b will flow unobstructed and won't form an opening for disease to step in. The body will be awake. As for the mind, when mindfulness and self-awareness are the causes, a s the result. When negligence is the cause, a mind distracted and restless is the result. So make the causes good, in order to give rise to the good results we've referred to. If we us of observation and evaluation in caring for the breath, and are constantly correcting and im we will develop awareness on our own, the fruit of having developed our concentration hig When the mind is focused with full circumspection, it can let go of allusions to past. It sees the true nature of its old preoccupations, that there's nothing lasting or certai them. As for the future lying ahead of us, it's like having to sail a small boat across the gr sea: There are bound to be dangers on all sides. So the mind lets go of allusions to the fu into the present, seeing and knowing the present. The mind stands firm and d sway. Unawareness falls away. Knowledge arises for an instant, and then disappears, so that you can know that there in the present is a void. A void.

You don't latch on to world-fashionings of the past, world-fashionings of the future, or dhamma-fashionings of the present. Fashionings disappear. Avijja--counterfeit, untrue awareness--disappears. 'True' disappears. All that remains is awareness: 'buddha... bud The factor that fashions the body, i.e., the breath; the factors that fashion speech, i.e., t that formulate words; and the factor that fashions the mind, i.e., thinking, all disappear. Bu awareness doesn't disappear. When the factor that fashions the body moves, you're awar factor that fashions speech moves, you're aware of it. When the factor that fashions the m you're aware of it, but awareness isn't attached to anything it knows. In other words, no fa affect it. There is simply awareness. At a thought, the mind appears, fashionings appear. to use them, there they are. If not, they disappear on their own, by their very nature. Awar above everything else. This is release. Meditators have to reach this sort of aware they're to get good results. In training the mind, this is all there is. Complications are a lo fuss and bother, and tend to bog down without ever getting to the real point.

The Refinements of the Breath (August 3, 1956)

========== When we sit in meditation, observant of the levels of the breath. The breath in the body has three levels: common, profound. 1. The common breath is the breath we breathe into the body. It comes sorts. (a) That which is mixed with impure or polluted air: When it goes into the lungs, it do come out. The dregs hang on in the body. And when these dregs mix with the blood in the can cause the blood to be harmful to the body, giving rise to diseases. But these diseases be treated with medicine. If we treat them using the breath, they'll go away. (b) The othe common breath is that which is beneficial--the breath mixed with pure air. When it mixes w the heart, it's beneficial to the body. 2. The refined breath is gentle and soft. It's th delicate breath sensations derived from the in-and-out breath that permeate between the and nerves. This breath is what gives rise to our sense of feeling throughout the body.

The profound breath lies deeper than the refined breath. It's cool, spacious, empty and wh
The refined breath that spreads to nourish the body is the important level of breath to use for observing all three levels of the breath. When this refined breath is spread fully throug part of the body, the body will feel light, empty and quiet--but we are still mindful and self-a mind is stable and so is the sense of the body. When this is the case, we are constantly r self-aware. At this point, a bright light will appear in our sensation of the breath. Even thou eyes are closed, it's as if they were open. We'll feel as if the breath in our body had a whi like the mantle of a Coleman lantern bathed with light. This is the profound breath. The m serene and still; the body becomes serene and still. The mind at this point is said in Right Concentration, which can lead to liberating insight. Liberating insight can cut away allusions and concepts dealing with past and future. In other words, the mind is content to profound breath, the spacious and empty breath. As long as the mind hasn't penetrated to the breath, it isn't free from Hindrances. It doesn't give rise to discernment; it has no true a But when the awareness that comes from stillness gains power, it gives rise to strength a mind and breath are both bright. When every aspect of the breath is equally strong, the pr becomes apparent: quiet and smooth; free from waves; motionless and resilient. The bre point isn't affected by the in-and-out breath. The body is quiet, with no feelings of pain. It f buoyant, saturated and full, like the mantle of a Coleman lantern: There's no need to pump sound, the air inside seems still, and yet the light is dazzling. All that's needed is the vapor kerosene, and the lantern will give off light. The body is quiet, with no ups or downs, or lows. When the breath is smooth and level in this way, it makes the body feel light, em quiet. This is called kaya-passaddhi: physical serenity. The mind, which stays with the qu termed citta-passaddhi: a serene mind. When the mind stays with this stillness, it become This brightness comes from the mind's being firmly centered. When the mind is firmly cent insight. When insight arises, we can be aware on the level of sensations (rupa) a acts (nama) that arise from the in-and-out breath. We're aware of the common breath, the and the profound breath. We can keep tabs on all three levels of the breath. When our a reaches this point, we can be said to know the breath, or to know sensation. Then we obs things affect the mind. This is called knowing mental acts. Once we can know both sensa acts, we'll know: 'This is true awareness. This is how true awareness goes about knowing can't make the mind behave in this way, we can't know. And when we can't know, that's a unawareness. Unawareness is darkness. The common breath is dark, the refined dark, the profound breath is dark. How harmful this darkness is for the body and mind, we more darkness. Unawareness. Unawareness is like putting tar oil in a Coleman lantern. the bad features of tar oil. It gives rise to nothing but trouble--darkness--for other people, a time being destructive to our own heart and mind, just as a fire fed with tar oil will give off but black smoke. The more tar oil we feed it, the blacker the smoke--and then we go arour our black smoke is something special, but actually it's unawareness, i.e., unaware of the fa unawareness. So we get more and more wrapped up in our unawareness until we're cove Soot is a form of filth that gives rise to harm. When a fire gives off black smoke, i light is bad, the fire is bad, the smoke is bad. Bad smoke is the nature of unawareness; an bad, the knowledge it gives rise to is bad, the results it gives rise to are bad. These are a that give rise to suffering and stress. This is the sort of harm that comes from unawarenes The harm caused by unawareness is like a wood-fire. A wood-fire makes us sweat and--a enough--its light is red and fierce like the light of the sun. Whatever it's focused on will go u flames. Any place a wood-fire burns for a long time will become black with soot, just as a p builds a wood-fire gets himself all dirty. His face and arms get black, his clothes get black, since he sees this blackness as his own, he doesn't take offence at it. Just like an infected body: No matter how dirty or smelly it may be, he can still touch it without feeling any revul But if he saw the same sore on someone else, he'd be so repulsed that he couldn't stand to wouldn't even want to go anywhere near. Anyone whose mind is wrapped up in u like a person covered with open sores who feels no embarrassment or disgust at himself. our own kitchen walls: Even though we see it, we simply see it, without any sense that it's disgusting or embarrassing. But if we saw it in someone else's kitchen, we'd want to run a Unawareness is what kills people. Unawareness is a trap. But ordinarily a tra catch only dull-witted animals. Sharp-witted animals usually don't let themselves get caugh stupid, unawareness will catch us and eat us all up. If we live under the sway of ignoranc aren't acquainted with the three levels of breath in the body--we'll have to reap harm. To k though, is to have Right Mindfulness. We'll know the causes of our actions and their resu this is to be mindful and alert. Our body and actions will be clear to us, like a fire that's brig and of itself. Where does its brightness come from? From the energy in the kerosene. S the profound breath. It's quiet in the body, like a Coleman lantern glowing dazzlingly bright quiet, as if no air had been pumped into it at all. This is kaya-passaddhi, physical serenity. As for the mind, it's crystal clear all around. And like the glow coming off the mar the lantern, it's of use to people and other living beings. This is what's meant by 'pabhassa cittam'--the mind is radiant. When we can keep the mind pure in this way, it gains the pow lies deeper still--but as of yet we can't know clearly. We'll have to make our strength of mi powerful than this: That's vipassana, clear-seeing insight. When vipassana arises, if we put kerosene directly on the mantle of a lantern: The fire will flame up instantly; the li dazzle in a single flash. The allusions and concepts that label sensations will disappear; t and concepts that label mental acts will disappear. All labeling and naming of things will a single mental instant. Sensations are still there, as always; mental acts are still there, as but the labels that take hold of them are cut, just like a telegraph line: The transmitter is t the receiver is there, the line is there, but there's no connection--the current isn't running. wants to send a message can go ahead and try, but everything is quiet. So it is with the we cut through labels and concepts, then no matter what anyone may say to us, the heart

This is vipassana, an awareness beyond the sway of unawareness, free from clinging
The mind rises to the transcendent, released from this world. It dwells in a 'world' higher ordinary worlds, higher than the human world, the heavenly and the Brahma worlds. This Buddha gained the knowledge of unsurpassed right self-awakening, a tremor went through universe, from the lowest reaches of hell, up through the human world to the worlds of the Because his mind had gained full power so that it could part its way up above the Brahma

For this reason, we should reflect on the common breath we're breathing right now. It to benefits mixed with harm. The refined breath nourishes the blood vessels and nerves. breath adjusts the breath sensations throughout the body so that the breath is self-sufficie affairs. The earth property, the fire property and the water property all become self-sufficie their own affairs. And when all four properties are self-sufficient, they become equal and b there's no turmoil in the body. The mind is self-sufficient, the body is self-sufficient, and we stop worrying about them, just like a child we've raised to maturity. The body and mind be independent in its own affairs. This is termed paccattam: We see on our own, and responsible for ourselves. Sanditthiko: We can see clearly for ourselves. Akaliko: No ma soon as we reflect on the three levels of the breath, we immediately gain comfort and ease legal terms, we've come of age. We're no longer minors, and have full rights to our parents accordance with the law. To speak in terms of the monastic discipline, we no longer have our teachers, because we're fully able to look after ourselves. And to speak in terms of the longer have to depend on teachers or texts. What I've been saying here is aimed a a sense of how to apply our powers of observation to the three levels of the breath. We s to them until we gain understanding. If we're observant in keeping tabs on the three levels at all times, we'll reap results--ease of body and mind--like an employer who constantly ke the workers in his factory. The workers won't have a chance to shirk their duties, and will h their minds on doing their work as they are supposed to. The result is that our work is su finished quickly, or to make steady progress. The Direct Path (September 14, 1956) ========== Whe the breath, you must try to cut away all outside preoccupations. Otherwise, if you let yours distracted, you won't be able to observe the subtleties of the breath and mind The energy in the body can be divided into three parts: one in the heart and lungs, another in t intestines, and a third in the blood vessels throughout the body. All three are breaths that moving; but there's another breath--a still breath, light and empty--centered in the diaphrag heart and lungs on the one hand, and the stomach and intestines on the other. This brea motionless, unlike the breath distilled in the heart and lungs. It exerts no pressure on any p body at all. As for the moving breath, when it strikes the blood vessels, it feels wa or hot, and sometimes causes excretions in your nose. If the breath is predominant over th it causes the blood to be cool. If the fire property is predominant over the breath property the blood to be hot. If these properties are combined in the right proportions, they give rise feeling of comfort and ease--relaxed, spacious and still--like having an unobstructed view sky. Sometimes there's a feeling of ease--relaxed, spacious but moving: This is called piti

The best breath to focus on is the empty, spacious breath. To make use of the bre to use whichever feeling is most predominant, as when you feel very relaxed, very empty o comfortable. If there's a feeling of motion, don't use it. Use just the feelings of emptiness, or lightness. To use them means to expand their range, so that you feel empty in every pa body. This is called having a sense of how to make use of the feelings you already have. these feelings, you have to be completely mindful and self-aware. Otherwise, when you st empty or light, you might go thinking that your body has disappeared. In letting the sensations expand, you can let them spread either one at a time or all together at once. Th point is that you keep them balanced, and that you focus on the whole body all at once as object of your awareness. This is called ekayana-magga, the direct path. If you can maste like having a white cloth that you can either keep hidden in your fist or spread out for two Your body, although it may weigh 50 kilograms, may feel as light as a single kilogram. This maha-satipatthana--the great frame of reference When mindfulness saturates the bo flame saturates every thread in the mantle of a Coleman lantern, the elements throughout t together like a group of people working together on a job: Each person helps a little here a in no time at all, almost effortlessly, the job is done. Just as the mantle of a Coleman lant every thread is soaked in flame becomes light, brilliant and white, in the same way if you so in mindfulness and self-awareness so that it's conscious of the entire body, both body and become buoyant. When you think using the power of mindfulness, your sense of the body become thoroughly bright, helping to develop both body and mind. You'll be able to sit or long periods of time without feeling tired, to walk for great distances without getting fatigued unusually long periods of time on just a little food without getting hungry, or to go without sleep altogether for several days running without losing energy. As for the heart, it become pure, open and free from blemish. The mind will become bright, fearless and stron Saddha-balam: Your sense of conviction will run like a car running without stop along the r Viriya-balam: Your persistence will accelerate and advance. Sati-balam: Your mindfulnes will be robust, capable of knowing both past and future. For instance, knowledge of past li knowledge of other beings' death and rebirth: These two kinds of intuition are essentially fo mindfulness. Once your mindfulness is fully developed, it can give you knowledge of peop and lives. Samadhi-balam: Your concentration will become unwavering and strong. No a able to kill it. In other words, no matter what you're doing--sitting, standing, talking, walking whatever--as soon as you think of practicing concentration, your mind will immediately be Whenever you want it, just think of it and you've got it. When your concentration is this str meditation is no problem. Panna-balam: Your insight will be like a double-edged sword. into what's outside will be sharp; your insight into what's inside will be sharp. Wher five strengths appear in the heart, the heart will be fully mature. 'Saddhindriyam viriyindriy satindriyam samadhindriyam pannindriyam:' Your conviction, persistence, mindfulness, c discernment will be mature and pre-eminent in their own spheres. It's the nature of mature they co-operate. When they work together on a job, they finish it. So it is when you have adults working together for you: You'll be able to complete any task. Your mind will have t demolish every defilement in the heart, just as a nuclear bomb can demolish anything any world. When your mind has this sort of power, liberating insight will arise, like a lan with sharp edges on all four sides, or a power saw whose blade has teeth all the way arou like the stand on which the saw rests; the mind is the circular blade: Wherever it spins, it through whatever is fed into it. This is the nature of liberating insight. These are so of the results that come from knowing how to refine the breath and how to expand the still it benefits both body and mind. We should take these matters to heart and put them into are able, so as to share in these benefits.

Knowledge & Vision (July, 1958) ========== The parts of are tense, painful or sore--think of them as hoodlums or fools. As for the parts that are re comfortable, think of them as sages. Ask yourself: Do you want to live with sages or fools It's not the case that the body will be painful in every part all at the same time. Sometimes hurts, but our arm doesn't hurt; our stomach aches, but our back doesn't ache; our legs hu feet are fine; or our eyes hurt, but our head doesn't hurt. When this is the case, we should stay with the good parts. If we take up company with more and more good people, they'll where they can drive out all the hoodlums. In the same way, when the mind is very still, th comfort will become so great that we'll forget about aches and pains. The breath energy in the body is like a messenger. When we expand the breath--this is what's vicara--mindfulness will spread throughout the body, as if it were going along an electric mindful is like sending electricity along a wire; self-awareness is like the heat of the electric energizes us and wakes us up. When the body is energized, no pains will overcome it. I we wake up the properties of earth, water, wind and fire so that they get to work. The prop body will become strong and healthy, making the body feel comfortable and well. This is mahabhuta-rupa. When this sense of mahabhuta-rupa is nourished with breath and mindf will grow and mature. The properties will grow quiet and mature, and become maha-sati great frame of reference. This is threshold concentration; or vicara--spreading the b

In centering the mind, we have to put it on the middle path, cutting away all thoughts and future. As for worldly phenomena--gain and loss, status and disgrace, praise and cens and pain--no matter how bad they may be, or how fantastically good, we aren't interested-- they really have been good, they've left us long ago; and as for the good lying ahead, it ha us yet. To feed on moods that are past is like eating things that other people have out. Things that other people have spit out, we shouldn't gather up and eat. Whoever doe said, is like a hungry ghost. In other words, the mind is a slave to craving, which is like sa don't get to eat any food, and so we sit swallowing nothing but saliva. The mind isn't in the To think of the future is like licking the rim of tomorrow's soup pot, which doesn't yet have drop of soup. To think about the past is like licking the bottom of yesterday's soup pot whe any left. This is why the Buddha became disenchanted with past and future, bec they're so undependable. Sometimes they put us in a good mood, which is indulgence in p they get us in a bad mood, which is indulgence in self-affliction. When you know that this thing isn't the path of the practice, don't go near it. The Buddha thus taught us to shield the that it's quiet and still by developing concentration. When a person likes to lick his her preoccupations, if they're bad, it's really heavy. If they're good preoccupations, it's not but it's still on the mundane level. For this reason, we're taught to take our stance in the pr When the mind isn't involved in the past or the future, it enters the Noble Path--and then w how meaningless the things of the past are: This is the essence of the knowledge of past l things come back and turn into new; new things come back and turn into old. Or as people future becomes the past and the past becomes the future. When you can dispose with pas mind becomes even more steadfast. This is called Right Mindfulness. The mind strength of conviction (saddha-balam), i.e., your convictions become more settled in the tr present. Viriya-balam: Your persistence becomes fearless. Sati-balam: Mindfulness deve mindfulness. Samadhi-balam: The mind becomes firm and unshaking. Panna-balam: D acute to the point where it can see the true nature of the khandhas, becoming dispassionat of the body and self so that the mind is released from the power of attachment. This, acc wise, is knowledge of the end of mental fermentation. To know where beings go a birth is termed knowledge of death and rebirth. We become disenchanted with states of be know enough to feel disenchantment, our states of being and birth lessen. Our burdens ar lighten. The mind's cycling through states of being slows down. Just like a wheel when we the tire and place logs in the way: It slows down. When the mind turns more slowly, you c stages in its cycle. This is called knowing the moments of the mind. To know in this way is insight. It's awareness. To know past, future and present is awareness.

The Noble Ones aren't attached to activities--to acting, speaking or thinking--in any way. W processes of action fall silent, their minds are empty and clear, like space. But we ordinary hold on to speaking, standing, walking, sitting, lying down, everything--and how can it help The Noble Ones let go of it all, and so are at ease. If they walk a long time, they don't get

If they sit a long time, they don't ache. They can do anything without being weighed down.
are weighed down are those who hold on. Stress for ordinary people is pa and suffering. For sages, it's the wavering of pleasure. The breath of birth or of life is the in-breath. The out-breath, when there's no in-breath, is the breath of d Whether a person is to have the potential for a short or a long life depends on the in-and-Thus the breath is termed kaya-sankhara, the factor that fashions the body. It's the crucial life. When you can catch hold of the breath, you can keep tabs on your own birth and dyi birth and dying on the obscured level. As for birth and dying on the open level, even fools can know it: 'Birth' means breathing, sitting, lying down, standing, walking, etc. 'Death' m stop breathing and to get hauled off and cremated. But birth and dying on the obscured lev only within. And not everyone can know them: Only those who still their minds can.
focus on the breath this way is, at the same time, mindfulness of death, mindfulness of bre mindfulness immersed in the body. Or you can call it ekayana-magga--unifying the sense a single, direct path. Vitakka is to bring the topic of meditation to the mind, to bring the min topic of meditation. Vicara means to spread, adjust and improve the breath carefully. The keep at this, the more comfortable your going will be, just as when we work at clearing a ro of the body will benefit in three ways, feeling light, cool and comfortable. At this point, our meditation theme becomes even stronger, and the mind feels even greater ease and detac citta-viveka, or mental solitude. The sense of the body becomes more quiet and detached, kaya-viveka, or physical solitude. The breath energy in the body falls into tw classes. One class is called the 'feminine breath,' the gentle flow of energy from below th to the head and out the nose. The other class is called the 'masculine breath,' the solid flo from the ends of the feet up through the spine. Once you can focus on these breaths, don' their basic nature. Be conscious of them when you go in to co-ordinate and connect them, results that come from spreading and adjusting the breath. As soon as things feel smooth focus in on the breath in the stomach and intestines, and the breath energy that acts as a s them, keeping them from rubbing against each other, like the cotton wool used to pack a st glassware to keep the glasses from striking against one another. When the breath is quiet and the mind at ease, this is goodness in its greater form. When the mind is the body in turmoil, this is goodness in a lesser form. Let the mind settle wherever there's comfort in the body, in the same way that we go to look for food in places where in the past enough to eat our fill. Once the mind is full, rapture (piti) arises. Pleasure (sukha) saturat heart, just as salt saturates pickled fish. The mind will take on value. The sense of the bod become bright, clear and cool. Knowledge will begin to see bit by bit, so that we can com nature of our own body and mind. When this state of mind becomes stronger, it turns into nana-dassana--knowledge and vision. Knowledge on this level comes from mindfuln from self-awareness. When the wavering of the mind stops, craving for sensuality, for be no becoming all stop. Pain and pleasure, let go of them. Don't give them a second though them as words that people speak only in jest. As for the truth, it's there in the heart. If the still wavers and strays, there will have to be more states of being and birth. If sensual crav it leads to a gross state of being. If craving for becoming moves, it leads to an intermediat being. If craving for no becoming moves, the mind will latch on to a subtle state of being.

we see this happening can we be said to know past, future and present. When this clear and full, the mind becomes dispassionate and loosens its attachments, coming to a fu stopping of unawareness, the stopping of birth. This is why the Buddha felt no attachment family, for wealth, servants or material pleasures of any kind.

Coming Home (September 22, 1956) ========== eyes while sitting in meditation, simply close your eyelids. Don't try to close off your eyes, person sleeping. You have to keep your optic nerves awake and working. Otherwise you to sleep. Think of your internal meditation object--the in-and-out breath--and th think of bringing your external meditation object--'buddho,', awake, which is one of the virtu Lord Buddha--in with the breath. Once you can focus comfortably on the breath, le breath spread throughout the body until you feel light, supple and at ease. This is called the proper quality in practicing concentration. To keep the mind fixed so that it doesn't slip from the breath is called maintaining the proper object. Being firmly mindful of your medita without any lapses, is called maintaining the proper intention. When you can keep your mi these three component factors, you can say that you're practicing meditation.

Once we set our mind on doing good in this way, things that aren't good--nivarana, or Hind bound to come stealing into the mind. If we call the Hindrances by name, there are five of here we aren't going to talk about their names; we'll just talk about what they are: (1) Hind things that defile and adulterate the mind. (2) They make the mind dark and murky. (3) T obstacles that prevent the mind from staying firmly with the component factors of its medita

Hindrances come from external preoccupations, and external preoccupations arise beca preoccupation is weak. To say that our internal preoccupation is weak means that our min firmly with its object. Like floating a dipper in a barrel of water: If it doesn't have anything t it down, it's bound to wobble and tip. The wobbling of the mind is what creates an openin various Hindrances to come pouring in and make the mind lose its balance. We s ourself aware that when the mind starts tipping, it can tip in either of two directions: (1) It m toward thoughts of the past, matters that happened two hours ago or all the way back to breath. Distractions of this sort can carry two kinds of meaning for us: Either they deal in t worldly matters--our own affairs or those of other people, good or bad--or else they deal in the Dhamma, things good or bad that have happened and that we've taken note of. (2) Or tip towards thoughts of the future, which are the same sort of thing--our own affairs or tho others, dealing in terms of the world or the Dhamma, good or bad. When our mind drifting in this way, we're bound to receive one of two sorts of results: contentment or disco moods that indulge either in pleasure or in self affliction. For this reason, we have to catc the mind constantly and bring it into the present so that these Hindrances can't come seep then, the mind isn't really at equilibrium. It's still apt to waver to some extent. But this wa isn't really wrong (if we know how to use it, it isn't wrong; if we don't, it is) because the min it wavers, is looking for a place to stay. In Pali, this is called sambhavesin. So we're taugh meditation theme to act as a focal point for the mind, in the same way that a movie screen reflector for images so that they appear sharp and clear. This is to keep external preoccup barging in. In other words, we're taught to meditate by focusing the mind in one p the breath. When we think of the breath, that's called vitakka--as when we think 'bud-' in a like we're doing right now. As for the wavering of the mind, that's called vicara. When we vicara into the picture, we can let go of part of vitakka. In other words, stop repeating 'bud then start observing how much the body is affected by each in-and-out breath. When the does it feel easy and natural? When it comes in, does it feel comfortable? If not, improve When we direct the mind in this way, we don't have to use 'buddho'. The in-breath will spread throughout the body, along with our sense of mindfulness and self-awareness. Wh part of vitakka--as when we stop repeating 'buddho,' so that there's only the act of keeping breath--the act of evaluating increases. The wavering of the mind becomes part of our co Outside preoccupations fall still. 'Falling still' doesn't mean that our ears go deaf. Falling s means that we don't stir the mind to go out after external objects, either past or future. W stay solely in the present. When the mind is centered in this way, it develops sensiti and knowledge. This knowledge isn't the sort that comes from studying or from books. It c doing--as when we make clay tiles. When we first start out, we know only how to mix the c and how to make plain flat tiles. But as we keep doing it, we'll start knowing more: how t attractive, how to make them strong, durable and not brittle. And then we'll think of making different colors and different shapes. As we keep making them better and more attractive, make will in turn become our teachers. So it is when we focus on the breath. As w observing how the breath flows, we'll come to know what the in-breath is like; whether or comfortable; how to breathe in so that we feel comfortable; how to breathe out so that we f what way of breathing makes us feel tense and constricted; what way makes us feel tired breath has up to four varieties. Sometimes it comes in long and out long, sometimes in lon sometimes in short and out long, sometimes in short and out short. So we should observ four types of breath as they flow in the body to see how much they benefit the heart, the lu other parts of the body. When we keep surveying and evaluating in this way, min and self-awareness will take charge within us. Concentration will arise, discernment will ar will arise within us. A person who develops this sort of skill may even become able to brea using the nose, by breathing through the eyes or the ears instead. But when we're starting make use of the breath through the nose, because it's the obvious breath. We first have t observe the obvious breath before we can become aware of the more refined breath sensa

The breath energy in the body, taken as a whole, is of five sorts: (1) The 'sojourning (agantuka-vayas) that's continually flowing in and out. (2) The breath energy that stays w body but can permeate through the various parts. (3) The breath energy that spins around The breath energy that moves and can flow back and forth. (5) The breath energy that no nerves and blood vessels throughout the body. Once we know the various kinds of b how to make use of them and how to improve them so that they feel agreeable to the bod expertise. We'll become more adept with our sense of the body, and results will arise: a fe fullness and satisfaction pervading the entire body, just as kerosene pervades every threa mantle of a Coleman lantern, causing it to give off a bright white glow. Vitakka is lik putting sand into a sifter. Vicara is like sifting the sand. When we first put sand into a sifte still coarse and lumpy. But as we keep sifting, the sand will become more and more refin have nothing but fine particles. So it is when we fix the mind on the breath. In the first stag breath is still coarse, but as we keep using more and more vitakka and vicara, the breath and more refined until it permeates to every pore. Olarika-rupa: All sorts of comfortable se appear--a sense of lightness, spaciousness, respite, freedom from aches and pains, etc.- nothing but refreshment and pleasure in the sense of the Dhamma, constantly cool and rel Sukhumala-rupa: This sense of pleasure will appear to be like tiny particles, like the mist o forms the air but can't be seen with the naked eye. But even though we feel comfortable a this point, this mist of pleasure pervading the body can form a birthplace for the mind, so w that we've gone beyond stress and pain. This is one of the forms of awareness we in concentration. Whoever develops it will give rise to a sense of inner refreshment: a fe lightness, like cotton wool. This lightness is powerful in all sorts of ways. Hinam va: The b sense of the body will disappear--panitam va--and will turn into a more refined sense of the and beautiful. The beauty here isn't the sort that comes from art or decoration. In it's beauty in the sense of being bright, clear and fresh. Refreshing. Soothing. Peaceful. qualities will give rise to a sense of splendor within the body, termed sobhana, a sense of r exhilaration that fills every part of the body. The properties of earth, water, fire and wind in are all balanced and full. The body seems beautiful, but again this isn't beauty in the sense All of this is termed panita-rupa. When the body grows full and complete to this exte four of the elementary properties become mature and responsible in their own spheres, a mahabhuta-rupa. Earth is responsible in its own earth affairs, water in its own water affairs own wind affairs, and fire in its own fire affairs. When all four properties become more res and mature in their own affairs, this is termed olarika-rupa. The properties of space and co also become mature. It's as if they all become mature adults. The nature of mature adults together, is that they hardly ever quarrel or dispute. Children, when they live with children, be quarreling all the time. So when all six properties are mature, earth won't conflict with w won't conflict with wind, wind won't conflict with fire, fire won't conflict with space, space wo conflict with cognizance. All will live in harmony and unity. This is what is meant by ekayano ayam maggo sattanam visuddhiya: This is the unified path for the purification of b physical properties become mature in the unified sense of the body, four-in-one. When th into this unified path, it's able to become well-acquainted with the affairs of the body. It con feel that this body is like its child; the mind is like a parent. When parents see that their chi grown and matured, they are bound to feel proud. And when they see that their child can c itself, they can put down the burden of having to care for it. (At this point there's no need to the Hindrances any longer, because the mind at this point is firmly centered. The Hindranc a chance to slip in.) When the mind can let go of the body in this way, we will feel an inner glow in both body and mind, a glow in the sense of a calm pleasure unlike the pleasu world--for instance, the body feels relaxed and at ease, with no aches or fatigue--and a glo sense of radiance. As for the mind, it feels the glow of a restful sense of calm and the glow radiance. This calm glow is the essence of inner worth (punna). It's like the water vapor th from ice-cold objects and gathers to form clouds that fall as rain or ride high and free. In th this cool sense of calm explodes into a mist of radiance. The properties of earth, water, w space and cognizance all become a mist. This is where the 'six-fold radiance' (chabbanna-The sense of the body will seem radiant and glowing like a ripe peach. The power glow is called the light of the Dhamma (dhammo padipo). When we've developed this qual secure and the mind wide awake. A mist of radiance --a power--appears within us. This ra becomes more and more powerful, is where intuitive insight will appear--the means for kno Noble Truths. As this sense of intuition becomes stronger, it will turn into knowledge and a knowledge we haven't learned from anywhere else, but which we've gained from the practi Whoever can do this will find that the mind attains the virtues of the Buddha, Dhamma and will enter to bathe the heart. Such a person can be said to have truly reached the refuge o Buddha, Dhamma and Sangha. Whoever can do even just this much is capable of reachin having to go and do much of anything else. If we're careful, circumspect, persistent, mindfu discerning, we'll be able to open our eyes and ears so that we can know all kinds of things-even have to be reborn to come back and practice concentration ever again. But if we're complacent--careless, inattentive and lazy--we'll have to come back and go through the pra again. The reason we practice concentration is to disband the Hindrances from the heart. When the Hindrances are absolutely quiet, the mind can reach vihara-dhar quality that can form its home. We'll then be able to gain complete freedom from the Hindr future states of rebirth will be no lower than the human level. We won't be forced to gain re four realms of deprivation (apaya). Once the mind reaches its inner home, it's capable of itself to the transcendent level, to the stream flowing to nibbana. If we're not lazy or compla keep persevering with our meditation, we'll be able to gain release from the mundane level gains the quality of stream-entry, we will never again have to be born in the realms of depri Stream-winners, if we were to explain them in really simple terms, are people whose m certain and sure, but who still have some forms of shoddy thoughts--although they would n shoddiness show in their actions. As for ordinary run-of-the-mill people, once they have a thought, it's bound to appear in their words and deeds--killing, stealing, etc. Although strea may still have some forms of shoddiness to them, they don't act shoddy at all, like a perso knife in his hand when he's angry, but who doesn't use it to cut off anyone's head.

Ordinary people usually can't say no to their defilements. They usually have to act in line w defilements as they arise. For example, when they feel strong anger, they can't bear it. Th let it show, to the point where they can get really ugly and do things that fly right in the face morality. Stream-winners, although they do have defilements, can say no to them. Why? have the discipline of mindfulness embedded within them, enabling them to tell right from w mind wavers in a good direction, they're aware of it. When it wavers in a bad direction, th of it. They see, hear, smell aromas, taste flavors, feel tactile sensations just like ordinary p they don't let these things make inroads on the heart. They have the self-control that ena withstand their defilements, like a person who is able to carry a bowlful of water while runni spilling a single drop. Even though stream-winners may be 'riding a bicycle'--i.e., sitting, s walking, lying down, speaking, thinking, eating, opening or closing their eyes--the permane their hearts never gets overturned. This is a quality that never disappears, although it may sometimes. That wavering is what can cause them to be reborn. But even though they ma they're reborn in good states of being, as human or heavenly beings. As for ordinary they take birth without any real rhyme or reason, and they keep doing it over and over agai Stream-winners, however, understand birth. Though they experience birth, they let it disb words, they have no use for shoddy impulses. They respond weakly to shoddy impulses, a ones. Ordinary people respond strongly to bad impulses, and weakly to good ones. For who decides to go do good at a monastery--if someone then makes fun of him, saying that the monastery are old-fashioned or have hit rock-bottom--will hardly feel like going at all. E how other people may try to talk him into doing good, he hardly responds. This is because the mind has fallen very low. As for stream-winners, no matter how many times sh may occur to them, the goodness of nibbana acts as a magnet on their hearts. This is wh keep on practicing until they reach the end point. When they reach the end point, there ca birth, no more ageing, no more illness, no more death. Sensations stop, feelings stop, con fashionings stop, cognizance stops. As for the six properties, they also stop. Earth stops stops, wind stops, fire stops, space stops, cognizance stops. The properties, khandhas an stop. There's no mental label alluding to any of the khandhas. Mental labels are the med the khandhas come running in. When mental labels stop, there's nobody running. And wh stopped running, there's no pushing and shoving, no colliding, no conversing. The heart itself, in line with its duties. As for the properties, khandhas and sense media, each independent in its own area, each is in charge of its own affairs. There's no trespassing on property. And once there's no trespassing, what troubles will there be? Like a match left ly in the match box: What fires can it cause? As long as its head isn't struck on anything abr won't have a chance to arise. This doesn't mean that there's no fire in the match. It's there always was, but as long as it doesn't latch onto anything combustible, it won't flare up.

The same is true of a mind that no longer latches on to the defilements. This is what is me It's the ultimate good, the ultimate point of the religion, and our own ultimate point as well don't progress in the threefold training--virtue, concentration and discernment--we won't ha to reach the ultimate. But if we gather these practices within ourselves and advance in th will develop the knowledge and awareness that will be capable of pushing us on to an adva nibbana. Noble disciples are like people who realize that rain water is the vapor that heat sucks up from the salt water of the ocean and then falls down as rain--and water is ocean water, and ocean water is rain water. Ordinary run-of-the-mill people are lik who don't know what rain water comes from. They assume that rain water is up there in th deludedly wait to drink nothing but rain water. If no rain comes, they're sure to die. The r their ignorance is their own stupidity. They don't know enough to search for new resources of the Noble Ones--and so will have to keep gathering up the same old things to eat over They keep spinning around in the cycle of rebirth in this way, with no thought of searching of this mass of suffering and stress. They're like a red ant that keeps probing its way arou around the rim of a bushel basket--whose circumference isn't even two meters--all because realize that the rim of the basket is round. This is why we keep experiencing birth, ageing and death without end. As for the Noble Ones, they see that everything in the world same old stuff coming over and over again. Wealth and poverty, good and bad, pleasure a censure, etc., keep trading places around and around in circles. This is the cycle of defile causes ignorant people to misunderstand. The world itself spins--Sunday, Monday, Tuesd Thursday, Friday, Saturday, and then back to the same old Sunday all over again. Janua March, April, May, etc., up to November and December, and then back to January. The ye ox, the tiger, all the way up to the year of the pig, and then back to the same old year of th over again. Everything is like this, night following day, day following night. Night-time isn't Our daytime is other people's night-time, their daytime is our night-time. Things keep cha this. This is called the wheel of the world, which causes people with only partial knowledge misunderstand and to quarrel. When Noble Ones see in this way, they develop a s dispassion, and don't ever want to be born in a world again--for there are all sorts of worlds worlds have nothing but cold, others nothing but heat--no living beings can be born there. sunlight; others only moonlight; still others, neither sunlight nor moonlight. This is what is lokavidu. For this reason, once we've learned this, we should take it to think over carefully. Whatever we see as worthy of credence, we should then use to train our hearts and their fruitions will arise within us. Don't be heedless or complacent in anything you do is like dew on the grass. As soon as it's touched by the light of the sun, it vanishes in no ti leaving a trace. We die with every in-and-out breath. If we're the least bit careles we are sure to die, for death is something that happens very easily. It's lying in wait for us moment. Some people die from sleeping too much, or eating too much, or eating too little;

cold, too hot, too happy, too sad. Some people die from pain, others die without any pain. when we're sitting around perfectly normal, we can still die. See that death has you surro sides--and so be earnest in developing as much goodness as you can, both in the area of t the Dhamma.

PART II

SELECTED TEXTS

Texts 1_3: Translated by Edward Conze Text 4: Translated by Nyanaponika Mahathera Text 5: Translated by Bhikkhu Nanamoli

1. THE FIVE FACULTIES

(a) From the Milindapanha

The king said: "Is it through wise attention that people become exempt from further rebirth?"--"Yes, that is due to wise attention, and also to wisdom, and the other wholesome //dharmas//."--"But is not wise attention the same as wisdom?"--"No, Your Majesty. Attention is one thing, and wisdom another. Sheep and goats, oxen and buffaloes, camels and asses have attention, but wisdom they have not."--"Well put, Venerable Nagasena."

The king said: "What is the mark of attention, and what is the mark of wisdom?"--"Consideration is the mark of attention, cutting off that of wisdom."--"How is that? Give me a simile."--"You know barley-reapers, I suppose?"--"Yes, I do."--"How then do they reap the barley?"--"With the left hand they seize a bunch of barley, in the right hand they hold a sickle, and they cut the barley off with that sickle."--"Just so, Your Majesty, the yogin seizes his mental processes with his attention, and by his wisdom he cuts off the defilements."--"Well put, Venerable Nagasena."

The king said: "When you just spoke of 'the other wholesome dharmas,' which ones did you mean?"--"I meant morality, faith, vigour, mindfulness and concentration."--"And what is the mark of morality?"--"Morality has the mark of providing a basis for all wholesome dharmas, whatever they may be. When based on morality, all the wholesome dharmas will not dwindle away."--"Give me an illustration."--"As all plants and animals which increase, grow, and prosper, do so with the earth as their support, with the earth as their basis, just so the yogin, with morality as his support, with morality as his basis, develops the five cardinal virtues, i.e. the cardinal virtues of faith, vigour, mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom."

"Give me a further illustration."

"As the builder of a city when constructing a town first of all clears the site, removes all stumps and thorns, and levels it; and only after that he lays out and marks off the roads and cross-roads, and so builds the city, even so the yogin develops the five cardinal virtues with morality as his support, with morality as his basis."

The king said: "What is the mark of //faith//?"--"Faith makes serene, and it leaps forward."--"And how does faith make serene?"--"When faith arises it arrests the five hindrances, and the heart becomes free from them, clear, serene and undisturbed."--"Give me an illustration."--"A universal monarch might on his way, together with his fourfold army, cross over a small stream. Stirred up by the elephants and horses, by the chariots and infantry, the water would become disturbed, agitated and muddy. Having crossed over, the universal monarch would order his men to bring some water for him to drink. But the king would possess a miraculous water-clearing gem, and his men, in obedience to his command, would throw it into the stream. Then at once all fragments of vegetation would float away, the mud would settle at the bottom, the stream would become clear, serene and undisturbed, and fit to be drunk by the universal monarch. Here the stream corresponds to the heart, the monarch's men to the yogin, the fragments of vegetation and the mud to the defilements, and the miraculous water-clearing gem to faith."

"And how does faith leap forward?"--"When the yogin sees that the hearts of others have been set free, he leaps forward, by way of aspiration, to the various fruits of the holy life, and he makes efforts to attain the yet unattained, to find the yet unfound, to realize the yet unrealized."--"Give me an illustration."--"Suppose that a great cloud were to burst over a hill-slope. The water then would flow down the slope, would first fill all the hill's clefts, fissures, and gullies, and would then run into the river below, making its banks overflow on both sides. Now suppose further that a great crowd of people had come along, and unable to size up either the width or the depth of the river, should stand frightened and hesitating on the bank. But then some man would come along, who, conscious of his own strength and power, would firmly tie on his own loin-cloth and jump across the river. And the great crowd of people, seeing him on the other side, would cross likewise. Even so the yogin, when he has seen that the hearts of others have been set free, leaps forward, by aspiration, to the various fruits of the holy life, and he makes efforts to attain the yet unattained, to find the yet unfound, to realize the yet unrealized. And this is what the Lord has said in the Samyutta Nikaya:

> By faith the flood is crossed,
> By wakefulness the sea;
> By vigour ill is passed;
> By wisdom cleansed is he."

"Well put, Nagasena!"

The king asked: "And what is the mark of //vigour//?"--"Vigour props up, and, when propped up by vigour, all the wholesome dharmas do not dwindle away."--"Give me a simile."--"If a man's house were falling down, he would prop it up with a new piece of wood, and, so supported, that house would not collapse."

The king asked: "And what is the mark of //mindfulness//?"--"Calling to mind and taking up."

"How is calling to mind a mark of mindfulness?"--"When mindfulness arises, one calls to mind the //dharmas// which participate in what is wholesome and unwholesome, blamable and blameless, inferior and sublime, dark and light, i.e. these are the four applications of mindfulness, these the four right efforts, these the four roads to psychic power, these the five cardinal virtues, these the five powers, these the seven limbs of enlightenment, this is the holy eightfold path; this is calm, this insight, this knowledge and this emancipation. Thereafter the yogin tends those //dharmas// which should be tended, and he does not tend those which should not be tended; he partakes of those //dharmas// which should be followed, and he does not partake of those which should not be followed. It is in this sense that calling to mind is a mark of mindfulness."--"Give me a simile."--"It is like the treasurer of a universal monarch, who each morning and evening reminds his royal master of his magnificent assets: 'So many elephants you have, so many horses, so many chariots, so much infantry, so many gold coins, so much bullion, so much property; may Your Majesty bear this in mind.' In this way he calls to mind his master's wealth."

"And how does mindfulness take up?"--"When mindfulness arises, the outcome of beneficial and harmful //dharmas// is examined in this way: 'These //dharmas// are beneficial, these harmful; these //dharmas// are helpful, these unhelpful.' Thereafter the yogin removes the harmful //dharmas//, and takes up the beneficial ones; he removes the unhelpful //dharmas//, and takes up the helpful ones. It is in this sense that mindfulness takes up."--"Give me a comparison."--"It is like the invaluable adviser of a universal monarch who knows what is beneficial and what is harmful to his royal master, what is helpful and what is unhelpful. Thereafter what is harmful and unhelpful can be removed, what is beneficial and helpful can be taken up."

The king asked: "And what is the mark of //concentration//?"--"It stands at the head. Whatever wholesome //dharmas// there may be, they all are headed by concentration, they bend towards concentration, lead to concentration, incline to concentration."--"Give me a comparison."--"It is as with a building with a pointed roof: whatever rafters there are, they all converge on the top, bend towards the top, meet at the top, and the top occupies the most prominent place. So with concentration in relation to the other wholesome //dharmas//."--"Give me a further comparison."--"If a king were to enter battle with his fourfold army, then all his troops--the elephants, cavalry, chariots and infantry--would be headed by him, and would be ranged around him. Such is the position of concentration in relation to the other wholesome //dharmas//."

The king then asked: "What then is the mark of //wisdom//?"--"Cutting off is, as I said before, one mark of wisdom. In addition it illuminates."--"And how does wisdom illuminate?"--"When wisdom arises, it dispels the darkness of ignorance, generates the illumination of knowledge, sheds the light of cognition, and makes the holy truths stand out clearly. Thereafter the yogin, with his correct wisdom, can see impermanence, ill, and not-self."--"Give me a comparison."--"It is like a lamp which a man would take into a dark house. It would dispel the darkness, would illuminate, shed light, and make the forms in the house stands out clearly."--"Well put, Venerable Nagasena."

//Milindapanha//, pp. 51-62

(b) From the Akshayamati Sutra

The five faculties are faith, vigour, mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom. Here what is //faith//? By this faith one has faith in four //dharmas//. Which four? He accepts the right view which assumes renewed becoming in the world of birth-and-death; he puts his trust in the ripening of karma, and knows that he will experience the fruit of any karma, that he may have done; even to save his life he does not do any evil deed. He has faith in the mode of life of a Bodhisattva, and, having taken up this discipline, he does not long for any other vehicle. He believes when he hears all the doctrines which are characterized by the true, clear, and profound knowledge of conditioned co-production, by such terms as lack of self, absence of a being, absence of a soul, absence of a person; and by emptiness, the signless and the wishless. He follows none of the false doctrines, and believes in all the qualities (//dharmas//) of a Buddha, his powers, grounds of self-confidence, and all the rest; and when in his faith he has left behind all doubts, he brings about in himself those qualities of a Buddha. This is known as the virtue of faith. His //vigour// consists of his bringing about (in himself) the //dharmas// in which he has faith. His //mindfulness// consists in his preventing the qualities which he brings about by vigour from being destroyed by forgetfulness. His //concentration// consists in his fixing his one-pointed attention on these very same qualities. With the faculty of //wisdom// he contemplates those //dharmas// on which he has fixed his one-pointed attention, and penetrates to their reality. The cognition of those //dharmas// which arises in himself and which has no outside condition is called the virtue of wisdom. Thus these five virtues, together, are sufficient to bring forth all the qualities of a Buddha.

//Akshayamati Sutra// (quoted in //Shikshasamuccaya//).

2. THE RESTRAINT OF THE SENSES

(a) From Ashvaghosha's Saundaranandakavya

By taking your stand on mindfulness you must hold back from the sense-objects your senses, unsteady by nature. Fire, snakes, and lightning are less inimical to us than our own senses, so much more dangerous. For they assail us all the time. Even the most vicious enemies can attack only some people at some times, and not at others, but everybody is always and everywhere weighed down by his senses. And people do not go to hell because some enemy has knocked them down and cast them into it; it is because they have been knocked down by their unsteady senses that they are helplessly dragged there. Those attacked by external enemies may, or may not, suffer injury to their souls; but those who are weighed down by the senses suffer in body and soul alike. For the five senses are rather like arrows which have been smeared with the poison of fancies, have cares for their feathers, and happiness for their points, and fly about in the space provided by the range of the sense-objects; shot off by //Kama//, the God of Love, they hit men in their very hearts as a hunter hits a deer, and if men do not know how to ward off these arrows, they will be their undoing; when they come near us we should stand firm in self-control, be agile and steadfast, and ward them off with the great armour of mindfulness. As a man who has subdued his enemies can everywhere live and sleep at ease and free from care, so can he who has pacified his senses. For the senses constantly ask for more by way of worldly objects, and normally behave like voracious dogs who can never have enough. This disorderly mob of the senses can never reach satiety, not by any amount of sense-objects; they are rather like the sea, which one can go on indefinitely replenishing with water.

In this world the senses cannot be prevented from being active, each in its own sphere. But they should not be allowed to grasp either the general features of an object, or its particularities. When you have beheld a sight-object with your eyes, you must merely determine the basic element (which it represents, e.g. it is a sight-object), and should not under any circumstances fancy it as, say, a "woman" or a "man." But if now and then you have inadvertently grasped something as a "woman" or a "man," you should not follow that up by determining the hairs, teeth, etc., as lovely. Nothing should be subtracted from the datum, nothing added to it; it should be seen as it really is, as what it is like in real truth.

If you thus try to look continually for the true reality in that which the senses present to you, covetousness and aversion will soon be left without a foothold. Coveting ruins those living beings who are bent on sensuous enjoyment by means of pleasing forms, like an enemy with a friendly face who speaks loving words, but plans dark deeds. But what is called "aversion" is a kind of anger directed towards certain objects, and anyone who is deluded enough to pursue it is bound to suffer for it either in this or a future life. Afflicted by their likes and dislikes, as by excessive heat or cold, men will never find either happiness or the highest good as long as they put their trust in the unsteady senses.

//Saundaranandakavya//, xiii, 30-56

(b) From the Prajnaparamita

The Lord: When he practises the perfection of meditation for the sake of other beings his mind becomes undistracted. For he reflects that "even worldly meditation is hard to accomplish with distracted thoughts, how much more so is full enlightenment. Therefore, I must remain undistracted until I have won full enlightenment." ... Moreover, Subhuti, a Bodhisattva, beginning with the first thought of enlightenment, practises the perfection of meditation. His mental activities are associated with the knowledge of all modes when he enters into meditation. When he has seen forms with his eye, he does not seize upon them as signs of realities which concern him, nor is he interested in the accessory details. He sets himself to restrain that which, if he does not restrain his organ of sight, might give him occasion for covetousness, sadness or other evil and unwholesome //dharmas// to reach his heart. He watches over the organ of sight. And the same with the other five sense-organs--ear, nose, tongue, body and mind.

Whether he walks or stands, sits or lies down, talks or remains silent, his concentration does not leave him. He does not fidget with his hands or feet, or twitch his face; he is not incoherent in his speech, confused in his senses, exalted or uplifted, fickle or idle, agitated in body or mind. Calm is his body, calm is his voice, calm is his mind. His demeanour shows contentment, both in private and public.... He is frugal, easy to feed, easy to serve, of good life and habits; though in a crowd he dwells apart; even and unchanged, in gain and loss; not elated, not cast down. Thus in happiness and suffering, in praise and blame, in fame and disrepute, in life or death, he is the same unchanged, neither elated nor cast down. And so with foe or friend, with what is pleasant or unpleasant, with holy or unholy men, with noises or music, with forms that are dear or undear, he remains the same, unchanged, neither elated nor cast down, neither gratified nor thwarted. And why? Because he sees all //dharmas// as empty of marks of their own, without true reality, incomplete and uncreated.

//Prajnaparamita//, ch. 68.

(c) From the Visuddhimagga

This is the morality which consists in the restraint of the senses: "//Here someone: (1) having seen a form with his eye, does not seize on its general appearance, or the (accessory) details of it. That which might, so long as he dwells unrestrained as to the (controlling) force of the eye, give occasion for covetous, sad, evil and unwholesome //dharmas// to flood him, that he sets himself to restrain; he guards the controlling force of the eye, and brings about its restraint. And likewise (2) when he has heard sounds with the ear, (3) smelled smells with the nose, (4) tasted tastes with the tongue, (5) touched touchables with the body, (6) cognized mind-objects (//dharmas//) with the mind.//" (M.i,180).

//Having seen a form with his eye//: when he has seen a form with the visual consciousness which is capable of seeing forms, and which in normal language is usually called the "eye," though it actually is its tool. For the Ancients have said: "The eye cannot see forms because it is without thought; thought cannot see forms because it is without eye. When the object knocks against the door (of sight) one sees with the thought which has eye-sensibility for its basis." In the expression "one sees with the eye," only accessory equipment is indicated, just as one may say, "one shoots with a bow" (and not "with an arrow"). Therefore, the meaning here is: "having seen form with visual consciousness."

//He does not seize on its general appearance// (lit. "the sign"): he does not seize on its appearance as man or woman, or its appearance as attractive, etc., which makes it into a basis for the defiling passions. But he stops at what is actually seen. //He does not seize on the details of it//: he does not seize on the variety of its accessory features, like the hands or feet, the smile, the laughter, the talk, the looking here, the looking away, etc., which are in common parlance called "details" (//anubyanjana//) because they manifest the defiling passions, by again and again (//anu anu//) tainting with them (//byanjanato//). But he seizes only on that which is really there, i.e. the impurity of the 32 parts of the body) like Mahatissa, the Elder, who lived on Mount Cetiya. Once that Elder went from Mount Cetiya to Anuradhapura, to gather alms. In a certain family the daughter-in-law had quarrelled with her husband, and adorned and beautified like a heavenly maiden, she left Anuradhapura early in the morning, and went away to stay with some relatives. On the way she saw the Elder, and, as her mind was perverted, she gave a loud laugh. The Elder looked to see what was the matter; he acquired, at the sight of her teeth (-bones), the notion of repulsiveness (impurity), and thereby reached Arahatship.... The husband who ran after her on same road, saw the Elder, and asked him whether he had by any chance seen a woman. The Elder replied:

> "Whether what went along here
> Was a man or a woman, I do not know.

But a collection of bones is moving Now along this main road."

//That which might//, etc.: that which might be the reason, or that non-restraint of the faculty of the eye which might be the cause, why in this person, when he //dwells// without having restrained the faculty of the eye with the gate of mindfulness, i.e. when he has left the door of the eye open, such //dharmas// as covetousness, etc., //flood// him, i.e. pursue and submerge him. //That he sets himself to restrain//: he sets himself to close this faculty of the eye with the gate of mindfulness. And one who sets himself to do that, of him it is said that he //guards the controlling force of the eye//, and //brings about its restraint//.

But it is not with reference to the faculty of the eye itself that there is restraint or non-restraint (i.e. it does not apply to the initial stage of the impact of stimulus on the eye), and it is not concerning the eye considered as a sensitive organ that mindfulness arises, or the lack of it. But it is at (the stage of the apperception of the object, with such and such a meaning and significance, and the volitional reaction to it, which is technically known as) the "impulsive moment," that there is lack of restraint, if and when immorality arises then, or lack of mindfulness, or lack of cognition, lack of patience or laziness. Nevertheless one speaks of the non-restraint of the sense of sight. And why? Because when the mind is in that condition, also the door (of the eye) is unguarded. The situation can be compared with that of a city: when its four gates are unguarded, then, although in the interior of the city the doors of the houses, the storerooms and private rooms are well guarded, nevertheless all the property in the city is actually unguarded and unprotected, and robbers can, once they have entered through the city gates, do whatever they like. In the same sense also the door (of the eye) is unguarded when, in consequence of the arising of immorality, etc., there is lack of restraint at the "impulsive moment."

But when morality, etc., arise at that moment, then the door (of sight) also is guarded. Just again as with the city: When the city-gates are well guarded, then, although in the interior the doors of the houses, etc., are unguarded, nevertheless all the property in the city is actually well guarded and well protected; for the city-gates being closed, robbers cannot enter. Just so also the door (of the eye) is guarded when morality, etc., arise at the "impulsive moment."

The same explanation applies to: when he has heard sounds with the ear, etc. The restraint of the senses thus consists, in short, in the avoiding of the seizing of the general appearance, etc., of sight-objects, etc., which lead to one's being pursued by the defiling passions.

And it should be achieved through mindfulness. For it is effected by mindfulness, in so far as the sense-organs when they are governed by mindfulness, can no longer be influenced by convetousness, etc. Therefore, we should remember the "Fire Sermon" (S.iv,168) which says: "It were better, monks, if the eye were stroked with a heated iron bar, afire, ablaze, aflame, than that one should seize on either the general appearance or the details of the forms of which the eye is aware." The disciple should achieve a thorough restraint of the senses, in that, by unimpaired mindfulness, he prevents that seizing on the general appearance, etc., which makes the consciousness which proceeds through the door of the eye, etc., with forms, etc., for its range (province), liable to be flooded (influenced) by covetousness, etc.

And one should become like Cittagutta, the Elder, who lived in the great Kurandaka Cave. In that cave there was a delightful painting which showed the seven Buddhas leaving for the homeless life. One day numerous monks were wandering about in the cave, going from lodging to lodging. They noticed the painting and said: "What a delightful painting, Venerable Bhikkhu!" The Elder replied: "For more than sixty years, brethren, I have lived in this cave, and I have never known whether there is a painting here or whether there is not. Today only I have learned it from you people, who use your eyes." For all that time during which the Elder had lived there, he had never lifted up his eyes and looked more closely at the cave. At the entrance to the cave there was a large ironwood tree. To that also the Elder had never looked up; but he knew that it was in flower when each year he saw the filaments which had fallen down on the ground.

All the sons of good family who have their own welfare at heart should, therefore, remember:

> "Let not the eye wander like forest ape,
> Or trembling wood deer, or affrighted child.
> The eyes should be cast downwards; they should > look
> The distance of a yoke; he shall not serve > His thought's dominion, like a restless ape."

Visuddhimagga, I, 42, 53-59, 100, 104-5, 109

3. THE CONTROL OF THE MIND

~~ ~~~ ~~~~~~~~ ~~ ~~~ ~~~~

From the Majjhima Nikaya and Commentary

The Sutta on the Composition of Ideas:[27]

//If, whilst attending to a certain sign, there arise, with reference to it, in the disciple evil and unwholesome ideas, connected with greed, hate or delusion, then the disciple:

I. should, by means of this sign (= cause, occasion) attend to another sign which is more wholesome;

II. or he should investigate the peril of these ideas: "Unwholesome truly are these ideas! Blameworthy are these ideas! Of painful result are these ideas!";

III. or he should pay no attention to these ideas;

IV. or he should attend to the composition of the factors which effect these ideas;

V. or, with teeth clenched and tongue pressed against the gums, he should by means of sheer mental effort hold back, crush and burn out the (offending) thought.

In doing so, these evil and unwholesome ideas, bound up with greed, hate or delusion, will be forsaken and disappear; from their forsaking thought will become inwardly settled and calm, composed and concentrated. This is called the effort to overcome.//

The Commentary says:

I. Unwholesome ideas may arise with reference to beings--be they desirable, undesirable, or unconsidered--or to things, such as one's possessions, or things which annoy, like stumps or thorns. The wholesome counter-ideas which drive them out arise from the following practices, which are directly opposed to them:

Greed about beings: Meditation about the repulsiveness of the body.

Greed about things: Attention to their impermanence.

Hate for beings: The development of friendliness.

Hate for things: Attention to the elements: which of the physical elements composing the thing am I angry with?

Delusion about beings and things:

(1) When he has, in his general bewilderment, neglected his duties to a teacher, he wakes himself up by doing some tiresome work, such as carrying water.

(2) When he has been hazy in attending to the teacher's explanation of the doctrine, he wakes himself up by doing some tiresome work.

(3) He removes his doubts by questioning authorities.

(4) At the right time he listens respectfully to the Dharma.

(5) He acquires the skill in distinguishing between correct and faulty conclusions, and knows that "this is the reason for that, this is not the reason."

These are the direct and correct antidotes to the faulty ideas.

II. He investigates them with the power of wisdom, and rejects them like a snake's carcass.

III. He should not remember those ideas, not attend to them, but become one who is otherwise engaged. He should be like someone who, not wanting to see a certain sight-object, just closes his eyes; when these ideas arise in his mind, he should take hold of his basic subject of meditation, and become engaged in that. It may help him to break the spell of intruding thoughts and to occupy his mind otherwise, if he recites with great faith a passage from the Scriptures, or reads out a passage in praise of the Buddha or Dharma; or he may sort out his belongings, and enumerate them one by one: "these are the scissors," "this is the needle," etc.; or he should do some sewing; or he should do some good work for a given period of time. And after that he should return to his basic subject of meditation.

IV. He should analyse the conditions for these ideas and ask himself: "What is their cause, what their condition, what the reason for their having arisen?"

V. He should put forth great vigour, and with a wholesome thought he should hold back an unwholesome one.

//Majjhima Nikaya, No. 20, and Papancasudani (Summary)//

4. THE BUDDHA'S SAYINGS ON THE FACULTIES

(Indriya Samyutta)

From the Samyutta Nikaya

(a) At their Best

There are these five faculties, monks: the faculty of faith, the faculty of vigour, the faculty of mindfulness, the faculty of concentration and the faculty of wisdom.

Where can the faculty of faith be seen (at its best)? In the four characteristic qualities of a stream-winner.[28]

Where can the faculty of vigour be seen (at its best)? In the four right efforts.[29]

Where can the faculty of mindfulness be seen (at its best)? In the four foundations of mindfulness.[30]

Where can the faculty of concentration be seen (at its best)? In the four meditative absorptions.[31]

Where can the faculty of wisdom be seen (at its best)? In the Four Noble Truths.[32]

//Sutta 8// (PTS, iv,196)

(b) The Measure of Achievement

By accomplishment and perfection in the five faculties one is an Arahant. If the faculties are weaker, one is a non-returner; if they are still weaker, one is a once-returner, or a stream-winner, or a Dhamma-devotee (//dhammanusarin//), or a faith-devotee (//saddhanusarin//).

Thus, monks, through the difference of faculties, there is difference of result; and the difference of results makes for the difference of individuals.
//Sutta 13//

Thus, monks, he who practises the five faculties to their perfection, wins to perfection (of Arahantship). He who practises them partially, wins a partial result. Not barren (of results), I say, are the five faculties.
//Sutta 14//

But he who is entirely, in any degree and respect, without these five faculties, stands outside, in the class of ordinary men (puthujjana).
//Sutta 18//(iv,200-202)

(c) Rooted in Experience

Thus I have heard. On one occasion when the Exalted One lived in the Eastern Cottage at Savatthi, he addressed the Venerable Sariputta as follows:

"Do you believe, Sariputta, that the faculty of faith, if cultivated and regularly practised, leads to the Deathless, is bound for the Deathless, ends in the Deathless; that the faculty of vigour ... the faculty of mindfulness ... the faculty of concentration ... the faculty of wisdom, if cultivated and regularly practised, leads to the Deathless, is bound for the Deathless, ends in the Deathless?"

"Herein, O Lord, I do not follow the Exalted One out of faith. Those by whom this is unknown, unseen, uncognized, unrealized and unexperienced by wisdom, they will herein follow others out of faith. But those by whom this is known, seen, cognized, realized and experienced by wisdom, they have no uncertainty, no doubt about it that these five faculties, if cultivated and regularly practised, lead to the Deathless, are bound for the Deathless, end in the Deathless. By me, O Lord, it has been known, seen, cognized, realized and experienced by wisdom and I have no uncertainty, no doubt about it that the faculty of faith ... the faculty of vigour ... the faculty of mindfulness ... the faculty of concentration ... the faculty of wisdom, if cultivated and regularly practised, leads to the Deathless, is bound for the Deathless, ends in the Deathless."

"Well said, Sariputta, well said," spoke the Lord (and he repeated in approval the words of the Venerable Sariputta).

//Sutta 44// (iv,220)

(d) Wisdom, the Crowning Virtue--1

It is through cultivating and regularly practising one faculty that a canker-free bhikkhu makes known his knowledge (of final attainment):[33] "Ceased has rebirth, fulfilled is the holy life, the task is done, nothing further remains after this." Which is the one faculty? The faculty of wisdom.

In a noble disciple endowed with wisdom, faith that goes along with it, is firmly established; vigour that goes along with it, is firmly established; mindfulness that goes along with it, is firmly established; concentration that goes along with it, is firmly established.
This, monks, is the one faculty through the cultivating and regularly practising of which, a canker-free bhikkhu makes known his knowledge (of final attainment): "Ceased has rebirth, fulfilled is the holy life, the task is done, nothing further remains after this."

//Sutta 45// (iv,222)

(e) Wisdom, the Crowning Virtue--II

Just as among all heartwood fragrances that of the red sandalwood is deemed best, so, monks, among states that partake of enlightenment the faculty of wisdom is deemed best, namely, for the purpose of enlightenment.

Which, monks, are the states partaking of enlightenment? The faculty of faith is a state partaking of enlightenment and it leads to enlightenment. The faculty of vigour ... the faculty of mindfulness ... the faculty of concentration ...the faculty of wisdom is a state partaking of enlightenment and it leads to enlightenment.

And among them, the faculty of wisdom is deemed best, namely, for the purpose of enlightenment.
//Sutta 55// (iv,231)

(f) The Acme of Faith

Thus I have heard. On one occasion, the Exalted One dwelt among the Anga people, at Apana, a town of the Angas. There the Exalted One addressed the Venerable Sariputta as follows:

"A noble disciple, Sariputta, who has single-minded confidence in the Perfect One, can he have uncertainty or doubt concerning the Perfect One's dispensation?"

"A noble disciple, Lord, who has single-minded confidence in the Perfect One, cannot have uncertainty or doubt concerning the Perfect One's dispensation.

"Of a noble disciple endowed with faith it can be expected, Lord, that he will live employing his vigour to the overcoming of unsalutary states and the acquisition of salutary states, energetic, with strenuous exertion, unremittingly applying himself to things salutary. This vigour of his, O Lord, is his faculty of vigour.

"Of a noble disciple who is endowed with faith and employs his vigour, it can be expected, Lord, that he will be mindful, equipped with the highest mindfulness and circumspection, and that he remembers well and keeps in mind what has been done and said long ago. This mindfulness of his, Lord, is his faculty of mindfulness.

"Of a noble disciple who is endowed with faith, employing his vigour, keeping his mindfulness alert, it can be expected, Lord, that making the highest relinquishment (Nibbana) his object, he will obtain concentration, will obtain unification of mind. This concentration of his, Lord, is his faculty of concentration.

"Of a noble disciple endowed with faith, vigour and mindfulness, and whose mind is concentrated, it can be expected, Lord, that he will know this: 'Without a conceivable beginning and end is this round of existence; no first beginning can be perceived of beings hastening and hurrying on (through this round of rebirths), enveloped in ignorance and ensnared by craving. The entire fading away and cessation of this very ignorance which is a mass of darkness, this is the state of peace, this is the state sublime, namely, the quiescence of all formations, the relinquishment of all subtrata of existence, the extinction of craving, dispassion, cessation, Nibbana.' This wisdom of his, Lord, is the faculty of wisdom.

"The noble disciple who has faith, after thus striving again and again, after thus applying mindfulness again and again, after thus concentrating his mind again and again, is now fully convinced: 'These teachings which before I had only heard, I now dwell in their personal experience, and having penetrated them with wisdom, I now see them (myself).' This faith of his, Lord, is his faculty of faith."

"Well said, Sariputta, well said," spoke the Exalted One (and he repeated in approval the words of the Venerable Sariputta).

//Sutta 50// (iv,225ff.)

5. THE BALANCE OF THE FACULTIES

~~ ~~~ ~~~~~~~ ~~ ~~~ ~~~~~~~~~

From the Visuddhimagga

[According to the //Visuddhimagga//, the balance of the faculties (//indriya-samatta//) is one of the ten kinds of skill in absorption (//appana-kosalla//), and it is one of the seven things that lead to the arising of the enlightenment factor "investigation of (material and mental) phenomena" (//dhammavicaya-sambojjhanga//).]

Imparting balance to the faculties is the equalizing of the controlling faculties of faith, vigour, mindfulness, concentration and wisdom. For if the faith faculty is strong and the others weak, then the vigour faculty cannot perform its function of exerting, the mindfulness faculty its function of attending to the object, the concentration faculty its function of excluding distraction, the wisdom faculty its function of seeing. So the (excessive) strength of the faith faculty should be reduced by reflecting on the phenomenal nature (of faith and its objects), and by not paying attention to what has caused the excessive strength of the faith faculty. Then if the //vigour faculty// is too strong, the faith faculty cannot perform its function of convincing, nor can the rest of the faculties perform their several functions. So in that case the excessive strength of the vigour faculty should be reduced by cultivating (the enlightenment factors of) tranquillity, concentration and equanimity. So, too, with the other factors, for it should be understood that when any one of them is too strong the others cannot perform their several functions.

However, what is particularly recommended is the balancing of faith with wisdom, and concentration with vigour. For one who is strong in faith and weak in wisdom places his confidence foolishly in an unworthy object. One strong in wisdom and weak in faith errs on the side of cunning and is as hard to cure as a sickness caused by medicine. But with the balancing of the two, faith and wisdom, a man has confidence only in a deserving object.

If there is too much of concentration and too little of vigour, the mind will be overpowered by indolence to which concentration inclines. But if vigour is too strong and concentration too weak, the mind will be overpowered by agitation to which vigour inclines. But concentration coupled with vigour cannot lapse into indolence, and vigour coupled with concentration cannot lapse into agitation. So these two should be balanced; for absorption comes with the balancing of the two.

Again (concentration and faith should be balanced). One working on concentration needs strong faith, since it is with such faith and confidence that he reaches absorption.

As to (the balancing of) concentration and wisdom, one working on concentration (i.e. who practises tranquillity; //samatha//) needs strong one-pointedness of mind, since that is how he reaches full absorption; and one working on insight (//vipassana//) needs strong wisdom, since that is how he reaches penetration of (the phenomena's) characteristics; but with the balancing of the two he reaches full absorption as well.

Strong mindfulness, however, is needed in all instances; for mindfulness protects the mind from lapsing into agitation through faith, vigour and wisdom, which tend to agitation, and from lapsing into indolence through concentration, which tends to indolence. So it is as desirable in all instances as a seasoning of salt in all curries, as a prime minister in all the king's business. Hence it is said (in the commentaries): "It was declared by the Exalted One that 'mindfulness, indeed, is of universal use.' Why? Because the mind has mindfulness as its refuge, and mindfulness is manifested as protection, and there is no exertion and restraint of the mind without mindfulness."

//Visuddhimagga//, (pp.129-30)
Adapted from Bhikkhu Nanamoli's translation:
//The Path of Purification//, pp.135-36

PART II ~~~~ ~~

SELECTED TEXTS

~~~~~~~~ ~~~~~

Texts 1_3:

Translated by Edward Conze Text 4: Translated by Nyanaponika Mahathera Text 5: Bhikkhu Nanamoli

1. THE FIVE FACULTIES

~~ ~~~ ~~~~ ~~~~~~~~~~

(a) From the Milindapanha The king said: "I through wise attention that people become exempt from further rebirth?"--"Yes, that is due attention, and also to wisdom, and the other wholesome //dharmas//."--"But is not wise att same as wisdom?"--"No, Your Majesty. Attention is one thing, and wisdom another. Sheep buffaloes, camels and asses have attention, but wisdom they have not."--"Well put, Vener The king said: "What is the mark of attention, and what is the mark of wisdom?"--"Cons the mark of attention, cutting off that of wisdom."--"How is that? Give me a simile."--"You kn barley-reapers, I suppose?"--"Yes, I do."--"How then do they reap the barley?"--"With the le seize a bunch of barley, in the right hand they hold a sickle, and they cut the barley off with sickle."--"Just so, Your Majesty, the yogin seizes his mental processes with his attention, a wisdom he cuts off the defilements."--"Well put, Venerable Nagasena." The king sai just spoke of 'the other wholesome dharmas,' which ones did you mean?"--"I meant moralit mindfulness and concentration."--"And what is the mark of morality?"--"Morality has the ma a basis for all wholesome dharmas, whatever they may be. When based on morality, all th dharmas will not dwindle away."--"Give me an illustration."--"As all plants and animals whic grow, and prosper, do so with the earth as their support, with the earth as their basis, just yogin, with morality as his support, with morality as his basis, develops the five cardinal virt the cardinal virtues of faith, vigour, mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom." "Give further illustration." "As the builder of a city when constructing a town first of all clear the site, removes all stumps and thorns, and levels it; and only after that he lays out and m roads and cross-roads, and so builds the city, even so the yogin develops the five cardinal morality as his support, with morality as his basis." The king said: "What is the ma //faith//?"--"Faith makes serene, and it leaps forward."--"And how does faith make serene arises it arrests the five hindrances, and the heart becomes free from them, clear, serene a undisturbed."--"Give me an illustration."--"A universal monarch might on his way, together fourfold army, cross over a small stream. Stirred up by the elephants and horses, by the ch infantry, the water would become disturbed, agitated and muddy. Having crossed over, the monarch would order his men to bring some water for him to drink. But the king would poss water-clearing gem, and his men, in obedience to his command, would throw it into the stre once all fragments of vegetation would float away, the mud would settle at the bottom, the become clear, serene and undisturbed, and fit to be drunk by the universal monarch. Here corresponds to the heart, the monarch's men to the yogin, the fragments of vegetation and defilements, and the miraculous water-clearing gem to faith." "And how does faith le forward?"--"When the yogin sees that the hearts of others have been set free, he leaps forv aspiration, to the various fruits of the holy life, and he makes efforts to attain the yet unatta find the yet unfound, to realize the yet unrealized."--"Give me an illustration."--"Suppose t cloud were to burst over a hill-slope. The water then would flow down the slope, would first hill's clefts, fissures, and gullies, and would then run into the river below, making its banks on both sides. Now suppose further that a great crowd of people had come along, and una either the width or the depth of the river, should stand frightened and hesitating on the ba some man would come along, who, conscious of his own strength and power, would firmly loin-cloth and jump across the river. And the great crowd of people, seeing him on the oth cross likewise. Even so the yogin, when he has seen that the hearts of others have been s forward, by aspiration, to the various fruits of the holy life, and he makes efforts to attain t unattained, to find the yet unfound, to realize the yet unrealized. And this is what the Lord h the Samyutta Nikaya: By faith the flood is crossed, By wakefulness the se By vigour ill is passed; By wisdom cleansed is he." "Well put, Nagasena!" The king asked: "And what is the mark of //vigour//?"--"Vigour props up, and, when propped up by vigour, all the wholesome dharmas do not dwindle awa simile."--"If a man's house were falling down, he would prop it up with a new piece of wood supported, that house would not collapse." The king asked: "And what is the mark //mindfulness//?"--"Calling to mind and taking up." "How is calling to mind a mark of mindfulness?"--"When mindfulness arises, one calls to mind the //dharmas// which participa wholesome and unwholesome, blamable and blameless, inferior and sublime, dark and ligh four applications of mindfulness, these the four right efforts, these the four roads to psych these the five cardinal virtues, these the five powers, these the seven limbs of enlightenme holy eightfold path; this is calm, this insight, this knowledge and this emancipation. Therea yogin tends those //dharmas// which should be tended, and he does not tend those which s tended; he partakes of those //dharmas// which should be followed, and he does not partak should not be followed. It is in this sense that calling to mind is a mark of mindfulness."--"G simile."--"It is like the treasurer of a universal monarch, who each morning and evening rem master of his magnificent assets: 'So many elephants you have, so many horses, so many infantry, so many gold coins, so much bullion, so much property; may Your Majesty bear th this way he calls to mind his master's wealth." "And how does mindfulness take up? mindfulness arises, the outcome of beneficial and harmful //dharmas// is examined in this w //dharmas// are beneficial, these harmful; these //dharmas// are helpful, these unhelpful.' Th yogin removes the harmful //dharmas//, and takes up the beneficial ones; he removes the //dharmas//, and takes up the helpful ones. It is in this sense that mindfulness takes up."--" comparison."--"It is like the invaluable adviser of a universal monarch who knows what is what is harmful to his royal master, what is helpful and what is unhelpful. Thereafter what is unhelpful can be removed, what is beneficial and helpful can be taken up." The king "And what is the mark of //concentration//?"--"It stands at the head. Whatever wholesome / may be, they all are headed by concentration, they bend towards concentration, lead to c incline to concentration."--"Give me a comparison."--"It is as with a building with a pointed r whatever rafters there are, they all converge on the top, bend towards the top, meet at the top occupies the most prominent place. So with concentration in relation to the other whole //dharmas//."--"Give me a further comparison."--"If a king were to enter battle with his fourfo then all his troops--the elephants, cavalry, chariots and infantry--would be headed by him, a ranged around him. Such is the position of concentration in relation to the other wholesome
~~~~~~~~

The king then asked: "What then is the mark of //wisdom//?"--"Cutting off is, as I said one mark of wisdom. In addition it illuminates."--"And how does wisdom illuminate?"--"Whe arises, it dispels the darkness of ignorance, generates the illumination of knowledge, sheds cognition, and makes the holy truths stand out clearly. Thereafter the yogin, with his correc can see impermanence, ill, and not-self."--"Give me a comparison."--"It is like a lamp which take into a dark house. It would dispel the darkness, would illuminate, shed light, and mak in the house stands out clearly."--"Well put, Venerable Nagasena." //Milindapanha//, pp. 5

(b) From the Akshayamati Sutra The five faculties are faith, vigour, mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom. Here what is //faith//? By this faith one has faith in //dharmas//. Which four? He accepts the right view which assumes renewed becoming in th birth-and-death; he puts his trust in the ripening of karma, and knows that he will experienc any karma, that he may have done; even to save his life he does not do any evil deed. He the mode of life of a Bodhisattva, and, having taken up this discipline, he does not long for vehicle. He believes when he hears all the doctrines which are characterized by the true, c profound knowledge of conditioned co-production, by such terms as lack of self, absence o absence of a soul, absence of a person; and by emptiness, the signless and the wishless.
the false doctrines, and believes in all the qualities (//dharmas//) of a Buddha, his powers, self-confidence, and all the rest; and when in his faith he has left behind all doubts, he bring himself those qualities of a Buddha. This is known as the virtue of faith. His //vigour// cons his bringing about (in himself) the //dharmas// in which he has faith. His //mindfulness// con preventing the qualities which he brings about by vigour from being destroyed by forgetful //concentration// consists in his fixing his one-pointed attention on these very same qualitie faculty of //wisdom// he contemplates those //dharmas// on which he has fixed his one-poi and penetrates to their reality. The cognition of those //dharmas// which arises in himself an no outside condition is called the virtue of wisdom. Thus these five virtues, together, are su bring forth all the qualities of a Buddha. //Akshayamati Sutra// (quoted in //Shikshasamuc

2. THE RESTRAINT OF THE SENSES

~~ ~~~ ~~~~~~~~ ~~ ~~~ ~~~~~~ (a) From Ashvaghosha's Saundaranandakavya By taking yo mindfulness you must hold back from the sense-objects your senses, unsteady by nature.

lightning are less inimical to us than our own senses, so much more dangerous. For they a time. Even the most vicious enemies can attack only some people at some times, and not a everybody is always and everywhere weighed down by his senses. And people do not go t enemy has knocked them down and cast them into it; it is because they have been knocke unsteady senses that they are helplessly dragged there. Those attacked by external enemi suffer injury to their souls; but those who are weighed down by the senses suffer in body a alike. For the five senses are rather like arrows which have been smeared with the poison cares for their feathers, and happiness for their points, and fly about in the space provided range of the sense-objects; shot off by //Kama//, the God of Love, they hit men in their very hunter hits a deer, and if men do not know how to ward off these arrows, they will be their u when they come near us we should stand firm in self-control, be agile and steadfast, and w the great armour of mindfulness. As a man who has subdued his enemies can everywhere ease and free from care, so can he who has pacified his senses. For the senses constantly way of worldly objects, and normally behave like voracious dogs who can never have enou disorderly mob of the senses can never reach satiety, not by any amount of sense-objects; like the sea, which one can go on indefinitely replenishing with water. In this world th senses cannot be prevented from being active, each in its own sphere. But they should not grasp either the general features of an object, or its particularities. When you have beheld sight-object with your eyes, you must merely determine the basic element (which it represe sight-object), and should not under any circumstances fancy it as, say, a "woman" or a "m and then you have inadvertently grasped something as a "woman" or a "man," you should determining the hairs, teeth, etc., as lovely. Nothing should be subtracted from the datum added to it; it should be seen as it really is, as what it is like in real truth. If you thus try to look continually for the true reality in that which the senses present to you, covetousn aversion will soon be left without a foothold. Coveting ruins those living beings who are be sensuous enjoyment by means of pleasing forms, like an enemy with a friendly face who sp but plans dark deeds. But what is called "aversion" is a kind of anger directed towards cer and anyone who is deluded enough to pursue it is bound to suffer for it either in this or a fu Afflicted by their likes and dislikes, as by excessive heat or cold, men will never find either happiness or the highest good as long as they put their trust in the unsteady senses.
//Saundaranandakavya//, xiii, 30-56 (b) From the Prajnaparamita The Lord: When he practises the perfection of meditation for the sake of other beings his mind undistracted. For he reflects that "even worldly meditation is hard to accomplish with distra thoughts, how much more so is full enlightenment. Therefore, I must remain undistracted u full enlightenment." ... Moreover, Subhuti, a Bodhisattva, beginning with the first thought of enlightenment, practises the perfection of meditation. His mental activities are associated w knowledge of all modes when he enters into meditation. When he has seen forms with his seize upon them as signs of realities which concern him, nor is he interested in the access sets himself to restrain that which, if he does not restrain his organ of sight, might give him for covetousness, sadness or other evil and unwholesome //dharmas// to reach his heart. H organ of sight. And the same with the other five sense-organs--ear, nose, tongue, body a Whether he walks or stands, sits or lies down, talks or remains silent, his concentration doe him. He does not fidget with his hands or feet, or twitch his face; he is not incoherent in his confused in his senses, exalted or uplifted, fickle or idle, agitated in body or mind. Calm is h calm is his voice, calm is his mind. His demeanour shows contentment, both in private and is frugal, easy to feed, easy to serve, of good life and habits; though in a crowd he dwells a and unchanged, in gain and loss; not elated, not cast down. Thus in happiness and sufferin and blame, in fame and disrepute, in life or death, he is the same unchanged, neither elate

And so with foe or friend, with what is pleasant or unpleasant, with holy or unholy men, wi music, with forms that are dear or undear, he remains the same, unchanged, neither elated neither gratified nor thwarted. And why? Because he sees all //dharmas// as empty of ma without true reality, incomplete and uncreated. //Prajnaparamita//, ch. 68.

(c) From the Visuddhimagga This is the morality which consists in the restraint of the
"//Here someone: (1) having seen a form with his eye, does not seize on its general appea (accessory) details of it. That which might, so long as he dwells unrestrained as to the (co force of the eye, give occasion for covetous, sad, evil and unwholesome //dharmas// to floo sets himself to restrain; he guards the controlling force of the eye, and brings about its res And likewise (2) when he has heard sounds with the ear, (3) smelled smells with the nose, with the tongue, (5) touched touchables with the body, (6) cognized mind-objects (//dharm mind.//" (M.i,180). //Having seen a form with his eye//: when he has seen a form with visual consciousness which is capable of seeing forms, and which in normal language is us "eye," though it actually is its tool. For the Ancients have said: "The eye cannot see forms is without thought; thought cannot see forms because it is without eye. When the object kn door (of sight) one sees with the thought which has eye-sensibility for its basis." In the exp "one sees with the eye," only accessory equipment is indicated, just as one may say, "one bow" (and not "with an arrow"). Therefore, the meaning here is: "having seen form with vis consciousness." //He does not seize on its general appearance// (lit. "the sign"): he d seize on its appearance as man or woman, or its appearance as attractive, etc., which mak for the defiling passions. But he stops at what is actually seen. //He does not seize on the it//: he does not seize on the variety of its accessory features, like the hands or feet, the sm laughter, the talk, the looking here, the looking away, etc., which are in common parlance "details" (//anubyanjana//) because they manifest the defiling passions, by again and again tainting with them (//byanjanato//). But he seizes only on that which is really there, i.e. the of the 32 parts of the body) like Mahatissa, the Elder, who lived on Mount Cetiya. Once tha from Mount Cetiya to Anuradhapura, to gather alms. In a certain family the daughter-in-law with her husband, and adorned and beautified like a heavenly maiden, she left Anuradhapu morning, and went away to stay with some relatives. On the way she saw the Elder, and, a perverted, she gave a loud laugh. The Elder looked to see what was the matter; he acquire her teeth (-bones), the notion of repulsiveness (impurity), and thereby reached Arahatship husband who ran after her on same road, saw the Elder, and asked him whether he had by woman. The Elder replied: "Whether what went along here Was a man or do not know. But a collection of bones is moving Now along this main road." //That which might//, etc.: that which might be the reason, or that non-restraint of the faculty which might be the cause, why in this person, when he //dwells// without having restrained of the eye with the gate of mindfulness, i.e. when he has left the door of the eye open, such as covetousness, etc., //flood// him, i.e. pursue and submerge him. //That he sets himself to restrain//: he sets himself to close this faculty of the eye with the gate of mindfulness. And himself to do that, of him it is said that he //guards the controlling force of the eye//, and //b about its restraint//. But it is not with reference to the faculty of the eye itself that there is restraint or non-restraint (i.e. it does not apply to the initial stage of the impact of st on the eye), and it is not concerning the eye considered as a sensitive organ that mindfulne or the lack of it. But it is at (the stage of the apperception of the object, with such and such and significance, and the volitional reaction to it, which is technically known as) the "impul moment," that there is lack of restraint, if and when immorality arises then, or lack of mindfu lack of cognition, lack of patience or laziness. Nevertheless one speaks of the non-restrai sense of sight. And why? Because when the mind is in that condition, also the door (of the unguarded. The situation can be compared with that of a city: when its four gates are ung although in the interior of the city the doors of the houses, the storerooms and private room guarded, nevertheless all the property in the city is actually unguarded and unprotected, a can, once they have entered through the city gates, do whatever they like. In the same sen (of the eye) is unguarded when, in consequence of the arising of immorality, etc., there is restraint at the "impulsive moment." But when morality, etc., arise at that moment, the (of sight) also is guarded. Just again as with the city: When the city-gates are well guarde although in the interior the doors of the houses, etc., are unguarded, nevertheless all the p the city is actually well guarded and well protected; for the city-gates being closed, robbers enter. Just so also the door (of the eye) is guarded when morality, etc., arise at the "impuls moment." The same explanation applies to: when he has heard sounds with the ear, etc of the senses thus consists, in short, in the avoiding of the seizing of the general appearan sight-objects, etc., which lead to one's being pursued by the defiling passions. And should be achieved through mindfulness. For it is effected by mindfulness, in so far as the when they are governed by mindfulness, can no longer be influenced by convetousness, e should remember the "Fire Sermon" (S.iv,168) which says: "It were better, monks, if the ey with a heated iron bar, afire, ablaze, aflame, than that one should seize on either the gene appearance or the details of the forms of which the eye is aware." The disciple should achi restraint of the senses, in that, by unimpaired mindfulness, he prevents that seizing on the appearance, etc., which makes the consciousness which proceeds through the door of the forms, etc., for its range (province), liable to be flooded (influenced) by covetousness, etc And one should become like Cittagutta, the Elder, who lived in the great Kurandaka Cave there was a delightful painting which showed the seven Buddhas leaving for the homeless numerous monks were wandering about in the cave, going from lodging to lodging. They n and said: "What a delightful painting, Venerable Bhikkhu!" The Elder replied: "For more tha years, brethren, I have lived in this cave, and I have never known whether there is a paintin whether there is not. Today only I have learned it from you people, who use your eyes." Fo during which the Elder had lived there, he had never lifted up his eyes and looked more cl cave. At the entrance to the cave there was a large ironwood tree. To that also the Elder ha looked up; but he knew that it was in flower when each year he saw the filaments which ha the ground. All the sons of good family who have their own welfare at heart should, the remember: "Let not the eye wander like forest ape, Or trembling wood dee affrighted child. The eyes should be cast downwards; they should look distance of a yoke; he shall not serve His thought's dominion, like a restless ape." Visuddhimagga, I, 42, 53-59, 100, 104-5, 109 3. THE CONTROL OF T MIND ~~ ~~~ ~~~~~~~ ~~ ~~~ ~~~~ From the Majjhima Nikaya an Commentary The Sutta on the Composition of Ideas:[27] //If, whilst attending to a c sign, there arise, with reference to it, in the disciple evil and unwholesome ideas, connecte greed, hate or delusion, then the disciple: I. should, by means of this sign (= cause, occasion) attend to another sign which is more wholesome; II. or he should investigate the peril of these ideas: "Unwholesome truly are these ideas! Blameworth ideas! Of painful result are these ideas!"; III. or he should pay no attention to th ideas; IV. or he should attend to the composition of the factors which effect th ideas; V. or, with teeth clenched and tongue pressed against the gums, he s by means of sheer mental effort hold back, crush and burn out the (offending) though In doing so, these evil and unwholesome ideas, bound up with greed, hate or delusion, wil disappear; from their forsaking thought will become inwardly settled and calm, composed a concentrated. This is called the effort to overcome.// The Commentary says: Unwholesome ideas may arise with reference to beings--be they desirable, undesirable, or to things, such as one's possessions, or things which annoy, like stumps or thorns. The w counter-ideas which drive them out arise from the following practices, which are directly op Greed about beings: Meditation about the repulsiveness of the body. Greed a things: Attention to their impermanence. Hate for beings: The development of friendli Hate for things: Attention to the elements: which of the physical elements composing th angry with? Delusion about beings and things: (1) When he has, in his gener bewilderment, neglected his duties to a teacher, he wakes himself up by doing some tiresome work, such as carrying water. (2) When he has been hazy in attending to th explanation of the doctrine, he wakes himself up by doing some tiresome work (3) He removes his doubts by questioning authorities. (4) At the right time he list respectfully to the Dharma. (5) He acquires the skill in distinguishing between correc faulty conclusions, and knows that "this is the reason for that, this is not the reas These are the direct and correct antidotes to the faulty ideas. II. He investigates them with the power of wisdom, and rejects them like a snake's carcass. should not remember those ideas, not attend to them, but become one who is otherwise en like someone who, not wanting to see a certain sight-object, just closes his eyes; when th arise in his mind, he should take hold of his basic subject of meditation, and become engag may help him to break the spell of intruding thoughts and to occupy his mind otherwise, if with great faith a passage from the Scriptures, or reads out a passage in praise of the Bud or he may sort out his belongings, and enumerate them one by one: "these are the scisso needle," etc.; or he should do some sewing; or he should do some good work for a given p And after that he should return to his basic subject of meditation. IV. He should anal conditions for these ideas and ask himself: "What is their cause, what their condition, what for their having arisen?" V. He should put forth great vigour, and with a wholesome th should hold back an unwholesome one. //Majjhima Nikaya, No. 20, and Papancasudani

4. THE BUDDHA'S SAYINGS ON THE FACULTIES ~~ ~~~ ~~~~~~ ~~~ ~~~~~~~~~~

(Indriya Samyutta)

~~~~~~~~ ~~~~~~~~

From the Samyutta Nikaya

(a)

At their Best There are these five faculties, monks: the faculty of faith, the faculty of vigour, the faculty of mindfulness, the faculty of concentratio the faculty of wisdom. Where can the faculty of faith be seen (at its best)? In the four characteristic qualities of a stream-winner.[28] Where can the faculty of vigour be see best)? In the four right efforts.[29] Where can the faculty of mindfulness be seen (at best)? In the four foundations of mindfulness.[30] Where can the faculty of concentr seen (at its best)? In the four meditative absorptions.[31] Where can the faculty of w seen (at its best)? In the Four Noble Truths.[32] //Sutta 8// (PTS, iv,196)

(b) The Measure of Achievement By accomplishment and perfection in the five faculti Arahant. If the faculties are weaker, one is a non-returner; if they are still weaker, one is a once-returner, or a stream-winner, or a Dhamma-devotee (//dhammanusarin//), or a faith-d (//saddhanusarin//). Thus, monks, through the difference of faculties, there is differe result; and the difference of results makes for the difference of individuals. //Sutta 13// Thus, monks, he who practises the five faculties to their perfection, wins to perfection (of A He who practises them partially, wins a partial result. Not barren (of results), I say, are the faculties. //Sutta 14// But he who is entirely, in any degree and respect, without these five faculties, stands outside, in the class of ordinary men (puthujjana). //Sutta 18//(iv,200-
~~~~~~~~

(c) Rooted in Experience Thus I have heard. On one occasion when the Exalted One lived in the Eastern Cottage at Savatthi, he addressed the Venerable Sariputt

"Do you believe, Sariputta, that the faculty of faith, if cultivated and regularly practise leads to the Deathless, is bound for the Deathless, ends in the Deathless; that the faculty o ... the faculty of mindfulness ... the faculty of concentration ... the faculty of wisdom, if cultiv and regularly practised, leads to the Deathless, is bound for the Deathless, ends in the Dea

"Herein, O Lord, I do not follow the Exalted One out of faith. Those by whom this is unk unseen, uncognized, unrealized and unexperienced by wisdom, they will herein follow othe But those by whom this is known, seen, cognized, realized and experienced by wisdom, th uncertainty, no doubt about it that these five faculties, if cultivated and regularly practised, the Deathless, are bound for the Deathless, end in the Deathless. By me, O Lord, it has be cognized, realized and experienced by wisdom and I have no uncertainty, no doubt about i faculty of faith ... the faculty of vigour ... the faculty of mindfulness ... the faculty of concentr ... the faculty of wisdom, if cultivated and regularly practised, leads to the Deathless, is bo the Deathless, ends in the Deathless." "Well said, Sariputta, well said," spoke the Lor repeated in approval the words of the Venerable Sariputta). //Sutta 44// (iv,220)

(d) Wisdom, the Crowning Virtue--1 It is through cultivating and regularly practisi faculty that a canker-free bhikkhu makes known his knowledge (of final attainment):[33] "C rebirth, fulfilled is the holy life, the task is done, nothing further remains after this." Which is one faculty? The faculty of wisdom. In a noble disciple endowed with wisdom, faith tha with it, is firmly established; vigour that goes along with it, is firmly established; mindfulnes goes along with it, is firmly established; concentration that goes along with it, is firmly established. This, monks, is the one faculty through the cultivating and regularly practising canker-free bhikkhu makes known his knowledge (of final attainment): "Ceased has rebirth holy life, the task is done, nothing further remains after this." //Sutta 45// (iv,222)

(e) Wisdom, the Crowning Virtue--II Just as among all heartwood fragrances that of the red sandalwood is deemed best, so, monks, among sta enlightenment the faculty of wisdom is deemed best, namely, for the purpose of enlighten Which, monks, are the states partaking of enlightenment? The faculty of faith is a state pa enlightenment and it leads to enlightenment. The faculty of vigour ... the faculty of mindfuln the faculty of concentration ...the faculty of wisdom is a state partaking of enlightenment an enlightenment. And among them, the faculty of wisdom is deemed best, namely, for of enlightenment. //Sutta 55// (iv,231)

(f) The Acme of Faith

Thus I have heard. On one occasion, the Exalted One dwelt among t Anga people, at Apana, a town of the Angas. There the Exalted One addressed the Venera follows: "A noble disciple, Sariputta, who has single-minded confidence in the Perfe can he have uncertainty or doubt concerning the Perfect One's dispensation?" "A no disciple, Lord, who has single-minded confidence in the Perfect One, cannot have uncertai concerning the Perfect One's dispensation. "Of a noble disciple endowed with faith i expected, Lord, that he will live employing his vigour to the overcoming of unsalutary state acquisition of salutary states, energetic, with strenuous exertion, unremittingly applying him things salutary. This vigour of his, O Lord, is his faculty of vigour. "Of a noble discipl who is endowed with faith and employs his vigour, it can be expected, Lord, that he will be equipped with the highest mindfulness and circumspection, and that he remembers well a what has been done and said long ago. This mindfulness of his, Lord, is his faculty of mind "Of a noble disciple who is endowed with faith, employing his vigour, keeping his mindfu it can be expected, Lord, that making the highest relinquishment (Nibbana) his object, he w concentration, will obtain unification of mind. This concentration of his, Lord, is his faculty o concentration. "Of a noble disciple endowed with faith, vigour and mindfulness, and is concentrated, it can be expected, Lord, that he will know this: 'Without a conceivable beg is this round of existence; no first beginning can be perceived of beings hastening and hu (through this round of rebirths), enveloped in ignorance and ensnared by craving. The entir and cessation of this very ignorance which is a mass of darkness, this is the state of peac the state sublime, namely, the quiescence of all formations, the relinquishment of all subtra existence, the extinction of craving, dispassion, cessation, Nibbana.' This wisdom of his, L faculty of wisdom. "The noble disciple who has faith, after thus striving again and ag after thus applying mindfulness again and again, after thus concentrating his mind again an fully convinced: 'These teachings which before I had only heard, I now dwell in their person experience, and having penetrated them with wisdom, I now see them (myself).' This faith his faculty of faith." "Well said, Sariputta, well said," spoke the Exalted One (and he repeated in approval the words of the Venerable Sariputta). //Sutta 50// (iv,225ff.)

5. THE BALANCE OF THE FACULTIES ~~ ~~~ ~~~~~~~ ~~ ~~~ ~~~~

From the Visuddhimagga [According to the //Visuddhimagga//, the balance of faculties (//indriya-samatta//) is one of the ten kinds of skill in absorption (//appana-kosalla it is one of the seven things that lead to the arising of the enlightenment factor "investigatio (material and mental) phenomena" (//dhammavicaya-sambojjhanga//).] Impartin the faculties is the equalizing of the controlling faculties of faith, vigour, mindfulness, conce and wisdom. For if the faith faculty is strong and the others weak, then the vigour faculty c perform its function of exerting, the mindfulness faculty its function of attending to the objec concentration faculty its function of excluding distraction, the wisdom faculty its function of the (excessive) strength of the faith faculty should be reduced by reflecting on the phenom (of faith and its objects), and by not paying attention to what has caused the excessive stre faith faculty. Then if the //vigour faculty// is too strong, the faith faculty cannot perform its function of convincing, nor can the rest of the faculties perform their several functions. So i the excessive strength of the vigour faculty should be reduced by cultivating (the enlighten of) tranquillity, concentration and equanimity. So, too, with the other factors, for it should be understood that when any one of them is too strong the others cannot perform their severa However, what is particularly recommended is the balancing of faith with wisdom, and co vigour. For one who is strong in faith and weak in wisdom places his confidence foolishly in object. One strong in wisdom and weak in faith errs on the side of cunning and is as hard t sickness caused by medicine. But with the balancing of the two, faith and wisdom, a man only in a deserving object. If there is too much of concentration and too little of vigour the mind will be overpowered by indolence to which concentration inclines. But if vigour is t concentration too weak, the mind will be overpowered by agitation to which vigour inclines. concentration coupled with vigour cannot lapse into indolence, and vigour coupled with con lapse into agitation. So these two should be balanced; for absorption comes with the balan two. Again (concentration and faith should be balanced). One working on concentra strong faith, since it is with such faith and confidence that he reaches absorption. As (the balancing of) concentration and wisdom, one working on concentration (i.e. who practi //samatha//) needs strong one-pointedness of mind, since that is how he reaches full abso working on insight (//vipassana//) needs strong wisdom, since that is how he reaches pene phenomena's) characteristics; but with the balancing of the two he reaches full absorption Strong mindfulness, however, is needed in all instances; for mindfulness protects the mind into agitation through faith, vigour and wisdom, which tend to agitation, and from lapsing i indolence through concentration, which tends to indolence. So it is as desirable in all instan seasoning of salt in all curries, as a prime minister in all the king's business. Hence it is sa the commentaries): "It was declared by the Exalted One that 'mindfulness, indeed, is of uni Why? Because the mind has mindfulness as its refuge, and mindfulness is manifested as there is no exertion and restraint of the mind without mindfulness." //Visuddhimagga//, (pp Adapted from Bhikkhu Nanamoli's translation: //The Path of Purification//, pp.135-36

PART THREE: INNER RELEASE ==========

The Truth & its Shadows (Undated, 1959) ========== The Dha cool, clean and clear. It doesn't take birth, age, grow ill or die. Whoever works earnestly a Dhamma of study and practice will give rise to the Dhamma of attainment without a doubt. attainment is paccattam: You have to know it for yourself. We should make a poin searching for whatever will give rise to discernment. Sutamaya-panna: Listen to things tha listening to. Cintamaya-panna: Once you've listened, evaluate what you've learned. Don' reject it right off hand. Bhavanamaya-panna: Once you've put what you've learned to the in line with it. This is the highest perfection of discernment--liberating insight. You know w of stress and pain should be remedied, and so you remedy them. You know what kinds s remedied, and so you don't. For the most part, we're really ignorant. We try to rem things that shouldn't be remedied, and it just doesn't work--because there's one kind of str should simply be observed, and shouldn't be fiddled with at all. Like a rusty watch: Don't p any more rust than you should. If you go taking it apart, the whole thing will stop running fo What this means is that once you've seen natural conditions for what they truly are, you ha them be. If you see something that should be fixed, you fix it. Whatever shouldn't be fixed This takes a load off the heart. Ignorant people are like the old woman who lit a fire cook her rice, and when her rice was cooked, had her meal. When she had finished her r and had a cigar. It so happened that when she lit her cigar with one of the embers of the fi her mouth. 'Damned fire,' she thought. 'It burned my mouth.' So she put all her matches poured water all over them so that there wouldn't be any more fire in the house--just like a sense at all. The next day, when she wanted fire to cook her meal, there wasn't any left. she wanted light, she had to go pestering her neighbors, asking this person and that, and y hated fire. We have to learn how to make use of things, and to have a sense of how much light only a little fire, it'll be three hours before your rice is cooked. The fire isn't enough fo your food. So it is with us: We see stress as something bad, and so try to remedy it--keep our eyes closed, as if we were blind. No matter how much we treat it, we never get anyw

People with discernment will see that stress is of two kinds: (1) physical stress, or th inherent stress of natural conditions; and (2) mental stress, or the stress of defilement. On birth, there has to be ageing, illness and death. Whoever tries to remedy ageing can kee they're withered and grey. When we try to remedy illness, we're usually like the old woman all over her matches. Sometimes we treat things just right, sometimes we don't--as when gets cracked, and we dismantle the house right up to the roof. Illness is somethin everyone has, i.e., the diseases that appear in the various parts of the body. Once we've t disease in our eyes, it'll go appear in our ears, nose, in front, in back, in our arm, our hand, etc., and then it'll sneak inside. Like a person trying to catch hold of an eel: The more you catch it, the more it slips off every which way. And so we keep on treating our diseases till Some kinds of disease will go away whether we treat them or not. If it's a disease that goe treatment, then take medicine. If it's one that goes away whether we treat it or not, why bo what it means to have discernment. Ignorant people don't know which kinds of stre be treated, and which kinds shouldn't, and so they put their time and money to waste. As intelligent people, they see what should be treated, and they treat it using their own discern diseases arise either from an imbalance in the physical elements or from kamma. If it's a arises from the physical elements, we should treat it with food, medicine, etc. If it arises fro we have to treat it with the Buddha's medicine. In other words, stress and pain that arise heart, if we treat them with food and medicine, won't respond. We have to treat them with Whoever knows how to manage this is said to have a sense of how to observe and diagno

If we look at it in another way, we'll see that ageing, illness and death are simply the shad stress, and not its true substance. People who lack discernment will try to do away with the which leads only to more suffering and stress. This is because they aren't acquainted with shadows and substance of stress come from. The essence of stress lies with the mind. Ag and death are its shadows or effects that show by way of the body. When we want to kill o take a knife to stab his shadow, how is he going to die? In the same way, ignorant people destroy the shadows of stress, and don't get anywhere. As for the essence of stress in the don't think of remedying it at all. This ignorance of theirs is one form of avijja, or unawaren
To look at it in still another way, both the shadows and the real thing come from tanha, We're like a person who has amassed a huge fortune and then, when thieves come to brea the thieves. He doesn't see his own wrong-doing, and sees only the wrong-doing of other once he's piled his house full in this way, thieves can't help but break in. In the same way, suffer from stress and so they hate it, and yet they don't make the effort to straighten them Stress comes from the three forms of craving, and so we should kill off craving for sensuality, craving for becoming, and craving for no becoming. These things are fabricated heart, and we have to know them with our own mindfulness and discernment. Once we'v until we see, we'll know: 'This sort of mental state is craving for sensuality; this sort is crav becoming; and this sort, craving for no becoming.' People with discernment will see that th exist in the heart in subtle, intermediate and blatant stages, just as a person has three stag lifetime: youth, middle age and old age. 'Youth' is craving for sensuality. Once this thirst a the heart, it wavers and moves--this is craving for becoming--and then takes shape as crav further becoming--a sambhavesin with its neck stretched out looking for its object, causing and pain. In other words, we take a liking to various sights, sounds, smells, flavors, etc., a on them, which brings us stress. So we shouldn't preoccupy ourselves with sights, sounds provoke greed, anger or delusion (craving for sensuality), causing the mind to waver and concepts (this is craving for becoming; when the mind sticks with its wavering, won't stop re motions, that's craving for no further becoming). When we gain discernment, we sh destroy these forms of craving with anulomika-nana, knowledge in accordance with the fou knowing exactly how much ease and pleasure the mind has when cravings for sensuality, b becoming all disappear. This is called knowing the reality of disbanding. As for the cause and the path to the disbanding of stress, we'll know them as well. Ignorant people ride in the shadow of a car--and they'll end up with their heads bashed in. People who don the shadows of virtue are, will end up riding only the shadows. Words and deeds are the virtue. Actual virtue is in the heart. The heart at normalcy is the substance of virtue. The s of concentration is the mind firmly centered in a single preoccupation without any interfere concepts or mental labels. The bodily side to concentration--when our mouth, eyes, ears, n are quiet--is just the shadow, as when the body sits still, its mouth closed and not speakin anyone, its nose not interested in any smells, its eyes closed and not interested in any obje the mind is firmly centered to the level of fixed penetration, then whether we sit, stand, wa down, the mind doesn't waver. Once the mind is trained to the level of fixed penetration, di will arise without our having to search for it, just like an imperial sword: When it's drawn fo sharp and flashing. When it's no longer needed, it goes back in the scabbard. This is why taught, mano-pubbangama dhamma mano-settha mano-maya: The min most extraordinary thing there is. The mind is the source of the Dhamma. This what it means to know stress, its cause, its disbanding and the path to its disbanding. This substance of virtue, concentration and discernment. Whoever can do this will reach relea Whoever can give rise to the Dhamma of study and practice within themselves will meet wi attainment without a doubt. This is why it's said to be sanditthiko, visible in the present; a bearing fruit no matter what the time or season. Keep working at it always.

Beyond Right & Wrong (January 17, 1959) ========== heart to go and do harm to other people, we first have to open the way for it. In other word out by doing harm to ourselves, and this clears the way from inside the house for us to go harm to people outside. The intention to do harm is a heavy form of self-harm. At th least, it uses up our time and destroys our opportunity to do good. We have to wipe it out w intention not to do harm; or in other words, with concentration. This is like seeing that there plenty of unused space in our property, and that we aren't making enough for our living. W leap out into the open field so as to give ourself the momentum for doing our full measure o as the opportunity arises. Nekkhamma-sankappo (thoughts of renunciation), i.e at ease in quiet, solitary places. Abyapada-sankappo (thoughts of non-anger): We don't about our own bad points or the bad points of others. Avihinsa-sankappo (thoughts of not not creating trouble or doing harm to ourselves, i.e., (1) not thinking about our own shortco would depress us; (2) if we think about our own shortcomings, it'll spread like wildfire to the shortcomings of others. For this reason, wise people will lift their thoughts to the level of go that they can feel love and good will for themselves, and so that they can then feel love and towards others as well. When our mind has these three forms of energy, it's like a ta with three legs that can spin in all directions. To put it another way, once our mind has spu high a level, we can take pictures of everything above and below us. We'll develop discern bright light, or like binoculars that can magnify every detail. This is called nana--intuitive av that can know everything in the world: Lokavidu. The discernment here isn't ordin knowledge or insight. It's a special cognitive skill, the skill of the Noble Path. We'll give ris three eyes in the heart, so as to see the reds and greens, the highs and lows of the munda sport for those with wisdom. Our internal eyes will look at the Dhamma in front and behind below and all around us, so as to know all the ins and outs of goodness and evil. This is di We'll be at our ease, feeling pleasure with no pain interfering at all. This is called vijja-carana-sampanno--being fully equipped with cognitive skill. A person whose h discernment is capable of helping the nation and the religion, just as a farmer who grows ri sold both inside and outside the country strengthens the nation's economy. A person with will make the religion degenerate. When he brings disaster on himself, the disaster will ha to others as well. In other words, a single, solitary person with no goodness to him--nothin defilements and craving--can do evil to the point where he wipes himself out, and it will sp out people all over the country. But when a person has the three above virtues in his or he will turn into the strength of concentration. The heart will be as clear as crystal or a diamo whole world will become transparent. Discernment will arise, the skill of liberating insight a understanding, all at once. Whoever sees the world as having highs and lows doe have true intuitive discernment. Whoever has the eye of intuition will see that there are no lows, no rich, no poor. Everything is equal in terms of the three common characteristics: in stressful and not self. It's like the equality of democracy. Their home is the same as our ho differences at all. People commit burglaries and robberies these days because they don't s They think that this person is good, that person isn't; this house is a good place to eat, that isn't; this house is a good place to sleep, that house isn't, etc. It's because they don't hav insight, the eye of discernment, that there's all this confusion and turmoil. Keep your attention focused exclusively on the body--a cubit wide, a fathom long, a span thick. T middle path. If you make your awareness of the breath too narrow, you'll end up sitting st with no self-awareness at all. If you make your awareness too broad--all the way to heave can end up falling for aberrant perceptions. So neither extreme is good. You have to kee moderate and just right if you want to be on the right track. If you don't have a sense of ho correctly, then even if you ordain until you die buried in heaps of yellow robes, you won't s the practice. You lay people can sit in concentration till your hair turns white, your teeth fal your backs get all crooked and bent, but you'll never get to see nibbana. If we can practice on the Noble Path, though, we'll enter nibbana. Virtue will disband, concentration discernment will disband. In other words, we won't dwell on our knowledge or discernmen intelligent enough to know, we simply know, without taking intelligence as being an essenti ourselves. On the lower level, we're not stuck on virtue, concentration or discernment. O level, we're not stuck on the stages of stream-entry, once-returning or non-returning. Nibba on the world, the world isn't stuck on nibbana. Only at this point can we use the term 'ara This is where we can relax. They can say inconstant, but it's simply what they say. say stress, but it's simply what they say. They can say not-self, but it's simply what they sa they say, that's the way it is. It's true for them, and they're completely right--but complete As for us, only if we can get ourselves beyond right and wrong will we be doing fine. Road for people to walk on, but dogs and cats can walk on them as well. Sane people and crazy the roads: They didn't build the roads for crazy people, but crazy people have every right t As for the precepts, even fools and idiots can observe them. The same with concentration they can come and sit. And discernment: We all have the right to come and talk our hea simply a question of being right or wrong. None of the valuables of the mundane wo real pleasure. They're nothing but stress. They're good as far as the world is concerned, doesn't have any need for them. Right views and wrong views are an affair of the world. N have any right views or wrong views. For this reason, whatever is a wrong view, we shoul Whatever is a right view, we should develop--until the day it can fall from our grasp. That's be at our ease. Point Zero (April 22, 1957) ========== "Asokaram, the night of April 22, 1957: After we ha meditation hall and said our chants, Ajaan Lee delivered a sermon. At first, all I heard was phrase, 'namo tassa, etc.,' without hearing what Pali stanza he was going to take as his the voice was very weak and the wind outside so strong that my ears were ringing. So I tried t and keep listening, even though I couldn't make out a word he said until the sermon was al when I was able to catch the following:" To purify the heart, we have to disentangle our attachments to self, to the body, to mental phenomena and to all the objec passing in through the senses. Keep the mind intent on concentration. Keep it one at all ti let it become two, three, four, five, etc., because once you've made the mind one, it's easy zero. Simply cut off the little 'head' and pull the two ends together. But if you let the mind l many, it's a long, difficult job to make it zero. And another thing: If you put the zero after other numbers, they become ten, twenty, thirty, forty, fifty, hundreds, thousands, on to But if you put the zero's first, even if you have ten thousand of them, they don't count. So the heart: Once we've turned it from one to zero, and put the zero first, then other people or criticize us as they like, but it won't count. Good doesn't count, bad doesn't count. This something that can't be written and can't be read, that we can understand only for ourselv

When there's no more counting like this, the heart attains purity and the highest happine Pali stanza. nibbanam paramam sunnam nibbanam paramam sukham. whi 'Nibbana is the ultimate void, emptiness, zero. Nibbana is the ultimate ease.' This we're taught to make the mind one at all times--so that we can easily erase it into zero. Or it zero, we are bound to loosen our attachments to all things. Our heart will reach purity-- nibbana.

Chapter VIII

MAKING KNOWN THE TEACHING

As a man who long has struggled to swim across a wide and stormy water and at length after much effort reaches the safe shore, lies down awhile to rest his wearied limbs and look back with satisfaction on the dangers he has safely passed, as a man who has climbed into the cool pleasant air of a high mountain slope, when he gets there turns round, pleased and contented, and looks down upon the hot, dusty plain whose stifling air he had left behind, so now, his long toil past, his labors successfully accomplished, there in the quiet wood of Uruvela the victor in this fierce fight, rested Himself for a time, enjoying the relief of release from toil and labor, tasting in peace well-won, the fruits of truth and knowledge He had gained. Then having rested Himself sufficiently beneath the tree of victory, Siddhattha Gotama, now and henceforth Gotama the Buddha, passed from under that tree and went towards another near by under which the goatherds of the place were accustomed to take shelter from the sun while they watched their flocks.

As He sat resting here, a Brahmin happened to come past that way, and after the usual greetings to the ascetic under the goatherd's tree, he said to Him, "Gotama, what makes a man a real Brahmin? What qualities does he require to possess in order really to be a man of the highest caste?"

And the Buddha, taking no notice of the proud Brahmin's rudeness in addressing Him by His family name of Gotama without any title of courtesy before it such as "reverend Sir," or the like, pointedly replied to him in this verse:

"The Brahmin who has put away all evil,
Has put off pride, is self-restrained and pure,
Has learning, follows out the Holy life,
He alone has the light to be called Brahmin,

He nothing has to do with worldly thing."

And the Brahmin went away muttering to himself: "This ascetic Gotama knows me, this ascetic Gotama knows me."

A few days after this, while the Buddha was still staying under the goatherd's tree, two merchants who were going about the country selling their wares, came along the road, and seeing the ascetic sitting there under the goatherd's tree so calm and content, enjoying its fruits in the peace and quietude it has brought him, they offered Him an offering of the best food they had, and struck by His noble and majestic look, asked Him to accept them as believers in Him. These two merchants, whose names were Tapussa and Bhallika, were thus the first persons in the world who became the followers of the Buddha Gotama.

But now, having rested long enough, the Buddha began to think about what He should do next. He had found the Truth He sought, and now it seemed to Him that He ought not to keep such precious knowledge to Himself, but that He ought to tell it to others, so that they too might taste the comfort it brought. This was what He thought at first. But then other thoughts came into His mind.

"This doctrine of mine is not a very easy doctrine to understand," he said to himself. "It is deep and subtle. Only the thoughtful and reflective can grasp it fully so that it will do them good. But there are not many men who are thoughtful and reflective. The great majority of men do not want to take the trouble to think and reflect. They want something easy; something that will amuse and entertain them. Their minds are inclined only to what promises to give them pleasure and delight. They are altogether given over to love of pleasure. If I were to preach this doctrine to them, they would not know what I was talking about. They would not pay attention to me. I should only be giving myself trouble all for nothing."

Thus did the Buddha consider within himself almost making up his mind not to tell the Truth He had found to anybody, but just to keep it and enjoy it by Himself, since it did not seem to Him that anybody else in the world would want to hear it or thank Him for telling them.

However He did not stop at this point in His reflections or else the world would not know as it does to-day, the Truth He taught. He went on to consider the matter further; and this is what He next thought:

"Yes, it is true that most of the people in the world, will not want to hear this Truth I have found, and would not understand it even if they did hear me tell about it, they are so fond of what is easy and pleasant and comfortable and costs them no trouble. But still, everybody in the world is not alike. There are sure to be some, not very many, but still some who are not satisfied with the way they are living now, who want to know more than they know now, who are not content to follow pleasure wherever it may lead them. What a pity it would be that I should know this Truth which would bring to these few comfort and happiness, if only they heard it, and yet never give them a chance to hear it! No, I shall not do like that. I shall go forth now and make known, to all men I meet, these Four Noble Truths, these Four Great Facts I have discovered, of Ill, and its Cause, and its Cure, and the Way in which it can be cured; and among the many I speak to, there will always be a few who will listen, and listening, understand me.

"Just as in a lotus pond where all kinds of lotus lilies are growing, pink and blue and white, many of them have grown only a little way about the muddy bottom of the pond; and some have grown half way up through the water; and some have reached the top of the water and rest there; but a few grown up so as to lift their blossoms right out of, and above the mud and water, into the open air and the sunshine. So there are some beings whose minds are much sunk in the mud of passions and desires; and there are some that are not so much sunk in that mud; while some, a few are only a little touched with the mud of passion. These last will be able to understand my teaching when they hear it. I will let them hear it. I will go forth now and preach it to all men everywhere."

And then the Buddha began to consider who would be the best people to whom to tell His doctrine first, who would be the most likely to listen to Him and quickly understand what He said.

Then He thought about His old teacher Alara Kalama, and how learned and thoughtful, how quick in the brain, how pure in his life he was. And He said to himself: "I will go and tell Alara Kalama first. He will very quickly understand."

But as He was getting ready to go to Alara Kalama, some one came and told Him that Alara Kalama was dead. The Buddha was very sorry to hear this, for He felt sure that so good and so wise a man as His old teacher would have been sure to understand His doctrine as soon as he heard it. Then He began to think who else there was who would be likely to understand His doctrine. And the thought came to Him that perhaps the other teacher He had studied under in former days, Uddaka the disciple of Rama, would be a good person to whom to tell it, for Uddaka too, like Alara Kalama, was quick to understand anything new when he was told it. But when He made enquiry where Uddaka was staying, then He learned that he had died just the night before.

So once more He had to consider who among all those He once had known, would be most likely to listen to Him and understand the Truth He wanted to tell them. And then He remembered the five hermits who had waited upon Him and attended to Him so faithfully during the time when He was striving by Himself at Uruvela. After enquiring where they had gone to when they had left Him, He learned that they were staying in a deer-park near the city of Benares. So, rising up and leaving Uruvela, the Buddha set out to walk to Benares, about a hundred and fifty miles away, to find His former attendants and disciples and tell them what He had found. And wandering on day after day from place to place, at length one evening He drew near to the grove in the deer-park where those five ascetics were staying.

And they say Him approaching in the distance, and said to one another:

"Look yonder! There is that ascetic Gotama coming here -- a luxurious fellow who gave up striving and fell back into a life of ease and comfort. Don't let us speak to Him! Don't let us show Him any respect! Let nobody go and offer to take His bowl or His extra robe from Him. We'll just leave a mat there for Him to sit on if He wants to, and if He doesn't want, He can stand. Who is going to attend on a good-for-nothing ascetic like Him!"

However, as the Buddha came nearer and nearer, they began to notice that somehow He was not the same as He used to be in the days when they had lived with Him and studied under Him. There now was something about Him, something noble and majestic, such as they never had seen before. And almost in spite of themselves, before they well knew what they were doing, they had forgotten all they had just agreed on as to how they were going to receive Him. And one was hastening forward to meet Him, and respectfully taking His bowl and robe from Him, another busily preparing a seat for Him, while a third hurried off and brought Him water for His feet.

Then, after He had taken the seat offered Him, the Buddha spoke to them and said:

"Listen, ascetics. I have found the way to deathlessness. Let me tell you. Let me teach you. And if you listen and learn and practice as I instruct you, very soon you will know for yourselves, not in some future life but here and now in this present lifetime that what I say is true. You will realize for yourselves the state that is beyond all lives and deaths."

Naturally the five ascetics were very much astonished to hear their old master and teacher talking like this. They had seen Him give His hard life of going without proper food and rest; they had seen Him cease, as they thought, from all efforts to find the Truth, and here He was actually coming to them and telling them that He had found the Truth! They simply did not believe Him; and they told Him so.

"Why, friend Gotama," they said, "when we were living with you, you practiced all sorts of stern austerities and bodily mortifications such as were practiced by no other ascetic we ever heard of in the whole of India, and that was why we took you for our master and teacher. Yet with all you did, you never found out the Truth you wanted to find. How is it possible you can have found it now when you are living a life of luxury, have ceased from striving, and turned to live in ease and comfort?"

But the Buddha replied: "You are mistaken, ascetics. I have not given up all efforts. I am not living a life of self-indulgence and idle comfort and ease. Listen to me. I really have attained supreme knowledge and insight. And I can teach it to you so that you also may attain to it and possess it for yourselves."

But still the five ascetics could not believe what their old teacher now was telling them. It seemed to them impossible that such a thing could be true, even though He begged them once more to listen to Him and believe what He said.

Then when He saw that they did not believe Him when He said He found the Deathless, He looked at them very earnestly, very seriously, and said:

"Listen, ascetics! In all the time that you used to be with me, did I ever say anything like this to you before? Did I ever before tell you that I had found the supreme knowledge and insight that leads beyond birth and death? Come, answer me!"

The five ascetics had to answer the Buddha that it was true He had never said anything like this to them before.

"Very well," urged the Buddha. "Listen to me now when I tell you that I really have found the way to deathlessness. And let me show you what I have found."

So gravely and impressively did the Buddha speak these words, so gravely and impressively did He look at them as He spoke, that the five ascetics found themselves unable any longer to refuse to listen to Him. They invited their old master and teacher to stay with them and teach them. So, day after day, during the next few months, the Buddha taught these five old disciples of His, the new Truth He had discovered. First He taught two out of the five, while the other three went out with their begging bowls to the city, and collected enough food for the whole six of them. Then these three stayed at the deer-park and were taught by the Buddha while the other two went out begging and brought back sufficient for them all. Thus the little party of the five pupils and their teacher lived happily together, He teaching, the other five busily learning and practicing, until in a short time (for they were all diligent pupils, and they had the best master and teacher in the world) the whole five of them, one after another, reached and realized for themselves the Truth their Master had found. They came to know even while alive in this body, the state that is called Nibbana.

Out of these five ascetics, the one who was the first thus to learn and realize for himself what his Master taught, was called Kondanna. The names of the other four were, Bhaddaka, Assaji, Vappa, and Mahanama. These five ascetics were the first five Arahans that appeared in the world; for Arahan is the name that is given to one who in this life, in the body he now is in, comes to realize the state that cannot be touched by birth and death, the state that is called Nibbana. These five Arahans were the first members of the Sangha or Brotherhood of Bhikkhus who acknowledged the Buddha as master and teacher and guide for all their life.

While the Buddha thus was staying in the deer-park at Isipatana, there came to see Him a rich young man of the neighborhood called Yasa. And after the young man Yasa had heard the Buddha explain his teaching and what it led to, he was so well pleased with what he heard that he became a Bhikkhu there and then, and stayed on with the Buddha in order to hear and learn more.

But towards evening that day an elderly man came to where the Buddha was, and told Him that his son had left home that morning saying he was going to visit the Buddha, but he had not come again, and his mother was crying for him thinking that he must have been killed by robbers on the way. Then the Buddha told the man that his son had become a Bhikkhu; and He began to explain His doctrine to the new Bhikkhu's father. And so well did He speak that when He had ended, the father also asked to be allowed to become a Bhikkhu, the same as his son had done; and he too, stayed with the Buddha and did not return home. And next morning, when the Buddha and the new young Bhikkhu went to his mother's house for food, she was quite pleased to learn that her son and her husband had become disciples of so great a teacher, and she herself became a lay-follower of the Buddha.

After this, four close friends of young Yasa, when they saw what their companion had done, also did the same, and became Bhikkhus also, disciples of the Buddha Gotama, members of His Sangha. And in this way, more and more young men became Bhikkhus, until at last the Buddha had gathered round Him there at Isipatana, a body of about sixty young Bhikkhus, all of the best families, and all of them eager and diligent in study, and strenuous and persevering in practice under their Master's training, so that in no very long time, all of them had realized for themselves the supreme knowledge and insight, and become Arahans.

But the Buddha did not allow them to stay there with Him. Now that they had learned all He had to teach, He told them that now they must go out and teach others, so that these others who were ready to accept His teaching, might hear It and learn It, and be saved from all trouble and distress.

"Go forth," He said to them, "and make known the Teaching which is excellent in its beginnings, excellent in its progress, and excellent in its goal. Proclaim the perfect life, holy and pure. There are in the world beings not altogether blinded with the dust of passion and desire; and if they do not learn my doctrine, they will perish. They will listen to you: they will understand."

And the Buddha sent out these first sixty disciples, not in pairs nor in groups of three or four. He sent them out one by one, and each of them in a different direction, so as to make sure that His teaching should be spread as far and wide as possible. And these sixty Arahans did as their Master told them to do, and carried a knowledge of His Teaching and Discipline, North and South, and East and West. They were the first men in the world who went abroad into foreign countries for the sole purpose of spreading a knowledge of the religious truth they believed in. They were, in fact, the first duly appointed missionaries of a religion the world has seen.

And they were brave men, these first missionaries of the Buddha's religion.

One of them came to the Buddha and told Him that he wanted to be sent to a certain country where everybody knew the people were very wild and rough.

"But what will you do there, Bhikkhu," said the Buddha, when He heard his request, "if the people of the country abuse you and say all sorts of bad things about you."

"Then," answered the Bhikkhu, "I shall say to myself: 'These people are very good people; they only use their tongues to me; they do not beat me with their fists.'"

"But suppose they beat you with their fists, Bhikkhu, what will you do then?" asked the Buddha.

"Then I shall say to myself: 'These people are very good people; they do not thrash me with sticks,'" replied the Bhikkhu.

"But if they thrash you with sticks, what then?"

"Then I shall say that they are very good people; they do not cut me with swords."

"And if they cut you with swords?"

"Then I shall say they are very good, they do not kill me."

"But if they make to kill you, O Bhikkhu; what will you do then?" said the Buddha.

"Then Lord," said the Bhikkhu calmly, "I shall say to myself: 'These people are doing me a great favor, for this body of mine is an evil thing of which I shall be glad to be rid; and these good people are going to rid me of it.'"

Then the Buddha said:

"Go O Bhikkhu, and make known my Teaching among these people. Bhikkhus like you are the proper kind of Bhikkhus to publish abroad my Doctrine among all the peoples and nations of the world." *

* * *

Chapter IX

SIGALA

In the meantime the two merchants Tapussa and Bhallika, the first men in the world to call themselves the followers of the Buddha, had traveled on, and in the course of their journeying, come to Kapilavatthu. There they told everybody that they had seen Siddhattha the son of their king, at Uruvela, and that He had actually become, as had been prophesied, a very great religious teacher, indeed, the greatest religious teacher in the world, an Awakened One, a Buddha. And they said they had heard that He was coming soon to Kapilavatthu.

And, shortly after the Buddha had sent out the sixty Arahans to preach His Doctrine everywhere, He himself also left the deer-park at Isipatana, and turning Southwards in the direction of the Magadha country, at length came back to Uruvela. Here he stayed for a time, and entered into talk and discussions with a number of hermits who were living there under a leader called Kassapa. And after He had explained His Doctrine to them, Kassapa himself, their leader and teacher, accepted the Buddha's doctrine as true, and asked the Buddha to receive him into the Order of His Bhikkhus. And later on, by meditating and practicing as the Buddha taught him, he became an Arahan, and after the Buddha had passed away, he was one of the leading Arahans who maintained the doctrine in its original purity.

But now, leaving Uruvela, the Buddha wandered on through the country towards Rajagaha the capital city of Magadha, to keep His promise to its king, Bimbisara, that when He had found the Truth, He would come and let him and his people know it. And King Bimbisara and his people received Him with great gladness, now that He had become a Buddha. And in a grove of bamboo trees a little way outside the city He stayed many days, teaching and preaching so kindly and so persuasively, that the king and all his people accepted His teaching entirely and became His declared followers. And the king, to show the respect in which he held the Buddha and His Teaching and the Brotherhood of Bhikkhus, made Him a gift of the Bamboo Grove and of a fine Vihara he caused to be build there, so that He and His Sangha would always have a comfortable place to live in during the rainy season.

Now one morning as the Buddha left the Bamboo Grove to go into Rajagaha to beg alms of food, He saw a young man all dripping wet as if he had just come from bathing, standing in the roadway and bowing in each of the four directions, East, South, West and North, as well as to the sky overhead and to the ground beneath his feet, at the same time throwing rice in each of these directions.

The Buddha looked at the young man as he went through this strange performance on the public street, and then He stopped and asked the young man why he was acting like that. The young man replied that he was only doing what his old father had asked him to do each morning so as to keep any evil from coming to him during each day from any of the four directions, or from the gods above, or from the demons below. It was his father's last wish, spoken on his death-bed, so he could not deny him his wish. And every day since his father had died, he had faithfully observed his promise without missing a single morning.

"It is very right of you," said the Buddha when He heard the young man's answer, "to keep the promise you made to your dying father and carry out his wish faithfully; but what you are doing is not really what your father meant."

"When your father told you that you were to bow down to, and make an offering of rice to the East, he meant that you were to show respect and honor to those through whom you have come into life, namely, to your parents. By worshiping the South, he meant worshiping and honoring your teachers through whom you get knowledge. By worshiping the West, he meant cherishing and supporting wife and children. By worshiping the North, he meant holding in esteem all relatives and friends, and helping them where they have need of help. By worshiping the sky, he meant worshiping and reverencing all that is good and holy and high. And by worshiping the earth, he meant respecting the rights of every creature, even the smallest and meanest that lives upon it. This is the way in which your father wished you to behave so that no harm would come to you any day from any quarter whatsoever."

And there and then the Lord Buddha went on to give Sigala -- for that was the name of the young man He was speaking to -- some good counsel as to how he should live so as to make his own and other people's lives happy and fortunate here and now, and in the future earn an equally happy and fortunate lot. He told Sigala to abstain from killing and stealing and lying and lewdness and the using of intoxicating drinks or hurtful drugs. He told him to avoid bad companions and cultivate the acquaintance of good people. He told him to work diligently so as to get wealth, and then to take care of the wealth he earned, but yet not to be greedy in keeping it all to himself, nor yet foolish in throwing it away again on foolish objects, but to use a fourth part of it in supporting himself and all depending on him, his wife and family, another fourth part in building up and extending his business further, another fourth part in helping any one in need of help, and the last fourth part he was to lay aside and keep in case misfortune should come to him and he should need help himself.

Young Sigala listened respectfully to all the good counsel the Lord Buddha thus gave him. Then he confessed that when his father was living, he had often told him about the Buddha and what a great and good teacher He was, and had tried to get him to go and see the Buddha and hear Him preach; but he always refused to go, saying that is was too much trouble and would only weary him, and that he had neither time nor money to spend on wandering ascetics like Gotama. And Sigala now asked the Buddha kindly to pardon him for his former neglect, and to accept him as a follower; for, so he promised the Lord Buddha, he meant to worship the six directions of space exactly in this right way which the Buddha had just taught him, for all the rest of his life.

The full account of all the Buddha said to Sigala that morning in the streets of Rajagaha, can be read in the Sigalovada Sutta of the Samyutta Nikaya.

* * *

Chapter X

SARIPUTTA AND MOGGALLANA

Now about this time there was staying near Rajagha a famous religious teacher called Sanjaya, along with a large following of disciples and pupils, numbering about two hundred in all. And among these two-hundred disciples of Sanjaya, there were two very close friends who were not at all satisfied with the teaching their master gave them. These two friends whose names were Upatissa and Kolita, wanted to know something more than their teacher knew and taught: they wanted to find that state which is beyond the power of death. They wanted to find what they called "The Deathless." And these two friends were so fond of one another, that they always shared together what ever either of them got. And they made a solemn promise to each other that they would both search and study and meditate with all their power, and try to find "The Deathless," and whichever of them found it first, he would let the other know.

Now it chanced that one morning early, as Upatissa was in the main street of Rajagaha, he saw some distance away, an ascetic going round from door to door begging alms of food. And as he looked at him, he was very much struck by everything about him. The unknown ascetic seemed to him most modest in his demeanor, and so calm and collected in his way of walking along and standing still while the people brought out rice from their houses and put it in his bowl. But when he had come nearer, his admiration of the ascetic was turned into wonder and reverence, for there was a look in his face such as he had never seen on the face of any ascetic before -- a look of perfect peace, of unshakable serenity as of a smooth unruffled lake under a calm, clear sky. "Who is this?" said Upatissa to himself. "This ascetic must be one who has found what I am seeking, or else he must be the pupil of such an one. I wonder who is his teacher? Whose doctrine can it be that he follows? I must go after him and find out."

Upatissa, however, knew that it was not proper to ask questions of a stranger ascetic while he was busy begging his morning meal, so he patiently walked on some way behind him as he passed in and out among the houses with his begging bowl; but at last, when the ascetic had gone round all the houses, and now was going out of the city gate, Upatissa went up to him, and greeting him with respect, humbly asked him if he would kindly tell him who was the teacher at whose feet he sat and learned. "Your coming and going, brother, are so serene and placid," he said, "your face is so clear and bright; very much would I like to know who is that teacher, to follow whom you have left home and friends behind. What is your teacher's name? What is the doctrine he preaches?"

"I can soon tell you that, brother," said the ascetic pleasantly. "There is a great ascetic of the Sakya race who has left his home and country behind in order to follow the homeless life. And it is to follow him that I have left the household life. It is that Blessed One who is my teacher. It is His teaching that I follow and practice."

"And what is that teaching, Venerable Sir? What is it that your master teaches? I also would like to know it," said Upatissa eagerly, thinking that perhaps at last now he was going to hear from this ascetic about that "Deathless" for which he and his friend Kolita had been looking for so long.

"I am only a novice, a newcomer into the Brotherhood of the Blessed

One," replied the ascetic modestly. "It is only a little while ago since I began to study under the Blessed One, and to follow His rules of discipline, so I do not know very much yet about His Teaching. I cannot explain it to you in every little point. But if it is only the pith of His teaching that you want; I can give you that just in a few words."

"That is all I want, brother," said Upatissa quickly. "Tell me the substance. The substance is just what I want. What need to make a lot of words about it?"

"Very well, then," said the ascetic. "Listen!"

> "How all things here through Cause have come,
> He hath made known, the Awakened One.
> And how again they pass away,
> That, too, the Great Recluse doth say."

That was all the ascetic said. But as Upatissa stood there listening to him by the city gate in one great flash of insight there burst upon his mind in all its force and verity, the great truth taught by all the Buddhas -- the truth that everything that ever has come into existence, or ever will come into existence, inevitably, unfailingly, without exception, must and will again Pass out of existence. Upatissa in this great moment saw clearly with his whole heart and mind that only whatever has not arisen, never had come into existence can be free from the law that it must pass out of existence again, must die. And he said to the ascetic: "If this is the doctrine you have learned from your teacher, then indeed you have found the state that is free from sorrow, free from death, the state of the Sorrowless, the Deathless, which has not been made known to men for ages and ages." Then, with expressions of joyful gratitude, he took leave of the ascetic who thus in a moment had brought light to his mind, and he went off to find his friend Kolita and bring him the great news that at last he had found "The Deathless."

But just as he had seen the unknown ascetic from a distance and wondered at his impressive walk and behavior; so now Kolita saw his friend Upatissa coming near, and wondered what had made such a change in his whole appearance. And he said to him:

"Why, brother, how clear and shining your face is! Can it be, brother, that at last you have found "The Deathless" we both have been seeking so long?"

"It is so, brother; it is so," was Upatissa's glad reply. "I have found the Deathless."

"But how, brother, how?" Kolita asked eagerly.

Then Upatissa told his bosom friend Kolita about the unknown ascetic he had seen that morning begging in the streets -- an ascetic all dressed in yellow, and looking so calm and collected as he never had seen an ascetic look before. And how he had followed him out of the city gate and then asked him to tell him the secret of his peace and serenity. Then he repeated to Kolita the four line stanza the ascetic of the happy countenance had repeated to him. And there and then, in a flash of perception, Kolita also saw the Truth that the Deathless is that which never has arisen in this world of sights and sounds and scents and tastes and touches and ideas, and, because it never has so arisen, therefore cannot pass away again, cannot die.

So these two friends, with minds now happy and joyful, went to the place where the Buddha was, and asked to be allowed to take Him as their master and teacher henceforth instead of Sanjaya whom they now left. And the Buddha accepted them into the Brotherhood of His Bhikkhus, and within a very short time they became the very foremost of the Buddha's disciples for their learning and practical knowledge. In fact, these two friends Upatissa and Kolita, became the two great Theras known to the world as Sariputta and Moggallana. And the name of the ascetic who told them the Doctrine of the Buddha in one little stanza or gatha of four lines only, was Assajii. And ever afterwards this little stanza was known as "Assaji's stanza."

But it was not only Upatissa and Kolita who joined the Buddha's Order of Bhikkhus while he was staying at Rajagaha at this time. Many of the youths of the best families of Magadha left their homes, their fathers and mothers and all their relations behind them, and became the Bhikkhu disciples of the great Sakya teacher who was so different from the ordinary religious teachers of the country -- so great and noble by birth and attainments, and whose Teaching, if followed to its end, brought about the ceasing of all things evil. Indeed, so many young men left their homes to follow the Sakya Sage, the Buddha Gotama, that the people of the country began to get alarmed and annoyed, and some of them even got angry. And they went to the Buddha and complained saying that if things went on much longer as they were doing, soon there would be no young men at all left in the country to live the household life. Soon, they said, there would be no more families, no more wives and children, and the whole country would go to ruin and become an empty wilderness, for all the young men in the country would be Bhikkhus.

So when the Buddha heard this complaint of the people, He gave orders that after this, no one was to come and follow Him as a Bhikkhu without first getting permission to do so from his father or mother; or, if his father and mother were dead, then from his nearest relation, whoever that might be. And when the people of Magadha heard of this new rule of the Buddha, they were once more pleased and contented to have a Buddha in their midst, and they gave Him and His Bhikkhus the best of everything they had got. And this new rule which the Buddha thus first gave out at Rajagaha with regard to Bhikkhus joining the Order, is the one we find in the Vinaya Rules of the Sangha to this day.

* * *

Chapter XI

KAPILAVATTHU

When the Buddha's father, King Suddhodana, heard that his son was now at Rajagaha, he sent a messenger to tell Him that His father was now getting old, and begged that He would come and let him see his son once more before he died. But the messenger he sent happened to arrive at Rajagaha just when the Buddha was preaching to the people. So he sat down and listened to the preaching till it was finished before trying to deliver his message. But what the Buddha said seemed to him so good and so true as he listened to it, that when the discourse was ended, in his pleasure and delight with it, he had forgotten all about what he had come for, he had forgotten the message King Suddhodana had sent him to take to his son the Buddha, and instead of delivering it, he remained with the Buddha so as to hear Him preach some more.

King Suddhodana at Kapilavatthu, meanwhile waited a long time for his messenger to come back and tell him what his son had said in reply to his message, but no messenger came. Then he sent another messenger to take the same message to his son the Buddha, and to see what had happened to his first messenger. But this second messenger also, when he arrived, found the Buddha preaching, listened to His preaching, became converted to His doctrine, and remained with Him. Then King Suddhodana sent out a third messenger with his message and to see what had happened to the first two he had sent; but the same thing happened to him as to the other two before him; he did not come back with any answer. And so, one after another, King Suddhodana sent out other messengers until he had sent out nine altogether; but none of them came back. They were also charmed by the Buddha's words that they forgot what they had been sent to say, and stayed with the Buddha so as to hear more of His preaching.

The King thought it was very strange that none of his messengers had come back with any answer. He asked Yasodhara, his son's wife, to try do what she could to get an answer from Him, and to bring Him to Kapilavatthu. So now Yasodhara sent a messenger asking her husband to come and see her and Rahula, who was a fine little boy seven years old. But the same thing happened to her messenger as happened to King Suddhodana's: he was so pleased with the Buddha's preaching that he forgot the message he had been sent with, and did not return. Then another and another messenger was sent by Yasodhara but none of them returned. All were captivated by the Buddha's words, and remained with

Him.

And now Yasodhara did not know what more she could do to get her husband to come and see her and His son. Then King Suddhodana remembered that there was a young man about the court called Udayi who had formerly been the Buddha's favorite playmate when they both were boys together. And he thought that if he sent Udayi to tell his son that His old father wanted to see Him once more before he died, perhaps He would listen to this old friend of His boyhood's days, and come to Kapilavatthu. For of course, neither the King nor Yasodhara knew that all the messengers they had sent before had never delivered their message at all.

So now the friend of His youth, Udayi, was sent to ask the Buddha to come to Kapilavatthu and let everyone there see His face once more -- His father, His wife, His son, and all the people of the country who would have called Him their king one day if He had not gone away to become a religious teacher. And when Udayi came to Rajagaha he soon learned the real reason why King Suddhodana's and Princess Yasodhara's messengers had never come back. So Udayi stopped his ears while the preaching was going on for fear that he too might do as the others had done. But when the preaching was over, he went to the Buddha and after greeting Him with profound reverence, he told Him that His father and wife and son, as well as all the people of Kapilavatthu, were very, very anxious to see the Buddha that had appeared in the world, and asked Him out of compassion to come and visit them soon. Then the Buddha very kindly said that He would not refuse to gratify the wish of those who were His own people, and that very soon He would go to Kapilavatthu and see them all. So Udayi hurried back to King Suddhodana bearing the news that He who before was Prince Siddhattha, and now was the great, the universally honored Buddha, soon would be coming to the city to do the duty of a son to his father.

Then every one in Kapilavatthu, from the King downward, was filled with joy to know that their prince who had left them seven long years ago and become a homeless beggar in order to follow the religious life, had succeeded in His efforts to find the Truth, and was now a Buddha, a teacher not only of men but of the very gods, and soon would be back among His own folk again to tell them what he had found.

So they swept up all the streets of the city and made them clean as they never had been made clean before. They decorated all their houses with flowers, and hung flags and streamers of many colored cloth along the streets, and prepared to give their prince a reception worthy of the eldest son of their Raja, and a great Buddha as well.

And on the day when the Buddha was expected to arrive in the city, the king sent out his best elephants decorated with all their royal ornaments, along the road by which he thought his son would come, in order that they might meet Him and conduct Him in regal state into the city of His fathers. Yasodhara also, on this great day, ordered her bearers to carry her litter out to the borders of the city so that she might meet her husband at the city gate. But as they were carrying her along the main street, she saw ahead of her an ascetic dressed all in yellow who was going round from door to door with a bowl in his hand begging alms of fool. "Who can that ascetic be?" she thought to herself. "Never before have I seen a begging ascetic look so noble an dignified as this one does. He must be a very good and holy man." But as she came nearer, what was her surprise to find that the yellow-robed beggar was her own husband, the father of her child, the handsome Prince Siddhattha of former days! He was not handsome now in the way that he used to be handsome. About Him now there was something that was better than handsomeness, something great and high and holy that made her get down out of her litter and bow low before His feet, as He passed upon His silent way, His eyes fixed on the ground, not seeing her.

But when she returned to the Palace and told the king her father-in-law in what way his son and her husband, had come into the city, as a beggar, King Suddhodana was filled with humiliation and anger at the news. At once he ordered his charioteer to get the chariot ready and he drove furiously through the streets of the city towards the place where Yasodhara had told him she had seen her husband begging. When the king got there he found the Buddha calmly pacing along towards the Palace with a worshiping crowd all round Him. But the king's indignation and anger at his son's behavior in begging where He had the right to take all He wanted without asking leave, remained as great as ever, and he at once began to scold and upbraid Him.

"What is this I hear about you, my son?" he cried. "Was it for this that you left your father's home, to come back begging your daily food like the commonest beggar in the kingdom -- you, the son of the king, the heir to the throne? O my son, you have this day disgraced me and the royal house to which you belong. When did any of your race and lineage do a thing like this? When did any of our family before beg his food like a common beggar?"

But the Buddha quietly answered his grieved, indignant father: "Indeed, my father, this is how my race and lineage have always done."

"Your race have always been kings for as long as men can remember," said King Suddhodana proudly. "Not one of them ever did a thing like this."

"That is true, my father," the Buddha gently answered. "But now I do not think of my earthly descent. Now I belong to the race of the Buddha of all time. It is of them that I speak when I say that I only do as my race has always done. For the Buddhas have always done like this, and now, as is only right and proper, I do the same."

And as the Buddha walked along beside his father towards the Palace, He told him that He was not coming back to the home of His fathers, by any means poor or empty handed. He told him that He was bringing back with Him a precious jewel, the richest, most precious jewel in the world, the jewel of the security of Nibbana. And then He went on to tell His father all about that great security, Nibbana, and about the way in which it can be reached. And when He had come to the Palace, He sat down and explained the Truth He had discovered so simply and persuasively that not only His father and Yasodhara and His son Rahula, but all the people of Kapilavatthu became his followers and accepted His Teaching as true. And after a short time, His son Rahula was ordained and became a member of the Order of Bhikkhus.

* * *

Chapter XII

DAILY LIFE

The Buddha now began that career of continual teaching and preaching which lasted for forty-four years, during which time He wandered about principally in that part of Northern India where are now Oudh, Bihar, and the North Bengal. Except during the rainy season He very seldom stayed more than a day or two at any one place. And during the rainy season of each year, He generally lived at the Bamboo Grove or Veluvana Vihara at Rajagaha that had been given Him by King Bimbisara, or else at the Jetavana Vihara near Savatthi in the Kosala country, which had been presented to Him by a very generous supporter of the Buddha and His Sangha whose name was Anathapindika.

During these years the daily habits of the Buddha were somewhat as follows:

He rose early in the morning before dawn, and after making His toilet, sat down and engaged in meditation for some time. Then, when daylight was fully come, He used to put His robe on decently over both shoulders, and taking His almsbowl in hand, go out to the village or town near which He happened to be staying at the time, and with His eyes fixed on the ground, pass from door to door, waiting for, and accepting in silence, whatever the charitable might put into His bowl. Sometimes He went out on this round for alms alone by Himself; sometimes he went accompanied by a body of His disciples who passed along in single file behind Him, their bowls in their hands also, and with the same modest and subdued demeanor. Occasionally, when begging alone, some supporter to whose door He came, would invite Him to come in and eat His meal in their house. Such invitations He usually accepted, taking the seat that had been prepared for Him, and partaking of what was put in His bowl by the people of the house who meantime had taken it from Him and filled it with the best of everything they had. Then, after finishing His meal and washing His hands, He would speak to those present about His doctrine, telling them about the benefit and advantage of doing good and the disadvantage and harm of doing evil both now and in the future, and then He would rise and go back to the place where He happened to be staying at the time. There He would sit quiet waiting in a rest-house or under a tree near by, until all the Bhikkhus living with Him at the time, had finished their meal also; and then He would retire to His own chamber where He would wash His feet, coming out again afterwards to give an address to the Bhikkhus who meanwhile had assembled together in order to listen to Him, and to exhort them to be diligent in learning the Doctrine and practicing the Discipline, so as to attain to a realization of Nibbana here and now in this present life.

After He had finished speaking, some of the Bhikkhus would ask Him to give them a subject to meditate upon suitable to their individual character and the state of progress at which they had arrived, and then the Buddha would tell them what would be best for them to meditate on that day, giving them an easy or a difficult subject according as they were beginners or far advanced in their study and practice. Then the Bhikkhus would break up their gathering, and each would go away by himself under a tree or to some retired spot in the fields, and spend the afternoon there meditating upon the subject the Master had given each for meditation.

The Buddha would now go back to His private room, and if it was the hot season, and by reason of the great heat He felt inclined to lie down for a little and rest, He would do so with His mind composed and collected. Then, being refreshed, He would rise from His couch which simply consisted of His robe folded in four and laid on the floor of His room, and He would begin to consider the people in the world and how best He could help them to gain final deliverance from everything evil. By this time the people from the village or town near which he was living, perhaps would come to Him with offerings of one kind or another, wishing at the same time to hear Him preach. So He would sit down and after accepting their gifts, speak to them in such a nice easy way, in a way so suited to the understanding of each person present, whether rich or poor, learned or unlearned, that each of them would think that the Great Teacher was speaking specially to them, to nobody else, and when He had ended speaking, they would all go away pleased and delighted with everything they had heard.

When these visitors had thus gone, the Buddha would then go and bathe in the Vihara somewhere or, if there was a good bathing-tank or pond near by, go and bathe there, and afterwards retire again to His private room, and sitting down alone, engage in meditation.

By this time it would be coming on towards evening; and now any Bhikkhus who did not belong to the company who were living with Him but were living somewhere else, were free to come and see Him and get advice from him about their practice of meditation or ask Him to explain to them some points about the Doctrine which they did not fully understand. Such Bhikkhus were now received by Him and He gave them the counsel and advice they required, and cleared up for them their difficulties in understanding with kind and helpful answers which sent them away cheered and encouraged and strengthened. And this the Buddha always did in the kindest and most patient and courteous manner. During all the forty-four years of His life when He thus received Bhikkhus from other places nearly every day, and answered their questions and solved their difficulties for them, never once was He known to lose patience with any questioner or become annoyed or angry at anything any one said, whether they were friendly or hostile; still less did He ever become confused and confounded, or unable to answer any question asked Him. He was always prepared to speak with all who came to Him, whether honestly ask His help, or only to try to trap Him in what He said. To those who really wanted help in their difficulties, He gave helpful, satisfying answers. And those who came to try to confuse and puzzle Him, and trip Him up in His words very often came away full of admiration for His ready knowledge and wisdom, some of them even becoming there and then His devoted followers for the rest of their life.

The evening and the earlier part of the night is this was given to visitors. But now, being a little weary of so much sitting all day, the Buddha used to get to His feet and spend some time just pacing up and down to relieve and refresh His limbs. Then, after walking back and forward like this for a while, He would retire to His room and go to rest for the night.

Thus during the forty-four years of His career of teaching and preaching His doctrine, did the Buddha spend each day when not actually engaged in traveling from one place to another, always ready to help and instruct any one who desired His help and instructions in religious matters. But it was not only in religious but also in every day worldly affairs that He was sometimes able to do good with His practical wisdom to the people among whom He freely moved during these forty-four years of active, beneficent life.

Thus, once when He was staying at the Jetavana Vihara at Savatthi, the people of Kapila and Koliya fell into a great and bitter dispute about the watering of their paddy fields. It was a time of drought. No rain had fallen for a long time, and as a result, the stream that ran between the fields of the Kapila folk on one side, and the fields of the Koliya people on the other, was almost dried up. There was only a very little water left in it. And each of these two peoples, the Kapilas and the Koliyas, wanted to get all the water there was for their own fields, and to leave the others none. And they began to get ready to fight about it, each party prepared to kill the people on the other side of the stream so as to get all the water in it for themselves.

Now the Kapila people were the Buddha's own people, and when He heard about this quarrel of theirs with the Koliyas, He felt very sorry to think that they were going to kill other people and perhaps get killed themselves all for the sake of a little water. So He set out for the place where the angry people were gathered together all ready to fight, with their weapons in their hands. And when He got there He spoke to them like this:

"Princes and warriors, listen to what I am going to say, and answer what I ask you, truthfully. What is it you are getting ready to kill one another about?"

"About the water in the stream, here, which we both want for our dry fields," said the people of both banks of the stream.

"Yes," said the Buddha, "but tell me truly. Which do you think is the more valuable -- the little water in this stream, or the blood in the veins of the many men, especially that in the veins of princes and kings?"

"The blood of men, and especially the blood of princes and kings," the people at once replied, "of course is much more valuable than the water of the stream."

"That being so," the Buddha now said, "is it fit and proper to risk what is more precious and valuable for the sake of what is less precious and valuable?"

"Nay, indeed, Lord," the people replied, "it would not be fit and proper to risk what is more valuable for the sake of what is less valuable."

"If that is so," concluded the Buddha, "go and conquer your anger, put away your murderous weapons, and come to a peaceable agreement among yourselves."

And both the Kapila and the Koliya people, now heartily ashamed of their foolishness and lack of good sense thus pointed out to them by the Lord Buddha, did as He told them, and agreed to share equally between them what water was in the stream, and ever afterwards lived at peace with one another.

* * *

Chapter XIII

MAHAPAJAPATI

Meanwhile the Buddha's father King Suddhodana fell very ill, so like a good son, the Buddha, taking with Him His half-brother Nanda who now was one of His Bhikkhus, and Ananda and Sariputta and Moggallana, went to visit and console His father in his illness. At first, in his pleasure at seeing his beloved son again, King Suddhodana grew a little better, and everyone thought that he was going to get well altogether; but the improvement lasted only a little while. He was getting too old now to have much strength for resisting sickness, and a few days later, the king became very ill again, and to the grief of the whole kingdom, passed away in death.

Her husband now being dead, Queen Mahapajapati the Buddha's own mother's sister, who had brought Him up the same as if He had been her own child, did not want to stay living in household life any longer. Mourning for her husband who had just died, she wished henceforth to live a religious life just like a Bhikkhu, under the guidance and instruction of her foster-son, the Buddha. So, along with a number of her ladies who did not want to part from their mistress but wished to go with her wherever she might go, she went to the Buddha and asked Him if out of pity and compassion He would not allow women also to leave the household life the same as men, and live under His guidance and instruction the same as the Bhikkhus. But although she entreated the Buddha three separate times to accept her and her ladies as female Bhikkhus under Him, He begged her not to ask such a thing from him. And Queen Mahapajapati was very much grieved that her great wish should thus have been refused, and bursting into tears, she and her ladies left the Buddha's presence weeping.

And now, having waited at Kapilavatthu until the funeral ceremonies for his father were over, the Buddha left the city, and wandering on from place to place, at length came to Vesali, and took up His residence in the Vihara in the Great Wood there.

Then Mahapajapati cut off her hair and putting on yellow robes, along with a lot of her ladies, she took the road to Vesali, proceeding on foot from village to village until in due time she arrived at the Vihara in the Great Wood where the Buddha was staying.

Then, with her feet all swollen with her long walk, and with the dust of the road still upon her, sad and dejected, she stood weeping outside the Vihara. And Ananda saw her standing there in such a pitiful condition, and asked her what was the matter, why she was crying. And she answered: "It is because, O Ananda, the Blessed One will not allow women to retire from the household life and live the homeless life under His Doctrine and Discipline."

"If that is so, O daughter of the Gotama family," said Ananda, "wait a moment and I will plead with the Blessed One that He may be pleased to allow women to live under His Doctrine and Discipline the same as the Bhikkhus do."

And Ananda did as he promised Mahapajapati, and going into the room where the Buddha was, he humbly and respectfully asked the Buddha to have compassion on women and allow them to follow the homeless life under His guidance the same as men.

"Enough, Ananda, enough! Do not ask me any such thing!" was the Buddha's reply to him.

But Ananda was not in the least daunted or discouraged. A second time and a third time he asked the Buddha the very same thing, and each time he received the very same answer.

Then Ananda thought to himself: "The Blessed One will not give permission for women to withdraw from household life under Him when He is asked direct; but perhaps He may give permission if He is approached in another way."

So he said to his Master:

"If women were to be allowed, Reverend Lord, to retire from the household life and follow the life of homelessness under the Doctrine and Discipline of the Tathagata, would they be able to reach the four stages, one after another, of the Path of Holiness that leads to the Deathless, to Nibbana?"

"Yes, Ananda," was the Buddha's reply, "if women were to withdraw from household life and follow my Doctrine and Discipline, they could reach Nibbana in this life, they could become Arahans."

"If that is so," said Ananda, "consider, Reverend Lord, what a great benefactress Mahapajapati of the Gotama family, has been. She is the sister of the mother of the Blessed One; and as foster-mother as nurse, as giver of mother's milk, she reared and nurtured the Blessed One when His own mother died. Pray, Reverend Lord, allow women to withdraw from household life and live the homeless life under the Doctrine and Discipline made known to the world by the Tathagata."

"Well, Ananda," said the Buddha, "if Mahapajapati of the Gotama family is willing to accept and keep strictly these eight rules, let this be considered as her ordination."

And then the Buddha went on to tell Ananda that every women who wished to follow His Discipline must show respect to any Bhikkhu no matter how lately he may have been in the Order or how long she may have been in the Order, and she must not live in any district where there are no Bhikkhus, must listen to an admonition from an appointed Bhikkhu every Sabbath day, must invite criticism of her behavior both from Bhikkhus and Bhikkunis at the end of each Vassa, if guilty of a serious offense must do penance towards both Bhikkhus and Bhikkunis, must spend a period of testing as a novice for two years before being fully ordained by a chapter composed of both Bhikkhus and Bhikkhunis, must not speak evil in any way about any Bhikkhu, and must not officially administer admonition to a Bhikkhu but must accept such admonition from a Bhikkhu.

"If Ananda," said the Buddha in conclusion, "Mahapajapati is willing to obey these eight rules and to keep them as long as she lives, then she may consider herself ordained as a female Bhikkhu or Bhikkhuni."

Then Ananda took leave of the Buddha and went and told Mahapajapati all that the Buddha had said. And Mahapajapati, glad and happy, answered Ananda:

"O Ananda, Reverend Sir, just as a young woman or young man, fond of personal adornment, having bathed their head and got a wreath of beautiful, sweet-smelling flowers, would lift it up with both hands and place it on their head, on that, the noblest part of the body, even so do I, O Ananda, Reverend Sir, take up these eight rules, never to break them as long as my life shall last."

Then Ananda went back to where the Buddha was, and greeting his Master respectfully, he spoke to Him and said: "Mahapajapati of the Gotama family, Reverend Lord, accepts the eight strict rules laid upon her by the Blessed One. The sister of the mother of the Blessed One is now ordained a Bhikkhuni."

But the Buddha said:

"Ananda, not for long will this Doctrine and Discipline of mine endure among women who withdraw from the household life. Only for five hundred years will it so endure, Ananda, just as families in which there are many women and few men, do not long hold out against thieves and robbers, so where women take to the homeless life under a Doctrine and Discipline like mine, it does not long endure. It will be with it as with a field of rice or sugar-cane when mildew falls on it: it will not flourish very long."

And things happened exactly as the Buddha had foreseen. The proper ordination of women Bhikkhus or, as they are correctly called, Bhikkhunis, died out about five hundred years after Mahapajapati thus became the first Bhikkhuni in the world, there being no longer any Bhikkhunis then living who had been ten years in the Order and so able to confer ordination properly.

* * *

Chapter XIV

WONDER-WORKING

As the Buddha went wandering here and there about the country along with His Bhikkhus, everywhere He went the people came in crowds to see Him and to hear Him teach and preach, and many were converted to belief in Him and in His Doctrine. But there were also going about the country in the same way that He did, other religious teachers; and some of these, by doing very wonderful and extraordinary things, sometimes attracted many people to go and see them do such things. And then these people stayed and listened to their preaching, and sometimes believed in what they preached and became their followers. Now when the Buddha's Bhikkhus saw what was happening in this way, they went to their Master and asked Him if He, too, would not do some wonderful and extraordinary thing just to show the simple jungle people that He was not inferior to these other religious teachers they were admiring because of the wonderful things they could do, and so induce them to follow Him instead of the other religious teachers.

But the Buddha answered the Bhikkhus who asked Him this, that He would be ashamed to attract people to listen to Him and believe in Him just because, He could do something extraordinary that would make them gape with astonishment, something of the nature of what they would call a miracle. "The only miracle," said the Buddha, "which the Tathagatas perform is this -- that when they find a man full of passion and craving, they leave him free from passion and craving. When they find a man a slave to anger and hatred, they leave him delivered from anger and hatred. When they find a man blinded with delusion and ignorance, they open his eyes and leave him rid of delusion and ignorance. This is the only miracle They perform. Any other miracle They loathe and despise and shun."

But now some one came and told the Buddha that Moggallana, by the use of extraordinary power which he possessed more than any other of the Arahans, had gone up to a high place difficult to get at, and from it had brought down a very fine, specially good bowl which a certain man had put on that high place in order to test Moggallana's power and see if he would be able to go there and get it. But the Buddha was very much displeased to hear about this that Moggallana had been doing; and He sent for Moggallana and told him to bring with him the bowl he had got in this way by the exercise of his abnormal powers. And when Moggallana came with the bowl, the Buddha took it from his hand and broke it into pieces before Moggallana and all the assembled Bhikkhus, and strictly charged him that he must never on any account do such a thing again as show off his powers, and that none of His Bhikkhus must ever do any kind of wonderful thing just to make simple ignorant people admire at them: or if they did, then they must at once leave His Brotherhood of Bhikkhus; they could not be allowed to remain with Him as His followers. And this particular command of the Buddha about wonderworking remains to this day as one of the Vinaya rules for the breaking of which a Bhikkhu is at once put out of the Order and cannot be taken back into it. For a Bhikkhu to perform, or even claim to be able to perform, any supernormal feat, is a Parajika or Great Offense, as seriously looked upon as murder or theft or unchastity; and if he does such a thing he must leave the Order at once.

Thus, the Buddha never tried to astonish the people by doing any wonderful deeds and after this affair with Moggallana, neither he nor any other of the Bhikkhus ever tried to do any. Yet in spite of this, the people clearly saw and felt that the Buddha was a great teacher, and they showed their respect and veneration for Him wherever He went, by providing plentifully for the wants of Himself and His company of Bhikkhus who went about everywhere with Him. And many of the followers of the other religious teachers did not like to see this at all. They were very much annoyed to see how the people went to these new yellow-robed ascetics of the Sakya ascetic Gotama to hear them preach and to give them the best of fool and medicines, while they neglected them and their teachers.

Thus, once when the Buddha and His Bhikkhus came to the town of Kosambi where there lives a well-known religious teacher along with a large company of disciples, these latter began to abuse and revile the Bhikkhus and followers of the Buddha in the most outrageous manner, calling them all sorts of abusive and wicked names.

Then Ananda came to the Buddha and told his Master what these other ascetics were saying about the Buddha's Bhikkhus, and how they used the most shameful language about them, and heaped the coarsest abuse upon them whenever they met them anywhere, but especially when they met them going out with their begging-bowls to collect alms of food. And on behalf of all the Bhikkhus who had asked him to speak to the Buddha about the matter, he asked the Buddha if He did not think it would be better for Him and them to leave Kosambi and go some-where else where they would not have to listen to such abuse every day when they went out begging.

The Buddha quietly listened to all Ananda had to say. Then He spoke and said:

"But suppose, Ananda, that we are ill-treated and abused in the next place we go, what shall we do then?"

"Then we shall go to some other place," said Ananda.

"And if we are reviled and miscalled in that new place too, what shall we do then?"

"Then we shall go to some other place," replied Ananda.

The Buddha sat silent for a little while; then, with a gently glance at Ananda, He said:

"O Ananda, a little patience properly exercised now, will save us all the trouble of so much moving about. We cannot say for certain that we shall find the peace we want in any new place we may go to; but we are sure to find it just where we are, if only we practice patience. By patience and forbearance those that are wise overcome all their enemies. Look at the elephant, that men use in war, Ananda. He plunges into the thick of the fighting and pays no attention to the darts and arrows and javelins that are hurled at him from all sides, but rushes on, sweeping away everything from before him. And I, Ananda, am going to imitate that elephant. I shall stay here in this town and preach my excellent doctrine with all my force and power, and labor without ceasing to deliver wretched men from the net of passion in which they are entangled and caught fast. I shall not pay the least attention to the abuse these other ascetics hurl at me and my disciples. Like men, who spit up at the sky thinking they are going to dirty it only to find that their spit does not touch the sky at all or dirty it, but only falls back on and dirties themselves, so these poor men who spit abuse at us will only find their abuse come back on themselves, if we pay no attention to it."

So, notwithstanding the request and wishes of Ananda and all the other Bhikkhus, the Buddha still stayed on at Kosambi; and the good result of His practice of patience and forbearance was soon seen. For when the people of Kosambi saw how meekly He and His Bhikkhus endured the bad language of the other ascetics without ever answering them back in the same way they became displeased with the other ascetics for abusing men who never abused them. And many of the young men of Kosambi admired the behavior of the Buddha and His Bhikkhus in this respect so much, that they became His followers and joined the Order of Bhikkhus.

Unfortunately, however, these Kosambi youths did not, in becoming Bhikkhus, at once get rid of their quarrelsome dispositions, and very soon they were involved in a bitter dispute among themselves about some small point in what they considered correct Bhikkhu behavior. Some maintained one thing and some maintained another, and although the Buddha repeatedly admonished them to live at peace with one another and not quarrel, they still kept on wrangling. They paid no attention to the Buddha when He told them that quarreling and ill-will were greater evils than the little fault in behavior about which all their disputing arose. So when the Buddha saw that they were not going to listen to Him or take His advice, He went away from Kosambi by Himself, leaving all the Bhikkhus there behind Him. Then the people of Kosambi, when they saw that the Great Teacher had gone away by Himself, and that the Bhikkhus He had left behind were behaving just like common worldly people who had not left the household life t become ascetics, quarreling and wrangling no different from householders they stopped putting any food in the bowls of the quarrelsome Bhikkhus when they came round begging in the mornings. This step very quickly brought the squabbling Bhikkhus to their senses. They made up their quarrel; came to peace again with one another; and the Buddha once more allowed them to join Him, and go with Him wherever He went.

* * *

Chapter XV

DISCOURSES

As the son of a king, and so, accustomed to the manners of a royal court, the Buddha was perfectly at home, entirely at his ease, in the company of the greatest kings and warriors and priests, and could hold His own in conversation with any of them, even the most learned, and send them away pleased and delighted with what they had heard from Him. But He was equally as well able to speak in a manner common people could understand, and as He wandered about the country on foot, was always ready to talk to any one He happened to meet -- farmers, blacksmiths, wheelwrights, barbers, anybody who liked to speak to Him.

Thus, one day as he was traveling through a district covered with paddy fields, He fell in with a farmer at work in his field, and stopped and began talking to him about his cattle, and plowing, and seed, and about how he expected his crop to turn out this year. "You know," He said to the farmer, "I am a farmer, too, and I have got all the things needed for working my fields, and the seed as well."

"You a farmer!" said the surprised cultivator. "Where then have you left your bullocks, your plow, and the other things you need?"

"I have got them all with me here," said the Buddha calmly. "Listen to me, and I'll tell you all about it."

"My seed is the warm desire and feeling of compassion which caused me to resolve to become a Buddha, as also the knowledge which I obtained under the Bodhi Tree. The rain that watered my seed and made it grow richly and abundantly, was the constant good deeds I did until I became a Buddha. My knowledge is the yoke, and wisdom the shaft of my plow. My heart is the reins with which I guide my bullocks. My plowshares is the diligence with which I get rid of all evil things in me. The handle of my plow is the Doctrine which enables me to remove all that is bad and promote all that is good. When you go plowing, you cut up and overthrow all bad weeds; so he who has learned the Four Noble Truths cuts up and overthrows all evil inclinations within him. At night, when your day's work is done, you unyoke your bullocks and let them go wherever they like. In the same way the wise men, in cleaving to what is perfect, lets go whatever is not perfect. Your bullocks have to strain and toil in order to do their work of plowing your fields; and in the same way the wise man has to strive with all his strength, and turn over the soil of his own nature, so as to reach Nibbana. The cultivator works hard in order to prepare his field for the seed; and in the same way the wise man has to work hard to get rid of the ills of existence. But the man who works in the paddy fields is often disappointed in the size of the crops he gets as the outcome of his toil and sometimes he has to go hungry. But whoever works in the fields of wisdom, never is disappointed; he is sure to reap the full results of his labors; he is entirely happy, perfectly satisfied when he comes in sight of Nibbana. In this way it is, O farmer, that I am a farmer also. And this, too, is the way in which I do my work."

And the cultivator to whom the Buddha spoke this little sermon was so well pleased with it that he asked the Buddha there and then to accept him as a cultivator in the field of His Good Doctrine, and he became a follower of the Buddha for the rest of his life.

To another person who came to the Buddha and asked to be told the way in which common people might reach the best and happiest state, the state of Nibbana, the Buddha gave these simple instructions.

"Avoid the company of the foolish; cultivate the companionship of the wise. Show respect to those who are worthy of respect. Remain in a position that is in accordance with your abilities. Always perform meritorious deeds. Constantly aim at perfect behavior. Take pleasure in hearing and seeing all you can so as to acquire knowledge. Study everything that is not evil. Acquire a knowledge of what ought to be shunned. Speak only what is true, kindly and profitable. Be kind to, and support father and mother. Care for, and cherish wife and children. Resist temptation to do evil. Give alms. Observe the rules of right conduct. Assist relatives and friends when they are in need of assistance. Do nothing that is not permitted by the law of good. Abstain from intoxicating drinks or drugs. Do not be slow in doing good deeds when an opportunity to do them arises. Be courteous to all men. Be humble. Be easily satisfied. Acknowledge kindness received with gratitude. Listen to the preaching of the Doctrine in proper season. Be patient and forbearing. Take pleasure in profitable conversation. From time to time visit those who lead the holy life. Converse with them on religious subjects. Practice virtuous behavior. Bear in mind the Four Noble Truths. Keep ever before the mind's eye the goal of Nibbana. In the midst of every affliction, be unshaken, unperturbed, fearless, and composed. Who observes these perfect rules shall never be overcome by evil; he will always enjoy perfect peace of mind."

On another day when the Buddha was resting in a little village, the people of the place came to him and said:

"Reverend Sir, we know that you are a great religious teacher, and have taught much that is good to those disciples of your who follow you about and live the homeless life just as you do yourself. But we are not ascetics. We are just common folk who love our wives and children, and earn our living cultivating our fields and breeding cattle, and we take whatever innocent enjoyment comes our way. We use gold and silver. We like to ornament ourselves on holidays and feast days with jewelry and flowers. We use oils and perfumes to make our bodies pleasant to us. We follow the ordinary ways of the world. Now, Reverend Sir, if there is anything in your teaching that would be good for us to know, anything that would help us to be happy here and now as well as in the future, be pleased, Reverend Sir, to let us hear that part of your teaching, so that we may follow it and get the benefit of it."

"Well, villagers," said the Buddha, "there are four things which a teacher like myself has to teach which are good for you and everybody who is not an ascetic to know and observe. Listen, and I will tell you about them.

"First: Whatever may be the employment by which you earn your living, in that business you ought always to do your best to make yourselves efficient. If you are a farmer you should try to be a good farmer, and make your fields grow all they can. If you are a merchant you should try to be a wide-awake and enterprising merchant. If you are a servant you should try to be a reliable and trustworthy servant. Be active and energetic always so as to get the best and fullest results from what you do, whatever it may be. In this way you will acquire wealth and be able to do good with it -- to help any one who may need help. For it you do not acquire wealth by working for it, you will not be able to do good deeds and help others, for you will have nothing with which to help them.

"Second: You ought to take proper care of your wealth after you have got it, and not waste it in foolish ways. It is of no use to put water in a jar out of which it is allowed to run away again through a hold in the jar. It is good to get wealth, but it is every bit as necessary to see to it that when it is got it is not lost again in all sorts of foolish and wasteful ways.

"Third: People in worldly life should choose only good people for their friends and associates. People mostly become like the kind of people they mix with. If a man goes with good men, he has a good chance of becoming a good man himself. And if he goes with bad men, he is very likely to become bad too. You cannot touch black things without getting your fingers made black. So household folk should frequent the company of others who are good and wise and liberal and full of faith in what is good, and then they also will be likely to become good and wise and liberal and full of faith in what is good.

"Fourth: The householder should follow a regular and moderate way of living. He should not be extreme or extravagant in his way of life. He should not spend or give more than what he gets as income. If he does his wealth will be like a pond that has more streams running out of it than it has running into it. Such a pond very soon will run dry, and have no water in it at all. And very soon a man who pays out more then comes in to him, will have no more wealth. But if a man takes care to spend on himself and his family, or give away in charity, always a little less than his income, then the pond of his wealth will never run dry. There will always be some water, that is some wealth in it, for use when any sudden need for it arises. But this does not mean that he is not to make full use of his wealth. It does not mean that he is to heap it up and hide it away and not use it. A man who does that is like one who has a tree full of fruit in his garden, but instead of eating the fruit when it becomes ripe, puts it all away in a box to keep it there. Such a man will find that all his fruit will go rotten and he will get no good of it at all.

"These, then, O householders," said the Buddha in concluding this sermon, "are the four things that will promote your success and well-being in this world if you observe them. And now I will tell you what are the four things which will promote your best good in the future. They are, first: Faith in the teaching that the doing of good will bring good results, and the doing of evil, evil results. Second: The constant practice of good deeds, and the avoiding of evil deeds such as killing, stealing, lying, lewdness, and drinking intoxicating drinks. Third: The practice of liberality in giving so as to learn not to cling too closely to the things of the world. Fourth: The acquiring of wisdom so as to know and follow the path that leads to Nibbana."

Such was the sermon which the Lord Buddha delivered to these country villagers who wanted to know what ordinary household folk, not Bhikkhus or ascetics, could do to make sure of their well-being both here and hereafter. And they were all very much pleased with the plain practical advice which the Buddha gave them.

One of the longest discourses ever delivered was spoken, not to common folk nor yet to His Bhikkhus, but to no less a person than a king, King Ajatasattu of Magadha.

This King Ajatasattu was not a good man; he was, indeed, a murderer.

He caused his own father, King Bimbisara who had been one of the first friends of the Buddha when he became Buddha, to be starved to death, and in this cruel and unrighteous manner, came to the throne himself.

It happened that one night of the full moon, King Ajatasattu sitting on the terrace of his palace, did not know what to do for entertainment, and decided that he would go and visit the Buddha who was then staying in a garden not too far away that had been given to Him and His Bhikkhus by the good physician Jivaka. When the king got to where the Buddha was, he found Him sitting quietly with all his Bhikkhus round Him in the preaching hall. The king exchanged the usual greetings of courtesy with the Buddha, and after taking a seat, asked the Great Teacher if he could tell what was the benefit or advantage of living like an ascetic. "What profit is it to a man to live like a Bhikkhu?" said King Ajatasattu. [*] "I have asked several other leaders of ascetics this question, but I have never received a satisfying answer from any one of them. They always answered by telling me about something else I did not ask about. It was as if a person should enquire about bread-fruit, and in reply be told all about mangoes. So I shall be highly pleased, Reverend Sir, to hear what you will say in reply to this question of mine."

* [Read "The Fruits of the Homeless Life," by the author, or the Visible Fruits of a Buddhist Monk," by J. Wettha Singha.]

Then the Buddha, after a few words exchanged back and forth, proceeded to tell King Ajatasattu at great length all the benefits that come to a man both in this life and afterwards through becoming a Bhikkhu; and He did it so well that when He had ended His long discourse, Ajatasattu declared himself entirely satisfied that what the Buddha had answered was true, and that it was the best thing in the world to be a Bhikkhu if a man could be one, honestly and sincerely and follow so great and good a teacher as the Buddha. And he asked the Buddha to look upon him henceforth as a follower of His and not of any other religious teacher.

After the King had gone away again, the Buddha said to the Bhikkhus round Him:

"O Bhikkhus, this king was much moved in his mind just now as I was speaking to him. If, O Bhikkhus, this king had not done that evil deed, had not caused the death of his father the just king, there where he sat just now, he would have seen the Truth with clear eyes, and left his throne and everything behind him, and become a Bhikkhu and an Arahan."

This, the longest sermon the Buddha ever spoke can be read in its complete form in the Digha Nikaya of the Sutta Pitaka. It is called the Samannaphala Sutta, or the Discourse concerning the fruit of the life of an ascetic.

And here is the shortest sermon the Lord Buddha ever delivered;

Some one once asked the Buddha: "What is the best thing anybody can give as alms? What thing has the best taste? What thing gives the most pleasure? What thing is best fitted to bring passion to and end?" And the Buddha replied to all these four questions with just this one word: "Dhamma."

Of course His questioner then asked Him to explain a little more what He meant; and the Buddha then said:

"The giving of alms, though it is a good thing to do, cannot by itself bring a man on to the Path that leads to Deliverance: only the Dhamma can do this. Therefore the making known of the Dhamma, the trouble a man takes to give a knowledge of the Dhamma to others -- this is the best kind of giving, this is the best kind of alms.

"Also, through learning the Dhamma, the heart is filled with joy and the mind delighted with its sweet taste, because it destroys all those passions in men which cause them suffering, and brings them at last to the final end of all sufferings -- to supreme Nibbana. Therefore the Dhamma is the most sweet tasting of all things, and the most pleasing of all things, and the best thing in the world for putting passion to an end. And so, my disciples, preach the Dhamma to all mankind, and thus you will be giving the very best of alms to all beings that live on the earth or in the heavens."

* * *

Chapter XVI

THE KINDNESS OF THE BUDDHA

Upon one occasion when the Buddha was known to be going to deliver a discourse in a village where, He had rested overnight, a poor farmer, a Brahmin, living near by, made up his mind to be present and hear the Great Teacher speak. But to his dismay, on the morning of the day when the Buddha was to preach, he found that one of his bullocks was amissing. He was only a poor man and could not afford to lose it, so he set off at once into the jungle all round to look for it, hoping that he would soon find it, and be able to get back to the village before the time when the preaching was to begin.

But the bullock had wandered further away than he expected; and although he made all the haste he could searching here, there and everywhere, wherever he thought his bullock might have got to, it was some time after mid-day before he found it and got back to the village. He was very hungry and very tired with running about all the morning under the hot sun, but he did not want to miss hearing the Great Teacher speak, so without waiting to take a rest or get anything to eat, he hurried to the place where the Buddha was, hoping he would still be in time to hear the end of the sermon at least. But when he got to the preaching place what was his surprise to find that the sermon had not even begun. There in the preaching hall the Buddha sat silent with all the people round Him patiently waiting for Him to begin. Pleased and thankful to find that he was still in time, the farmer crept quietly in at the back of the hall to look for a seat there.

But as soon as he came in at the door, the Buddha saw him, and kindly asked him if he had had anything to eat. The farmer replied that he had only just come back from looking for a bullock he had lost, and he had not stopped to eat anything because he did not want to miss the sermon.

On hearing this, the Buddha ordered one of His supporters near Him to give the farmer some food and He would wait for him to finish his breakfast before beginning the sermon. Then when the farmer had satisfied his hunger and taken a seat near Him, the Buddha began His discourse; and the farmer knew that the Buddha had somehow heard that he wanted to hear Him preach, and had sat silent in the preaching hall keeping everybody waiting until he should arrive.

Some of the people and the Bhikkhus thought it was very strange and not quite right that the Buddha should concern Himself about the food of a person who was only a householder, not a Bhikkhu, and not even a follower of His at all, but a Brahmin. But the Buddha's kindness and thoughtfulness for the Brahmin who wanted so much to hear Him preach was well rewarded, for the Brahmin's heart was touched by the Buddha's consideration for him, and when the sermon was over he became the Buddha's follower for the rest of his life.

On another occasion the Buddha again showed His kind consideration for common people this time for a young girl.

In the town near which He then was staying there lived a weaver with one daughter who used to help him with his work. This girl was very anxious to hear the Buddha preach, but on the very day when the Buddha was to give His discourse it happened that she and her father had an urgent piece of work which they had to get finished that very day for an important customer. So the girl made up her mind to hurry with her part of the work, so that she might be able both to finish it and also hear the Great Teacher's sermon. Instantly she set to her task and wound up all her yarn on a quill and took it along, intending to carry it to the shed where her father had his loom. But on the way to the shed she had to pass near the place where the crowd sat motionless waiting for the words that were to fall from the Teacher's lips. And the girl laid her quill of yarn down and timidly took a seat behind the last row of the assembled congregation. But the Buddha saw that the young girl was ready to understand and follow His teaching; and He called to her to come nearer where she could hear better so that she might not miss anything He said. The girl came forward, and, to put her at ease, the Buddha encouragingly asked her where she was coming from and where she was going to. The young girl, thus questioned, replied that she knew where she was coming from and also where she was going to, "but at the same time," said she, "I am ignorant, Reverend Sir, of the place where I came from, and the place to which I am going."

When the people present heard her give this strange answer to the Buddha's question, they became very indignant, for they thought she was trying to make fun of the Great Teacher, and they began to murmur and talk about putting her out of the hall for what they thought her gross impertinence. But the Buddha saw what the young girl was really thinking about in making this strange reply to His question, and He told the people to keep still. Then, turning to the girl, He asked her what she meant. And the girl spoke and said:

"I know that I was coming from my father's house, and that I was going to our weaving-shed. But what existence I have come from into this present existence -- that I do not know at all. Neither am I sure about the existence that will follow after this one. Of these two things I am quite ignorant. My mind can discover nothing about either the one or the other."

Then the Buddha and every one present praised the wisdom and insight of the young girl; and the Buddha began His sermon. And when it was finished, the young girl having listened eagerly and attentively to it all, she became one who has taken the first step on the Higher Path; she became what is called a Sotapanna -- that is, one who has entered the stream that eventually, without fail, will carry her on to Nibbana.

On another day as the Buddha was walking through a wood, He happened to come upon a deer struggling in a snare that had been set by a hunter. The Buddha at once went forward and released the struggling animal and let it run away. Then He sat down under a tree near by to rest. And by and by the hunter came along, and saw at a glance that a deer had been caught in his snare, and that somebody had released it, letting it get away again. And when he looked round to see who it might be, his eye fell on the ascetic dressed all in yellow, who was sitting under a tree near by. The hunter knew at once that this must be the person who had caused him to lose his deer. "There are getting to be too many of these holy men," he said to himself in great anger. "They are always sneaking about everywhere spoiling honest men's business with their pious ways." And in his rage he lifted his bow, fitted an arrow to the bowstring, and taking good aim at the Buddha who meanwhile sat perfectly quite, let fly. "I am going now to make one less of them anyway," said the hunter. But his hand trembled so much as he took aim at this so strangely serene ascetic, that his arrow missed. Never in his life before had he missed anything he aimed at so close, and full of anger, at himself now he aimed another arrow at the Lord Buddha, and missed again. Astounded at his sudden poor skill in shooting, once more he shot an arrow at the Buddha and once more missed. Then, with a feeling very much like fear, he dropped his bow and arrows, and going up to the Buddha, humbly asked Him who He was.

The Buddha told him, and then very mildly and gently began to talk to him about the evil of taking life which it is so very easy to take, but so very hard to give back again once it is taken. And the hunter listened to the Lord Buddha's words, and was so much impressed by them, that he there and them promised never again to kill any living thing at all, but henceforth, as the Buddha wished him to do, earn his living in some way that did not involve the hurting of any living creature.

Another man who took life and was turned from that evil way of doing by the Buddha was called Angulimala. The life that this man took, however, was human life. And he had received his name of Angulimala, which means garland of fingers, because he had killed ninety-nine people and cut a finger off each person he killed, and strung it on a chain of fingers that he had hung around his neck. And now he was waiting by the roadside for another person to come along whom he also meant to kill, so as to get the hundredth finger he wanted for his ghastly necklace. And it happened that the Buddha came along the road as he was waiting thus. He thought it was just an ordinary ascetic, and he meant to kill Him and get the hundredth finger he wanted.

And he too, Angulimala, just like the hunter, three times tried to get at the Buddha to kill Him, and three times, just like the hunter, he failed. Then, very much astonished, he went up to the Buddha and began to speak to Him. And the Buddha did not utter a single word of reproach to him for trying to kill Him, but instead, told him about the Doctrine. And after thus hearing about the Doctrine from the Buddha's own lips, Angulimala confessed his wickedness in killing so many people, and became a Bhikkhu. And not long after, through diligent study and practice he became an Arahan.

But this did not free him from having to suffer the consequences of his evil deeds. For, when he went into the town of Savatthi with his begging bowl to gather alms of food, the people of the town pelted him with stones and hurt him so severely that in a short time he died. But he was not dejected or sorrowful at this that had happened to him. Neither was he angry at all at the people who had stoned him. He knew quite well that he was only suffering the results of his own ill deeds, and that it was far better to suffer like this at once and be done with it, than to have the consequences of his wrong-doing always hanging over his head in the future. So Angulimala died calmly and serenely and passed away to Nibbana.

* * *

Chapter XVII

DEVADATTA

The Buddha had one disciple whom He particularly loved, and who in return, had a specially warm affection for his Master, and that was His own cousin Ananda. Indeed, when the Buddha had reached the age of fifty-one and was beginning to feel the burden of His advancing years, He chose Ananda to be His special private attendant, giving out through Ananda any orders He wished made known to the other Bhikkhus.

The other Bhikkhus also, when they wished to see the Buddha about any special matter, always asked first through Ananda. And often, when there was something they wanted from the Buddha which they did feel very sure they would not get if they asked for it themselves, they used to get Ananda to ask it from the Buddha on their behalf, for they knew that He was fond of Ananda and would be more likely to do what they wanted if Ananda spoke in favor of it.

But the Buddha had another cousin who also had become a Bhikkhu under Him, but in his disposition towards is teacher and master, was the very opposite of Ananda. Far from taking delight in waiting upon the Buddha and serving Him faithfully, he was envious and jealous of Him, and wished to break up the Brotherhood of Bhikkhus He gathered round Him.

The evil-disposed cousin of the Buddha was Devadatta. Being of the royal family of Kapilavatthu, he was inclined to be proud of himself and of the royal blood in his veins. So when, some time after he had become a Bhikkhu, Sariputta and Moggallana joined the Order, and on account of their great learning and ability, every one began to take much notice of them and call them "the right and the left hand of the Buddha," Devadatta became very jealous of them now, and annoyed and angry at the attention received by these two Bhikkhus who had not been in the Order as long as he, and were just of a common family while he was of royal blood and the Buddha's cousin to boot. Indeed, Devadatta became so angry at what he considered the unjust neglect of himself in favor of these two new-comers, that he left the company of Bhikkhus who went with the Buddha everywhere He went, and set off for Rajagaha where he expected to make friends with the young Prince Ajatasattu the son of King Bimbisara of Magadha, and heir to the throne. When he got to Rajagaha he put on a look of great gravity and solemnity, so that young Prince Ajatasattu was quite struck with his appearance, and thought: "How serious and solemn he looks. This must be a very good Bhikkhu indeed!" And in his great admiration for the serious-looking Devadatta, he built for him a fine Vihara near the city, and Devadatta took up his residence there, and the Prince became his obedient and devoted supporter.

Time passed; and a few years after this, when, in the course of His continual wanderings, the Buddha came again to Rajagaha, Devadatta went to pay Him a visit, and asked to be allowed to form a company of Bhikkhus of his own, separate from those who accepted the Buddha as their Master. The Buddha, however, refused to give Devadatta the permission he asked for, saying that it was not a good thing for the Sangha to be divided. But Devadatta was bent upon having his own way, and he asked and asked again for permission to have a Sangha of his own, but each time the Buddha refused to grant him his wish.

Then Devadatta's jealousy and envy turned to bitter hatred of the Buddha, and he made up his mind to start a Sangha of his own whether the Buddha gave him permission to do so or not. In this resolve of his he succeeded in getting Prince Ajatasattu to support him; but the Prince's father, King Bimbisara, altogether refused to have anything to do with his plan for a new Sangha, and firmly took the side of the Buddha in the matter.

And now Devadatta, pretending to be very pious and strict in his life, worked his way completely into the confidence of Prince Ajatasattu, and gained such an influence over him that he was ready to do anything Devadatta told him to do. And when Devadatta saw that he could do anything he liked with Ajatasattu, he told him to put his father out of the way, and then he himself would be the King of Magadha and be able to do what he pleased with no one to hinder him, and he could help him, Devadatta, to carry out his scheme for a new Sangha. And Ajatasattu did what his evil counselor Devadatta thus advised him to do, but not suddenly with an arrow or a sword, for he still felt afraid to shed his father's blood. Yet he did kill his father, and in a very cruel way. For he caused his father to be captured and shut up in a prison and given no food, so that King Bimbisara died a slow miserable death by starvation, in spite of all his grief-stricken wife did to try to get the jailers to take food to him. It was in the thirty-seventh year of the Buddha's preaching career that Ajatasattu did this cruel deed, and took the throne of Magadha in the place of his father Bimbisara whom he thus murdered.

Devadatta now had all the power he wanted. The new king of the country was his devoted friend and supporter, and would do anything for him that he asked him to do. So, very soon, he got King Ajatasattu to gather together for him a band of bowmen and he paid them well to go where the Buddha was staying, and shoot the Buddha dead. But when these hired assassins came to the place where the Buddha was, and saw him sitting there so calm, so mild, and yet so majestic looking, they simply could not do what they had come to do, and had been well paid to do. Completely over-awed by the bearing and manner of the Great Teacher, instead of letting loose their arrows at Him, they came up to Him and sat down at His feet in an attitude of reverence and worship. And the Buddha began to talk to them; and after a little they confessed what they had come to do and asked Him to forgive them for their evil intention. Of course the Buddha pardoned them at once, and they promised to Him that they would be His followers for all the remainder of their lives.

But when Devadatta learned that the men he had sent out to kill the Buddha, instead of killing Him, had actually become His followers, he was furious with rage, and resolved next time not to send any one else but to go himself and take the Buddha's life.

Now there was a hill near the palace where the Buddha was staying, and the Buddha used often to take a walk along a path at its foot. So one evening as the Buddha was taking a walk along this road, Devadatta who was all the time on the look out for a good chance to kill Him, without being seen by the Buddha climbed up the hill to a place just above the road, where there was a big rock. Devadatta loosened this rock from the soil round it, and waited till the Buddha was passing right below it. Then he gave the rock a big push and sent it rolling and bounding down the hill-side intending it to fall on the Buddha and crush Him to a jelly. But as the rock was rolling down straight for the Buddha's head, it struck against another big one that happened to lie in its way, and instead of falling straight on the Buddha's head, it broke into a lot of little pieces, and only one little splinter of it struck the Buddha on the foot and lamed Him for a little while. But it did not hurt Him very much, and He was able to walk back to the Vihara. And when He got there, the good and skillful physician Jivaka, put a bandage on it with some healing ointment, and by the next morning the foot was quite well again. So once more Devadatta was defeated in his evil designs.

But he was not yet finished with his endeavors to bring about the death of the Great Teacher. He was going to make one more attempt to get the Buddha out of the way so that he himself might be the leader whom the Bhikkhus would follow. For that was what he thought. He thought that if once the Buddha was dead, then he would become the leader of the Sangha, and all of the Bhikkhus would follow him as their master.

This time he arranged that when the Buddha went out as He did every morning through the streets of Rajagaha begging alms of food, a wild raging elephant should be let loose in the particular street where He was at the time, so that it might rush at Him and trample Him to death. And this was done. The raging elephant was brought to the street where the Buddha was then engaged in passing quietly from door to door begging His morning meal, and then let loose. But instead of rushing at the Buddha and crushing Him under its huge hoofs, it became quite quiet and subdued, and allowed the calm figure in the yellow robe to pass on unharmed. Thus for the third time the attempt of Devadatta to bring about the Buddha's death was defeated.

Devadatta now gave up the idea of killing the Buddha, after failing these three times; but he was still as determined as ever, one way or another to bring about a break in the Sangha. So now he went to visit the Buddha, and pretending to be friendly with Him, told Him that he thought the Bhikkhus did not live strictly enough; he thought it would be better if they lived a harder life like the ascetic followers of other religious teachers, because the common people were inclined to look down on the Buddha's Bhikkhus saying that they seemed to have rather an easy and comfortable life, compared with other ascetics.

Devadatta therefore suggested to the Buddha that He should make it a strict and fixed Vinaya rule that all His Bhikkhus henceforth should live no longer in any kind of roofed dwelling, but should sleep at night at the foot of a tree in the jungle, or in some open place without a roof. He also wanted the Buddha to order his Bhikkhus not to eat food specially prepared for them and brought to them in the place where they were staying, but to live strictly on such food as they got when round begging with their bowls, and to eat nothing else. Devadatta also wanted the Buddha to command the Bhikkhus not to wear any of the neat, clean, ready-made robes which the people used to give them, but only to cover their bodies with robes which they themselves had put together out of rags picked up on refuse-heaps and in tombs and burial places. And last he wanted the Buddha to make it a fixed rule that His Bhikkhus should not eat fish or meat of any kind. These four things Devadatta wished the Buddha to make binding rules of the Vinaya, which every member of His Sangha would have to observe or leave the Order.

The Buddha, however, flatly refused to make any one of these rules he suggested a binding command upon His Bhikkhus. "But," the Buddha said, "if any Bhikkhu wishes to live always at the foot of trees or in places open to the sky, he can do so. But those who do not wish to do this, may live in places provided for them by benefactors, so long as they are not built too close to houses where the lay people live." And the Buddha said the same about the other three rules proposed by Devadatta. He said that any of his Bhikkhus who wished to do so, could live solely on what was put into their begging bowl when they went through the streets for alms, wear only what robes they made for themselves out of dirty, cast-off rags, and abstain from eating fish and meat. But those who did not wish to observe such practices, need not do so unless they liked. And the Buddha ended by warning Devadatta that he must not try in this cunning way to cause a split in the Sangha, or in the end the consequences would be very had for him.

But, paying no heed to the Buddha's warning, Devadatta went away disappointed and angry, and going to Ananda, tried to get him to side with his views about having a stricter rule for the Bhikkhus. But Ananda refused to agree with him and sided with his Master the Buddha.

Then Devadatta went away to a part of the country where the Bhikkhus had not seen the Buddha for a long time, and succeeded in winning over a lot of them to believe in him and in his new rules for the Sangha. But the Buddha came to hear of this. And one afternoon when Devadatta was asleep in his Vihara, He sent Sariputta to Devadatta's place to speak to the Bhikkhus who had gone wrong and were following Devadatta, and tell them what the Buddha had really said on the matter. And Sariputta did as his Master told him, and spoke to the erring Bhikkhus so well that in a little while they said they wanted to be the Buddha's disciples again; and they all rose up and followed Sariputta back to the Buddha's Vihara.

When Devadatta woke again from his sleep that afternoon he thought the Vihara seemed strangely quiet as if there were nobody in it, and he went out to see what was the matter. And when he went out he found that there was not a single Bhikkhu about the place. And soon he learned that Sariputta had been there while he was sleeping, and had spoken to his Bhikkhus, so that now they had all left him, every one, and gone back to the Buddha. Then Devadatta was filled with rage and fury and ordered his servants to prepare his litter and take him at once to the Buddha's Vihara; he was going to see what the Buddha meant by taking all his disciples from him.

But when Sariputta and the other Bhikkhus heard of Devadatta's rage, and that he was on his way to the Buddha's Vihara, they advised the Buddha to go away, for they feared that when Devadatta came, this time for sure he would kill the Buddha in his fury. But the Buddha was not in the least disturbed at the news that Devadatta was coming, and told Sariputta that he knew that Devadatta could not do Him any harm. "But he is full of anger at the Blessed One," said Sariputta; and again he urged his Master to save Himself while there was time, for Devadatta was coming nearer. But the Buddha still refused to move saying again that He felt quite safe against anything Devadatta could do.

And the Buddha proved to be right. For the next thing the Bhikkhus heard was that Devadatta's bearers had stopped on the way. Then came the news that Devadatta was dead. And it was quite true. Death struck down Devadatta himself at the very time, when he was on his way to bring death to the Buddha.

After this there was no more trouble in the Sangha as long as the Buddha was alive. The only distressing thing that happened in connection with the Buddha was that the king and the princes of the royal houses of Kapilavatthu and of Kosala, both were all killed in war by the cruel Ajatasattu, after once before having been saved from that fate by the efforts of the Buddha. This blotting out of the Buddha's family happened in the year before that in which He Himself passed away into Nibbana.

* * *

Chapter XVIII

MAHAPARINIBBANA

The Lord Buddha now began to feel that His days in this world were coming to a close; but before He passed away He wished to give His Bhikkhus some last advice which should serve to guide them in their general conduct after He was gone and could advise and guide them no more with His living voice. So He told Ananda to gather the Bhikkhus together in the Preaching Hall at Rajagaha; and when all the Bhikkhus had assembled, He addressed them as follows:

"O Bhikkhus, as long as you remain united and meet together frequently, so long the Sangha will continue to flourish and prosper. So long as you meet together and decide all important questions in union and harmony one with another, and do not make new and oppressive rules, hard to keep, where I have made none, but strictly adhere to the observance of those rules which I have given you for your help and protection -- so long as you do this, the Sangha will never decay and die out.

"Always treat with respect those who have been longer in the Sangha than yourselves, and pay attention to their counsel and admonition. Be ever on the watch against the beginnings of anything that tends to evil in order that you may not become the slaves of evil before you are aware. Do not seek company: seek solitude. When Bhikkhus from other places come to visit you, attend to their wants and treat them well and hospitably. When any among you are sick, let the others wait upon them and care for them. He who thus waits upon and cares for a sick brother, it is the same as if he waited upon and cared for me. Shun pride vain show. Seek the companionship of the good; avoid the company of the bad. Think and reflect frequently upon the nature of all things here, that they do not last, that they cause suffering to him who clings closely to them, that they are empty of any solid substance."

"So long as you do these things and follow the rules of conduct I have given you for your guidance, you will always be respected and esteemed by the householders and everyone, and the Sangha will prosper, and you will be safe from falling into anything low and vulgar and ignoble, you will be shielded from everything unbecoming, everything unworthy of those who have left the household life to live in homelessness."

This was the last sermon the Buddha preached to the whole Sangha.

After this, He went to the city of Nalanda, and then to the city of Patali; and at this latter place He preached this His last sermon to the householder folk.

"Dayakas, whoever breaks the precepts of right conduct which I have taught for the guidance of householders, or is careless and slack in his observance of them, such a person will lose his good name among men, and his well-being and happiness in this world will grow less and less, and finally dwindle away and disappear altogether. He will have no certainty, he will feel no confidence of mind, but, wretched and unhappy, at death he will pass away to a fate of misery and suffering.

"But those who faithfully keep these precepts of good conduct which I have laid down, those who are not careless in the observance of them, such persons will gain honor and enjoy a high reputation among men. They will enjoy health and wealth and all prosperity. They will be welcomed wherever they may go. They will be received with pleasure even in the company of the great, among princes and king's counselors, among the good and the learned and the wise. Their minds will be free from any kind of doubt or anxiety; and after death they will pass to a state of happiness."

And now the Buddha is getting to be an old man. He is eighty years of age. For nearly forty-five years He has been traveling about on foot up and down His native land of India, teaching and preaching without any rest except during the rainy season of each year. And now He is feeling His years. He is weary and worn out in body, though His mind remains as strong as ever. He feels that He is not going to live much longer, and His thoughts turn to the north, towards the lands that lie at the foot of the great snowy mountains, where His youthful days were passed. It is in that country that He wishes to pass away from the world He has served so ungrudgingly these many years. So, leaving Rajagaha. He turns His now feeble steps northwards, intending to go to the little town of Kusinara, and there await death. On the way to it, He passes through the city that is now called Patna, and then, still going north, through the rich town of Vesali where He once was splendidly entertained by the courtesan Ambapali, and given a Vihara by her, much to the annoyance of the young princes of the place who wanted to have the honor of doing this themselves.

When He had arrived at the little village of Beluva, He sent away all the Bhikkhus who had been coming with Him so far, all except his faithful attendant Ananda, who never left Him night or day, telling the other Bhikkhus that they had better spend the Vassa or rainy season at some place where they would have a better chance of getting support than a little place like Beluva which could not provide food for so many of them. So most of the Bhikkhus went back to Vesali to spend the rainy season near that large and rich city.

Meanwhile, the Buddha resolved to spend this last Vassa of His life at Beluva. But He had not been staying there very long when He was seized with severe illness accompanied by violent pain. And the sickness increased and the pain grew worse until Ananda began to think that his Master was going to die. But the Buddha did not want to die at Beluva. He did not want to die until He had seen His Bhikkhus once more and encouraged them and strengthened them in the good life they are trying to live. So, with a great effort of will, He managed to master His sickness, being determined to live and see and speak to His Bhikkhus once more before He passed away. And after a time, feeling better again, He went outside and took a seat on the shady side of the little house He was living in, out of the hot sun, on a mat Ananda had made ready for Him. And Ananda sat down near Him and said:

"How glad I am to see that the Blessed One is better again! I almost fainted away when I saw how ill the Blessed One was a little while ago. I very nearly swooned. But then I thought: 'No, most surely the Blessed One will not pass away to Nibbana till He has left full instructions about the future of the Sangha, and how it is to be conducted when He is gone.'"

"But Ananda," said the Buddha, "what more can the Bhikkhus ask of me? I have taught them the whole doctrine; I have not hidden from them anything they ought to know in order to be able to reach Nibbana. I have been a faithful teacher to them, and told them all they need to know so that they may bring suffering to an end. One who wanted to rule the Sangha and keep it under his own control, might well leave orders about its future government. But I, Ananda, do not wish to rule over the Sangha, or to keep it under My control. What instructions then, should I leave about its future? I am now an old man, feeble and worn out. My days are at an end. I am eighty years of age. I have only one thing I want to say to you all. Be to yourselves your own light. Be to yourselves your own refuge. Do not go looking for any other light or refuge. Whoever, Ananda, when I am gone shall be to himself his own light, his own refuge, looking for no other light or refuge -- whosoever shall take the truth I have taught as his light and his refuge -- that disciple, Ananda, now and always will be my true disciple, will be walking in the right way."

Next morning the Buddha was feeling so well again that He was able to go into Vesali on His usual begging round; and in the evening He sent Ananda to bring the Bhikkhus who were living in Vesali to Him, so that He might speak to them all once more.

When the Bhikkhus had all come, He exhorted them earnestly, as His last parting admonition to them, to follow faithfully the good way He had taught them, for the sake of the world, for the sake of the benefit, the advantage, the welfare of the world of men which need to have kept before it the example of the holy life, perfect and pure. "All that belongs to this world is changeable and unlasting," He said. "Exert yourselves! Strive earnestly! Follow the Good Way! Keep close watch over your minds! So shall you find certain deliverance from the round of birth and death and all things evil."

Then, the next morning, the Buddha started out direct for Kusinara, and on the way, at a little village called Pava, He was invited by the son of the village goldsmith, whose name was Cunda, to partake of a meal of //sukara-maddavam//, a kind of mushroom which wild boars much delight to eat, hence its name which means //boar's delight//.

The Buddha partook of the meal Cunda offered Him, and after He had eaten, felt very much refreshed and strengthened. Indeed, He thought He had quite got over His illness and He praised Cunda for having given Him a meal that had done Him so much good, and said that the good deed Cunda thus had done would make for his well-being both here and hereafter, both now and in the future.

Unfortunately, the improvement produced in the Buddha's condition by the meal Cunda had just given Him, did not last very long. The illness that had first attacked Him at Beluva came on Him again. But again by a great effort of will He mastered it, and getting to His feet, with failing strength struggled on once more towards Kusinara, and after a painful journey at length reached the grove of Sal trees outside the town which belonged to the princes of the place.

"Go Ananda," said the Buddha when He came in sight of the grove and saw that His journey was now ended; "go and make ready a place for Me to lie down on between those two big Sal trees. I am very weary Ananda, and would like to lie down and rest."

So Ananda took the Buddha's robe and, folding it in four, spread it on the ground between the two big Sal trees, so that his Master could lie on it with His head towards the North. Then the Buddha lay down on the couch thus prepared for Him, not to sleep, but only to rest His sick and weary body while His mind remained calm and collected as ever. For, did He not once tell Sariputta in the years when He was still hale and well, that if He were to live to become so old and weak that He could not walk but had to be carried about in a litter, still, for all that, He would be able to expound His Teaching and answer any question about it that might be asked even by the wisest and cleverest scholars, as long as they could stay awake to ask questions! He would never be tired in His mind.

But now, when Ananda saw that his beloved Master was really going to leave him he was filled with grief; he could not help it. And he went into the Vihara close by, and hiding himself from the Buddha's eyes behind the door, he began to weep, saying to himself: "I am not like the other Bhikkhus. I am still only a learner. I have not yet reached the state of Arahan. And now my Teacher is going to pass away and leave me, he who has always been so kind to me." And the hot tears rolled down poor Ananda's cheeks.

Then the Buddha opened His eyes and seeing that Ananda was not beside Him as usual, He said to the other Bhikkhus who were round Him: "Where is Ananda?"

"Reverend Lord," replied one of the Bhikkhus, "the venerable Ananda has gone into the Vihara and is now standing behind the door there weeping, and saying that he is only a learner, not perfect yet, and now is losing his teacher who was always kind to him."

"Go, O Bhikkhu," said the Buddha, "and tell Ananda that his teacher is calling for him."

So the Bhikkhu went and told Ananda that the Buddha wanted to see him. And Ananda came and sat down near the Blessed One. And the Blessed One spoke to him and said "Enough, now, Ananda! Do not grieve, do not weep. Have I not told you many and many a time that it must be that some day we shall be separated, cut off, sundered, parted from all that is dear to us? This must be, Ananda. There is no help for this. How is it possible that any-thing that has been born, has had a beginning, should not again die, come to an end? Such a thing, Ananda, is not possible. For a long time now, Ananda, you have waited upon the Tathagata and served him with body and speech and mind, in deed and word and thought, kindly, devotedly, cheerfully, ungrudgingly, and beyond measure. You have done much that is good by your faithful service of me, Ananda. Now exert yourself to get rid of all the things that hinder you from becoming an Arahan, and in a very short time you will become one."

Then the Buddha spoke to the other Bhikkhus round Him and said:

"All the Buddhas before me have each had a favorite disciple and body-servant just as I have had Ananda. And all the Buddhas to come will each have a favorite attendant like Ananda. A wise and faithful servant has Ananda been to me. He always knew when it was a suitable time to let visitors see me. He has always been pleasant to them in all his words and ways, and they have always been pleased with his manners towards them. When he has addressed them, they have always wanted to hear more from his lips. Such an excellent disciple and servant has Ananda always been to me."

Then Ananda spoke and said to the Buddha:

"Pray, Reverend Lord, do not pass away to Nibbana from this little mud-built place, this jungle town, this out-of-the-way corner. There are great cities like Rajagaha and Savatthi and Vesali and others. Let the Blessed One be pleased to pass away from one of these places. In these cities there are many wealthy and high-placed believers in the Blessed One who will see to His funeral rites in a manner worthy of the Tathagata.

"Nay, Ananda," said the Buddha, "do not talk like that. Do not call this a little out-of-the-way, mud-built, jungle place. For at one time Ananda, in days gone by, this was a great and flourishing city, the capital of the country where a great king lived in his golden palace."

"But go now, Ananda, and tell the chief men and the people of Kusinara that to-night, in the last watch of the night, the Tathagata will pass away to Nibbana. Therefore let them come and see the Tathagata before He passes away."

So Ananda, taking with him another Bhikkhu, did as his Master bid him, and went to Kusinara and told the elders of the town that the Buddha was going to pass away that night. And when they heard it, they were much grieved, and cried: "Alas, too soon, too soon is the Blessed One passing away to Nibbana. Too soon, too soon is the light of the world vanishing from the sight of men." And all the people of Kusinara, men, women and children, grieving and sorrowing, came to the Sal Tree grove where the Buddha lay, to take a last farewell of Him. And family by family, they bowed low before Him in reverence, and so bade Him farewell.

Now it happened that a certain wandering ascetic, called Subhadda was staying near Kusinara at this time, and when he heard that the Buddha was about to pass away, he resolved to go and see Him at once and ask Him about a certain matter that puzzled him, before He passed away. For he felt sure that the Lord Buddha could answer the question he wished to ask and clear up all his doubts about it.

So Subhadda went to the Sal Tree grove, and told Ananda about his question, and asked him kindly to give him an opportunity of speaking to the Buddha and putting his question to Him before He passed away.

But Ananda said: "Enough, Subhadda, enough. The Blessed One is very weary. Do not trouble Him with questions now."

But Subhadda was too anxious to have his doubts settled by the Buddha before He passed away, to take a refusal from Ananda, and he pressed Ananda again and again to let him see the Buddha; and Ananda again and again told him that his Master was far too ill and could not be disturbed by any one.

However, the Buddha, where He lay, caught a word or two of the talk that was passing between Ananda and Subhadda, and He called Ananda to Him and said:

"Come, Ananda. Do not keep Subhadda from seeing me. Let Subhadda come and see me if he wishes. What he asks will be for the sake of learning from me, and not merely in order to trouble me. He is quick of wit, and will readily understand what I say to him, Ananda."

Then Ananda allowed the wandering ascetic Subbhada to approach the Buddha. And after greeting the Buddha with all respect, Subhadda said:

"Gotama, have all the famous leaders of ascetics of other schools than yours, discovered the Truth as they say they have? Or have they not discovered the Truth? Or have some of them discovered the Truth, and others not?"

"Enough, O Subhadda," said the Buddha. "Never mind that question. But listen to me and pay close attention to what I say, and I will make known to you the Teaching."

"In whatever doctrine or discipline the Noble Eightfold Path is not found, there also are not to be found those have become Sotapanna, or Sakadagami, or Anagami, or Arahan. But wherever the Noble Eightfold Path is found, there also is found the Sotapanna and the Sakadagami and the Anagami and the Arahan. And in this Doctrine and Discipline of mine, O Subhadda, is to be found the Noble Eightfold Path, and in it alone the Sotapanna and the Sakadagami and the Anagami and the Arahan. In no other schools of ascetics are these to be found. And if only my Bhikkhus live rightly and follow my precepts, the world will never be without true and genuine Arahans."

Then Subhadda asked to be admitted to the Order of Bhikkhus, and the Buddha granted his request, and told Ananda to give him ordination. In this way Subhadda became the very last Bhikkhu whom the Buddha admitted to the Order, just as Kondanna in the deer park near Benares was the first. And by earnest and diligent labor in the Doctrine and Discipline, Subhadda very shortly became an Arahan.

Then the Buddha spoke to Ananda again and said:

"Perhaps, Ananda, some of the Bhikkhus may be thinking: 'The Teacher's words we shall hear no more. We have no teacher now.' But, Ananda, that is not the right way to look at the matter. The doctrine and the discipline which I have taught you and counseled you to follow while I was with you, these will be your teacher when I am gone. And now, while I am alive, you all address one another as 'Brother,' but when I am gone, the older Bhikkhus are to address those younger than themselves in the Order by their simple name, or as 'Brother,' but those that are younger must always address those that are older than themselves in the Order, as 'Reverend Sir,' or 'Venerable Sir,' and after I am gone, Ananda, the Order, if it wishes, may do away with all the lesser and minor rules of the Order."

Then the Buddha, addressing the other Bhikkhus said:

"If any among you has any doubts or perplexities regarding the Buddha or the Dhamma or the Sangha or the Path or about what is Right Conduct, ask about these now, O Bhikkhus, so that afterwards you may not have cause to regret that you did not have your doubts settled while the Teacher was with you to do so."

But at these words of the Buddha, none of the Bhikkhus said anything: none of them had any questions to ask: none of them had any doubts or perplexities.

Then a second and a third time the Buddha asked any of the Bhikkhus who had any question they would like to put to Him, to do so now while He was with them to answer it; but still no Bhikkhu spoke.

Then Ananda spoke and said: "It is wonderful it is admirable. Reverend Lord! I do believe that in all this great company of Bhikkhus there is not a single one who has any doubts or perplexities about the Buddha or the Dhamma or the Sangha or the Path or the Right Rule of Conduct."

"With you, Ananda," said the Buddha, "this may be a matter of faith and belief. But I, Ananda, I know that not a single Bhikkhu here has any doubts or perplexities about these things. Of all the Bhikkhus here present, Ananda, even the most backward of them is not liable to fall back into any lower state of existence, but is certain to attain wisdom supreme."

Then the Blessed One once more addressed the assembled Bhikkhus, and these were the very last words He spoke on this earth.

"O Bhikkhus," He said, "this is now my last admonition to you. //Sabbe sankhara anicca, Appamadena sampadetha.// All the constituents of existence are unlasting. By earnestness work out your liberation."

Then the Blessed One sank into trance ever deeper and deeper. Then He came out of trance again. Then He again passed into trance a little way; and from this trance passed away with that passing away which leaves nothing whatever behind that can cause birth again in this or any other world. The Blessed One passed away to Parinibbana.

It is twenty-five centuries ago since Siddhattha Gotama, the Sakya Prince who became Gotama the Buddha, thus passed away in far Kusinara. But His words, His Teachings, have not passed away. These still remain, the guide through life to what is beyond life, of millions of the human race. For, after His passing away, the Arahans and other disciples of that Blessed One spread the tidings of His great Teaching all through His native land of India, and passing beyond its boundaries, carried it far away to the West into Egypt, and to the East into Tibet and China and Japan. To Lapland in the cold North the Message was borne by them, and to Java and the isles of the southern seas. So that to-day two and a half millennia since He passed away from the earth, nearly a third part of those that dwell upon it revere the name of the Exalted One, the Blessed One, the Buddha Supreme, the Instructor of gods and men the Teacher unique, without a peer, who taught Nibbana and the Way Thither.

* * * * * * * *

ÉÍÍÍ

believe this sutra and put this teaching into practice will attain foremost wisdom.

* Venerable Mahamaudgalyayana was the foremost in spiritual penetrations. Once one is reborn into the Western Pure Land and later becomes a Buddha, aided by Amitabha, one recovers this foremost innate power.

* Maha is a Sanskrit word meaning great.

* The first Patriarch in the Zen school was Venerable Mahakasyapa who also attended this meeting.

* Venerable Ananda did the primary work of compiling the Buddha's teachings into sutras.

* For one to become a left-home person, one must have planted good roots in past lives. One time Buddha Shakyamuni tested his student's ability to decide whether to accept an old man who had requested to become a monk. An Arhat is capable of knowing a being's past lifetimes over many lifetimes. All of the Buddha's Arhat students doomed the old man as a prospect, because they thought that he had no connection with Buddhism in his past lives. Buddha Shakyamuni then announced that many aeons ago, this old man was a woodchopper. One day when he ran into a tiger on the mountain, he climbed up a tree to escape, calling out, "Homage to the Buddha" for help. With only those few words, the old man planted his good roots. In this life, he became a monk as he had wished and later attained his Arhatship.

* The Buddha gave this Pure Land teaching as a special way to help beings in this Dharma Ending Age.

* For one to be able to accept the Pure Land teaching, one must have previously nurtured countless good roots.

* The attendance of the great Samantabhadra Bodhisattva at this teaching symbolized the unity of the Pure Land and Esoteric Schools.

* The presence of the great Manjusri Bodhisattva symbolized the integration of the Zen and Pure Land Schools.

* Both of these venerables represent that all the teachings of the Buddha are contained within this sutra.

* The name of "Amitabha" is in itself a supreme mantra. By chanting this name and vowing to go to the Western Pure Land, one can attain the utmost achievement: to be born into the Western Pure Land and become a Buddha within one lifetime.

* The great Maitreya Bodhisattva is currently in the Tusita Deva (a level in heaven). After 5,706,000,000 years, he will appear in the human realm and become the next Buddha in this world.

* In our current aeon, one thousand Buddhas will appear in our world. Buddha Shakyamuni was the fourth; Maitreya Bodhisattva will be the fifth. All these great sages came to this teaching as well.

<end of file>

ÉÍÍÍ

from the Diamond Sutra, "One's mind should not attach to anything, then the true mind will arise."

* "Spiritual Penetration Flower" Bodhisattva teaches us that many different abilities can be used to help sentient beings as he pledged in his vows.

* "Light Emitting" Bodhisattva symbolizes the light of wisdom. Chanting Buddha's name will help us generate this limitless light.

* "Precious Flag" Bodhisattva stands for how precious the opportunity is to help all beings through the Buddha's teachings. In the past, people would raise a flag from a pole in front of a Buddhist teaching center, which signaled that a lecture would be given that day.

* "Utmost Wisdom" Bodhisattva illustrates that infinite wisdom is within this Pure Land teaching.

* "Stilled Root" Bodhisattva demonstrated purification of the six sense organs (eye, ear, nose, tongue, mind, and body). Practicing according to the Buddha's teachings naturally purifies these six sense organs.

* "Faith and Wisdom" Bodhisattva clarified that, without wisdom, one cannot believe in this teaching.

* "Vow and Wisdom" Bodhisattva told us that, after unwavering belief is developed, it is important to vow to go to the Western Pure Land. From true wisdom comes the vow.

* The elephant was the strongest animal to haul vehicles in ancient times. So the name of "Fragrant Elephant" Bodhisattva is a way to show us how great the benefit is to chant the Buddha's name.

* "Treasury Revelation" Bodhisattva taught us that after one goes to the Western Pure Land, with the help of Buddha Amitabha, the treasury in one's self-nature will be uncovered.

* "Dwelling in the Middle" Bodhisattva represents how one's mind should be set on the practice in the middle path, avoiding the extremes.

* "Practice of Restraint" Bodhisattva advocated two points in the Pure Land School; following the precepts and Buddha-name chanting. Following the precepts disciplines one's thought, speech and behavior.

* "Liberation" Bodhisattva was the last of the sixteen great guests of honor. He represented the result one attains from this practice: to be freed from worry and to attain liberation from the cycle of birth and death.

* The first fourteen Bodhisattvas teach us to recognize this Buddha Name Chanting method and the Infinite Life Sutra, illustrating their importance in uncovering our true wisdom.

* The fifteenth Bodhisattva represents our actual transformation by correcting erroneous ways in thought, speech and behavior.

* The sixteenth and the last of the Bodhisattvas symbolized the final outcome of the entire practice.

* All of those who attended this teaching followed the "Ten Great Vows" of Samantabhadra. The characteristics of this Bodhisattva are having a great compassionate mind and tirelessly fulfilling his vows.

* The first great vow of Samantabhadra Bodhisattva is to "Pay respect to all the Buddhas." Respect is to be paid to both sentient and non-sentient beings, even to inanimate objects, since all essentially have a Buddha-nature.

* Cultivating respect can help to subdue a person's arrogance and learn humility.

* The second vow is to "Praise 'Thus Come One.'" "Thus Come One" is one's true nature. Things that correspond with one's true mind can be praised. Those that do not correspond with one's true mind are to be respected, but not praised.

* One needs to have true wisdom to praise others. With this wisdom, one is able to differentiate between proper and deviated, right and wrong, to praise the good and proper teachings, and not to praise the deviated ones.

* The third vow is to "Make offerings extensively." In Buddhism, the distinction between offering and giving is that offering is a form of giving or contribution with respect whereas, giving is not necessarily done with respect. When making offerings, one does so with a compassionate mind, a pure mind and a mind of equality for all beings, because everyone possesses a Buddha nature.

* The fourth vow is to "Repent of karmic obstacles." Karma, cause and effect, results from thought, speech and behavior of aeons past. Karmic retribution, arising from former wrong thought, speech and behavior, blocks wisdom, virtue and talent within our self-nature.

* Repenting of karmic obstacles and the ensuing reduction of karma begins with an immediate end to wrong thought, speech and behavior.

* One then should not attach to either good or bad deeds, because good karma would have one go to the upper three realms (heavens, Asuras and humans), and bad karma to the lower three realms (animals, hungry ghosts and hells). However, whichever way, we are still mired in reincarnation.

* Accumulating Pure Karma is a goal of a Pure Land practitioner. Rather than resulting in reincarnation, Pure Karma leads the practitioner to birth into the Pure Land.

* The fifth vow is to "Be joyful over other's meritorious deeds." Jealousy and arrogance present serious obstacles for one to overcome, not only in the pursuit of worldly progress, but even more so for one on the path to enlightenment. When others accumulate merits, one should be happy and want to help them, thus, one's jealousy is overcome.

* The sixth vow is to "Appeal to the Buddha to turn the wheel of Buddha's teaching." Buddhists should request all Buddhas, Bodhisattvas and venerable masters to give teachings for the benefit of all beings.

* The seventh vow is to "Request the Buddha to reside in this world." Presently there is no Buddha in our world. If there is any venerable master who has achieved attainment, we should try to have him/her remain with us; so more beings can benefit from his/her teaching.

* The eighth vow is to "Constantly be a diligent follower of the Buddha's teaching." For a Pure Land practitioner, the Infinite Life Sutra is the Buddha's guideline for one's thought, speech and behavior.

* The ninth vow is to "Accord with all sentient beings." Filial piety is the heart of this vow. Wisdom and serenity are required for one to be patient with others. True conformation derives from one's Bodhi Mind.

* The tenth vow is to "Dedicate all merits." All merits should be dedicated to beings and inanimate objects, existing everywhere in the universe and beyond, which in reality is our Bodhi Mind.

* Samantabhadra Bodhisattva said that his great vows could be perfectly accomplished only in the Western Pure Land. Therefore, he wished all those who suffer within all the realms in all the worlds of the ten directions, to quickly obtain birth into the Pure Land.

* One is to be mindful of the name "Amitabha," for this name enables one to reflect and intensify the same merits and virtues, thus eventually achieving a Buddha's perfection.

* All attending this assembly wanted themselves and all beings to accept this Pure Land teaching and that all could reach the Buddha's state of perfection.

* Out of their great compassionate nature of first wanting to help all sentient beings escape suffering; Bodhisattvas perfect their wisdom and virtues.

* Today, people might ask, "why should we help others?" They do not understand the true reality of life and the universe, thinking others and they are not one, so why should they help? This is similar to one's left hand being bitten by a mosquito. Would the right hand help to shoo away the mosquito or would it ask, "why should I help the left hand, it isn't me?" As worldly people, we have deluded thoughts and behavior, not realizing that all sentients and we are one being.

* Wandering thoughts and attachments arise when one strays away from the truth; thus, deluded beings differentiate themselves from others. Knowing that others and self are an inseparable entity, the Buddhas and Bodhisattvas also understand that "helping others is helping oneself."

* It is said in the Surangama Sutra that, "Buddhas and Bodhisattvas respond specifically to each person's appeal due to the differences in the minds of all beings." For example, they may appear as Avalokiteshvara Bodhisattva, if that is the form the individual would most willingly accept.

* When a Bodhisattva in this world is ready to attain perfect realization, he goes through the same eight phases to instruct the world. Usually this Bodhisattva is called a "Next Buddha to Be."

* If a Bodhisattva is a "Next Buddha to Be" he lives in and descends from Tusita Heaven to the human realm where he will attain Buddhahood. This is the first phase.

* The second and the third phases are "Choosing parents" and "Being born." When a Buddha comes to this world, he is born into a royal family. This good fortune comes naturally to him due to his great merits and virtue. In addition, in this position he can best show the world that such dignity and wealth are not the most important pursuits in one's life.

* "Leaving home and giving up the throne" is the fourth phase to show that true happiness comes from being able to let go of worldly possessions and prestige.

* Manifestation of a Buddha requires him to take the ascetic path in his cultivation. This is to be acceptable to this world.

* Only through the strength developed from concentration and wisdom, can one overcome the obstacles presented by one's internal afflictions and external temptations. This is the fifth phase, "Subduing Mara's evil obstacle."

* Severing one's wandering thoughts and attachments will enable one to attain the wonderful reality of truth. This representation is within the sixth phase "Attaining Enlightenment."

* All beings have been trapped in reincarnation for countless aeons. Although they have encountered Buddhism before, somehow it has only helped them to plant or reinforce their good roots. With the Pure Land teaching, if a person can truly grasp this opportunity and practice sincerely, one will finally take the last glimpse at reincarnation.

* The seventh phase is "Turning the Dharma wheel." Once the Buddha achieved perfect enlightenment, the heavenly beings, recognizing him for what he was, requested him to give the teachings to this world.

* Lecturing on Buddhism is turning the Dharma wheel. Turning the wheel symbolizes making this education available to beings in all directions. The center of the wheel is stationary while its circumference moves, representing stillness and movement in one. The center is hollow while its circumference is solid representing emptiness and existence. The wheel represents Buddhism as the most complete and perfect education.

* The Buddha's teaching helps all beings subdue their evil obstacles, thus uncovering their true mind.

* The eighth stage is "Entering the state of Nirvana." The person with good understanding knows that the Buddha actually is never apart from us at any time. However, those with less understanding believe that the Buddha left this world.

* A sangha is a group of four or more people who practice the Buddha's teachings together in accordance with the Six Principles of Harmony.

* The Six Principles of Harmony are:
1. To share the same viewpoints or goals.
2. To observe the same precepts.
3. To live and practice together harmoniously.
4. To not quarrel.
5. To experience the inner peace and happiness from practicing together harmoniously.
6. To share benefits equally.

* The purpose of the sangha is to spread the Buddha's teachings in helping all beings. Whether those committed to propagating the teachings or those devoted to supporting them, all are equally important in achieving this purpose. When one looks at a clock, one only sees the minute and hour hands and not the intricate parts within that keep it ticking. However, if one part is missing, the hands cannot move. Only in working together as one entity does the sangha accumulate infinite merits.

* Buddha Shakyamuni teaches unceasingly, even during moments of silence. Through simply observing certain movements of the Buddha, beings with high levels of intelligence and wisdom can reach realization. His teachings not only include speech, but also languages of the body and mind.

* Not only do beings from the six realms come to learn from the Buddha, but beings from all the nine realms do as well.

* Delusion, our biggest obstacle, arises from afflictions and wandering thoughts; therefore, the Buddha teaches us first to sever our afflictions and cease wandering thoughts.

* The Buddhas and Bodhisattvas help sentient beings see through delusion to completely understand the truth of life and the universe.

* The goal of our cultivation is to replace the worries surrounding us with purity of mind. The Pure Land is our destination.

* The Three Learnings are self-discipline, concentration and wisdom. They are important steps in one's practice.

* Even in the present age, advanced medical science remains unable to surpass the perfect and thorough teachings of the Buddha to harmonize body and mind, which contributes to a healthy body. People who truly know how to attune their body and mind to peace and purity are immune from illnesses.

* Continued practice of the Three Learnings will release worries, abolish longings and eradicate delusions and attachments. Only thus can we truly understand the Buddha's teachings.

* The Pure Land School uses the sutra recitation method to help people sever their afflictions. The goal of this practice is to purify both body and mind, resulting in rebirth into the Western Pure Land.

* When wandering thoughts cease to arise during sutra recitation, one's body, mind and speech commit no evil. One is cultivating self-discipline when one does not commit any evil deeds and practices only good ones.

* One is cultivating concentration when achieving single-minded recitation of the sutra without giving rise to the analytical mind.

* One is cultivating wisdom when reciting the sutra clearly and without error.

* Losing one's purity of mind to analyze its meanings during sutra recitation would be the same as reading ordinary books, thus forsaking the purpose of the Three Learnings.

* The length of a sutra such as The Infinite Life Sutra is perfect for recitation; they provide us with ample time to cultivate self-discipline, concentration and wisdom.

* Ridding oneself of the three inner poisons of greed, anger and ignorance within the mind enables one to obtain a healthy mind and body. Having a healthy mind is important in helping one practice Buddhism, for without a healthy mind, one will find difficulty in accepting the true teaching.

* Conditioning one's mind is an essential step towards learning the Mahayana sutras. A good teacher would have the students concentrate on their cultivation of virtue before learning the sutras. Just as a dirty bowl would need to be cleansed before it can be of good use or whatever it holds will be contaminated.

* Reciting the sutras three hours or more daily for three years will deepen one's concentration. When one's concentration reaches a certain level, true wisdom can be revealed.

* What is merit and virtue? It is the pure mind derived from practice of the Three Learnings of precepts, concentration and wisdom that are obtained from years of cultivation.

* A pure mind is one without discriminations or attachments.

* Anger is like a fire, being one of the three poisons of the mind. Once a person's anger flares up, all the merit and virtues accumulated from years of diligent cultivation completely disintegrate, sending the practitioner back to square one.

* One accumulates merit and virtue when one is able to end greed in addition to diligently cultivating giving and following the precepts. The practice of patience, diligence and concentration enables one to preserve one's merit and virtue.

* A person, who likes to practice giving and abides by laws and customs while conducting oneself in a proper and dignified manner, will accumulate good fortune.

* Understanding what one practices is essential to one's success. Pure Land practitioners can start with the teachings from The Infinite Life Sutra, The Amitabha Sutra and "The Chapter on Samantabhadra Bodhisattva's Vows and Cultivation."

* One needs to cultivate good fortune before wisdom.

* Those who are mindful of Buddha Amitabha can apply the practice of the Three Conditions in their daily lives. The Three Conditions, which are the first of the Five Guidelines, are the foundation upon which Pure Land practitioners begin their practice.

* Cultivating the first of the Three Conditions enables one to harvest good fortune as great as that of heavenly beings. The First Condition includes being filial and respectful to one's parents and teachers, being compassionate and not killing any living beings and cultivating according to the Ten Good Conducts (no killing, stealing, sexual misconduct, lying, abusive language, backbiting, seductive speech, greed, anger or ignorance).

* The Second Condition consists of abiding by the Three Refuges, following the precepts, laws and customs, and conducting oneself in a proper and dignified manner. By practicing the Second Condition, one's good fortune will be as great as that of Pratyekabuddhas and Arhats.

* One does not accomplish anything just by going through the ceremonial ritual of taking the Three Refuges. Truly taking the Three Refuges is to return from delusion, erroneous thoughts and viewpoints, and impurity and to rely on one's enlightened self-nature, proper viewpoints and thoughts, and purity within the six senses.

* Practicing the Third Condition enables one to harvest good fortune like that of Bodhisattvas. One generates the Bodhi mind, deeply believes in the Law of Cause and Effect, recites and upholds Mahayana sutras and encourages others to advance on the path to enlightenment.

* The second of the Five Guidelines for practitioners is to follow the Six Principles of Harmony, which show one how to get along with others. By practicing the Three Conditions and the Six Principles of Harmony, one will harvest good fortune.

* After reaching a degree of attainment, one vows to practice the Bodhisattva way, teaching and benefiting all sentient beings, and working on behalf of the Buddha to publicize and advocate this ultimate perfect method of the Pure Land School.

* As one generates a true and sincere heart to learn an unsurpassable method, one will naturally meet a genuine teacher to guide the way. If one does not harbor sincerity and respect in one's learning, it is useless even to have the best teacher in the world.

* "Bodhisattvas unceasingly practice in accordance with limitless cultivation." (Infinite Life Sutra) To accord with Bodhisattva's manner of living and cultivation, one applies the principles such as those within The Five Guidelines which are the Three Conditions, Six Harmonies, Three Learnings, Six Paramitas and the Ten Great Vows of Samantabhadra Bodhisattva into his/her daily lives.

* By "...maturing boundless Bodhisattva's good roots" (Infinite Life Sutra) beings will be able to become Buddhas once they have perfected their merit, which involves helping all beings, until they too become Buddhas.

* "Being the mindful ones of whom all Buddhas were protective" (Infinite Life Sutra). The kindness the Buddha shows us is like that of parents for their children, the only difference being that the Buddha remains mindful of us life after life, until we ourselves become Buddha.

* As we observe all the world's phenomena, birth and death seem to exist. However, this is not so. In reality, they, what we perceive as birth and death, are just the coming together and dispersion of causes and conditions. Thus, nothing is really gained or lost. If we can see through this concept of gain and loss, appearance and disappearance, we will attain comfort and happiness.

* Our afflictions come from caring too much about gaining and losing. When we lack something, we search for it everyday. Once we have it, we are afraid losing it. However, gaining and losing are only false conceptions of the mind. Buddhas and Bodhisattvas fully comprehend this truth. Thus, although they have already helped innumerable beings, their minds do not attach to the notion of having helped. They have neither attachment nor the thought to accumulate merits. The minds and hearts of Buddhas and Bodhisattvas are always pure and at peace.

* Those who simply go through daily rituals of prostrating and offering incense and fruit may not achieve as much benefit as those who practice in accordance with the Buddha's teachings may.

* All the beings in the infinite universe and beyond, including us, are interrelated. In past lives we may have been born in other worlds and been related to the beings there. When we become a Buddha or Bodhisattva, we will be able to travel to any Buddhaland that we have affinities with to help those beings walk the path of awakening. "These Bodhisattvas could appear in all the Buddhalands" (Infinite Life Sutra).

* Everything we see in this world is not real in the sense that it has a separate self, but is actually an accumulation of causes and conditions. Although we may think it is real, in the Buddha's mind, there is neither existence nor emptiness, appearing nor disappearing, gaining nor losing. This misconception of reality results in our delusion. Afflictions come from the inside and not the outside. They arise from our own deviated thoughts and viewpoints.

* The Buddha's education helps us to break through this delusion and refrain from wrong actions, thereby avoiding adverse consequences.

* Buddhas appear in this world to educate people so that we may attain enlightenment. However, they are not attached to the idea that they themselves are Buddhas or teachers. In addition, they are not attached to their ability to teach or to the idea that others are students accepting their teachings. Harboring these ideas would be attaching and discriminating and would block one from obtaining a pure mind.

* The Buddha does not take credit for any achievements, nor does he linger on thoughts regarding his activities. Therefore, he does not become weary or overwrought like ordinary people.

* "Like a flash of lightning, Bodhisattvas can transform into different forms" (Infinite Life Sutra). Not being attached to any forms, Bodhisattvas are able to manifest all forms.

* There are four similes within "a flash of lightning." First, its speed; life is short, most people do not realize how short until stricken with illness in their old age. Second, its application; a brief flare of lightning exposing the darkness which represents our ignorance. Buddhas appear in this world to help us break through this ignorance. Third, non-attachment; there is none for any Dharma, ability, phenomena or achievements. Fourth, it is non-discriminating; lightning appears anywhere, having no discrimination over what it illuminates.

* Demons and ghosts of the world are not as terrifying as demons of the mind. These demons torment our minds and bodies causing us to suffer and age quickly. They are simply brought about by our false viewpoints: the worries, miseries and our attachments to things that go against our wishes create the demons that we inflict upon ourselves.

* Cultivators would do well to refrain from deviated emotions and conditions such as the absence of embarrassment and shamefulness, and the presence of jealousy, stinginess, misdeeds, drowsiness, sleep, agitation, greed, anger and ignorance.

* Some people are unconsciously jealous of others who they feel are superior to them. These thoughts lead them to commit wrongdoings that result in ill consequences. Not only will they be afflicted by arrogance and jealousy life after life; these negative characteristics will block their own path to enlightenment.

* Lacking a conscience and the ability to feel shame, one would commit any wrong. Moreover, one will suffer the consequences of their actions.

* Stinginess arises from greed when one will not give to help others.

* Misdeeds include all behaviors that are not virtuous and logical, thus blocking our virtuous nature.

* Sleeping too much clouds our minds and obstructs our practice of the way.

* An agitated mind is one that harbors too many wandering thoughts and is bound by worries and unrest.

* Drowsiness is feeling tired and spiritless, impeding one's diligence.

* The above eight afflictions, along with greed, anger and ignorance can hopelessly ensnare one in the cycle of birth and death.

* Chanting the Buddha's name can diminish and eliminate one's accumulated karmic transgressions from the above eight afflictions. By replacing wandering thoughts with mindfulness of the Buddha, one can eliminate countless eons of transgressions.

* The essential practice in Buddha name chanting is not quantity but quality, using every chant to replace wandering thoughts, thus eventually reaching purity of mind.

* It may be more suitable for beginners to concentrate more on sutra recitation rather than Buddha name chanting, as one will have awareness of dispersion of wandering thoughts when one recites incorrectly. Buddha name chanting is easy to do, but it is not sufficient to help beginners suppress their wandering minds. However, once a person attains deeper awareness and concentration, Buddha name chanting becomes more suitable. One chooses the method that will be most effective in countering wandering thoughts and attachments.

* One day the great master Yuan Ying was meditating in his room, his mind was very calm and pure. Suddenly he thought of something and immediately went to take care of it. Getting off his bed, he headed straight out of the room. Only after he was outside, did he realize the door was still closed and locked. How did he get out? In that instant, he had forgotten that there was a door, and having no attachment, had simply gone through it. However, when the thought of the door arose, he was no longer able to go through it.

* Not knowing the empty nature of all appearances and phenomenon, we delude ourselves by not realizing their falseness. For example, if we perceive a wall as real, then we will not be able to go through it. However, perceiving one's body and the wall as not real allows one to pass through it.

* Having an affinity, a natural bond, with this world, the Buddha will stay. Once this affinity ends, the Buddha will enter Nirvana.

* The Buddha teaches us that we need to search our true self from within, not from the outside. To search from the outside would be superstitious and futile. The need is for one to end one's afflictions, greed, anger, ignorance and arrogance that block our true self from coming through.

* The great Zen master, the Sixth Patriarch Hui-Neng said in The Platform Sutra, "...not being attached to any outside phenomenon is meditation, no thoughts arising from within is concentration."

* Meditating is settling the mind, not just the practice of sitting in the lotus position on a cushion or platform while having wandering thoughts, one after another.

* Meditation is when one is not tempted by the exterior factors of reputation, power, prestige, wealth, the five desires (wealth, lust, food/drink, fame and sleep) and impurities in the six senses (sight, sound, smell, taste, touch and idea). Concentration is when no afflictions arise from within.

* One who regards others as Buddhas, is a Buddha, while an ordinary person would regard the Buddha as ordinary. In other words, a bad person would regard all as bad, whereas, a virtuous person would regard all as kind and virtuous. In reality, there is no good or bad, beautiful or ugly in the world but just reflections from our mind. The outside environment changes according to one's state of mind.

* When one sees other persons as displeasing, disgusting, etc., this perception comes from the afflictions arising from within one's own mind and has nothing to do with exterior factors. "True practitioners do not see the faults in others" (Platform Sutra).

* When one's self-nature arises from within, it also naturally brings out one's infinite wisdom and virtuous capabilities. This is true goodness.

* For most people the usual driving force behind their hard work is reputation and wealth. For enlightened beings, the driving force in the Buddha's teaching is compassion and wisdom. With wisdom, one sees very clearly the true reality of life and the universe, regarding others as oneself. With compassion, one understands that spreading the Buddha's teaching is one's duty and responsibility. One does so, expecting nothing in return.

* There are two kinds of understanding. One understands the truth of our existence and the universe; the other is reaching deeper realization from cultivation. The first one is understood through the Buddha's and Bodhisattva's education; the latter by relying on our own diligent practice.

* There are many methods within Buddha Shakyamuni's teachings; the Pure Land School is one method that does not need to overcome so many levels of accomplishment before becoming a Buddha. Reciting Buddha Amitabha's name with unwavering belief, vowing to reach the Pure Land and practicing diligently will enable one to be born into the Western Pure Land.

* "Numberless and limitless Bodhisattvas like these came and gathered together. There were also five hundred nuns, seven thousand laymen, five hundred laywomen and Brahma Gods from the realms of Sensuality and Form who attended the assembly" (Infinite Life Sutra).

* Not only these twenty thousand attended this teaching but additional other uncountable beings from higher realms attended as well. This signifies the great importance of this teaching.

<end of file>

ÉÍÍÍ

Life Sutra). All these were causes for giving this teaching of the sutra.

* Why is the Buddha so supremely radiant? Because he is incomparably joyful. This is the happiest day for Buddha Shakyamuni. At last, the opportunity has arisen to give this ultimate and convenient teaching.

* While Buddha Shakyamuni was contemplating on Buddha Amitabha, all other Buddhas in the ten directions were contemplating on Buddha Amitabha and propagating this sutra as well. Uniting with others, this brilliant power of concentration was focused through Buddha Shakyamuni, thus making him appear extraordinarily magnificent.

* Our face is a reflection of our state of mind. If one harbors a kind heart, it is reflected in a compassionate appearance. If one has a corrupted mind, it is reflected in a cruel face.

* The Buddha's appearance is a perfect one. As we are mindful of the Buddha, we will gradually acquire the body and mind of a Buddha; this in turn will be reflected in our bearing.

* In all the years Venerable Ananda had been with Buddha Shakyamuni, he had never seen him so magnificent as he was at that time. On the behalf of all sentient beings, Venerable Ananda requested this teaching.

* "Venerable Ananda rose from his seat, bared his right shoulder, knelt on one knee and placed his palms together in veneration and addressed the Buddha" (Infinite Life Sutra).

* When requesting instructions from our teacher, it is appropriate to rise from our seat.

* In India, when people wished to show the utmost respect for someone, they would bare their right shoulder and kneel on their right knee. Kneeling on the right knee enables one to rise at anytime to serve the teacher.

* When palms are placed together as one, they represent concentration and respect. Separated fingers indicate a scattered mind.

* With concentration, one is ready to accept the Buddha's instructions.

* Venerable Ananda asked, "World Honored One, today you have entered the great Samadhi...could you explain to me its significance?" (Infinite Life Sutra).

* The Buddha was in the Contemplating Buddha Amitabha Samadhi, a perfect Samadhi.

* On this day, Buddha Shakyamuni was practicing a very special method. He was about to speak of a way that equally helps all beings to become enlightened.

* In The Diamond Sutra, Venerable Sariputra had raised two questions. First, where should our minds dwell? Second, how do we overcome our wandering minds? The answer is simple. In the Pure Land School, dwelling in mindfulness of Buddha Amitabha overcomes our wandering thoughts.

* All the Buddhas contemplate Buddha Amitabha and the magnificence of the Western Pure Land. This is the way they guide all beings together on the path to enlightenment.

* The greatest teacher is one who, without discrimination or bias, teaches all the ways to attain Buddhahood.

* Contemplating Buddha Amitabha is contemplating his forty-eight vows, in which every vow is to equally help all sentient beings to become enlightened.

* All the Buddhas of the past, present and future are mindful of Amitabha. Likewise, Buddha Amitabha is mindful of them.

* The Venerable Ananda pondered: Today, Buddha Shakyamuni is displaying a magnificent aura. He must be contemplating the Buddhas in other worlds; otherwise, his countenance would not be so extraordinary.

Therefore, he asked the Buddha.

* Buddha Shakyamuni replied to Ananda: "Excellent! Excellent!" (Infinite Life Sutra). The first "Excellent" means the time has come for this teaching to be given so that all beings may become Buddhas within one lifetime. The second "Excellent" means the fulfillment of the Buddha's wish that every being may become a Buddha quickly, not just to become an Arhat or a Bodhisattva.

* Human life is as short as a flash of lightning, appearing and vanishing in milli-seconds. Moreover, there is nothing in this world we can truly grasp, since in reality everything is an illusion.

* It was said that when one offers a Pratyekabuddha a bowl of rice, one would not suffer poverty for many aeons. As an example, Venerable Mahakasyapa had made offerings to a Pratyekabuddha; consequently, he would not be poor for nine billion aeons.

* By requesting the true teachings, the merit Ananda obtained was one billion times more than that of making offerings to countless numbers of Arhats or Pratyekabuddhas living in one galaxy.

* Today, if we recite and study the Infinite Life Sutra then introduce it to others, we will gain the same merits, as did Venerable Ananda.

* Those who believe and vow to go to the Western Pure Land, and are mindful of Buddha Amitabha shall be born there without regression and eventually become Buddhas. This is true liberation.

* To rise from hell to the hungry ghost realm, to the animal realm and even up to the heaven realm is only liberation to a certain extent. If we do not break out of the cycle of birth and death, no matter how much we transcend, we will not be truly liberated.

* The kindness the Buddha has shown us is far beyond that of our parents. The compassion that our parents have offered us lasts for only one lifetime, whereas, the Buddha's compassion continues unceasingly life after life.

* One goal of the Buddha's appearance in this world is to bring us the true and beneficial teaching. For example, the teaching given in the Infinite Life Sutra shows us the way to single-mindedly contemplate Buddha Amitabha and to reach the Pure Land.

* It is an extremely rare opportunity to be born as a human. If one carefully examines his/her thoughts each day, how many of these arise from greed, anger or ignorance? Greed can be as simple as wishing for something more than the essentials. Anger can be felt in irritation or jealousy. Ignorance arises simply by lacking knowledge of proper thoughts and behavior. Greed leads one to the hungry ghost realm, anger to the hells, and ignorance to the animal realms. The thoughts that preoccupy us the most, especially the ones during our last moments will determine the realm of our next life.

* Of the six billion people in this world, how many have actually encountered Buddhism? Among these, how many have learned about Mahayana Buddhism? Of these, how many know of the Pure Land School? Among Pure Land Buddhists, how many have practiced single-mindedly? Through this process of elimination, we find that very few will attain Buddhahood in one lifetime.

* Today we freely distribute thousands of copies of the Infinite Life Sutra to the public. It would be worthwhile even if only one or two people truly believed, cultivated and were able to reach the Western Pure Land.

* To be able to renounce this Saha world and single-mindedly vow to reach the Western Pure Land is the result of one's good fortune and accumulated merit.

* What are good roots? One possesses good roots when one truly believes and understands the Buddha's teaching.

* One who believes in the Infinite Life Sutra and is willing to practice accordingly, with a joyful heart, has already made offerings to countless Buddhas. This person should feel extremely fortunate, since his/her good roots brought this about.

* Why are we still deluded, confused and receiving retributions? Because we have neither deep concentration nor wisdom.

* In order to attain concentration, one only need be concerned whether one is abiding by the precepts and not whether others are. When concerned with other people's practices, one's own concentration will not be achieved. This preoccupation deters purity of mind. When one regards all others as having the purest of minds, that person's mind will reflect this purity and achieve concentration.

* The Buddha's concentration and wisdom are perfect.

* The liberation of an Arhat cannot compare with that of a Pratyekabuddha, which cannot compare with that of a Bodhisattva. A Bodhisattva's cannot compare with that of a Buddha. A Buddha's liberation is the ultimate liberation.

* The Buddha's perfect concentration and wisdom give rise to ten kinds of freedom.

* First, freedom from limited life span; one will never grow old as one controls longevity, when one's willpower surpasses karma's control.

* Second, freedom from the deluded mind; the mind has no wandering thoughts, worries or attachments.

* Everyone's good fortune is different. There is really no way one can change other's lives simply with worries, as everyone's life experiences are governed by the Law of Cause and Effect. Once this is understood, one would truly understand that feeling worried about others is just a form of deluded thoughts and is therefore pointless.

* Third, freedom from material needs; one would never lack the essentials.

* The more one possesses, the more one worries; such as which to use, how to safeguard or how to acquire new ones. Having freedom from material needs means using the basic essential without the worries, even if one could have as much as one desired.

* Fourth, freedom of activities; for example, the Buddha is free to appear in any suitable form to help beings in the nine realms.

* Fifth, freedom of birth; one can choose which family to be born into.

* Sixth, freedom from ignorance; one intuitively possesses all knowledge without obstacles.

* When one possesses knowledge, one needs to be clear as to whether the people of that particular time are able to wisely use that knowledge. If not, then it is best to withhold that knowledge, thus preventing any catastrophes from happening.

* Seventh, freedom of vow fulfillment; everything that one wishes or vows to do will come to fruition.

* Eighth, freedom of spiritual penetration; possessing extraordinary abilities in the six senses of sight, hearing, smell, taste or speech, thought and action.

* Ninth, freedom of Dharma; the Buddha's teaching is excellent in that all the beings can comprehend his direct teachings without any misunderstanding.

* Tenth, freedom of wisdom; the Buddha knows all the lives of all beings in the ten directions, in the past, present and future and how to accommodate his teachings to each individual being.

When one's mind is at its purest, one can achieve these ten freedoms. All beings inherently possess the potential of achieving the qualities of a Buddha.

<end of file>

ÉÍÍÍ

Shakyamuni is to repay our gratitude for his being our original teacher; the offerings remind us to respect our teachers and their teachings, but not to blindly worship them. Another important reason is to acknowledge and emulate the virtuous; vowing to become a Buddha also.

* Third, "Perfect Enlightenment" is the abbreviated form of Supreme Unbiased Perfect Enlightenment.

* Fourth, "Perfection in Wisdom and Cultivation" means one's understanding and practice reach full completion.

* Fifth, "Skillful in Non-attachment." All Buddhas are neither bound by birth and death or by the state of Nirvana.

* Sixth, "Knower of the Worlds" comprehends everything in the universe.

* Seventh, "The Unsurpassed Scholar."

* Eighth, "Great Hero" is what the Buddha is by guiding all beings in their individual practices and solving their problems through his teachings, achieving what others cannot.

* Ninth, "Teacher of Heavenly Beings and Humankind."

* "Buddha, the World Honored One" is the person who has already attained perfect complete realization and the above nine virtues, thus deserving the respect of the world, though he is not attached to his achievements, and views himself as equal to all beings. This concludes the ten titles for all Buddhas.

* Buddha Lokesvararaja taught for forty-two aeons. This indicates that the life span of a human being at that time was even longer.

* "At that time, a great king by the name of World Abundant heard the Buddha's teaching" (Infinite Life Sutra).

* After King World Abundant received the teaching from Buddha

Lokesvararaja, he decided to give up his kingship to become a monk. He was renamed Dharmakara, meaning "Dharma Treasure."

* Giving up the kingship is an example of abdicating worldly attachments to pursue self-realization, while dedicating oneself to educate others in the Buddha's teaching; thus, one serves all the sentient beings not just in this world, but in the infinite universe and beyond.

* To create good fortunes for all, one contributes one's wisdom and capabilities. Ordinary people only think of themselves, their family or perhaps even their country, whereas, a realized person strives to help all sentient beings break through delusion to find true liberation.

* Dharmakara started practicing the Bodhisattva's way, which helped him to attain an awakened mind.

* A Bodhisattva can be any person in any place. They are no different from us except that they do not harbor any discrimination and attachments, and are unaffected by worries and troubles in their daily lives and work. For example, spiritual or religious leaders can be Bodhisattvas, guiding beings from delusion, improper thoughts and viewpoints, and polluted thinking.

* Dharmakara was an extraordinarily talented person, who in many ways already surpassed most people. In his past lives Dharmakara must have practiced extensively the giving of wealth, fearlessness and teaching in order to be born into a royal family and to have wealth, longevity, intelligence and wisdom respectively.

* By practicing diligently the Buddha's teaching, Dharmakara reached the utmost achievement.

* As the power of mindfulness and wisdom enhanced Dharmakara's determination to achieve in his practice without regression, he began to formulate his great vows. No one could surpass him.

* "He went to visit the Buddha, showed his respect by prostrating..."

(Infinite Life Sutra).

* Prostration is one form of practice. When prostrating, one should do so with a sincere and pure mind, without wandering thoughts. Thus, one cultivates concentration in addition to obtaining a healthy body.

* "He placed his palms together in reverence towards the Buddha and praised him with these verses and made the great vows" (Infinite Life Sutra).

* "The Thus Come One has a subtle, wonderful and majestic appearance, which no one in the universe can equal" (Infinite Life Sutra). This is one of the reasons why people like to get close to them.

* "The Buddha's light shines without limit throughout the ten directions, covering even the brightness from the sun and moon" (Infinite Life Sutra). This verse praises the Buddha's light and wisdom representing purity, equality, wisdom and compassion.

* "The World Honored One can present with a sound and make all kinds of beings understand in their own languages" (Infinite Life Sutra). When the Buddha gives a teaching, people from different regions in the world understand it. Moreover, all heavenly beings, Bodhisattvas and Arhats from other worlds and realms who attend, will also comprehend.

* "The Buddha can manifest in a subtle and wonderful appearance, and let all beings see him as their own kind" (Infinite Life Sutra). The appearances of the Buddhas or Bodhisattvas are images projected from the minds of different beings.

* The above verses praise the Buddha's virtuous capabilities.

* "I (Dharmakara) wish to attain the Buddha's pure and clear sound, and let the Dharma voice universally reach limitless boundaries" (Infinite Life Sutra).

* "I wish to penetrate the profound, subtle and wonderful Buddha's teaching" (Infinite Life Sutra).

* "May my wisdom be as vast and deep as the sea and my mind pure and void of impurities and afflictions" (Infinite Life Sutra).

* Although one may not be verbally chanting the Buddha's name at all times, it is important to be mindful of the Buddha unceasingly or else wandering thoughts may arise. Wandering thoughts are what pull us back into the endless cycle of reincarnation. In other words, if a Pure Land practitioner is not truly practicing for the Pure Land, he/she is practicing for the six realms of reincarnation.

* Pure mind and true wisdom prevent one from falling into the three bad realms; moreover, they lift one up to reach the perfection of the mind.

* "The poisons of greed, anger and ignorance will forever disappear, with the strength of samadhi I will end all delusions and faults" (Infinite Life Sutra).

* Three good roots for ordinary people to develop are ridding themselves of the Three Poisons: greed, anger and ignorance. Bodhisattvas have already eradicated these three. What they concentrate on is cultivating diligence.

* Strength developed from Contemplation of Buddha Amitabha Samadhi may dissolve all past transgressions, and uncover our wisdom by ending greed, anger, ignorance and delusion. This enables our inner brightness to shine through. We achieve this by sincere mindfulness of Buddha Amitabha and cultivate without doubt, intermingling with other thoughts and methods and without cessation.

* In the Surangama Sutra, Great Strength Bodhisattva taught us to use the Buddha name chanting method, to constantly maintain a pure mind void of thoughts. This will eventually uncover our true mind, leading us to the state of Samadhi.

* "Like the past incalculable Buddhas, may I become a great teacher to all living beings in the nine realms" (Infinite Life Sutra). Dharmakara wished that one day he would be a teacher to the beings in the whole universe like other countless Buddhas in the past, present and future.

* "And liberate everyone in every world from the myriad miseries of birth, old age, sickness and death" (Infinite Life Sutra). A great teacher helps to liberate all beings in the six realms from the suffering of birth, aging, sickness and death. He also helps those enlightened beings who have transcended reincarnation, but have not yet become a Buddha, to transcend their remaining ignorance.

* "I will constantly practice the Six Paramitas of giving, precept observation, patience, diligence, concentration and wisdom" (Infinite Life Sutra). Bodhisattvas themselves not only practice the Six Paramitas (Principles) but also encourage others to practice as well.

* The first of the Six Principles is Giving. There are three kinds of Giving.
1. Giving of wealth, which will result in wealth in return.
2. Giving of knowledge, either worldly or spiritual, which will result in intelligence or insight.
3. Giving of fearlessness, which will result in longevity and good health.

* All the infinite afflictions can be summed into six basic afflictions: greed, anger, ignorance, arrogance, doubt and erroneous viewpoints. These six can all be categorized under "greed." Anger arises when one cannot satisfy the greed within. Once the greed is satisfied, the anger naturally subsides. The practice of giving neutralizes greed, the worst of the three poisons of the mind.

* To rid ourselves of greed, we first reflect deeply to see what we crave the most. Starting from there, we proceed to let go of reputation, wealth, the five desires and the temptations of the six dusts or pollutants of the six senses.

* One creates obstacles for oneself by being unable to give. Reading Liao Fan's Four Lessons is a good basis for developing the Paramita of Giving. Understanding the truth of Cause and Effect, one will have the courage and joy to let go.

* When letting go of what one is destined to have, one will simply find it coming back from somewhere else. One will not be able to discard what one was meant to have, nor will one be able to keep what one was not meant to have. Furthermore, using devious means will not retain it either, but will instead bring disaster.

* The life of a human being is mapped out at birth. Bodhisattvas, heavenly beings or Kings of the Underworld do not control fate. Fate is determined by the causes one planted in their previous lives as well as in this life. Thus, one will either experience suffering or happiness in this life. However, one's thoughts, speech or behavior, resulting in good or bad karma, can change fate.

* Giving is not discarding, but gaining. It is actually a way of earning interest, but even more secure than that of a bank. Banks can go bankrupt. The value of a dollar may fall. However, the value within the acts of true giving will not diminish.

* The second Principle is precept observation. Its extended meaning is to follow the laws and customs wherever or whenever they apply.

* It is essential to practice giving before precept observation because without giving to neutralize the greed, one is unable to observe the precepts (laws, etc). For instance, when greed is in control, one thinks only of ways to possess wealth, not how to observe laws, an example is tax evasion.

* Cultivating the ten good conducts always brings good results. Although the result is good, this will only help one to reach heaven. However, one is still mired in reincarnation. On the other hand, observing the precepts brings the profound benefits of transcending reincarnation.

* The third Principle is patience. It teaches us to be patient in everything we say and do.

* It takes great patience to transcend the cycle of life and death. For all its simplicity and ease, the Buddha Name Chanting Method calls for patience in maintaining continuity, without doubt or intermingling. Though it may be hard at first, the result is attaining a certain degree of purity of mind, which brings out the true self, joy and true happiness; giving one the utmost enjoyment in life.

* With patience, Buddha Name Chanting elevates one's state of mind, level by level, enabling one to experience utmost happiness. The practice of giving is the first level, precept observation the second and patience the third. Like constructing a building while disregarding the first level, not being able to give will hinder one from reaching the second or the third levels.

* The fourth Principle is diligence. Diligence is being skillful and focusing on only one specialty, which brings a meaningful outcome. To succeed, one needs to concentrate on one method. People who attained achievements in this world initially specialized in one method. For those who study a variety of fields simultaneously, it is very hard to rise above the ones who have specialized.

* Upon reaching a certain level through profound cultivation on one method, we end affliction to open our mind. The more we focus on one simple method, the faster we advance. The more we intermingle with numerous difficult methods, the slower we advance.

* Because all sutras originate from self-nature, when one thoroughly comprehends one sutra, one comprehends all sutras.

* The fifth Principle is deep concentration. Insight gained from the practice of deep concentration helps us to truly suppress afflictions.

* The sixth Principle is wisdom. With firm concentration, we can awaken our realization, turning affliction into enlightenment and thus, truly severing our afflictions. At this point, one thoroughly comprehends the true reality of life and the universe, understanding clearly cause and effect, thereby attaining the great liberation.

* "For those undelivered sentient beings, let them be crossed over (to the other shore)" (Infinite Life Sutra). For those sentient beings who have not had the chance to encounter the Buddha's teaching, let the seed be planted so that in the future they will encounter these teachings.

* "For those already delivered let them attain Buddhahood" (Infinite Life Sutra). For those with good roots able to accept the Buddha's teaching, the Buddhas and Bodhisattvas will help them to progress rapidly to Buddhahood.

* The Infinite Life Sutra is the passport that the Buddha gave us to go to the Western Pure Land. Although we possess it, it may not be ours to use. Only when we are familiar with and practice its teachings, does it become ours to use.

* When lacking good roots, good fortune, merit, causes and conditions from the past, all one has to do is to nurture more in the present. Studying, reciting and comprehending the sutras, will help to break through doubt and instill unwavering belief in the Pure Land.

* "I would rather firmly and gallantly seek the proper enlightenment, than make offerings as boundless as Ganges sands, to the sages" (Infinite Life Sutra).

* The Ganges is the largest river in India with sand as fine as flour. It is often used in the sutras to describe an uncountable number.

* Making offerings to innumerable Buddhas and Bodhisattvas brings incredible good fortune. Yet, this fortune can only be enjoyed in the three good realms of reincarnation. Rather than staying in reincarnation, a Pure Land practitioner should put all their efforts into attaining rebirth in the Western Pure Land.

* The following eight verses are Monk Dharmakara's great vow to become a Buddha.

* "I wish to firmly remain in Samadhi, and constantly emit light to shine on all" (Infinite Life Sutra). Monk Dharmakara would stay in the Samadhi of Buddha Contemplation. The bright light generated from him would shine on all beings in the ten directions.

* "I vow to attain a vast and pure land..." (Infinite Life Sutra). The Western Pure Land was created from Monk Dharmakara's great pure vows. Beings are born in that land as the result of their pure karma.

* "...and make it's supreme adornment peerless" (Infinite Life Sutra). The splendor of the Western Pure Land is unequaled by any other Buddhaland.

* Monk Dharmakara did not establish the Pure Land for himself, but to provide an ideal environment for all beings to come and practice, to eventually become a Buddha.

* "For those beings amidst the six realms, I wish that they can quickly obtain rebirth in my land and enjoy the bliss" (Infinite Life Sutra). Monk Dharmakara wished to provide his utmost help to those in reincarnation. It would bring them peace and happiness if they could reach his world - the Western Pure Land.

* Bliss is the result of peace. However, harmony has to be achieved before peace ensues.

* In practicing, one nurtures the five virtues: gentility, kindness, respectfulness, thriftiness and humility. With others, one practices the Six Principles of Harmony.

* "I aspire to constantly employ compassion to help sentient beings and to cross over countless beings in misery" (Infinite Life Sutra). The extent of Monk Dharmakara's compassion to help all beings is beyond time and space; it is endless and dimensionless.

* Monk Dharmakara's compassion, which rose from the purity and equality of his mind, led him to vow to help all sentient beings cross over the river of reincarnation to the other shore of enlightenment.

* "The power of my vow and determination is adamant, only the Buddha's unsurpassed wisdom can perceive them" (Infinite Life Sutra).

* "Even amidst all kinds of suffering my vow will never regress" (Infinite Life Sutra). Although he would undergo all kinds of suffering, Monk Dharmakara would never waiver in his vows.

<end of file>

ÉÍÍÍ

and easiest without fixed forms. It is up to the practitioner to decide what is most suitable for him or her.

* Chanting the Buddha's name aloud helps to suppress afflictions. When we chant aloud, we can chase away wandering thoughts and drowsiness thus concentrating our mind. When we are alert, we can chant silently but continuously. We need to know which is most fitting.

* There is no fixed form in chanting the Buddha's name, but there is a basic principle, to let our mind become quiet, peaceful and without wandering thoughts. This is one of the purposes in chanting the Buddha's name.

* We can do walking meditation while chanting. When we feel tired, we can sit and continue chanting. If we feel stiff when sitting, we may get up to walk or prostrate. In this way, we can adjust our body accordingly.

* The more we chant and are mindful of Buddha Amitabha, the less our wandering thoughts will arise and the purer our mind will become, and the more wisdom we will attain. If not so, then something is incorrect in our way of practice. Therefore, we need to know how to harmonize our body and mind to keep our mind peaceful and quiet, and our body active and healthy.

* The title Infinite Life Sutra clearly explains that one chants the Buddha's name with a pure, non-discriminating and awakened mind. On the other hand, one uses the chanting method to attain a pure, non-discriminating and awakened mind. The chanting enhances this state of mind, which in turn enhances further the chanting.

* "After Monk Dharmakara spoke these verses, he addressed to the Buddha and said, 'I wish to practice the Bodhisattva way'" (Infinite Life Sutra). The Bodhisattva way is to help all sentient beings.

* Monk Dharmakara vowed to attain the perfect complete enlightenment, to become a Buddha, to help sentient beings and not for himself.

* Four Universal Vows of Buddhas and Bodhisattvas are:

1. Sentient beings are innumerable, I vow to help them all.
2. Afflictions are inexhaustible, I vow to end them all.
3. Ways to practice are boundless, I vow to master them all.
4. Enlightenment is unsurpassable, I vow to attain it.

Today, we wholeheartedly vow to be born into the Pure Land to become a Buddha like Buddha Amitabha so we can help all sentient beings. To do this, we start with the first vow, then proceed to the second vow, etc. Before attaining unsurpassable Enlightenment, one needs to master the ways of practice. Before one masters the ways of practice, one needs to end afflictions. And before beginning to end afflictions, one needs to vow to help all sentient beings.

* Will the one who truly generates such a great, ultimate vow to become completely enlightened create any bad karma or evil thoughts? Absolutely not. Could this person give in to temptation? Of course not. Not even when faced with the opportunity to be the president of a country or the king of the Mahabrahman heaven. His goal to become enlightened is so pure and proper, that he would not be tempted even by such opportunities.

* In order to eradicate the roots of birth and death, the first priority is to sever afflictions and then vow to go to the Western Pure Land. Once we sever our afflictions and attain Buddha Name Mindfulness Samadhi, we are certain to go to the Pure Land. We need to set this as our most important goal in this life.

* "Ways to practice are boundless, I vow to master them all" (Third Universal Vow). Life is short; we need to wait until we reach the Pure Land, where we will have the best of teachers and classmates to learn from, and the time to study and master all the sutras.

* Many practitioners are in a hurry to accomplish in this lifetime, the latter two of the Four Universal Vows. They studied and practiced too many different methods, failed to obtain a pure mind and were unable to end their afflictions, thus missing this rarest opportunity to achieve attainment in this life.

* Many people come to practice Buddhism only for themselves, to keep their family from harm, to have successful careers, health and longevity. They may practice for a lifetime, only to remain mired in the cycle of life and death. Their goal was only to seek the good fortune of humans and heavenly beings.

* Buddha and Bodhisattvas are not celestial beings, for the latter are still mired within the cycle of the six realms. Celestial beings are deluded and do not totally understand the true reality of life and the universe.

* "I entreat the Buddha to extensively proclaim to me the sutras and Buddhadharma. I will uphold and cultivate them accordingly" (Infinite Life Sutra). This illustrates Monk Dharmakara's learning approach. If one is not thoroughly awakened, one will not be so determined in cultivating and upholding the teacher's guidance.

* Upon finding one's behavior, thoughts and viewpoints to be in conflict with the teachings in the sutra, one should correct them. Or else no matter how many times one recites, it would be futile because no meaningful results would be gained. When some cultivators fail to receive positive effects from recitation, instead of reflecting within they may place the blame on Buddhas and Bodhisattvas, in effect slandering them, causing themselves to be born into the hell realm.

* How much the teacher will instruct depends on the learning attitude of the student. The more the student can uphold and cultivate, the more the teacher will impart.

* Monk Dharmakara vowed that when he becomes a Buddha, his wisdom, light, the land where he lives (Western Pure Land) and what he teaches (Namo Amitabha) would be known by all sentient beings of infinite Buddhalands in ten directions.

* All sentient beings of the six realms in the ten directions who go to the Pure Land will first become Bodhisattvas.

* Monk Dharmakara also vowed to become a Buddha who surpassed all other Buddhas. He asked Buddha Lokesvararaja if he would be able to accomplish these vows. Buddha Lokesvararaja replied with an example. "If a person tries to scoop up the water from the ocean through many aeons, he will dry up the water and see the bottom. With perseverance and sincerity what wish is there that he cannot fulfill?" (Infinite Life Sutra). If one is truly determined, one can achieve any goal.

* What is the sincere mind? A mind without wandering thoughts. One who has such a mind shall be awakened listening to Dharma talks.

* Today we feel unhappy and suffer hardships because our minds are impure, discriminating and deluded.

* Great Master Chin-Liang stated in his commentary on the Avatamsaka (Flower Adornment) Sutra that one who has not yet severed one's afflictions or become awakened, will find his or her extensive knowledge leads to erroneous viewpoints. It is essential to be balanced in both cultivation and understanding.

* A Dharma lecturer who does not cultivate often will have erroneous thoughts and viewpoints and will therefore mislead others. This person uses his or her own viewpoints, which distort the Buddha's teachings into worldly viewpoints.

* Buddha Lokesvararaja did not directly answer Monk Dharmakara's question as to whether or not he would be able to accomplish his vows. Rather, he asked Monk Dharmakara to contemplate which expedient way to cultivate and accomplish the adornment of the Buddhaland.

* Once our minds are pure, non-discriminating and awakened, the Buddha and we are of one mind for that split second. However, once our minds revert to greed, anger, ignorance and arrogance, we are again mortal. Buddhas have the ability to maintain their pure state at all times.

* Monk Dharmakara's good roots, wisdom, virtue and learning surpassed all the others, enabling him to know how to accomplish his vows. Given only a hint, he would instantly comprehend all.

* All the Buddhas establish their own Buddhaland by their respective vows.

* Some Buddhas choose to go to impure worlds, like Buddha Shakyamuni choosing to help the sentient beings in this Saha world. Other Buddhas choose a pure world. Therefore, Monk Dharmakara would make his own choice.

* Buddha Amitabha had already become a Buddha infinite aeons ago, not just the ten stated in the sutra. He is very compassionate, pretending to know nothing so that Buddha Lokesvararaja would have the opportunity to give him a detailed explanation, thus, allowing us to hear the sutra.

* Monk Dharmakara responded, "Such principles are vast and profound, it is not the state of my own can perceive. I entreat the Thus Come One, with the request to be recognizable by all, to broadly proclaim and manifest to me the measureless, wonderful lands of all Buddhas. When I hear and see such Dharmas, I will contemplate, practice and determine to fulfill my vows."

* The goal of ancient Chinese education was to teach the students to treat all with proper manners. Only when one has clear understanding of the relationships between father and son, siblings, friends, and co-workers, and how to cultivate one's virtue, will one know how to be an honorable person, and thus how to get along harmoniously with people. Knowing this will ensure one a happy family, a harmonious society, a strong nation and a peaceful world.

* Morality and proper conduct are the first priority of Confucian education. If a student does not possess these qualities, a wise teacher will try to correct the faults before proceeding with the teaching. This is to prevent the student from gaining any ability to harm society.

* Buddha Lokesvararaja knew that Monk Dharmakara was decent and virtuous, intelligent and wise, harboring a great compassionate vow. Therefore, to comply with his wish, the Buddha described and showed to him the merits, virtues and adornment of all the twenty one billion Buddhalands. Twenty-one is a symbolic number in the Esoteric school symbolizing complete perfection.

* When Zen Patriarch Master Dharma met Emperor Liang Wu in China, he found the emperor very proud of himself. The emperor said, "I have already accomplished many good deeds in the name of Buddhism. I have established four hundred and eighty Buddhist temples and helped hundreds of thousands of people to become ordained persons. How great is my merit from all of this?" Master Dharma honestly replied, "No merit at all."

* If the emperor had asked instead, "how great is my good fortune from all this?" Master Dharma would have answered, "Very great indeed!"

* Nowadays, many people misunderstand the difference between merit and good fortune. They think that simply donating money will gain much merit. Actually, this only brings good fortune. Merit is gained through one's practice by observing the precepts, cultivating concentration and attaining wisdom. Merit cannot be bought.

* When we are ignorant of our faults and others come and tell us, we would do well to correct them as soon as possible. This is precept observation. Precept observation does not just include observing precepts in the Buddhist sutras but also following the advice of teachers, parents and friends.

* Our countenance can be changed by the thoughts we harbor in our mind. If we are kind and gentle, our face will become kindhearted. If we are cruel and malicious, our face will become harsh looking. We bear the responsibility for our features after age forty, they are no longer solely what we were born with.

* Fortune-tellers have a saying; "a fortunate land is dwelt by people with good fortune and vice versa." If a person with less good fortune lived in a fortunate area, this person would soon feel uncomfortable and would want to move away. Thus, it is important to cultivate good fortune.

* The Buddha is the honored one complete with two perfections: one is wisdom, the other is good fortune.

* It is recommended that the practitioner spend at least ten years studying just one sutra to truly master it. On the other hand, if one studies ten sutras in ten years, one will barely skim their surface.

* Good students are the ones who consecutively spend ten years mastering one sutra, then two to three years on the second sutra, then half a year on the third and then one to two months on the fourth. The deeper one delves into the first sutra, the more concentration one achieves, thus building a strong foundation. Once one deeply comprehends one sutra, it takes less time to learn a new one.

* In the beginning of their practice, the teacher instructs the students to concentrate only on sutras of their selected school and not on those of other schools. This is to cultivate concentration in order to attain the pure mind. When the first step is achieved, one may continue to develop comprehensive learning.

* The four studies of Confucian teachings are virtue, speech, skills to earn a living and finally the arts. It is important for one to learn them in their respective order.

* There is an ancient Chinese saying, "The tongue is the gate leading to good fortune or misfortune throughout one's life." Beware of careless speech, which can easily hurt others, unexpectedly causing resentment in them and bringing reprisals upon us. Therefore, it is important to learn appropriate speech.

* During that time, Buddha Lokesvararaja was very patient in giving instructions for one hundred billion years and Monk Dharmakara was equally patient in learning tirelessly. It took that long to thoroughly view and analyze all the Buddhaland in the ten directions. This illustrates that patience in learning is the key to success.

* Taking something without permission is stealing. Of course, if one steals from others, one will have to pay them back someday. If one steals the possession of another, he or she only owes that person. If one steals city property, for example a public telephone installed by the city, then he or she owes the citizens of that city. If the property belongs to the country, then he or she owes the citizens of that country. Property in temples belongs to sentient beings in the infinite universe. Consequently, If one steals from temples, then he or she owes infinite beings in the ten directions thus leading one to the Avici Hell (the deepest of the eight burning hells).

* Buddha Amitabha's unsurpassable forty-eight vows were generated gradually during Dharmakara's hundred billion years of study and five aeons of cultivation. He condensed and perfected all that he learned from his study and cultivation of the Buddhaland in the ten directions to create the ideal land without any negative elements.

* When Buddha Amitabha made his selections to create his land, he used a single mind, a true mind without wandering, discriminating, attaching or deluded thoughts. With this true mind, every single choice would be perfect.

* Good choices are made when one's mind is truly at peace.

* A true Pure Land cultivator chants the Buddha's name with a sincere and pure mind. It is said in sutras that no bad spirits would dare to come within forty miles of a true cultivator. When one's body and mind are pure, Buddha Amitabha and all other Buddhas and Bodhisattvas will care for and protect this person.

* One should be ashamed of one's lack of cultivation if the spirits often come and make fun of oneself. Most likely, it indicates that the cultivator is not practicing in accordance with the teachings.

* One is not practicing in accordance with the Buddha's teachings if one chants the Buddha's name or recites the sutra while still harboring doubt, unable to let go of fame, wealth or desire. No matter how much one cultivates, all the efforts will be futile if one still attaches to greed, anger, ignorance or arrogance, discrimination between right or wrong, yours or mine and has nothing to do with the purity, equality and awakening,

* In our daily lives, it is necessary to practice even tiny good deeds, for an accumulation of these will make a great deed. Likewise, one would do well to be aware of even trivial faults and correct them, for many trivial faults add up to a big one. One needs to start from small places in severing misdeeds and accumulating good ones.

* True cultivation starts at the place where thoughts arise.

* The principle that one needs to follow in continuing the lifeline of the Buddha's teachings is to accord with conditions and not to purposely seek out opportunities. If the opportunities do not arise, we do not seek or force an opportunity. If we harbor an idea to create an opportunity, our mind will be neither calm nor pure, nor will it be in accordance with the teachings.

* One waits for the opportunity to spontaneously arise. If it is not yet the right time, then we just diligently cultivate.

* Never try to purposely seek out an opportunity, but when the opportunity arises, one needs to do one's best in accomplishing it.

* Many practitioners, who were formerly ill, recovered naturally upon chanting the Buddha's name sincerely.

* A professor of Tan Chiang University, Taiwan, had a tumor in his head for twenty years. Since the tumor was not very big, he did not worry about it. Recently when the tumor began to grow, the doctor suggested surgery. A practitioner suggested that he chant the name of Guan Yin Bodhisattva instead. After the professor chanted sincerely for four months, the doctor reexamined him and found the tumor was gone. When the mind is pure, the body naturally becomes pure.

* In the Buddha's teachings, it is more important to have confidence in oneself than to believe in the Buddha. When one loses confidence in oneself, one's self-nature is not equal to that of a Buddha. At that point, even Buddhas and Bodhisattvas are unable to help this person. Only when one is determined and has complete confidence in oneself, will Buddhas and Bodhisattvas truly be able to help.

* Many people's beliefs are easily shaken by the persuasion of ones from other schools. This indicates that they lack self-confidence and are easily misled.

* With his achievement in having created the Pure Land, Monk Dharmakara circled, prostrated and reported to the Buddha, with palms together in a respectful and sincere manner. Not only was he respectful toward his teacher, but to all the Buddhas of the ten directions in the past, present and future as well.

* Some people become arrogant as they learn more about Buddhism. What they really learned is not Buddhism, but delusion. All true practitioners of Buddhism have respect for their teachers. The relationship of teacher and student is like that of parent and child. Regardless of how much time the teacher spends with us, we shall never forget his or her kindness in helping to correct our faults, thus enabling us to cease doing bad deeds and to practice good ones. This is true education.

* Monk Dharmakara reported his achievement to his teacher. The Buddha answered, "Excellent! Now is the time for you to speak it all and let living beings rejoice with you. You should also let the living beings hear such a Dharma and obtain great benefit. They should be able to practice the cultivation, gather themselves in your Buddhaland and fulfill the measureless great vows of Buddhas and those living beings" (Infinite Life Sutra).

* Buddha Lokesvararaja and Monk Dharmakara portrayed the best role models for teacher and student. When this student's vows surpassed those of his teacher, the former showed neither resentment nor jealousy but praised his student's accomplishment and sent his other students to learn from him. From this, we can see the depth of Buddha Lokesvararaja's sincerity and unselfishness.

* Every Buddha's objective is for all sentient beings to become Buddhas as soon as possible. Yet, the karmic obstacles of sentient beings are so great that they block themselves from attaining Buddhahood.

* The Western Pure Land created by Buddha Amitabha provides the best opportunity to become a Buddha, for those with great karmic obstacles

* The true meaning of great benefit is to equally enable all sentient beings of the nine realms of all Buddhalands of the ten directions to gain true liberation. This is not only the fundamental vow of Buddha Amitabha, but of all Buddhas.

ÉÍÍÍ

within the teachings.

* Shakyamuni (Skrt) is the name of the historical and latest Buddha in our world who lived over 2500 years ago. "Shakya" means kindness, which represents the way we should treat others. "Muni" means stillness, which represents freedom from agitation, the state in which our mind ultimately should exist.

* Buddhists regard Buddha Shakyamuni as our "Original Teacher." Buddhism is an educational system, for the title of teacher is not found in religions, only in education.

* The aspiration of a Buddha is to help all beings to be free from suffering, to reach full realization. When the time comes for beings to accept the Pure Land teachings, great joy arises in all the Buddhas.

* The power of visualization is tremendous. Everything in the universe is derived from one's mind. Constant contemplation of the Buddha leads to becoming a Buddha, whereas a mind constantly harboring ignorance, greed and anger leads one to the three lower realms of animals, hungry ghosts and hells, respectively.

* A Buddha's mind, in essence, is equal to that of an ordinary being. However, a Buddha has a clear mind without any greed, anger, and ignorance, whereas, an ordinary being has a deluded one. This makes an ordinary being different from a Buddha.

* Amitabha (Skrt) is a Buddha's name, primarily meaning Infinite Life.

* "Infinite Life" is the most important meaning within "Amitabha." Others include infinite light, boundless wisdom, virtue, talent, etc.

* "Amitabha" virtually encompasses every word from the Infinite Life Sutra. The Western Pure Land is also contained within this name. No virtue is beyond the scope of the name "Amitabha."

* Contemplation of Buddha Amitabha's name all the time, persistently and without any doubt or intermingling with other thoughts leads one to true realization.

* By purifying one's body, mind and speech through the practice of chanting "Amitabha," one is adorned with magnificence radiated from within.

* The Western Pure Land, Amitabha's world, is a world of truth, grace, splendor and wisdom. All beings there develop their purity from within.

* Many great masters in China, even ones from other Buddhist schools, have chosen to be born into the Pure Land, for example, the Zen masters Yung Ming of the Sung Dynasty and Cher Wu of the Ching Dynasty.

* Chanting only one Buddha's name, Amitabha, contributes to the benefits of purifying one's mind and of being born into the Western Pure Land within the shortest period.

* The Western Pure Land has all the wonderful things that other Buddhalands have, but none of the unpleasant ones. That is why it is called the Land of Ultimate Bliss.

* All other Buddhas admire Buddha Amitabha and praise the Western Pure Land. Therefore, they strongly encourage all sentient beings to seek rebirth into Buddha Amitabha's world.

* The practice of Buddha name chanting will work effectively with pure conviction and strong determination. The practitioner is assured to go to the Western Pure Land and become a Buddha in one lifetime when one also practices according to the teachings.

* Buddha Amitabha is a Buddha within one's self-nature. His world also appears in one's mind. Everything essentially is a reflection of and cannot be separated from one's true nature.

* In order to attain a pure mind, one must overcome the internal obstacles of worry, delusion and habit accumulated over aeons of lifetimes, and the external obstacles of the enticements of too many adverse conditions which surround us.

* It is just a matter of thought whether we remain in or transcend the cycle of birth and death. We make the decision. Realizing this, we can escape from this cycle by cultivating a pure mind and vowing to go to the Western Pure Land.

* How does one check to see whether one's practice is progressing? A good sign is when we have less worry and wandering thoughts.

* The Buddha has taught us many methods to be freed from worry and delusion. If one method, sincerely practiced, does not work, one can try another, just as a doctor would give different prescriptions to patients with different illnesses.

* Master Yin-Guang, the thirteenth Patriarch of the Pure Land School, recommended people in this Dharma Ending Age practice the Pure Land teachings.

* The study and practice of the Buddha's teaching follow three guidelines: 1.Following the precepts, 2. Cultivating deep concentration and 3. Uncovering wisdom.

* The primary methods of practice are reciting the sutra and Buddha name chanting. When reciting, one also practices the Six Principles or Paramitas (Skrt) of giving, precept observation, patience, diligence, concentration and wisdom. When no other thought is concerned, it is "Giving." When no erroneous thought occurs, it is "Precept observation." When staying with this process without interruption, it is "Patience." When reaching one's goal in recitation, it is "Diligence." When focusing on recitation, it is "Concentration." When insight is obtained from within, it is "Wisdom."

* Diligently reciting the sutra helps one to eliminate karmic obstacles, worry and established habits acquired over aeons. Consequently, one attains purity, equality and finally, ultimate realization.

* Duality is not equality. Oneness is equality. A wandering thought arising in one's mind disturbs this oneness and renders everything unequal.

* The Infinite Life Sutra can help everyone to become a Buddha. Everyone who follows this teaching. From a Bodhisattva to an Arhat, from an ordinary being to one in the lower three realms can turn into a Buddha.

* The benefits from this Pure Land teaching are so inconceivable that initially they are extremely difficult for people to believe.

<end of file>

[This document can be acquired from a sub-directory coombspapers viaanonymous FTP or the node COOMBS.ANU.EDU.AU orANU Soc.Sci.WWW Server at http://coombs.anu.edu.a document's ftp filename and the full directory path are given inthe coombspapers top level I files][This version: 1 November 1995]----------THE PATH OF THE BODHISAT [Hekigan Roku: Case 89]Subhana BarzaghiSesshin Teisho[this text was first published in th CIRCLE, Winter 1995 pp. 13-16]This text addresses some of the most fundamental and deli issues.Therefore, it should be read, quoted and analysed in a mindful way.All copyrights to t belong to Subhana Barzaghi Sensei, Kuan-Yin ZenCenter, NSW, AustraliaEnquiries: The E Circle", Sydney Zen Centre, 251 Young St.,Annandale, Sydney, NSW 2038, Australia. Tel: + 2993----------THE PATH OF THE BODHISATTVASubhana BarzaghiUngan asked Dojo, "How does the Bodhisattva Kanzeonu and eyes?"Dogo answered, "It is like a man in the middle of the night reachingbehind his he pillow."Ungan said, "I understand."Dogo said, "How do you understand it?"Ungan said, "The hand and eye."Dogo said, "That is very well expressed, but it isonly eight-tenths of the answ said, "How would you say it, Elder Brother?"Dogo said, "Throughout the body, the hand and Case 89The Bodhisattva ideal is particular to the Mahayana Path. Bodhi meansawakened being. Together they mean a person who isawake and who is committed to the liberation a everyhuman being and creature.One of the grand archetypal images of the Bodhisattva of C isportrayed with 1,000 arms and eyes. In this imagery, the eyes of theBodhisattva symbolise the hands symbolise compassion.The compassion and wisdom of the 1,000 arms and eyes help to those who are suffering and the readiness to take onthe suffering of all other beings. is, "How does the Bodhisattva of great compassion usethose many hands and eyes?" Or, i theBodhisattva way of being in the world? What are some of the ways wecan bring wisdom the world?Dogo said, "It's like a person in the middle of the night reachingbehind their head pillow."This is a very interesting answer. There is a lovely image ofnaturalness in this respo suggests a person who is halfconscious and half asleep, like in a dream, instinctively gropin dark and reaching back for the pillow. This is ametaphor for true compassion which comes naturalresponse. Our deepest natural response arises from the act offorgetting the self.A co but erroneous view is that the Bodhisattva seeksBuddhahood through the systematic practic butrenounces complete entry into nirvana until all beings cross over tothe other shore, and a liberated.In our Bodhisattva vows we chant, "The many beings are numberless, Ivow to save do we save the many beings? The correctMahayana perspective is that realisation is the a theself". In the moment of "forgetting the self", we are united with allbeings in the universe a so we liberate them, because intruth we are not separate from all beings. This is what is me all beings.To follow the trail of a true human being is to hear the call ofsuffering and use eve circumstance to express compassion andunderstanding. As our practice widens we gather tobear witness and embrace the suffering in the world. One of thepitfalls is that we can hol inflated or idealistic image ofourselves as the saviour, the rescuer, the do-gooder, none of w who we actually are. The Bodhisattva way is the way of truesimplicity, it is the art of being v attentive, listening with anopen spacious heart and returning the freedom and wonder to eve every situation.The Bodhisattva within each of you knows that love is irresistible andperhaps There is no going back. Once we encounterawareness and love we see through our narrov contraction,stubbornness, fear, defensiveness, anger and greed. Although we mayrevisit ou tend to no longer be buried by them. Wecome to abide and trust that love and wisdom are i andtransform whatever they touch.Within each of you is this spirit, this light, this generosity a of our Buddha nature which are in many ways the greatest giftswe can bring to the earth. It' sometimes this light gets alittle buried as we scratch out a meagre existence in our own little preoccupied with trying to keep the grass down.I remember one of my earliest practices in th tradition whichwas to sit and contemplate the thought that every being I ever have orwill enc at some time my mother, father, brother,uncle, aunt, sister, son or daughter. It seems bizarr contemplatethat this ant was once my father in some previous life. Yet, strangeas it is, it bri a respect, reverence and tenderness forall life and greater responsiveness to all creatures. isliterally true or not is irrelevant, we can open our hearts to thisreverence and experience th bird as our brothers, that weare interconnected and interdependent in the seamless fabric of of the great qualities of the Bodhisattva way of being in theworld is to practice with a listenin Fran Peavey, a socialand peace activist, shared this story about the CompassionateListenin and her friends travelled to various "hotspots" in the world, places of conflict, war or racial vi Theysimply walked into these troubled places, sat down and listened. Theypractised listenin and attention to all sides of theconflict. When people felt heard, then the tension eased and and possibility opened up for negotiation.Right here in my own backyard in Lismore, in the v thelocal political domain, there is a wonderful story. Councillor LynCarson was running as on Community Independents for the CityCouncil elections. During their innovative campaign, s mates went to the busy street corners of Lismore and sat downwith a sign saying, "Commun willing to listen." Oneby one people would come up and talk about their concerns.A truly gre compassionate listening came out of the BoodanLand Gift Movement in India. One of my ea VimalaThaker, was very involved in this movement and I was reminded of thisinspiring story journey to India. After Ghandi's death,Vinoba Bhave, a senior elder in the Ghandian movem asix-month walk on foot half-way across India to a Conference., Vinobawould walk into rura the way and invite everyone togather around and tell their stories of hardship.One of the ma continually emerged was the plight of theUntouchables, the people Gandhi renamed Harijan ofGod". They suffered severe poverty and had no land to grow their ownfood. Upon hearin Vinoba offered to take their concernsto the Prime Minister, to try and have land reallocated t poor. However, Vinoba knew in his heart that the Indianbureaucracy was so ponderous that forever to bring abouteven minor changes. He also knew that by the time each pettybureau government department took their slice of the land"pie" there would be virtually nothing left f poor.Vinoba did not want to create false hope, so the next day he onceagain gathered toget villagers, this time to apologise andconfess his doubt that such action would gain them the la sodesperately needed.A wealthy landowner in the gathering was deeply moved by Vinoba's honesty and immediately offered to give some of his landto the Untouchables. In the next vi recounted this storyof futility and generosity to another gathering and again a wealthylandow some of his land.By the time Vinoba had reached the conference, two thousand acres hadbe the poorest villagers. Inspired by Vinoba's work,Vimala also walked across India from east t to southand eventually ten million acres of land was given back to thelandless poor without a from the bureaucracy. All of thisbegan with the simple act and spirit of listening.Our quality o listening does expand. At first we are preoccupied byour own individual song. Meditation he outside this songand tune into the great song that moves through all of us. The greatsong al without judgement, without picking and choosingbetween the ten thousand different voices i choir oflife from the children's cries and laughter to the complaining,whining voice, the silent oppression, the weeping voice, thecritical voice, the joyful, playful voice, the piercing voice o thecurrawong and the deafening voice of the crickets at sunset. All areintertwined in the son part of ourselves, and yet we arenone of these.In Tung-shan's Five Degrees of Honour and degree ofvirtue is when we listen to the ancient song that rests in the heartbefore time began that is beyond all stories, beyond allgoals. This is the virtue of ascending to the world of emp wherewe don't even see the trace of a cloud. Yamada Roshi described it as"the world of no variations, no phenomena, noconcepts." We still wish to save all beings, but there are no be the whole world.The second degree of virtue is descending again into the world ofdifference however seeing each thing as a uniqueexpression of essential nature. Again, the Bodhisatt arisenstrongly from our bosom. We now come to honour, and find ourselvesbowing to the d sangha, bowing to the difficultex-spouse, bowing to the sick child, bowing to the garbage, bo gratitude for our daily bread and cheese, bowing to every kind ofperson. Whether rich or po we respond accordingly.Yasutani Roshi added some comments here. "Before the degree of because of delusion. Upon the degree of virtue we arenot free, because of satori, because proudrealisations. When we attain to the degree of combined virtue for thefirst time, we are free."To walk the trail of a true human being, one's action must be inharmony with the ancien conscious conduct. Our ethicalconduct of living and refining the Five Precepts are gifts ofno offer to the world. The positive power of virtue isfathomless. The Five Precepts become our place ofengaged expression in the world.It is said there are two great forces in the world; on forceof hatred, those who are unafraid to kill others; and the other greatforce arises from the unafraid to die and use only weaponsof love, insight and compassion.The following story of was told to me first by a peaceactivist in Thailand. Maha Gosananda is one of those people weapons of love, who is unafraid to take a stand for truth andpractice metta, loving-kindness face of great adversityand fear of death. He is an inspiring and extraordinary Buddhistmonk last remaining elders in Cambodia. He was invited toopen a Buddhist temple on the Thai bo camp. As manyas 50,000 villagers had been forced to become communists either bythreat had fled to the refugee camp. Thesevillagers had endured enormous suffering.Parents and killed, families torn apart, theirtemples, schools and villages destroyed and burnt. Many had beenthreatened with death if they attended the opening of the temple, butdespite this, 20,00 turned up for the opening ceremony.What could Maha Gosananda say to those people whos beentotally ripped apart? Maha Gosananda started the ceremony withancient and traditiona then he chanted one of thecentral verses of the Buddha, first in Pali (the traditional language Buddha) and then in Cambodian.Hatred never ceases by hatred but by love alone is heale an ancient and eternal law.He chanted these verses over and over and thousands of people and wept. Despite their pain, grief, anger and suffering,the truth they chanted was even gra suffering. Truthhas the virtue to hold and transform our sorrows.To act in the world most eff actions cannot come from thesmall sense of self, our limited identity, our personal hopes an we must listen to a greater possibility, a greaterdream for humanity, and cultivate actions co highestintentions. If we listen to the Tao, the deep current of truth andact in accordance wit then no matter what happens, ouractions will be OK. Reverence for the dark and the light move freely in the world, responding with compassion to thesuffering and being free in the m resting with theDharma rather than the drama.If we return to the Case, remember Ungan sa is handand eye." The wisdom of the Bodhisattva is to not be caught and boundby the conce ordinary, self and other. Thedistinction between ordinary being and saint are wiped away.Av arms raised to save sentient beings become our own,which are now engaged in sipping and tea, preparinga meal for the family, opening the window to let the light in,inviting a friend ove chat. These present hands and eyesreveal the whole of it, the whole mystery is revealed rig hand, if you look deep enough. The light at work that shineswithin you, this non-discriminati does not waver, with nofixed abode, is unhindered like the moon traversing the sky.Respond is only one face of life. Another eye of theBodhisattva is to live imbued with the face of won simpleacts of mindfulness, our hearts are unfettered and we see the face ofwonder, even in of our lives. Wonder may beecstatic, joyous breathtaking, an exhilarating experience ofconn loved one, a reunion of old dear friends, the joy ofthe full moon rising over the cliffs, or stand under the MilkyWay. Wonder is joining with this miraculous moment, whatever it maybe. W which can only ever be found in the presentmoment, where we are stripped bare to the pure tree,leaf, walking, touching and seeing.As we walk further and further into our old growth for deeperinto our practice, so too our sense of wonder increases, right inamongst the daily ritu cleaning, breathing, sweeping, sortingand carrying, It's a mystery to stand here in the mist o not know our own true face. There is wonder in that. It's also awonder to stand here and se vastness and know your roots.But knowing and not-knowing are momentary experiences, st in consciousness, movements on the surface of the sea. Ouroriginal face of wonder is beyo not-knowing. It's justadjusting the pillow in the middle of the night.So, Bodhisattvas, what wi with your many hands and eyes?----------end o file

STEPS ALONG THE PATH

by Phra Ajaan Thate Desaransi (Phra Rajanirodharansi)

Translated from the Thai by Thanissaro Bhikkhu

Copyright 1994 The Abbot, Metta Forest Monastery

This work may be copied or reprinted //for free distribution// without permission from the copyright holder.
Otherwise, all rights reserved.

* * *

DharmaNet Edition 1994

Transcribed for DharmaNet by Eileen Santer

This electronic edition is offered for free distribution via DharmaNet by arrangement with the translator.

DharmaNet International
P.O. Box 4951, Berkeley CA 94704-4951

* * * * * * * *

PREFACE

The little book you are now holding in your hand grew from the faith and conviction of a Westerner of Jewish extraction, named Dr. Philip,

who came to study Buddhism in Thailand in 1963, when I was staying on Phuket Island. He studied meditation with me for a full six months, and seemed to develop not only peace of mind but also a great appreciation for Buddhism's worth. Before returning to Hawaii, he asked me to write down a few short and simple points for him to take and continue practicing, so I wrote down ten points. Afterwards, I learned that he had had them printed abroad in a periodical whose name slips my mind at the moment.

The thought has occurred to me that this little book might be of use to those who are interested in practicing meditation, as it is small, easy to carry and read through quickly without taxing the brain. So I have edited it, polishing the style and adding more points -- in particular, point 11 and onwards (i.e., how to deal with visions and signs in meditation) -- in order to make the book more complete, fit to be a guide to the practice of meditation: showing the worth of meditation, the way to meditate, which ways of meditation are right, which are wrong, and in detail how to correct those things which should be corrected in the practice. I hope that this little book will be of use to those who are interested.

If anything written here deviates from the truth, I ask for all the responsibility to be placed on me alone, since I still lack experience in terms of education, practice, writing skills and knowledge of many fields. If knowledgeable people should come across this book, I would be very grateful if they would correct and enlighten me.

* * *

1.

A basic tenet of the Buddha's teachings is that the mind and body work together, but that the body lies under the control of the mind. The mind is what orders the body to do this or that activity, but when the body wears down, the mind is of necessity put to some hardship as well. It doesn't lie under the control of the nervous system, although the brain can be regarded as a central office. When the body dies, disintegrating in line with the nature of its various elements, the mind -- if the necessary conditions of unawareness, craving, attachment and kamma are still present -- will have to reappear in this or that plane of existence and to continue experiencing suffering and stress.

2.

In order to do away with unawareness, craving, attachment and kamma -- which are the chief instigators -- we must first of all practice abandoning the elementary evils of word and deed by observing the principles of morality that correspond to our station in life. In other words, laypeople should observe the five precepts and, periodically, the eight precepts; novices should observe the ten or the twenty precepts; and monks, all 227 precepts of the basic monastic code, together with the principles of pure livelihood, restraint of the senses and proper use of the requisites of life as formulated by the Buddha.

As long as your precepts aren't being kept pure, your mind isn't yet ready for training. Even if it is trained, its training won't lead to progress and development in the Dhamma, for its foundations aren't yet firm enough to advance along the Noble Path -- and we can say that it hasn't yet reached the refuge of the Triple Gem (//ti-ratana//). A true Buddhist must before all else be firmly based in the Triple Gem and the principles of morality.

The Noble Eightfold Path and the three teachings at the heart of Buddhism -- the avoidance of all evil, the perfection of goodness and the purification the heart -- have to be established first on the principles of morality. This is why, for the Buddha's teachings, morality is the beginning of the religious life.

The next step is to train the mind to develop concentration (//samadhi//) and absorption (//jhana//) through the practice of tranquility meditation. Once the mind is adept at maintaining a steady focus, we can then develop clear insight (//vipassana//) based on an understanding of the Three Characteristics of inconstancy, stress and not-self. This will lead us to pure knowledge and vision of things as they actually are, and thus to release from all things detrimental and defiling.

3.

For Buddhism, the true aim in developing concentration and absorption is to gather one's mental energies and make them steady and strong in a single point. This then forms the basis for the knowledge and discernment capable of gaining true insight into all conditions of nature and eliminating all that is detrimental and defiling from the heart. Thus, stillness of mind is developed not simply for other, external purposes, such as the various fields of science. Instead, it is meant specifically for use in cleansing the heart of such defilements as the five Hindrances (//nivarana//). But when you have practiced to the point of proficiency, you can use your stillness of mind in any way you like, as long as that use isn't detrimental to yourself or to others.

4.

In training the mind -- which is a mental phenomenon -- material objects such as chains and leashes are of no use. The mind has to be trained by tutoring it, first by listening to the explanation of those who are already skilled and then by being determined to practice in line with those explanations, basing your initial efforts on a sense of trust and conviction if your own independent explorations into cause and effect don't succeed.

By and large, people who start out by exploring cause and effect on their own don't reach their desired goal because they lack the proper approach. They miss the true path, tending instead to be biased in favor of their own ideas. To develop first a sense of trust and faith in the individual giving the training and in the practices in which one is being trained until the mind if firm and unwavering, and //then// to begin exploring and figuring things out, in line with the way they really are: This is what will give satisfactory results.

This is because to begin by exploring cause and effect is usually a matter of looking at things from the outside, following external influences -- i.e., "This person says that...That person says this." But to investigate and explore cause and effect exclusively within the bounds of the body -- i.e., "What is this body of mine made of? How does it come about so that its parts are complete and able to perform their duties well? What is it to be used for? What keeps it going? Is its fate to develop or to deteriorate? Is it really mine?" -- and then, going on to mental phenomena -- "Do greed, anger, delusion, love, hatred and so forth, arise at the body or at the mind? What do they come from? When they arise, are they pleasant or stressful?" -- to reason and explore things strictly internally in this way is, in and of itself, training the mind.

But if your stillness of mind isn't yet strong enough, don't go reasoning in line with books you may have read or the things you may have heard other people say, because even though you may think things through, it won't lead you to the truth. In other words, it won't lead you to a sense of dispassion and detachment. So instead, explore and investigate things in line with the causes and effects that actually arise from the mind in the present.

5.

The mind which is investigating and figuring things out in line with its own personal reasonings in this way will tend to focus exclusively on examining a single spot in a single object. This is called one-pointed concentration. This is a gathering of the mind's energies so that they have great strength, able to uproot attachments -- mistaken presuppositions -- and to cleanse the mind so that it is, for the moment, bright and clear. At the very least, you will experience peace -- an extreme sense of well-being in body and mind -- and perhaps knowledge of one sort or another: knowledge of a strange and striking sort, since it arises, not from mental imaginings, but from the causes and effects of the truth acting in the present, in a way that has never happened before. Even if it is knowledge of something you may have suspected all along, only now is it your own, making your mind bright, driving away all doubt and uncertainty about matters that may have been occupying your thoughts.

You will say to yourself with a sense of deep satisfaction and relief, "So that's how it is!"

Those whose sensitivities are dull, though, won't be convinced and delighted with their knowledge until someone else confirms it or they see teachings of the Buddha in books bearing witness to what they have learned. This is in line with the fact that the Buddha's followers are of various sorts.

This type of knowledge -- no matter how much or how wide-ranging it is -- won't weigh on your nerves. On the contrary, it is a form of calm and true well-being which will greatly brighten and refresh your nerves. At the same time, it will refine your mind and manners in a way that will be very inspiring to others. Whatever you say or do, you will do mindfully, with hardly any careless lapses. Once this happens to you, you should then try to maintain all these traits, and not grow careless or complacent.

These are all individual matters, and won't occur in every case. But at any rate, when you have trained the mind as explained above, even if you don't receive results in full measure, you will still experience a striking sense of peace and well-being in proportion to the extent of your own individual practice. You should then try to maintain this mental state. Don't let feelings of greed or desire, disappointment or dejection arise. Keep the mind neutral and continue practicing as I have explained from the beginning with a sense of trust and conviction. Be mindful, careful and observant at every stage of your practice, and you will then meet with the results you hope for.

6.

If training the mind in line with points 4 and 5 doesn't produce results, then gather your awareness and focus it firmly with a single object or mental image as its target. For example, focus on an aspect of the body -- the bones or one of its internal organs -- so as to see its objectionable nature. Or you may simply focus the mind on bare awareness itself -- for the mind is something which can't be seen with the physical eyes. If it isn't focused on a single spot, you won't know whether or not it's present. The mind is like the wind: If the wind doesn't come into contact with anything, you won't know whether or not it's there.

So it is with the mind. If a new trainee doesn't have a target for the mind, he or she won't really be able to catch hold of the mind. But please don't choose anything outside of the body as your target. Make your target -- i.e., the object of the mind -- an aspect of the body, as already mentioned. And when you take aim, focus on a single object which seems right for you. Don't be greedy, first taking some of this and then a little of that.

In focusing, examine the object in line with the principals of the foundation of mindfulness (//satipatthana//). In other words, sort out the body's various aspects until you can see, "This isn't me. This isn't myself."

The sort of focused examination which gives rise to this realization you can do in two ways:

a) When focused exclusively on the target, don't give any thought to what the target is or who is focusing. Let there simply be awareness and the act of focusing. Don't let there be any naming or labeling of anything at all. There will simply be the single sensation which makes you feel that you are sticking with the target, but don't think about what the target is.

b) When focused exclusively on the target, at the same time keep yourself aware that, "This is the target of the mind. This is the mind examining. This is mindfulness, i.e., the act of remembering to keep the target in mind. This is discernment, which sees into the truth of the object under consideration."

Both methods work, although method (a) is suited for beginners and those whose sensitivities are not yet developed, while method (b) is suited for those who are sensitive and experienced. Both methods, though, if you practice them diligently, give rise to the same results, namely concentration and discernment.

7.

In training the mind as explained above, no matter which method you choose, please don't let yourself wonder about whether or not you're going to attain concentration and discernment. And put aside all desires based on the various rumors and reports that get passed around by word of mouth. Just follow correctly the method mentioned in point 6, and you'll be doing fine.

At the same time, observe the approach you've been practicing to see how you brought the mind to the object, how you maintained mindfulness, and what happened to the mind as a result. If acting in that particular manner made the mind open and bright, keep at it until you're adept and able to do it all the time. But if the results weren't like that, i.e., just the opposite, then without delay use your powers of observation, in the way already mentioned, to make adjustments and corrections.

In observing how the mind behaves under training, some people will be able to observe their state of mind while the mind is still in that state; others, only after the mind has withdrawn from that state and stopped still for a moment. Both ways work. They are simply a matter of individual temperament. But if you don't use your powers of observation at all, progress in mental training will be hard to achieve and -- even if you do achieve it -- hard to maintain.

8.

While you are training the mind, one thing -- strange and striking -- may occur without your intending it. That is, the mind will withdraw from its external objects and gather into a single whole, letting go of all labels and attachments dealing with past or future. There will be just bare awareness paired with its preoccupation in the present. This is something with no sense of inside or outside -- a condition whose features are peculiar to the mind itself. It is as if everything has undergone a revolution.

This is the mind coming to its own level, the //bhavanga//.

In this moment, everything has reference only to the mind. Even though life may still be going on, the mind when it reaches this level lets go of all attachments to the body, and goes inward to experience nothing but its own object, all by itself. This is termed //bhava-citta//, the mind on its own level. The mind on its own level still has a refined version of the five //khandha// complete within it, and so can still experience birth and states of becoming, and give rise to continued births in the future.

Reaching this state is somewhat like dozing off and dreaming. The difference depends on how much self-awareness there is. Those who are collected and perceptive will -- when the event first occurs -- be aware of what is happening and what they are experiencing, and so won't get excited or upset. Those who are gullible and not very mindful, though, will be just like a person who dozes off and dreams. When they come to, they will tend to be startled or get misled by the visions they may happen to see. But when they have trained themselves until they are skilled at giving rise to this state often, their sense of mindfulness will improve and their various visions will go away. Gradually they will gain insight until they see into natural conditions as they actually are.

9.

The phenomenon discussed in point 8 -- even though it doesn't give rise to discernment capable of exploring into the logic of cause and effect in a wide-ranging way -- is still a preliminary stage in training the mind. It can suppress the five Hindrances and at the same time give rise to a sense of peace and well-being in the present. If it is properly developed so that it doesn't deteriorate, it will lead to a good rebirth in a future stage, in line with one's karmic background.

Incidentally, when visions and signs of various sorts appear, it's usually in the mental moment we are discussing here. But this doesn't mean that when the mind reaches this stage there will have to be visions of signs in every case. With some people and at some times, they will occur. With others and at other times, they won't. This is another matter of individual temperament -- and of other factors as well.

To be perfectly truthful, when it comes to the question of visions and signs that arise in the course of meditation, you can say that they're good only in the case of meditators who are quick-witted and astute enough to see through them; who -- when they see visions -- don't fall for them or latch onto them as being the self or as really belonging to themselves. They see the visions simply as visions, enough to use them as tools or a temporary dwelling place for the mind, and then let go.

As for people who aren't especially mindful or alert -- and who are gullible to boot -- when a vision arises they will get extremely excited and may even become so deluded as to lose touch with reality because they believe the visions to be something real and true. (How to deal with visions and signs will be discussed in point 11, below.)

In addition, people who have trained their minds to this stage are usually stubborn and bull-headed in their opinions, due to their strength of mind. When they think about something, they tend to see it from one side only.

They won't easily give any heed to the opinions of others, because they believe that their own opinions are perfectly reasonable and trust-worthy -- even though their opinions are self-serving and very much lacking in reason, and so easily pervert the way they see things.

But at any rate, whether or not visions and signs arise, they're not really what you want here, because aside from being defilements, clouding your discernment, they are also obstacles to the development of clear insight. The aim of training the mind is to let go of the five Hindrances and then to examine the //khandha// so that they become clear, to see them as they actually are to the point where you grow disenchanted with them, loosen your passion and fascination with them, and let them go, never to enter into and take hold of them again.

10.

When you have trained the mind to be firmly established in absorption and concentration to the point where it is able to suppress the five Hindrances, then you should work at developing clear insight. Actually, clear insight may arise at the same time that you are working on tranquility. In other words, discernment may brighten so as to know and see clearly the truth that all conditioned things (//sankhara//) which arise are bound to disintegrate and pass away. They can't last. They aren't me or myself, but are simply natural conditions acting on their own.

When this sort of knowledge arises, it will make the mind become disenchanted and dispassionate with regard to all conditioned things. The mind will dwell entirely in a state of matured and chastened dispassion, no matter what it sees or hears, and no matter where. This is called clear insight occurring together with tranquility.

If, however, insight doesn't arise in this way, then when you have practiced tranquility meditation until the mind is firmly established, then you can select either a part of the body -- such as the bones or the intestines -- or else a topic which is occupying your thoughts at the moment, and examine it so as to see that all the things which the mind fastens onto as stable and real, as leading to true happiness, actually fall under the sway of the Three Characteristics. The way we assume things, saying, "This is this, and that is that," in line with our imaginings, is not in any way true. All conditioned things simply arise from their causes: unawareness, craving, attachment and kamma. When their causes are exhausted, they disband of their own accord. No one forces them to disband. Even the body we are living in is able to survive only in dependence on causes, such as breath and food. When these things are exhausted, the body has no meaning at all.

When you examine things in this way, using the power of a fully concentrated mind, you will reach the goal of the mind's training. The light of discernment will arise, complete with the insight into cause and effect you have discovered totally on your own. This is something which arises not from appropriating labels or theories remembered from other people, but from realizing the causes and effects that are entirely within your own heart. The mind will never again be deluded into becoming attached, passionate, pleased or displeased with any conditioned thing at all.

Incidentally, we can say that if the mind hasn't truly and clearly seen into the object of its meditation, then it hasn't really yet gathered itself together and settled down. But the reason why the training of the mind isn't called insight meditation before this point is because one's discernment is still weak in terms of cause and effect, and lacks circumspection.

To summarize: The purification of one's words and deeds has to begin with training in moral virtue. The purification of the mind has to begin with training in tranquility -- concentration and absorption -- until the mind has enough strength to suppress the five Hindrances. When the mind is adept at concentration and absorption, able to enter, withdraw and stay in place at will, then discernment -- the light of knowledge seeing into the truth of all natural conditions (//sabhava dhamma//), together with the causes for their arising and passing away

-- will arise in a remarkable way.

This sort of knowledge may arise only to certain individuals in certain circumstances. But in any case, those who have trained their minds to this level should realize that a mind which has reached this point is fit to be trained to give rise to clear insight. They should thus take any aspect of the body or any mental phenomenon which occupies their thoughts, and examine it from the standpoint of the Three Characteristics, as explained above. Then they too will develop the light of insight, seeing clearly into all conditioned things -- and be able to uproot attachments to physical and mental phenomena of every sort.

Even though the mind is intangible, it has influence over the body and all things in the world. It is capable of bringing everything in the world under its control. Still, it isn't so vicious or savage as to lack all sense of good and evil. When a person of good intentions trains the mind to enter correctly into the path of the Buddha's teachings as explained above, it will be tractable and quick to learn, developing the wisdom to bring the body, which may be behaving without any principles, back into line. In addition, it can cleanse itself to be bright and clean, free from defilements, able to realize by itself truths that are subtle and profound, and to bring dazzling light into this world which is dark with blindness.

This is because the true substance of the mind has been, from the very beginning, something bright and clear. But because of the preoccupations which have seeped into it and clouded it, the brightness of the mind has been temporarily darkened, making the world dark as well. If the mind were originally dark, there probably wouldn't be anyone able to cleanse it to the point where it could give rise to the light of discernment at all.

//So whether the world is to be dark or bright, whether it is to experience well-being or suffering, depends on the mind of each individual.// We as individuals should thus first train our own minds well, and then train the minds of others. The world will then be free from turmoil.

11.

The visions and signs that arise from the practice of meditation are a strange and uncanny affair. They may delude a gullible person of weak judgment into being so convinced of their truth as to lose touch with reality. For this reason, those who practice meditation should be cautious, examining and reflecting on them carefully, as I will now explain.

The signs that arise from meditation are of two sorts: visions and signs.

a. Visions: sometimes, when the mind gathers itself into its own level while we are considering our own body to see its unattractiveness, we will see the body as completely foul and decomposing, or as nothing more than a skeleton or a pile of ashes, etc. There are cases where this has caused people to become so repelled that they commit suicide.

In other cases, visions of divine beings or of hell and hungry shades may sometimes appear.

b. As for signs: When the mind gathers, as already mentioned, a whispering voice may appear. It may be the voice of a person we respect, telling us to examine a particular truth, or to beware of a coming event; or else it may be the voice of an enemy who means to harm us, appearing to us just before he/she will come to do us harm -- which shows how the mental currents of different individuals impinge on one another. On the other hand, the same sort of thing may occur involving a person who means us well. Sometimes an unidentified voice may come to tell a truth which is thought-provoking and worthy of consideration, which meditators in general call the teachings and warnings of the Dhamma, or //abhinna//.

It's not the case that visions and signs will occur to all meditators.

With some people, no matter how refined a level their minds attain, visions and signs won't appear. With others, the mind may gather in a flash for a brief moment, and all sorts of visions and signs will appear. (Be careful not to concoct too many, though.) This depends on the individual's temperament. With people who are gullible and don't give much thought to what is reasonable, visions and signs tend to occur quickly and to grow all out of bounds, to the point where they can lose their bearings. So treat them with caution.

Question: Are visions and signs true?

Answer: Sometimes yes, and sometimes no, because they arise exclusively from //jhana//, and //jhana// is a mundane phenomenon -- and thus undependable. That is to say, they arise to a person practicing meditation whose mind gathers into the bhavanga without knowing what level it has reached or how it focused on, examined and put down its object. Visions and signs, whether or not they arise intentionally, are composed of a great deal of mental concocting and attachment, and are therefore unreliable -- because the visions and signs that arise when the mind is in the //bhavanga// are like the dreams of a person who lies down to sleep or simply dozes off. By and large, when they first occur, there tends to be some truth to them, but not much.

Question: Is //jhana// mundane or transcendent?

Answer: //Jhana// has only twelve or thirteen component factors, and they are entirely mundane. But if the person entering //jhana// is a Noble One using it as a tool or a dwelling place for the mind, then he or she will be able to use this mundane //jhana// at will, and dependably as well -- like an expert sharpshooter as opposed to a commoner, whose sword is just a sword.

Question: Are visions and signs a good thing?

Answer: Only for a person who knows how to make use of them in the proper way, without being taken in by them or attached to them. They aren't good for a person who doesn't know how to use them properly, who gets taken in by them, believing them to be true. Once attachment latches on, the act of mental concoction can make these visions and signs proliferate to the point where a meditator may lose control over his or her sense of reality. So they should be treated with caution and care, as I will now explain.

Visions and signs arise from the power of mundane //jhana// and are sustained by attachment and mental concocting. They thus fall under the Three Characteristics: They are inconstant -- they can't last; they are stressful; and they are not-self -- i.e., they aren't yours or anyone else's. They are conditions which do nothing but constantly arise and fall away in their own way at all times. Examine them so as to see their true nature in this way, and then let them go. Don't be deluded into latching onto visions and signs, which are the results. Instead, work at the cause, //jhana//, so that you become more and more adept to the point where you can attain it at will. The visions and signs will then take care of themselves.

Also learn to see the drawbacks of visions and signs. Once they arise and we get engrossed and deluded into latching onto them, they will cause our //jhana// to deteriorate, just as sound waves are an obstacle to a person trying to quiet the mind and explore phenomena which are subtle and deep, or as waves in clear water prevent us from seeing our reflection on the water's surface.

The visions and signs which appear to a meditator just beginning to attain //jhana// tend to be extraordinary and amazing. The acts of mental grasping and concocting will tend to fasten tightly to them, and they will be indelibly impressed on one's inner eye. If the above methods for curing and removing these visions and signs don't produce results, then try not to have the mind enter //jhana//. In other words, don't put your mind to it, don't let the mind be still, don't take a liking to the visions or signs. Sleep and eat as much as you like, perform heavy tasks until the body is very tired, think of objects that will give rise to defilements, such as beautiful sights or sounds that will give rise to desire -- and once the mind withdraws from its absorption, the visions and signs will disappear of their own accord.

If the student meditator can't solve the problem with these methods, then the teacher should try to help by using the same sort of approach. The quickest and most effective way is to find an issue that will provoke the person attached to visions and signs to extreme anger. The visions and signs will immediately disappear.

The basis for giving rise to knowledge into the Dhamma is threshold concentration (//upacara samadhi//), which is of two sorts:

a) As a meditator is working with a particular object of meditation, the mind will gradually withdraw from external preoccupations and gather into one spot, right at the mind itself, but without being completely cut off from all objects. It is still sensing, thinking and considering, trying to withdraw from its very refined object, but as yet unable to let go completely. This is threshold concentration before reaching fixed penetration (//appana samadhi//).

b) The mind becomes more and more refined until it is able to let go and withdraw from the object it is considering, so that the object disappears. This is called fixed penetration. There is full mindfulness and awareness of a sense of emptiness, not grasping after or fastening onto anything at all, simply partaking of its own exclusive object. When the mind comes out of this state and is again considering the Dhamma -- objects, cause and effect -- this is threshold concentration coming out of fixed penetration.

Both sorts of threshold concentration can form a good basis for insight into particular truths and various events, which is different from the knowledge which arises from the visions and signs mentioned above, because visions and signs arise from mundane //jhana//, whereas the knowledge we are discussing here, even though it arises from mundane concentration, gives more dependable results. (Scientists use this level in doing their research.) And if your concentration becomes transcendent, it will do away, step by step, with all the effluents (//asava//) of the mind.

In short, the knowledge which arises from visions and signs, and that which arises from threshold concentration, differ in terms both of origin and of quality.

An item which deserves a little more explanation here is the term fixed penetration (//appana samadhi//). Fixed penetration is a superior human attainment. By and large, people who reach fixed penetration tend to focus on the in-and-out breath (//anapana//) as their object of meditation. As they they focus on the breath and come to pay attention to its arising and falling away, or just to its falling away, the mind gradually becomes more and more refined until, step by step, it lets go of all its preoccupations and gathers together to become fixed, as explained above. The stilling of the in-and-out breath is what indicates fixed penetration. In some instances it is called fixed //jhana// because it comes from the act of becoming absorbed in the breath. It is called fixed concentration because even though there is no in-and-out breath when the mind reaches that point, mindfulness is still absolutely full.

When you are in this state you can't examine anything, because the mind is totally uninvolved with anything at all. Only when the mind comes out of this state and enters threshold concentration can you begin examining things again. You will then see clearly into all the truths that the Buddha said are to be known, and into other matters as well. There will be no visions and signs, as mentioned above, but the knowledge here will be based on cause and effect, complete with analogies and similes tat will utterly erase all doubt.

In some cases, meditators will be considering objects of meditation other than the in-and-out breath, and yet will still be able to reach fixed penetration in the same way that those who practice mindfulness of breathing. When the mind gathers to a point where there is no more in-and-out breathing, that's fixed penetration.

This, at any rate, is my opinion on the matter. Meditators shouldn't take my opinion as their criterion, because the thoughts and opinions of people in this world -- even when we see the same things under the same conditions in the same place -- can formulate different names for, and reach different understandings about, those same things, and thus give rise to endless disputes and arguments. Simply let us all work with our own objects of meditation so as to reach fixed penetration as discussed above and then -- with a fair mind free from bias -- compare what we experience with what has been formulated in the various texts. Our knowledge will then be //paccatam// -- arising exclusively from within ourselves. That is what I would like to see in this regard.

PARTING THOUGHTS

All transcendent phenomena are rooted in mundane phenomena. The 37 components conducive to Awakening (//bodhi-pakkhiya-dhamma//), which are classified entirely as transcendent, have to begin first with mental and physical phenomena, i.e., this mundane body and mind.

Visions, signs and the knowledge which results from //jhana// are obstacles to the one-eyed -- those who are simply developing //jhana// -- but can provoke insight for those with two eyes, i.e., those who are developing discernment along with concentration.

Every sword and ax is made with both a sharp and dull edge, each with its own different uses, but a person who confuses those uses, aside from getting nowhere with the sword or ax, may actually harm himself or the work he is doing. Insight and the defilements of insight come from one and the same basis. When people without discernment consider things wrongly, they will give rise to the defilements of insight; but when they consider things rightly, using the proper approach, the same things will become true insight.

Mundane phenomena -- when we clearly see and know them and their causes for what they are, and when seeing their drawbacks we grow disenchanted with them, not being deluded into latching onto them -- then turn into Dhamma. But when we get taken in by them and are unwilling to let them go...It's not the cause that the world will stay the way it is forever. The world of the Brahmas may degenerate into the world of the Devas; the world of the Devas, into the human world; the human world, into the lower realms. Just as liquids tend to seek out low-lying places, so it is easy for the minds of living beings to seek out what's low -- namely, evil.

Even though the practice of meditation is a self-revolution, you must be willing to risk your life. At the very least, if you don't succeed, you should threaten yourself with self-exile. Those who don't make such a vow can look forward only to being a slave to others -- the defilements -- through time.

* * *

GLOSSARY

Abhinna: Intuitive powers that come from the practice of concentration.

Asava: Mental effluent; defilement in its role of giving rise to the flood of the cycle of rebirth. There are four sorts: sensuality, becoming, views and unawareness.

Bhavanga: The mind's underlying preoccupation or resting state, which determines its state of being and to which it reverts in between its responses to stimuli.

Bodhi-pakkhiya-dhamma: Wings of Awakening; principles conducive to the attainment of enlightenment. There are 37 in all, and they constitute the Buddha's own summary of the essential points of his teachings: four foundations of mindfulness, four right exertions, four bases for achievement, five strengths, five dominant factors, seven factors of awakening and the Noble Eightfold Path.

Brahma: An inhabitant of the heavens of form and formlessness.

Deva: An inhabitant of the heavens of sensual bliss.

Dhamma: Phenomenon; event; things as they are in and of themselves; the right natural order of things. By extension, Dhamma is used also to refer to any doctrine which teaches such matters.

Jhana: Meditative absorption in a single sensation or mental notion.

Kamma: Intentional acts which lead to states of being and birth.

Khandha: Heap, aggregate, group; the component factors of the personality, and of sensory experience in general -- physical phenomena, feelings, mental labels, thought-formations (see //sankhara//) and cognizance.

Nivarana: Hindrance to concentration -- sensual desire, ill will, torpor & lethargy, restlessness & anxiety, and uncertainty.

Sabhava dhamma: Natural condition; phenomenon; qualities and events as they are directly experienced in and of themselves.

Samadhi: Concentration; the act of centering the mind in a single object or topic.

Sankhara: Conditioned phenomena; formation; fashioning. This term covers all things, physical or mental, fashioned by causes or conditions, as well as the forces which fashion them and the processes by which they are fashioned.

Satipatthana: Foundation of mindfulness; frame of reference. The contemplation of body, feelings, mind and mental events as they are in and of themselves.

Ti-ratana: The triple Gem -- the Buddha, the Dhamma (his teachings, their practice and the realization of liberation at which they are aimed) and the Sangha (those of his followers who have gained at least a glimpse of that liberation). To take refuge in the Triple Gem means to take them as guide in one's pursuit of happiness and to give rise to their qualities in one's life and heart.

Vipassana: Clear insight into things as they actually are, seeing them in terms of the characteristics of inconstancy, stress and not-selfness.

* * * * * * * *

DISTRIBUTION AGREEMENT
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

TITLE OF WORK: Steps Along the Path FILENAME: PATHSTEP.ZIP
AUTHOR: Phra Ajahn Thate Desaransi (Thanissaro Bhikkhu, translator) AUTHOR'S ADDRESS: Wat Hin Mark Peng Sri Chiang Mai
Nongkai, Thailand 43130 PUBLISHER'S ADDRESS: N/A COPYRIGHT HOLDER: The Abbot Metta Forest Monastery
PO Box 1409
Valley Center, CA 92082
DATE OF PUBLICATION: 1994
RIGHTS AND RESTRICTIONS: See paragraph below. This work may be copied or reprinted for free distribution without permission from the copyright holder. Otherwise, all rights reserved.
DATE OF DHARMANET DISTRIBUTION: November 1994
ORIGIN SITE: Access to Insight BBS, Pepperell MA * (508) 433-5847 (96:903/1)

The copyright holder retains all rights to this work and hereby grants electronic distribution rights to DharmaNet International. This work may be freely copied and redistributed electronically, provided that the file contents (including this Agreement) are not altered in any way and that it is distributed at no cost to the recipient. You may make printed copies of this work for your personal use; further distribution of printed copies requires permission from the copyright holder. If this work is used by a teacher in a class, or is quoted in a review, the publisher shall be notified of such use. See the title page of this work for any additional rights and restrictions that may apply.
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

It is the spirit of dana, freely offered generosity, which has kept the entire Buddhist tradition alive for more than 2,500 years. If you find this work of value, please consider sending a donation to the author or publisher, so that these works may continue to be made available. May your generosity contribute to the happiness of all beings everywhere.

DharmaNet International, P.O. Box 4951, Berkeley, CA 94704-4951

[end]

ÉÍÍÍ

About fifteen years ago a Buddhist monk I met claimed that life for most people was dukkha. Dukkha, he explained, was a word from an ancient Indian language called Pali. He said that dukkha was roughly translated as suffering. However, this translation was, he claimed, inadequate because dukkha also signified the subtle qualities of unsatisfactoriness and uncertainty connected with change in life (Khantipalo, 1976). When I heard the word explained, I started to realise that my life and the lives of most beings around me, were characterised by dukkha. It was further indicated, however, that it was possible to seek a path to freedom (from dukkha) and hence out of suffering. The end result of this spiritual path is believed to be a total liberation which, ultimately, can only be directly experienced and any general conceptual descriptions deem inadequate and meaningless (Rahula, 1959). The alleviation of dukkha and the path to freedom are offered by numerous salvational philosophies and practices. On the secular side of the picture, Western psychotherapies offer relief from some aspects of psychological distress by strengthening the sense of selfhood with whom we identify our individuality. Spiritual paths, on the other hand, are directed at liberation by developing a level of experience beyond that which is centred on a personal self. Some of these (liberating) paths appear to take aspirants in opposite directions, but some authors have attempted to reconcile this contradiction by offering paradigms which include both 'self fortifying' and 'self transcending' methodologies which, together, can eventually lead the practitioner to freedom (eg Wilber, 1981).

My own path towards liberation is characterised by a practice in which I try to attend to and live my direct moment to moment experience of life. This method, which I have adopted as my spiritual path, is called present centred awareness. In my personal experience, present centred awareness has been a way to heal the psychic wounds which I have accrued during this life (and perhaps others). Thus, present centred awareness can be powerful pychotherapeutic device. In addition, present centred awareness is considered to be intrinsically liberating because it engenders, in the practitioner, an insight into 'truth'. In the sections which follow, this essay will examine, in detail, the nature of the human existential bind (dukkha) and the path to psychological and spiritual liberation through the practice of present centred awareness.

Dukkha

According to Buddhist thought dukkha, which usually means suffering, is the truth of existence. However, many Pali scholars claim that the word often has been misinterpreted and misunderstood (Rahula, 1959).Though dukkha may mean suffering (as it is normally conceived) a more precise translation of dukkha is "unsatisfactoriness" (Rahula, 1959). Dukkha can properly be understood in three ways: 1) dukkha as ordinary suffering, 2) dukkha as produced by change, and 3) dukkha as a characteristic of being someone in a 'conditioned state' (Rahula, 1959; Sole-Leris, 1986). The first type of dukkha encompasses the pain, grief, lamentation and difficulties associated with old age, sickness and death. Also included in this first category is the inevitable fact that individuals often get what they do not want, do not get what they want, and soon are parted from what they like. This first type of dukkha also includes mental distress such as confusion, anguish, worry, fear, anxiety, depression, loneliness, and alienation (Rahula, 1959). The second type of dukkha involves the paradox of living in happy and pleasant states and yet knowing these beautiful moments are transient and must inevitably change and disappear. The last type of dukkha involves the suffering engendered from clinging to the belief that transitory manifestations of sensations, thoughts, feelings and emotions, are a solid and concrete self which is usually labelled, by each of, us as "I", "mine", or "myself" (Rahula, 1959). This last type of dukkha is, perhaps, the most difficult to comprehend, but it will be clarified later in this essay. According to the classical Buddhist texts, absolute freedom from dukkha only can be found in Nibbana (or Nirvana) which is an unconditional state beyond causal existence and hence suffering (Nanamoli, 1978). Conditional states, on the other hand, are characterised by dukkha (Rahula, 1959).

Conditioned States and the Wheel of Birth and Death

The types of conditioned states are infinite. It is believed in Buddhist thought that every being creates his/her own reality, and the various dimensions of individual realities cross over to form a given realm or world. Western religions encompass the possibilities of experiential reality as falling within the tripartite concept of heaven, hell, and a mediating earthly plane. Like these other religions, Buddhist cosmology also has several realms of existence. In Buddhist thought, however, there are 31 such levels (Tambiah,1970). Though Buddhist texts have classic descriptions of these realms as places where beings abide (Kapleau,1971), they are often understood as states of mind (Trungpa, 1973). As states of mind the realms can be understood as part of one's own personal experience and/or as part of the experience of those who live around us. The various realms of existence in Buddhist cosmology can be divided into six basic categories:

1) the hell realms, 2) the hungry ghost realms, 3) the animal realms, 4) the human realms, 5) the heaven realms, and 6) the demon or asura (jealous god) realms (Tamaiah, 1970).

The Hell Realms

Many people are unhappy. Angrily or desperately they struggle with existence yet find no relief. They may feel trapped, isolated and lonely. There is no one to trust as the world seems violent, miserable and frightening. Contracted defensively, they experience hell. In these realms one is collapsed into a total paranoia and defensiveness. Here we find insanity, despair and a sense that all is hopeless and lost. It is truly a hell on earth into which some of us slip occasionally, but some, less fortunate, become hopelessly enmeshed for life as the incurably insane.

The Ghost Realms

The preta or hungry ghost realm is experienced as a state of intense and insatiable desire, frustration and dissatisfaction. Feeling ever empty and lacking, pretas constantly search for something or someone to fill their hungry space. Pretas are never gratified. No matter how much they try, gratification is always just beyond reach. In Buddhist cosmology pretas are considered to be in a realm of misery (Tambiah, 1970). When caught in these experiential realms we seek food, sex, power, glory, and money with unending appetite but, nothing can satisfy.

The Animal Realms

From the Buddhist point of view, the animal realm is yet another realm of misery. However, those in animal realms are not cognisant of their misery because the animal realm is characterised by stupidity. Actions are performed without discriminating wisdom and dominated by sensual desires and hedonistic needs. Those in animal consciousness do not think intelligently and their lives are governed by conditioning, indoctrination and seeking personal gratification.

The Human Realm

The human realm is considered to be a realm of relative advantage. As a human, one has the ability to both seek and enjoy pleasure and happiness. However, the human experience is equally grounded in difficulty, and hardship. Human existence swings between pain and pleasure, loss and gain, and praise and blame. Nevertheless, the emotions are not too extreme and those with human consciousness have the ability and mental space to ponder their existence. The human realm is therefore one of discriminating intelligence and is characterised by the ability to choose. This realm is a particularly useful realm to seek liberation because the human realm is a realm where one can see a balanced view of existence (Trungpa, 1973).

The Heaven Realms

Heaven states of consciousness, are expanded states of consciousness where one feels joyous, happy, and blissful all the time. Relationships are always fulfilling and meaningful. No one fights and life is pleasure. Projects are successful and every thing is wonderful and beautiful. These states of consciousness are also characterised by moments of transcendental well being and peace. It is like we have made it, we have arrived and won the prize (Trungpa,1973).

The Jealous God Realms

The final possibility of conscious experiential reality is that of becoming one of the asuras or jealous Gods (Trungpa, 1973). Knowing that heaven is possible, asuras jealously struggle up the ladder to gain access to the divine state, alternatively, like a fallen angel, having tasted the bliss and joy of heaven, they want it to continue and strive to regain the lost prize. This realm is different from the preta realms in that the jealous Gods have power. Like some politicians or mega-millionaires they claw their way to the top and, ever vigilant, they are protective of what they have and struggle for yet more. Asuras have a consciousness that is obsessed with power and the need for engrandisement (Trungpa,1973).

The realms and the psychological states they represent are constantly changing. Unlike the Judeo-Christian dogma, neither heaven nor hell can last for ever and the nature of conditioned experience is ultimately always change. Thus, life has the potential for cyclic fluctuation between and within the realms of experiential reality. Some days we may be in heaven while other days feel like hell. The arising and passing of experience, moment to moment or life time to life time, is what Buddhists call the wheel of birth and death or samsara (Trungpa, 1976). Being enchanted by samsara is dukkha.

Enchantment

Possibly one of the most subtle forms of psychological suffering is what Roy-King (1986) calls enchantment. The word enchantment has positive connotations in modern speech, however, as in the world of folktales: "to be enchanted is to be lured to one's death by seductive voices, to be turned to stone, to be obsessed (as Sinbad was) with journeys to impossible places, to be asleep or forgetful." (Roy-King, 1986 p211) To be enchanted is, therefore, to become intoxicated with the realities we create and to believe that these realities will last forever. Buddhists consider that the conditioned states of the wheel of birth and death are essentially unsatisfactory, or dukkha, because nothing lasts (Sumedho, 1983). Even at the most refined levels of consciousness, when our lives have no anxiety, worry, fear or gross distress, there still may be a quality of uncertainty. This uncertainty is an awareness that even if we had every thing that we could ever want, it is still not lasting. Dukkha may be gross and obvious or dukkha may be subtle. Regardless of whether it is gross or subtle it is the awareness of dukkha that motivates individuals to seek the path to freedom (Sumedho, 1983).

The Path to Freedom

When individuals become aware of their dukkha they either avoid it with distractions thereby perpetuating its manifestation (such as with drugs and alcohol) or they attempt to resolve it in a healthy manner. Psychotherapy and spiritual practices are two ways individuals may attempt to resolve the manifestations of dukkha constructively. Psychotherapy is essentially a process designed to alleviate mental distress by initiating psychological change in a manner which is both personally meaningful and socially constructive (Muzika, 1990). Most Western psychotherapies are directed at the personality and usually work at strengthening the self to make it more able to bear pain and to experience pleasure (Muzika, 1990). Psycho-spiritual teachings and movements (both East and West), on the other hand, are directed at self transcendence. The term transcendence may have a number of meanings, but in current psychological paradigms the meaning of transcendence is transpersonal in the sense that it is a development or a transition "to a level of experience beyond that centred in the ego or the personal self" (Washburn, 1990, p85). Many of the major world religions consider transcendence to be the primary path to liberation. However, the interpretation of transcendence varies. For example, in the spiritual paths found in Christianity the concept of salvation is synonymous with freedom. With salvation the soul, having confronted it's sins and having repented, is saved and reunites (in intimate relationship) with God (Washburn, 1990). This process, Washburn (1990) compares to the Jungian notion of regression and final integration with the archetype Self. The ego, being no longer separate from god, feels ultimate security, psychic wholeness and freedom from distress. Within Hinduism, the self has two aspects: Jiva, the individual soul, and Atman, it's universal form. Thus, freedom from dukkha is the discovery of the soul's universal aspect (Muzika, 1990). In the Hindu tradition, spiritual development is a progressive letting go of various levels of the self, (such as the physical level, the sensory mind and the intuitive intellect) until one finally achieves a transcendental absolute oneness with Atman in "blissful undifferentiated illumination" (Washburn, 1990, p87). Buddhism, on the other hand, teaches that suffering is conditional on the belief in an abiding, existent self. Dukkha arises because of attachment, aversion and ignorance (to and of that self) and is a cyclic reaction energised by desire. With Buddhism the path to freedom is one of insight into the nature of the conditioning forces. With wisdom, the attachment to conditions is severed and Nibbana, as ultimate freedom, is realised (Sole-Leris,1986).

At a superficial level, some of the paths designed to alleviate dukkha may seem contradictory. For example, Western psychotherapies are generally directed at strengthening the self while Eastern spiritual paths are concerned with its deconstruction (Wilber, 1981). Wilber attempts to reconcile these contradictions by offering a paradigm which includes both self fortifying and self transcending functions in the path to liberation. Wilber considers liberation to be an egoless state of mystical union with the universe that is beyond all division and duality. This state, called 'unity consciousness' he claims has no boundaries or limitations and is ultimate freedom. Suffering, on the other hand, he argues, results as the deluded mind creates self imposed boundaries and fantasy divisions between the 'self' and 'other'. The more contracted these existential boundaries are, the greater the alienation and subsequent suffering one experiences (Wilber, 1981).

Wilber (1981) claims that development towards "unity consciousness" occurs in several stages. Summarised, these stages are the prepersonal, personal, and transpersonal. Like other stage development paradigms (such as those of Kolberg, Freud and Piaget in Shaffer, 1985), each stage has its problems which must be resolved before an individual can move successfully on to the next (Muzika, 1990). Thus, Wilber (1981) claims that the different directions emphasised by the various liberation techniques and practices may be appropriate for different stages of development. At the prepersonal level, for example, in which individuals may be suffering from hurt, despair, worthlessness and loss, therapies such as simple counselling and basic psychoanalysis may be useful. At the personal level, where individuals need direction and sense of meaning, Gestalt or Existential therapies may prove to be the appropriate vehicles. However, it is only when the ego is strong and has established a strong sense of meaning, argues Engler and Wilber (1986 in Muzika, 1990), that it is capable of dealing with the transpersonal processes that may be encountered in spiritual practices such as meditation. According to Engler "You have to be somebody before you can be nobody" (1986 cited in Epstein, 1990, p18). A perennial question regarding reality is: What is the truth and which path does one follow to find it and freedom? Some base their choice on emotional attractiveness, while others use intellectual reasoning to make their decision. Therefore, confidence in a path or a "faith" can be fuelled by emotional energy or by intellectual reasoning. Both kinds of faith are important and valuable in the process. However, it is the faith arising from our own personal experience of the truth which has the most impact on the direction one takes (Goldstein, 1976).I have confidence in the Buddha's teachings. This "faith" is fuelled by both emotional attraction and intellectual reasoning. However, more than these two driving factors is the power of my personal experience. I do not pretend to ultimately understand the unconditioned or Nibbana, but, personal experience of the conditioned states has confirmed for me much of what the Buddha has taught. On his dying bed the Buddha has been quoted as saying to Ananda, his personal servant: "Be lamps unto yourselves. Be refuges to yourselves. Take yourselves to no external refuge. Look not for refuge in anyone beside yourselves. And, those Ananda, who either now or after I am dead, shall be a lamp unto themselves, shall betake themselves to no refuge, but holding fast to the truth as their lamp, holding fast to the truth as their refuge, shall not look for refuge to anyone beside themselves, it is they who shall reach to the very topmost height." (Goldstein, 1976, p116). When I follow this advice and look to myself for the truth and the path, I realise that it only can be known in the context of present moment experience. "Yesterday is a memory. Tomorrow the unknown. Now is the knowing" (Sumedho, 1983). Thus, having both faith and experience in the reality of the moment as the truth and the path, I have come to believe that present centred awareness is an important way to heal a distressed psyche and facilitate freedom from dukkha.

Present Centred Awareness

It has been argued that being in the moment may bean important factor in the development of emotional well-being (Roy-King, 1986). Being aware and present centred may be one simple technique which has self fortifying (Wilber's prepersonal), self clarifying (Wilber's personal) and self transcending (Wilber's transpersonal) functions. Present centred awareness is the act of being fully aware of and attending to experience. The focus of this awareness may be directed introspectively towards the 'self' or, on the other hand, it may be directed at the world around us. However, as life is experienced through the mechanisms of our humanness (the senses, thoughts, and emotions), present centred awareness is usually directed at aspects of the experiencing 'self'. Present centred awareness has come to subsume a number of other terms such as; bare attention (Goldstein, 1976), listening to oneself (Rogers, 1961), living in the moment (Perls, 1970) or just being here now (Dass, 1972). Present centred awareness has been utilised in many psychotherapies and is central to Gestalt therapy as well as Buddhist spiritual practice. All of these psychological approaches offer numerous techniques which help to centre a person's awareness on the present. However, it is Buddhism which offers the clearest explanation of the nature of present centred awareness and the most complete description of how it may be successfully practiced.

In the Buddhist Theravadin schools (where I have had my most comprehensive experience), present centred awareness is referred to as 'satipatthana' or, simply, mindfulness (Goleman, 1975). The word satipatthana has its origins in Pali which was spoken by Gotauma Buddha (Nanamoli, 1978). "Sati" means awareness and "patthana" means keeping present (Nyanapondika Thera, 1962). Satipatthana is "The accurate, continuous registering at the conscious level of all events occurring in the six sensory modes: seeing, hearing, touching, smelling and thinking, without qualitative judgment, evaluation, mental comment or behavioural act." (Deatherage, 1982, p 19) Similarly "Bare attention means observing things as they are without choosing, without comparing, without evaluating, without laying our projections and expectations on to what is happening, initiating instead a choiceless and non-interfering awareness." (Goldstein, 1976, p20) Satipatthana is a way of being and a meditation practice. The role of satipatthana is to clearly perceive, in an objective (but not disassociated) manner, the arising and passing of all conditions of mind and body (Nyanapondika Thera, 1962). As a practice its aim is to gain insight into the nature of the self, inner peace and psychological freedom. The theme behind mindfulness is to honestly relate with what ever arises as it arises.

In traditional Buddhist teachings there are four foundations or areas of mindfulness. These are mindfulness of body, feelings, mind states and mind objects (Nyanapodika Thera, 1962). Mindfulness of body includes, among other aspects, being aware of postures, somatic sensations and the breath. Mindfulness of feelings is not regarded as mindfulness of the emotions as such, but more being attentive to the qualities of pleasantness, unpleasantness and neutrality which arise in the mind with relationship to physical sensations or mental processes. Mindfulness of feelings is considered as important because "feelings" are primary factors in conditioning clinging (attachment) and condemnation (aversion), two root causes of suffering (dukkha) (Goldstein, 1976).

Mindfulness of mind states refers to being aware of the states of mind that may colour the mind such as a distracted mind, an angry mind, a happy mind, a guilty mind and so on. Mindfulness of mental objects refers to being aware of the content of mind such as thoughts, and, in addition, being aware of how they condition both physical and mental processes (Nyanapondika Thera, 1962). As a meditation practice, a practitioner of satipatthana chooses a primary object of attention and focuses upon that object. Theravadin Buddhist meditation teachers usually recommend choosing primary objects of meditation that are physical in nature. They recommend physical objects, such as sensations or sounds, because they are tangible, easy to focus on, and less illusive than mental objects (Nyanasamvara,1974).It should be noted, however, that meditation teachers claim that all objects of self, physical or mental, are essentially similar in nature. Thus, if insight is gained into one object of self, then insight is gained into them all. Primary objects of satipatthana meditation vary, but one of the most commonly used objects is that of the breath. As one breaths, attention may be directed to sensations at the tip of the nose or at the abdomen as it rises and falls (Nyanasamvara,1974). As a meditation practice satipatthana is not limited to sitting in a meditation posture, but can carry over into other activities, such as walking. In walking meditation the prime object of attention may be the sensations in the legs, or the general posture of walking.

Ideally, when one meditates, one's attention remains with the primary object. In reality, though, many people's minds do not stay focussed on the primary object. There may be, for example, thoughts of the past or future, distracting aches and pains, sounds and so on. When the mind becomes distracted from the primary object the distraction is acknowledged and the meditator returns his or her attention to the object. If the distraction becomes overwhelming or predominant, this "distraction" may then become the object of meditation and of non-intellectual investigation. Like changing gears on a car one may shift from object to object and from mindfulness of body to mindfulness of mind states, feelings or mental objects. For example, if a jackhammer started up outside one's meditation room, the vibrations of the sound (a physical object) could become the object of meditation (mindfulness of physical objects or body). One could also choose to be attentive to the unpleasantness of the sounds (mindfulness of feelings) or the thoughts that arise in regard to the sounds (mindfulness of mind objects). Alternatively, one could direct attention to the quality of anger that may arisen (mindfulness of mind states) (Nyanapondika Thera, 1962).

Currently, Buddhist meditation retreats are gaining popularity in the West (Goldstein, 1976). The activity in these retreats is very different from one's normal life style and the session may last anywhere from weekend to months.

On these retreats, much time is spent sitting in meditation posture while attempting to focus upon a primary object such as the breath. At the end of a sitting period one arises and does something else such as eating or walking. As the retreat progresses, the delineating line between meditation and non-meditation dissolve, so no matter what one is doing, mindfulness monitors. Moment after moment, attention is drawn to whatever is happening in that moment and to whatever one is doing which then becomes the primary object of meditation. Thus, when one brushes one's teeth, attention is directed to teeth brushing and (perhaps) the way the brush feels on one's gums, or the jerking action of the arms. When one eats, one eats with mindfulness of tastes and/or chewing actions or mindfulness of thoughts related to eating. When one visits the toilet, one is aware and present for the process of defecating and so on.

Meditation retreats and the practice of satipatthana are not always easy. It must be emphasised that meditation retreats, for many people, are often characterised by periods of losing mindfulness and becoming enmeshed and lost in thought. Nevertheless, for most practitioners, it becomes clear that the process of mindfulness is in itself enlightening. That is, it illumines one's situation and lightens one's emotional burden or mental distress. As time passes, practitioners may realise that satipatthana can be practiced anywhere at any time. "In one sense mindfulness refers to a clear, lucid, quality of awareness to the everyday experiences of life." (Tart, 1990, p83).

For many, therefore, present centred awareness may become a way of being with life and dealing with day to day activities. For example, Thich Nhat Hanh, a well known Vietnamese Buddhist monk, once wrote "when washing the dishes one should only be washing the dishes, which means that while] washing the dishes one should be completely aware that one is washing the dishes. The fact that I am standing here washing these bowls is a wondrous reality. I'm being completely myself" (Hanh, 1975, p3).

Being present centred and aware can generate a sense of freedom and alleviate dukkha in a number of ways. For example, present centred awareness can be used as a 'therapy' which helps us deal with distressing 'gross' forms of emotional suffering such as anxiety, depression, obsessions and fear. Being present centred may facilitate peak experiences, which can alter one's sense of reality thereby causing a radical change in perspective and, hence, new awareness which may have a healing effect.

Present centred awareness also may help us to deal with inner as well as interpersonal conflicts. However, more than any of the above change processes which may obviate detrimental life habits, present centred awareness is intrinsically liberating because it engenders a radical and awakening alignment in consciousness. Present centred awareness is intrinsically liberating because it draws one's consciousness into accord with the way things are and, thus, in line with the most basic existential truth.

"The prescription of living in the now is the consequence of the fact that we are living in the now; this is something that the sane person knows, but the neurotic does not realise while enmeshed in a dreamlike pseudo-existence." (Naranjo, 1970, p67).

Present centred awareness as a prescription for life is a means to an end, where the end is the means. The different ways present centred awareness may facilitate a sense of freedom work in essentially similar ways. However, to clarify and elaborate the liberating nature of present centred awareness, four angles will be delineated in the reference to my personal experience.

Present Centred Awareness as a 'Therapy'

In our efforts to manifest self-actualisation, Rogers describes the goal of life as "discovering the self one truly is" by "learning to listen to oneself... to experience what is going on within oneself" (Rogers, 1961, p169). Self awareness is thought to increase a person's knowledge about his/her behaviour and "the more one knows about their behaviour the more likely he/she is in a position to do something about it" (Pyke and Sanborn, 1975 cited in Gibbons et al. 1985, p662).

Present centred awareness is, therefore, a therapeutic tool which is used in a number of psychotherapeutic programs. It can serve both as a self regulation mechanism and as a process of self discovery. For example, Psychoanalytic processes use the technique of 'free association' as a means of increasing awareness and uncovering repressed memories and emotions. Like satipatthana, Freud's free association technique increases attention to the processes and content of mind, without censorship and criticism of what arises (Speeth, 1982). Free association is thought to be therapeutic because it helps resolve the debilitating effects of repressed traumas by bringing them into the light of awareness thereby freeing the mind from restrictions imposed by self-suppression (Muzika, 1990).

With Gestalt therapy, awareness is directed at how an individual thinks, feels, moves, and interacts in a present moment context (Naranjo, 1970). Some techniques used with Gestalt therapy involve dialogue between a therapist and a client. With dialogue, the therapist constantly reminds the client to relate to the present moment and issues which may have normally been avoided are explored. The expression of internal states acts as a tool to centre and clarify the client's experience while simultaneously providing a witness which enhances the attention and meaningfulness of the experience (Naranjo, 1970). Other Gestalt processes involve sensory awareness processes. Physical sensations that are normally avoided are explored and this can awaken a series of unresolved memories and traumas. Once recovered, these issues are explored, accepted and reintegrated into the client's life. Using the process of being brought back into the now, an individual is empowered to discover how he/she blocks and interrupts his/her functioning (Kepner and Brien,1970). The insights gained from increased awareness are thought to be sufficient to alleviate numerous psychological problems including anxiety (Davison and Neale, 1982).

Some therapists have used traditional Buddhist satipatthana tools in clinical situations to deal with manifestations of anxiety depression and obsessive behaviour (eg Wortz, 1982; Deatherage, 1982). One traditional method which has been used to enhance the effect of satipatthana is that of labelling an object of attention or mindfulness with a name (Nyanapondika, 1962). Like the expression of feelings and thoughts used in Gestalt therapy, 'noting' serves to concentrate the mind as well as clarify and objectify the condition. For example, attention to the rising and falling in the abdomen while breathing can be labelled "rising, falling", thoughts of the past can be labelled "remembering", the future, "planning". Simple emotional tendencies can be labelled appropriately such as "anger", "worrying", "fear", sadness" etc. Actions also can be labelled accordingly such as "brushing" for brushing one's teeth, "pissing" for urinating etc. Another satipatthana tool which can be developed is what Deatherage (1982) calls "the watcher self". "The watcher self can see the remembering of some painful event and label it objectively without becoming involved in its melodrama. The watcher can therefore put psychological distance between the 'me' who experiences the painful event and the 'me' who is presently remembering it. "(Deatherage, 1982, p22) The "watcher self" is not used to strengthen the self concept but: "The watcher self is used only as a tool for grounding some of the patient's mental energy in the present, providing a temporary, psychological stable centre for them to operate from and providing a perspective from which their own psychological functioning can be objectively observed." (Deatherage, 1982, p25).

Both "noting" and developing the "watcher self" can be very useful. If one can say to oneself, for example, "anger" when one is experiencing rage, then the "noting" allows the space to choose one's reactions instead being dominated by blind action. This space which noting and satipatthana promote can be therapeutic. In one case study, a divorced woman who was having bouts of depression, anxiety and unwanted memories of her ex-husband's bizarre sexual demands, was trained to label the thoughts as "remembering, remembering". Within a few days she could see the causal relationship between the thoughts and the anxiety and depression which proved to be quite therapeutic (Deatherage, 1982). Another woman, who was hospitalised for manic-depression and schizophrenia, was instructed to watch the second hand of a clock and, when her mind went off the clock, to name the distraction. She soon realised that most of her distractions were related to the past. She was then instructed to label them "remembering, remembering". With this technique "she learned to identify herself with the objective watcher of her disturbed thoughts instead of the depressed thinker" (Deatherage, 1982, p24). She was able to gain insight into the nature of her illness from this process and it was not long before she was released from hospital. Another woman who was hospitalised for anxiety, depression and inability to function adequately, rebelled against any suggestion of introspection, and owing to the fact that she was a Mormon the word "Buddhist" or "meditation" was not mentioned. As the therapists interacted with her it became evident that much of her day was spent fantasising and imagining to avoid the anxiety of her life. The habit of fantasising was discussed with her and she was then was asked to undertake a "psychological procedure". To her surprise she was asked to bake a cake. However, she had to do it extremely mindfully with minute attention to every detail. When her persistent fantasies would arise, she was instructed to just observe them. After a time she found that she could intentionally return to the present moment and so function more adequately. With mindfulness and other therapy she eventually gained insight into her anxiety and depression and was released from hospital (Deatherage, 1982).

I have been using meditation practices for nearly fifteen years, but began using satipatthana meditation techniques about 7 years ago. I have attended numerous meditation retreats and have noticed a "therapeutic" effect of mindfulness in these retreats and in my daily life. When I first started employing the satipatthana methods, I began experiencing a pain in my heart area. At times it would feel as if a knife had been inserted and was being twisted. At other times, it just ached. When I meditated the pains would intensify and distract me from the primary object of the meditation, so one day I decided to make the pain the object of my meditation. Although the pain was dominant in my consciousness, I found that when I tried to direct attention to the sensation my focus would 'deflect'. It was as if my mind wanted to avoid touching that area. I experimented with methods which would enhance exploration and slowly I learned that if I could generate a quality of total acceptance and gentle love, then the pain would allow my mind inside.

As I ventured inside the pain, I was flooded with memories. I discovered feelings of rejection, fear and loneliness which went far back into my childhood. These feelings also related to my adult life and as I meditated images of past interactions and associated emotional feelings of inadequacy and frustration would emerge. The images and feelings arose concomitantly with the pain in my heart. The pains lasted on and off for a period of about two years. I meditated upon them whenever they arose, and slowly I gained acceptance of the pains and the past that they represented. Like the integrative processes of Gestalt therapy, I found that the more I could accept the pain, the more I could accept myself as a whole. This acceptance was also reflected in the way I communicated with other people. I could relate with less fear and more openness and honesty. In addition, the pains became a useful tool. Particularly, when I interacted with people, (such as threatening individuals) the heart pain served as a warning signal that communication was difficult. With the mindfulness training, I could be attentive to the difficulty and allow myself to be open to those individuals (and the pain) finding acceptance rather than closing down with resistance, rejection and fear. The mindfulness process related to my heart area was therapeutic and healing in many areas of my life. Slowly and gradually the pains vanished.

Mindfulness thus can open up and facilitate a resolution of undermining influences in our lives. The detached (but not disassociated) attitude of present centred awareness also allows for a space to occur between life's events and the ego's reactions to those events, thus preventing our lives from being overwhelmed by unwise obsessions and actions. Mindfulness, for example, can catch a thought of anger before that anger is converted into a fist in someone's face or it can catch a worrying thought before the thought explodes into full blown anxiety. The regular practice of present centred awareness, can gradually alter habitual and crippling reactions to disturbing thoughts and feelings. However, another even more potent and rapid method for effecting change in habitual tendencies and promoting well-being is to experience a radical alteration of consciousness or a peak experience.

Peak experiences

A moment is only a short segment of time, yet in moments the human experience of reality can be deepened, challenged, explored and transformed (Roy-King, 1986). Carlos Casteneda, is an American writer who has authored a series of books about experiences he supposedly had with a Mexican shaman named Don Juan Matus. Over the course of their many discussions, Don Juan often attempted to get Carlos to attend more fully to the moment. He believed that this type of attention had in it great power to transform one's experiential world. "Do you know a moment can be an eternity?....This is not a riddle its a fact, but only when you mount that moment and use it to take the totality of yourself forever in any direction" (Casteneda, 1974,p8).

Being in the moment can facilitate what have been called 'peak experiences' and facilitate the opening of realities previously unexplored. Maslow (1968) described peak experiences as moments of intense joy and fulfilment that may occur when individuals are present for life. A mystical experience is one type of peak experience (Maslow, 1968). Mystical experiences may occur after intense spiritual practices, encounters with death, or spontaneously when a persons attention is focused, in the present (Happold, 1963; Grey, 1985; Goleman, 1975). The mystical experience is a subjective phenomenon which is not susceptible to scientific scrutiny or verification. Despite materialistic scepticism and explanation, the mystical experience is very real to those who perceive them (Grey, 1985). According to Happold (1963) mystical states are beyond description by discursive intellect. They are states of knowing that have elements such as 'timelessness', 'peace', and 'oneness with the universe' which create a feeling that the phenomenal ego is dissolved into some greater entity or presence. Gopi Krishna, in reference to his mystical experience described "sensation of light....an overwhelming sense of wonder and awe.... unshakeable conviction of the reality of the situation...an encounter with an inexpressible all knowing intelligence of an omniscient divine being... love and adoration." (Grey, 1985, p149) Another description is that of a school boy who spontaneously experienced a "timeless moment" Suddenly and without warning, something invisible seemed to be drawn across the sky, transforming the world about me into a kind of tent of concentrated and enchanted significance. What was merely an outside became an inside. The objective was somehow transformed into a completely subjective fact, which was experienced as 'mine', but on another level the word had no meaning; for 'I' was no longer the familiar ego." (Happold, 1963, p 130)

Peak experiences have numerous dimensions, and manifestations. They can be cosmic shifts in consciousness (such as the mystic variety) or they can be less spectacular moments of happiness and fulfilment (such as falling in love, watching a new born child, moments of intellectual insights, or moments of athletic achievement). Maslow (1968) claimed that these experiences were therapeutic. They could alter a person's view of himself and others, and significantly alter the relationship with the world. In addition, these experiences are capable of releasing a person's energies for greater creativity, spontaneity, idiosyncrasy, and expressiveness. Maslow went on to claim that some mystical or oceanic experiences have been "so profound as to remove certain neurotic symptoms forever after" (Maslow, 1968, p101).

Of the few studies related to the after effect of mystical experiences, those concerning the near death experience (NDE) are gaining increasing interest. Numerous studies (according to Ring, 1980; Grey, 1985; and Flynn, 1982) have indicated that NDEs, which have mystical elements have changed those who have experienced these states in a number of ways: "Experiencers resume life by living it more fully, loving more openly and fearing death less, if at all. Their life seems more grounded in a sense of purpose and is more consciously shaped by the spiritual values of love and acceptance."

(Ring, 1980, p202)

After conducting a survey on NDE experiences Flynn (1982) argued that the effect of the mystical states on moral consciousness and belief structures was profound. He found that those who had experienced the mystical states associated with NDEs were likely to operate from a high stage of moral development. Many of those who have experienced mystical states have been called saints (Happold,1963). Thus, peak experiences are not only pleasant, they can be profoundly transforming. They may uproot detrimental conditioned responses that cause suffering and awaken individuals to self actualising principles (Maslow, 1968). It appears, the more refined or transcendental the experience, the stronger is its effect.

States of concentration called 'Jhanas' can produce very refined states of consciousness which may contribute to the onset of a mystical experience (Goleman, 1975). Buddhist texts (Buddhagosa, 1976) offer detailed taxonomies, organisation, and general explanations of how to achieve these states at will. Basically the greater the level of concentration the more refined is the experience. At initial levels of activation (such as being in love), the body feels light and expansive and the mind is happy. As the states become more refined there are feelings of bliss, rapture, followed by consciousness of infinite space, oneness with the universe, awareness of no-thing-ness and eventually neither perception nor non-perception culminating in feelings of indescribable peace (Goleman, 1975).

Mystical states form a major component of Wilber's (1981) notion of a path to freedom and "unity consciousness" which, according to him, is the ultimate state of freedom. Like Maslow (1968) Wilber (1981) argues that peak experiences of this type have the power to eliminate neurotic habits and tendencies and they may even alter one's perception of the world, the self and give a sense of incredible peace.

However, peak experiences are still part of paradoxical life situation and the wheel of birth and death discussed earlier in this essay. The catch is, no matter how sublime and subtle the experience is, like heaven, peak experiences are impermanent. Certain individuals can encounter peak moments, benefit from them and then let them go. Most however, like fallen angels, strive for the continued experience of expanded states of consciousness and this can become a terrible trap. Meditation teachers caution of the dangers of developing the Jhanas because of their seductive power and deceptive nature (we can easily believe we have 'arrived' at ultimate liberation when, in fact, we are still caught on the wheel). If attachment is developed to an impermanent experience, then the attachment may condition wanting (like a Hungry Ghost) which eventually leads to misery (Epstein, 1988).

Thus, ironically, being present centred may facilitate peak experiences, but if one's mindfulness is not strong enough, attachment to the peak experience can engender further suffering. When I was twenty one years old, being aware of my dukkha, I decided that the most important thing to do in life was to "get" enlightened. Keen and enthusiastic to make "it" or die, I travelled to Thailand and was ordained as a Buddhist monk. At that stage I didn't know much about satipatthana, but used a variety of contemplation meditations to centre my mind. After a short period of searching, I found a meditation monastery in the forests of NE Thailand and stayed there. The climate and surroundings were harsh and there were no other English speaking monks. Life was difficult, yet I appreciated the rich spiritual life that being ordained and living in a Buddhist community offered. During my stay I contracted, dysentery, malaria and then later hepatitis, so the prospect of dying in the forests of NE Thailand was no mere fantasy.

When I contemplated what or who dies, my mind became peaceful, consequently death contemplation meditation became one of my primary practices. After about 15 months of intensive practice, which was compounded by severe illness, my reality began to break apart. My world and the experience of myself began to alter radically. Wherever I looked, I couldn't find a "me" that died, and my ego seemed to be dissolved into "something greater". There were many different experiences of expanded consciousness which followed and they were characterised by a sense that "I" was just a drop in the ocean of the universe. Everything seemed as if it was a dream, but the dream seemed more "real" than anything I had ever encountered. Strange but "perfect" events occurred as if they were following a divine plan. The "me" I had always identified as my essential self seemed of little consequence within this new perspective and everything appeared to be dominated by a very tangible omniscient intelligence. All "I" could do was surrender to it. This surrender was terrifying, but, at the same time it felt incredibly secure, spacious, peaceful and liberating. For a period of about 4 months my world was turned upside down, and my concepts of reality and existence were completely transformed.

For reasons primarily related to health I eventually disrobed, I left the order of monks and returned to secular life. Two weeks later, as a result of a complex set of circumstances, beyond the scope of this paper to describe, I married a Thai woman, returning to Australia with her two months later. Having nowhere to live, we moved in with my mother at Turramurra, an upper middle-class suburb of Sydney. Within a month my wife was pregnant. The contrast between my expanded world of spiritual security and spacious liberation and my new married life was horrific and my world felt as though it had come crashing down. I felt completely trapped.

Back in Australia, my freedom lost, I experienced great conflict. I reminisced about my experiences in Thailand, like flicking through postcards of a wonderful holiday (holy days). I suffered intense inner conflict over my role as a husband and parent while feeling great spiritual isolation in my new, materialistic surroundings. I desperately wanted to be back in Thailand and not where I was. My feelings of misery continued for quite some time. Eventually, I let go of my conflict and got on with life as it presented itself, but I had learned some important lessons. The most important of these lessons was that attachment to peak experiences can cause misery and suffering as powerfully as these experiences can give feelings of peace and joy.

The Thailand experience had drastically altered my ,understanding of life and the universe. However, it was just an experience and, as an experience, it was a just another conditioned moment on the wheel of birth and death. The Buddha taught that one of the primary root causes of misery was attachment (Nanamoli, 1978). Intellectually, I realised that attachment may eventually lead to suffering, but habits are strong and I still attach myself to concepts, views and objects. It is difficult to sever attachment. Nonetheless, as I grow older, present centred awareness has become like a refuge or home base. Sometimes I wander from it, suffer, but eventually return. Life is a constant process of enchantment and letting go. When I experience conflict and the dukkha of enchantment, present centred awareness is my most important ally in dealing with that conflict.

Present Centred Awareness, Desire, Inner and Interpersonal Conflict and Peace.

Conflict seems to arise when we feel that we should be somewhere else doing something other than what we are presently doing. Amongst other things, it is the feeling that conditions or circumstances 'should' be other than what they are and, in this state of mind, the past and future appear to be more in accordance with our wishes and ideals. Conflict of this type, whether inner or interpersonal, may be resolved with the application of present centred awareness. Rogers (1980) seemed to be referring to the use of present centred awareness in psychological healing when he described a process he called becoming "congruent". "By this I mean that when my experience of this moment is present in my awareness and when what is present in my awareness is present in my communications, then each of these three levels matches or is congruent. At such moments I am integrated or whole, I am completely in one piece." (Rogers, 1980, p15).

When people desire something and that desire is not satisfied, distress or conflict may arise. Even the desire for peace and psychic freedom, though it may be well motivated, is still 'desire' and therefore has the potential to give rise to conflict. By being present for the experience of life as it naturally arises, it is possible to transcend the pull of desire and the conflict or "discongruence" which desire may create.

A few years ago I attended a meditation retreat. The retreat was held in silence, which meant that there was no visual or verbal contact permitted amongst participants. Some of the yogis were old friends while others I had never met before. For six weeks I slept in a dorm, sat in a hall, ate and generally lived with 50 or more people with whom there was no normal communication. One day, as I was "sitting" in meditation, my mind became very quiet. There were no sounds in the hall and all I could hear was the gentle rustle of trees and the sweet sound of birds. The conditions were conducive, and I experienced peace. Part way through the session a person near me began to wriggle. The sound drew my attention, but it was not disturbing. Later he began to scratch his head and I also could hear him swallowing. My concentration was shattered and I felt irritation arise, but at that moment the end-of-session bell rang and we all got up.

As the days continued, a similar scenario was repeated a number of times. At these times his repertoire would also include getting up in the middle of the session to use the toilet attached to the hall, flushing the cistern and then, returning to his position in the hall, noisily writing memoirs in a journal he had been keeping. As my meditations became more difficult I began to notice the person on the other side of me as well. He was breathing quite heavily and, though not previously noticed, the rhythmic rushing of air would distract me from my own breath which was the object focus of my meditation. What were previously very calm meditation sessions began to become times of great agitation and hatred.

My concentration deteriorated and instead of observing my breath, the sessions began by neurotically waiting for the agitating sounds to begin. As their vibration was detected, uncontrollable fantasies would arise. In my mind's eye I would see me violently stomping on the culprit's journal and pen and strangling him while simultaneously I could feel a power growing in my arms, getting ready to stuff any available cushion up my noisy neighbour's nostrils. The thoughts would arise, and with great aversion and clinging, I would suffer. Feeling the conflict in my heart, my mind began to bargain. One thought I had was to write each of them a polite yet frank note: "Please stop writing, it is disturbing my peace." or "Do you mind not breathing, it is distracting my attention". For hours I would sit obsessively planning the how, when, where, and what of my potential notes. While my colleagues were either getting enlightened or completing the first draft of a best seller, I was entangled and enmeshed with thought and conflict. Naturally, I didn't strangle my neighbours, nor did I write them any diplomatic messages. I did, however, remember a talk given by a Thai meditation master. He compared the suffering of worldly beings to a dog with an itch on its back. If the dog sits in the sun it blames the sun. If it finds a shady tree it blames the tree. If it jumps in the river it blames the river. The itch he said was greed, ignorance and hatred. He, like the Buddha, claimed that only when these taints of mind are uprooted will worldly beings find resolutions to their conflicts, peace and freedom from suffering (Chah, 1980, 1982).

I suffered with my intense aversion for about 3-4 days. However, the suffering came from my own mind. Its cause was attachment to pleasant and peaceful mind states, aversion to unidealistic sounds, delusion about the way things should be and ignorance about the way they were. The peace I originally experienced was conditional upon getting things to go the way that I wanted them to. It became clear,(intellectually and to some extent experientially), that true peace is unconditional and, so, not dependent upon changeable objects of mind or body.

After this insight I tried to become 'congruent' with the experience of life as it presented itself. I also tried to simplify and clarify the situation by becoming aware of sounds as just sounds, thoughts as just thoughts, aversion as just aversion and so on. As mindfulness sharpened the pain of desire, clinging and grasping became more obvious with letting go of my views, concepts and desires being the only natural resolution of my conflict and, thus, the way to peace and freedom.

Eventually I allowed myself to look at my noisy neighbours. I could see that they, just like me, had conflict. Struggling with the mind's insanities, they also had human difficulties, hopes, desires and personal issues. As I looked, and my 'seeing' became clearer, an overwhelming quality of compassion and acceptance arose to take the place of my anger and agitation.

In most cases interpersonal conflict resolution is dependent on being able to hear another's point of view. Carl Rogers (1980) praised the ability some of us have to really 'hear' another. If the mind is defiled with "taints", then perception and human interaction may beclouded by one's judgments, expectations, desires, aversions, hopes, fears and limitations. "Most of the time, of course, I, like everyone else, exhibit some degree of incongruence. I have learned, however, that realness, or genuineness, or congruence -- whatever term you wish to give it -- is a fundamental basis for the best communication." (Rogers, 1980, p15)

According to Rogers (1980) real 'hearing' is a subjective experience where one listens without judgement or expectation, but with an open mind. Words and the concepts they create are therefore not twisted to fit into a listener's ideals or desires but are heard in an honest and realistic manner. It was only when I could 'let go' of my preconceived views, judgements and aversion that I could really 'see' the yogis on either side of me and thus appreciate them with compassion. The ability to let go, however, seemed to be dependent upon present centred awareness, which allows for the recognition of conditions and fosters the wisdom to accept their reality. Conflict (inner or interpersonal) is, of course, painful, and we tend to want to avoid it. Yet, if we honestly feel and perceive our experience, whatever it is, in a present moment context, we may find simple solutions.

To feel lonely is to feel isolated, alienated and disconnected from oneself and the rest of the world. Love is a means of reconnecting with oneself and the world around us, thus becoming whole through the union which love engenders. Love is normally considered as liking something, however from a Buddhist perspective it is to allow someone or something to be without judgment or expectation with "a willingness to listen and be attentive" (Kittisaro, 1989, p155).

Intrinsic Freedom: No Self No Problems

The Buddha taught that there are two types of understanding. The first type is the understanding which comes from an accumulated memory and intellectual grasp of concepts. The second type is not dependent upon intellectual reasoning and comes from a penetrative (non-discursive) insight into the 'truth's or the way things are. According to Buddhists the root causes of dukkha are attachment, aversion, and ignorance and the way to liberation from dukkha is with morality, concentration and wisdom. Morality is basically the act of living life with integrity and doings those things which do not harm oneself or others. Concentration is the ability to centre and focus attention while wisdom is a penetrative insight into the way things are (Rahula, 1959). Mindfulness can engender both intrinsic knowledge and penetrative wisdom (Mahasi Sayadaw, 1983).

Morality, concentration and wisdom are dependent upon one another. If one leads a life that is fragmented with acts that are harmful, it is difficult to focus the mind. If one cannot focus the mind, then it is difficult to see the truth. The more one knows the truth, the more likely one is able to live life with integrity. Like a forest water pool, if the muddy water is stirred up, one can not see its bottom, but if the muddy water settles and the water is clear, one can then observe and know what is on the bottom of the pool. Wisdom is the quality of clearly knowing the 'bottom of the pool', that is, the truth of existence (Chah, 1980; 1982; Kornfield & Breiter, 1985). According to Buddhists the truth of existence is that all conditioned phenomena are impermanent and all phenomena are insubstantial, empty or not self (Sole-Leris, 1986). The Buddhist line of thought considers that all psychological problems or dukkha, gross or subtle, arise because of the idea that there is belief in a solid, abiding self and the way to liberation is to gain insight into the empty nature of this deceptive self concept (Rahula, 1959).

Egolessness has become an accepted aspiration of many meditational practitioners (Epstein, 1988). For example, Wilber's (1981) "unity consciousness" is a state where the "self" boundaries expand infinitely and disappears and "identity, as a psychological concept, is achieved with the universe" (Koltko, 1989). Many concentration practices, such as developing the Jhanas, can lead to a loss of ego boundaries. For example, at the seventh level of the formless Jhanas there is an "awareness of No-thing-ness" While at the eighth formless Jhana there is "Neither perception-nor non-perception" (Goleman, 1975, p215). Egolessness is commonly understood the sought after end state and so many meditators attempt to abandon the ego for an experience that is free from ego boundaries. This is not unlike my attempt to "get" enlightened when in Thailand. It seemed that if I could surrender my ego and experience "Egolessness", I finally would be free from dukkha. A few years back I began to realise that no-body "gets" enlightened and there is nothing to be abandoned. According to Epstein (1990) emptiness does not meaning nothingness or that nothing exists. Rather, it means that nothing solid and lasting can be found with the concept attributed to self. Consequently, the freedom of emptiness is not an experience or a state, but a relationship to conditions which are in constant flux. "Egolessness in not a state, it is only found in relationship to a belief in concrete existence." (p30). Epstein argues, that by an individual's attempt to be rid of an ego and to merge it with its surroundings or attain a "state" of "egolessness", emptiness is recified into yet another 'thing'. The Buddhist doctrine of emptiness certainly does not intend to replace one 'thing' (self) with another (emptiness) (Epstein, 1990).

According to Buddhists the "self" is made up of five basic elements or clusters of conditions (called kandas). The kandas are: matter (form), feelings, mental formations (such as thoughts etc), perceptions, and consciousness. The kandas are constantly arising and passing away in a manner similar to a motion picture which is only a sequence of still pictures manipulated in such a way as to create an illusion of life (Rahula, 1959). The usual self-concept is the result of bringing the kandas together into an illusively solid entity and calling them "I" "mine" and "myself".

When I ordained as a monk in Thailand my head was shaved. The hair which I once called mine fell into a drain and was washed away. Later, when I thought that I was dying, I scrutinised the self that I thought I was. Everytime I looked I found a different concept. Sometimes I was a "monk", sometimes I was a "lonely boy", sometimes I was "an Australian", at other times I was "frightened" "brave" "young" "old" "confused" etc. With every introspection I found yet different images and concepts of myself, all of which inevitably would fade into something else. I could not find a stable and lasting concept that I could call "I", "mine" and "myself".

A few years ago I went on (yet another) satipatthana meditation retreat. The retreat was scheduled to last for six weeks. Usually on retreats I can maintain a reasonably stable and comfortable sitting posture. However, for some reason on this retreat, no matter how many cushions I used or how I twisted my body, I could not find a comfortable position. For the first two week I wriggled and squirmed (possibly driving my neighbours crazy) and then, eventually, decided to surrender to the discomfort. Like other times before (with my heart pain) I made "pain" the object of my meditation. This time though, the pain was not an obvious reflection of something else n my life but was distinctly physical in nature. The pain usually occurred around my knees and feet. At first I felt great aversion to the pain and the one hour sitting sessions seemed like four or five. Slowly, however, as I tried to remain present centred and aware, my mindfulness and concentration sharpened and my attention could focus right into the centre of the sensations with a quality of openness. What I found was fascinating. The essential nature of the pain was space. Out of the space there were qualities of hardness, heat, movement and moments of burning, sharpness, pulling and twisting. All these elements would arise like miniature explosions out of the space only to change to something else and disappear again. Some explosions were bigger than others but all of them only lasted moments. If I became distracted, or mindfulness faded, all the little separate explosions became diffuse and connected and the "knee" felt "painful". If, on the other hand, I could remain focused, the next moment would arise before the last one had a chance to hurt. If I could remain mindful and focused there was no "knee" and no "pain", only moments of sensations. Only when all the little momentary fragments of sensations were put together did it feel painful.

The "pain" of a "knee" can be compared to the pain of our lives. Our ignorance allows all the thoughts and feelings related to the past and the future to be mixed with delusions about the supposedly solid present in order to create an illusion of a self which is miserable. On the other hand, if life can be experienced moment to moment, then the potential for dukkha is greatly minimised. Present centred awareness is way of seeing clearly the moment to moment nature of life. Present centred awareness has the capacity of grasping reality to its maximum (Epstein, 1988) and is like a solvent which dissolves the glue (i.e. ignorance) that sticks the self concept together.

"There is a story of a man fleeing a tiger. He came to precipice and catching hold of a wild vine, swung down over the edge. The tiger sniffed at him from above while below another tiger growled and snapped waiting for him to fall. As he hung there two mice began to gnaw away the vine. Just then he saw a big wild strawberry growing nearby. Reaching out with his free hand he plucked the strawberry. How sweet it tasted." (Goldstein,1976, p22)

Because Buddhist thought emphasises dukkha, Buddhists have been criticised for being pessimistic. However, a Buddhist view is neither pessimistic nor optimistic but, rather, realistic (Rahula, 1959). The only certain thing about life is that there is death. It is like we are always hanging over a cliff from a vine being gnawed by mice. Yet, life can be sweet if we are present to taste it. Being present for life is intrinsically liberating because it illuminates the emptiness of both self and psychological distress. As far as I am able to understand, emptiness does not mean nothingness or annihilation. On the contrary, emptiness is full to the brim with experience. "Emptiness is where you experience everything in itself and of itself without meaning and judgement" (Peter Nelson, personal communication, 1990). Again, if we can do what we do for the sake of doing it, then the energy wasted in maintaining a self can be free to experience life (Moss, 1981).

Satipatthana: Destabilising or Centring?

Earlier in this essay it was argued that Western psychotherapies are directed at self fortification while spiritual practices are aimed at self transcendence. Now, it will be argued that Satipatthana can fulfil both functions.

Satipatthana is both a way of being and an intensive meditation practice. Wilber (1981) warns that meditation practices may be fragmenting and destabilising for those individuals who are still at the pre and personal stages because "You have to be somebody before you can be nobody" (Engler, 1986 cited in Epstein, 1990, p18). If satipatthana unsticks the self concept, then satipatthana as a meditation practice may be inappropriate for those whose problem is some form of neurotic fragmentation. However, satipatthana is a meditation practice which incorporates both stabilising and integrating functions. The "ego", according to Epstein (1988) can be understood in both representational and functional terms. The representational aspect of the ego constructs a picture of the self and the world with multiple mental images. The functional role of the ego, on the other hand, maintains psychic equilibrium and facilitates adaptation and growth. The "I" of the ego can be found in its representational aspect and this aspect creates the "I" as something that is felt to be real and solid. The functional aspect of the ego, however, promotes organisation and integration of the diverse elements and inputs of the life experience.

While on a meditation retreat with a Burmese meditation master (Sayadaw U Pandita, 1988), I heard him describe sharp mindfulness as having the nature of penetration and the ability to 'cover', 'rub' or stick to any object of attention. With mindfulness one "stays with" what ever happens as it happens. Thus, mindfulness maintains a sense of connection with changing events. It does not destroy the ego, but, on the contrary, provides and enhances a stable yet flexible centre from which to integrate and synthesise changing experience (Epstein,1988). This ability to integrate random and incessant change inherent in events is healing and leads to increasing well-being (Muzika,1990; Epstein, 1990). Thus, satipatthana facilitates and engenders the functional aspects of the ego and those who are mindful appear centred, at ease and "together".

The representational self or "I", on the other hand, is an illusion which arises because we do not scrutinise our experiences closely enough but instead we examine ourselves from the viewpoint of a person (Muzika, 1990). If we practice mindfulness, we begin to see the space between the kandas and the illusion of the "self" is shown for what it is - no-thing. Thus, mindfulness lets ego be ego (Epstein, 1990). Mindfulness does not eliminate the ego but rather banishes the delusion regarding the ego. "This seemingly solid, concrete, independent, self-instituting I under its own power that appears actually does not exist at all" (The Dalai Lama according to Epstein, 1988, p68). When there is no self, then dukkha has no place to abide. When there is no self dukkha does not have an owner. No self no problems!

Conclusion

Dukkha, is a term that refers to gross suffering as well as the subtle aspects of unsatisfactoriness and uncertainty. Dukkha is the reason why individuals seek freedom. The path to freedom is a very personal path and I have faith in the Buddha's teaching because it has been confirmed by personal experience. Central to this teaching is the practice of present centred awareness.

Although I can not claim to be an expert on satipatthana, I do know that mindfulness has helped me cultivate freedom from dukkha. Satipatthana has given me a stable centre and the psychological space to help heal a distressed psyche. Satipatthana has also given me a means of dealing with inner and interpersonal conflict and provided an insight into how to love myself and others. Moreover, mindfulness has been intrinsically liberating because it has illuminated the fantasy nature of "my" "self". Satipatthana is not an easy exercise. The habits of attachment, aversion and ignorance are strong. Like most people I become lost and enchanted with conditioned states and perpetuate dukkha. Every now and then, though, I sense a taste of freedom from the wheel of birth and death. In those moments I discover that present centred awareness is my refuge as well as my path.

There are numerous ways to cultivate present centred awareness. Present centred awareness can be an intensive meditation practice and/or a way of life, but essentially it is the practice of doing what one does for the value of doing it using 100% of one's being. Present centred awareness is one way to freedom of the heart, but in many ways freedom of the heart is simply present centred awareness which is being here now for the experience of life.

References:-

Buddhagosa, B. (1976). The Path of Purification: Volume one. Boulder: Shambala.

Castaneda, C. (1974). Tales of Power. New York: Pocket Books.

Chah, Venerable Ajahn. (1980). A Taste of Freedom. Ubon Rajathani, Thailand: Bung Wai Forest Monastery.

Chah, Venerable Ajahn. (1982). Bodinyana. Ubon Ratathani, Thailand: Bung Wai Forest monastery.

Davison, G. C. and Neale, J. M. (1982) Abnormal Psychology: An experimental clinical approach. New York: John Wiley and Sons, Inc.

Dass, R. (1972). Remember Be Here Now. New Mexico: Newspaper printing corporation.

Deatherage, O. G. (1982). Mindfulness meditation as psychotherapy. In Buddhism in Psychotherapy. Kandy: Buddhist Publication Society. (The Wheel Publication No 290/291.)

Epstein, M. (1988). The deconstruction of the self: Ego and "egolessness" in Buddhist insight meditation. The Journal of Transpersonal Psychology. 20, 61-69.

Epstein, M. (1990). Psychodynamics of meditation: Pitfalls on the Spiritual path. The Journal of Transpersonal Psychology. 22, 17-34.

Flynn, C. P. (1982). Meaning and implication of the NDE transformation: Some preliminary findings. Anabiosis. 2, 3-13.

Gibbons, F. X., Smith, T. W., Ingram, R. E., Pearce, K., Brehm, S. S., and Schroeder, D. J. (1985). Self awareness and self confrontation: Effects of self focussed attention on members of a clinical population. Journal of Personality and Social Psychology. 48, 663675.

Goldstein, G. (1976). The Experience of Insight. Boulder: Shambala.

Goleman, D. (1975). The Buddha on meditation and states of consciousness. In C.T. Tart (Eds) Tranpersonal Psychologies. London,: Routledge & Kegan Paul Ltd.

Grey, M. (1985). Return From Death: An exploration of the Near-Death experience. New York: Routledge and Kegan Paul Inc.

Hanh, Thich Nat. (1975). The Miracle of Mindfulness: A Manual on Meditation. Boston: Beacon Press.

Happold, F. C. (1963). Mysticism: A Study and an Anthology. Middlesex, England: Penguin Books Ltd.

Kapleau, P. (1971). The Wheel of Birth and Death. New York: Harpers and Row.

Kepner, E., and Brien, L. (1970). Gestalt therapy: A Behavioristic phenomenology. In J. Fagen and I. L. Shepherd (Eds.) Gestalt Therapy Now. New York: Harper Colophon Books

Khantipalo, Bhikkhu. (1976). Wat Buddharangsee, Stanmore, NSW, Australia.

Kittisaro Bikkhu. (1989). Contemplation and action. In Seeing the Way. Hertfordshire, England: Amaravati Publications.

Koltko, M. E. (1989). The humanised self: A response to Schneider's critique of Transpersonal psychology. Journal of Humanistic Psychology. 29, 482-492.

Kornfield, J., and Breiter, P. (1985). A Still Forest Pool. Illinois: The Theosophical Publishing house.

Mahasi Sayadaw. (1983). Thoughts on the Dhamma: Selections from Discourses by Venerable Mahasi Sayadaw. Kandy: Wheel Publications.

Maslow, A. H. (1968). Towards a Psychology of Being (2nd Ed). Princeton, New Jersey: D. Van Nostrand Company, Inc.

Moss, R. (1981). The I that is We. Berkely, California: Celestial Arts.

Muzika, E. G. (1990). Evolution, emptiness and the fantasy self. Journal of Humanistic Psychology. 30,89-108.

Naranjo, C. (1970). Present Centeredness: Techniques, Prescription and Ideal. In J. Fagen and I. L. Shepherd (Eds) Gestalt Therapy Now. New York: Harper Colophon Books.

Nanamoli Bikkhu. (1978). The Life of the Buddha. Kandy, Ceylon: Buddhist Publication society.

Nyanapondika Thera. (1962). The Heart of Buddhist Meditation. London: Rider & Co.

Nyanasamvara, Somdet Phra.(1974). Contemplation of the Body: Kayanupassana. Bangkok, Thailand: Mahamakut Rajavidyalaya Press.

Perls, F. S. (1970). Four lectures. In J. Fagen and I. L. Shepherd (Eds.) Gestalt Therapy Now. New York: Harper Colophon Books

Rahula, W. (1959). What the Buddha Taught. Bedford, England: Gordon Fraser.

Ring, K. (1980). Life at Death. New York: Coward, McCann and Geoghegan.

Rogers, C. R. (1961). On Becoming a Person. London: Constable & Company Ltd.

Rogers, C. R. (1980). A way of Being. Houghton Mifflin Company.

Roy-King, J. (1986). The moment as a factor in emotional well-being. Journal of Religion and Health. 25, 207220.

Sayadaw U Pandita (1988). A six week meditation retreat held in Burradoo, NSW.

Shaffer, D. R. (1985). Developmental Psychology: Theory Research and Applications. Monterey, California: Brooks/Cole Publishing Co.

Sole-Leris, A. (1986). Tranquility & Insight: An introduction to the oldest form of Buddhist meditation. Boston: Shambala.

Speeth, K. R. (1982). On psychotherapeutic attention. The Journal of Transpersonal Psychology. 14, 141-160.

Sumedho Bikkhu. (1983). Cittaviveka: Teachings from the silent mind. Hants, England: Chithurst Forest Monastery.

Tambiah, S. J. (1970). Buddhism and the Spirit Cults of North East Thailand. London: Cambridge University Press

Tart, C. T. (1990). Extending mindfulness to everyday life. Journal of Humanistic Psychology. 30, 81-106.

Trungpa, C. (1973). Cutting Through Spiritual Materialism. Boulder: Shambala.

Washburn, M. (1990). Two patterns of transcendence. Journal of Humanistic Psychology. 30, 84-111.

Wilber, K. (1981). No Boundary: Eastern and Western Approaches to Personal Growth. Boulder: Shambala.

Wortz, E. (1982). Applications of awareness methods in psychotherapy. The Journal of Transpersonal Psychology. 14, 61-68.

( End of File ***>

Ä
K7Äc/o Songserm Service„ Ä
K:Ä88©89 Phosi Road,„ Ä
K:ÄUdorn thani 41000„
Ä
KCÄTHAILAND„

Ä
K=ÄApril 11, 1991„

Dear Philip,

I am enclosing a copy of a letter to Ven: Sumedho. This is in answer to a letter from him in which he asks me to say what I want to do with the Arama Fund. Apparently the EST are in some doubt due to something that they have heard from you, either directly or indirectly.

I was about to write this letter to you yesterday when I received a tape from Betty in which she said that the point in question was in connection with a letter that I wrote to you on 18th June last year in which I said that "....I also want him (Haines) to look into the eventual repayment of the "pig farm land" and the cottage loan."

My intention in saying this was not that repayment should be made to the Arama Fund, but rather that if possible a fund should be made within the EST for promoting the objectives of the Arama Fund and that the fields and the cottage should be considered as assets of this fund. But from what I have since heard, the EST have a ruling that they will not make funds separate from their main assets, although I do'nt know the details of this.

Of course, your comment (via Betty's tape), that the EST cannot make payments to themselves, is obviously correct. But I hope now that this will clear the ground and enable you to get all the documents to Haines. I should think that you are quite tired of the whole thing and wo'nt be sorry to see the end of it.

At present we are in the middle of the hot season and this year looks like being hotter and longer than usual. The afternoon temperatures are approaching 40 deg:C, but we do get occasional storms that cool the atmosphere down for a day or two.

Tan Acharn is well and remarkably active for his age (77 years), but he tends to get tired more quickly than before and this hot weather does not suit him.

I hope you are managing to put up with your own problems. The aftermath of a severe stroke is by all accounts no fun atall and I admire your fortitude.

Yours with Metta

Paá¤áá¤áa.

THE TEACHING OF PHOWA
(TRANSFERENCE OF CONSCIOUSNESS AT THE TIME OF DEATH)

ACCORDING TO THE TEACHING OF THE PATUL RINPOCHE IN THE "KUNSANG LAMI SHELLUNG" PAGE 290--SHORTENED AND TAUGHT BY THE VENERABLE K.C. AYANG RINPOCHE OF THE DRIGUNG LINE OF KAGYUDPA, BYLAKUPPE, KARNATAKA STATE / INDIA.

INTRODUCTION

According to the Tibetan custom, in the event of someone dying, a member of the family of the dying person would request a Lama to perform the "phowa" ceremony (i.e. Transference of consciousness at the time of death.)

The Lama performing the ceremony would have himself mastered the art of phowa (transferring the consciousness at the time of death) after having previously been initiated into the practice and meditation given only to Tulkus (Incarnates) and retreated to the hills to carry out the practice which he would continue night and day until the signs he was told to watch for (at the time his initiation) appear.

He would then leave his retreat equipped now to instruct monks, nuns and lay people in the practice. He would however, continue to perform the practice at least once a month. When he becomes aware of the signs of his approaching death (signs he was taught to recognize during his retreat period), he would meet the eventuality with a great calmness and equanimity.

All the Tibetans are familiar with this practice. During the summer months at the end of every twelfth year when the plains were richly verdant after the white of winter, one could see the trek of Tibetan pilgrims walk to the small temple at Bhum Ngu Sumdo in which phowa had been given for the first time to the people of Drigung .

They would pitch huge white tents, a stark contrast to the yellow and maroon robes of the monks and nuns and the colorful chubas (the traditional dress) of the women and children and summer flowers, in preparation for three weeks stay for the performance of "PHOWA" by the head Tulku of Drigung Lamas.

This teaching of "PHOWA" is with the Venerable K.C. Ayang Rinpoche who continues this uninterrupted succession of the Drigung line of Phowa Lamas from the Supreme Guru Dorje Chang to Tilopa, Naropa, Marpa, Milarepa and Gampopa up to the present time. He now resides at the Tibetan Mahayana Buddhist Kagyudpa Monastery: "THUBTEN SHEDRUB JANGCHUBLING" in the Tibetan settlement, Bylakuppe in Karnataka State India.

When taking the initiation of Phowa, it is important to receive the initiation from a Tulku (i.e. Incarnate Lama) who continues the line of succession of the Phowa lineage of Gurus. The blessings of such an initiation will render the practice safe as the blessings of the lineage will flow unhampered to meet the disciple and bring with them quick results.

Should the Phowa be attempted without this very vital precaution the results will not be the same and the practitioner will be faced with many dangers.

Faith in the Lama Tulku is of primary importance. If the faith is very strong, coupled with devotion, then the results will be very powerful and immediate. If the faith is not of the highest strength then the results will be medium and so on . . and where there is little faith, no good results can be expected, however much you may try.

In the root Tantra, "GYUD" it is written:
Even if a man is so sinful that he kills a holy man every day and has committed the five Heavy Sins, if he goes on this path of Phowa the veils of sin will not remain. For the men of many sins and for all beings, this is the Path of liberation which is direct and secret.

Urgyan Rinpoche said, "By meditation all can attain Enlightenment. My meditation is that which is called "MA GOM PI" (i.e. spontaneous without meditation effort) . . . "

Naropa says, 'There are nine Gates which are of the world but there is only one which is the gate of Mahamundra (Nirvana). If you shut the nine Gates then you will get the Path of liberation without any doubt ...."

Marpa Lotsawa said, "From now, if you study Phowa, purify, purify time and time again. Then, at that time, when death is approaching you will know no despair. If, beforehand, you have become accustomed to this Path of Phowa then at the time of death you will be full of cheerful confidence .... "

Over and above the Nine ordinary apertures of the body called "buga", there is a 'Crest' aperture, and the virtue of doing this practice of Phowa is to be able to think of this crest aperture at the time of death and to direct the consciousness through this gate into the pure land of the Buddha, the Buddhafield (DEWA CHEN).

The profound Path of Phowa is the Holy Way of the Buddhas which is Dharma rapidly realized spontaneously without meditation effort.

DRIKUNG PHOWA CHEN MO
Account of the Great Drikun Phowa

It is very difficult to attain the precious human body and having attained it one must utilize it to reach Buddhahood through the proper hearing, contemplation and meditation of the precious teachings. Even if one has attained human birth, it can suddenly end without warning. Because of the overwhelming power of laziness in the postponement of our practice, one's life ends without one even realizing it, because life is so short and the galloping mara of death is so quick. When death comes we have no escape, we have to accept it and go on to the next life. At this time neither your accumulated wealth nor your dear ones nor your cherished body -- nothing can help except the precious teachings.

In the precious teachings, Lord Shakyamuni Buddha taught the Dharma to suit the different levels of understanding and to different dispositions of all beings through Shravakayana, Pratyekayana and Mahayana practices.

The Mahayana consists of Hetuyana (cause) and Phalayana (fruit). The Hetuyana or the Sutrayana consists of all the practices without the tantric initiations. In the Phalayana or the Vajrayana there are many means (paths) to attain enlightenment through the Arising and Completion processes but one must diligently practice over a period of time before one can realize one's Buddhahood .

In the Vajrayana, the Phowa practice is the most direct and the quickest path for one to achieve enlightenment. It is said that even the heaviest of sinners has a chance for enlightenment through the practice of the Phowa. "There are teachings for one to become enlightened, but I have a teaching (Phowa) that offers enlightenment without meditation", said Marpa, the great translator and the father of the Kagyu Lineage.

The Phowa "Jaktshukma" (the standing grass blade) Linage is one of the precious phowa practices. In the eighth century, the Dharma king of Tibet, Thri-song Deu-Tsen invited the great Indian tantric master, Guru Padmasambhava, to Tibet and they built the Samye monastery. Guru Padmasambhava was residing in Ch'im-phu cave in the vicinity of Samye when an important minister of the king, Nyima, had a tragedy. Nyima, who had two palaces and was in the process of moving from one to the other, was packing some belongings by the light of a lantern when a small spark caused a fire which instantly burned down the whole palace tragically killing thirteen people including his parents. All his horses, mules, cattle and other animals also perished in the fire. Minister Nyima, thinking of the love and respect that others show their parents felt that he had committed the heaviest of sins by causing the death of his parents and others.

The king desiring to end the suffering of his minister went to Ch'im-phu cave to request the help of Padmasambhava. Padamasambhava by miraculous power went to the Pure Land to see Amitabha Buddha. He told Buddha Amitabha about the suffering of Minister Nyima and of all sentient beings and asked Amitabha to give a special teaching to free them from suffering. Buddha Amitabha gave this Phowa teaching to Padmasambhava who gave it to Minister Nyima who then gave up all worldly activities to practice the Phowa which he eventually actualized. Through the path of Phowa, Minister Nyima's consciousness attained the Pure Land when death came and many different signs appeared like rainbows and relics from his body.

This text was hidden in the Black Mandala Lake which is at the backside of Dhaglhagampo Hill. The Naga king, Tsurana-Ratna, asked to be the guardian of this text and was told by Padmasambhava that the future incarnation of Minister Nyima would be Nyida Sang-gye and that he must give the text to him.

Padmasambhava then left to go to the land of the Rakshas. After more than 350 years the incarnation of Minister Nyima was born as the son of a shepherd. When Nyida Sang-gye was growing up he felt great compassion and wept tears of sorrow when the animals would die.

In order to alleviate his great suffering, Buddha Amitabha appeared to him and gave him this Phowa teaching for the benefit of all sentient beings. Nyida Sang-gye then gave Phowa to all the dying animals and often many different signs appeared.

The Naga-king then came to Nyida Sang-gye and told him of the Hidden Text (Ter-ma) and Nyida Sang-gye took the Ter from the Black Mandala Lake and gave the teaching to the Sagas. Through this teaching many of the Nagas were reborn into a higher life.

After this Nyida Sang-gye gave many teachings to human beings through which many reached liberation.

This transmission of the teaching is held by the Drikung Kagyudpa. The devoted practitioner who has no doubt in the qualified Lama and teachings can experience the sign of Phowa merely through receiving the Lung (Blessing Transmission). This has been experienced by many practitioners around the world.

The Drikung Kagyu Linage is one of the lineages of Tibetan Buddhism. The founder, Kyobpa Jigten Sumgon (1143-1217) - thought of as the second Buddha was the Vajra-regent of Phagmo Drupa who was the chief lineage holder of Gampopa (1079-1153).

The Drikung Kagyu order of Tibetan Buddhism holds the precious teachings of all the yanks which Shakyamuni Buddha taught for the benefit of all sentient beings. This lineage also possesses the complete transmission of the meditative practices of the Five-Profound Paths of the Mahamudra and the Six Yogas of Naropa. The Drikung order is famous for its ability to successfully transfer the power of the Phowa meditation to initiated and devoted practitioners who practice it. Thus, the Phowa transmission given by the Drikung Lamas came to be known as the 'Drikung Phowa Chen-mo' - the Great Drikung Phowa. The Drikung Phowa became so powerful that it became a tradition in Tibet to have a Drikung Phowa Ch'en-mo ceremony every twelve years at Dro-ngor Sum-dho at Drikung in central Tibet. The fame of this Phowa continued to spread as thousands of participants would experience the signs of the Phowa during the 'Lung' (Blessing Transmission) given by a head Lama of Drikung Kagyu. Due to the accumulated energy of the lineage and the blessing of the teaching itself, the qualified Lama is able to directly transfer the blessings of this practice to the pure and devoted disciples who can experience the signs very quickly. When one has received any of the signs of the Phowa meditation, then one is considered to be prepared to enter into the Buddha-field of Amitabha Buddha (Dewa-chen) at the time of death. It is taught that one does not return to the samsaric realms after having entered Dewa-chen and that one can quickly achieve Enlightenment. Because of all this, the Drikung Phowa is becoming particularly relevant in these times simply because in today's society we do not have the time nor the circumstances to walk the spiritual path of the Dharma as did our predecessors in the past. We desperately need a spiritual path that is simple, relevant, and direct, enabling us to transform the stresses and pace of modern life into a vital force that cuts through materialism and attachment to worldly phenomenal, and awakens in us the realization of our Buddha-natures.

The Drikung Phowa meditations is simple and yet powerful. We have the same opportunity as did the thousands of people in Tibet to master the Phowa practice, enabling us to transform the experience of death, which is a certainty, into a passage to the realization of Dewa-ch'en (Blissful, Pure Land). Today, we have His Holiness the Drikung Kyabgon, the Vaira-regent of Lord Jigten Sumgon who is the incarnation of Chenrezig, imparting this teaching as well as other Drikung Lamas like the Venerable K.C. Ayang Rinpoche who is traveling the world to impart these precious teachings to fortunate human being

==========
First published in the Dhammadana Series 10 //The First International Conference and Pilgrimage in the Tradition of Sayagyi U Ba Khin//, page 1-11, by the Sayagyi U Ba Khin Memorial Trust U.K., 1988
==========

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF THE PLACES OF PILGRIMAGE

Sayagyi U Chit Tin

The Four Places of Pilgrimage

On the day of the Buddha's demise, Venerable Ananda said to the Buddha that the bhikkhus used to come to see him after the rains retreat. This would no longer be possible after his demise. So the Buddha replied,[1] "There are these four places, Ananda, which give rise to a positive feeling (Samvejaniya), which are worthy of being seen by people of good family who have faith." He goes on to name the four places as: (1) the birthplace of the Buddha, (2) the place where he was fully awakened to unsurpassed, perfect awakening, (3) the place where he set rolling the unsurpassed Wheel of the Doctrine, and (4) the place where he was completely quenched in the state of Nibbana without any residue of (the effects of past) grasping remaining. These four places are: Lumbini, Bodh-Gaya, the deer forest (Migadaya) at Isipatana near Baranasi, and Kusinara.

The Buddha then says that bhikkhus, bhikkhunis, men and women who are lay disciples will come to see these four sites. "Indeed, Ananda," he said, "for all those who with a believing mind die while travelling on a journey to the monuments (at these places), after their death, they will be reborn in a happy, heavenly world."

We can see that the key idea in a pilgrimage is the mental attitude of those who visit the sites. Ashin Buddhaghosa explains that having faith means having a believing mind and keeping all the observances with regards to the Buddha, etc. The observances include such well-known actions as the duty (of sweeping) the space around a monument in the early morning, etc.[2] Ashin Dhammapala adds that this means faith in the three objects (of Buddha, Dhamma, and Sangha). Having a believing mind means being filled with joy and faith when acting.[3]

Ashin Buddhaghosa says the positive feeling (Samvejaniya) produced by seeing these sites is the religious excitement or sense of urgency they produce (Samvega-janaka). Ashin Dhammapala explains that this sense of urgency means the mind possesses the knowledge (that one should) shrink back from doing wrong (Ottappa-nana), for that is the condition for rebirth and so on (Abhijati-tthan'adini). The translation by the Burma Pitaka Association of Burma interprets this sense of urgency as meaning that "which causes awareness and apprehension of the nature of impermanence."[4] Here we see a hint that visiting these places of pilgrimage should help us in our practice of the Buddha's Teachings.

Travelling to see the monuments, Ashin Buddhaghosa says, means that at the various Cetiyas, the pilgrims sweep the space around them, clean the seats, and water the Bodhi tree. In this way, we should pay homage to the monuments. Thus we set out, with a believing mind in the intervening period (before reaching the goal), and we will be established in the very next life in a heavenly world. Ashin Dhammapala explains that skilful thought (Kusala-cetana) founded on the merit of the Buddha is sure to lead one to a heavenly world.

We may add that in addition to the veneration at the Cetiyas (Cetiya-puja) mentioned by these commentators, the practice of mindfulness of the breath (Anapana) and the development of insight (Vipassana) will also be very powerful in instilling in us a sense of urgency with regards to the need to escape from suffering. As we progress in the practice, our faith in the Buddha, his Doctrine, and those who follow that Doctrine scrupulously will grow stronger and stronger.

The Four Places Which Do Not Vary

These four places mentioned by the Buddha are not the only ones that pilgrims visit, however. Ashin Buddhaghosa points out that there are four places which do not vary for the Buddhas:[5] (1) the seat of awakening (Bodhi-pallanka) is in only one place; (2) they set rolling the Wheel of the Dhamma in a deer forest (Migadaya) in Isipatana; (3) when they descend from the Deva (world), the block where they first step at the gateway of the city of Sankassa does not vary;(6) and (4) the placement of the four feet of their bed in the Perfumed Hut (Gandhkuti) in Jetavana does not vary. The dwelling itself may be large or small, but its site does not vary, nor does the city nearby -- although the city may be to the east, west, south, or north of the dwelling.

This gives us two more places to add to our list: the Jetavana monastery given by the layman Anathapindika where the Perfumed Hut was located and the place at Sankassa where the Buddha first set foot on the earth after teaching the Abhidhamma in the Deva world. The site of the Jetavana monastery was near Savatthi, modern-day Sravasti (or Saheth-Maheth). Sankassa was located at a site about twenty-three miles from modern-day Fatehgarh.[7]

Lumbini, the Birthplace of the Buddha

The story of the Buddha's last birth is given in the commentaries.[8] before their last birth on the human plane, Bodhisattas are born in the Tusita Deva world. While they are there, there is the announcement of the coming of a Buddha, which means the Devas who are the guardians of the world go around announcing that a Buddha will arise in a thousand years. Hearing this, the Devas of the ten thousand world systems come to the Bodhisatta and request that he take birth on the human plane and attain Nibbana, for he fulfilled the ten perfections in order to become a Buddha and not for any lower attainment.

The Bodhisatta then investigates whether it is the right time, where the right continent, distric, and family are, and whether it is the right moment in his future mother's life to take conception.

The right time for the Buddhas depends on the length of the life-span in the human world. For Buddha Gotama, the human life-span was the minimum of a hundred years. For all the Buddhas, the right continent is Jambudipa, and the district in that continent is the Middle District. The future Buddha Gotama saw that for him the city would be Kapilavatthu. And he saw that he would be born in a warrior-noble family. His father would be King Suddhodana and his mother Queen Mahamaya. She had fulfilled the ten perfections for a hundred thousand aeons and had kept the five precepts throughout her life. Seeing it was the right moment in her life, for mothers of future Buddhas live only a week after the birth of the Bodhisatta, the future Buddha Gotama informed the assembled Devas that it was indeed the right time for his last birth.

When the Bodhisatta descends into his mother's womb, the ten thousand world-systems quake, and the thirty-two indicative signs appear. These signs appear on four occasions: (1) when an omniscent Bodhisatta descends into the mother's womb, (2) when he is born, (3) when he attains Awakening, and (4) when he sets in motion the Wheel of the Dhamma.[9] So these marvels were set going in three of the places on our pilgrimage.

During the ten lunar months in the mother's womb, four Devas keep guard to shield the mother from harm. And two of the thirty features that are general rules for all Buddhas are associated with the pregnancy:[10] The Bodhisatta is aware it is his last existence when he descends into the mother's womb, and he is seated cross-legged facing outwards in the womb.

Queen Mahamaya decided to go to her home city of Devadaha when she felt the birth was near. On the way there, she stopped at a grove of sal trees, the Lumbini Grove. The trees were in full bloom, and she reached up and took hold of a branch, and at that moment she felt she was going to give birth. Three of the thirty general rules for all Buddhas are associated with the birth: the Bodhisatta's mother is standing when she gives birth; the birth takes place in a forest; and when the baby is born, the feet are placed on a golden cloth, the baby takes seven steps towards the north, surveys the four quarters, and gives the lion's roar, "I am supreme in the world."

Bodh-Gaya, the Place of Attaining Awakening

The Bodhisatta Prince Siddhattha was brought up in a life of luxury. But two more of the general rules for all Buddhas came into play: after seeing the four signs of an old man, a sick man, a corpse, and one who had gone forth from the life of the householder, and after the birth of a son, he made the Great Renunciation; and having gone forth, he put on yellow robes and engaged in the striving for awakening. This striving lasts for a minimum of seven days, but Siddhattha worked for six years. During this time, he was attended on by the group of five, but they abandoned him when he adopted the Middle Path. He had realized that the path was not through a life spent indulging the sense desires nor in following extreme ascetic practices.

So the Bodhisatta Siddhattha was alone when he went to the market town of Senani near Uruvela on the full-moon day of Visakha. This was the day of the great awakening, and four more of the general rules for all Buddhas were accomplished. On the day of awakening, future Buddhas have a meal of milk-rice. Siddhattha received his from Sujata. Then, after spending the day in a grove of sal trees, he went in the evening to the Tree of Awakening. Now all Buddhas attain Self-Awakening while seated on grass, and Siddhattha was given eight handfuls of grass, by a Brahman named Sotthiya. The Bodhisatta spread the grass under the Assattha Tree, the Tree of Awakening. He sat with his back to the tree, facing the east. All the Buddhas begin by practising mindfulness of the in-breath and out-breath, they scatter the forces of Mara, and still seated in a cross-legged position, they acquire the three types of knowledge -- divine sight, the knowledge and recollection of past lives, and the knowledge that the taints have been destroyed -- as well as the special qualities of Buddhas beginning with the knowledges not shared by others.

Two other general rules for Buddhas are associated with Bodh-Gaya, where they all attain Self-Awakening: they spend seven weeks close to the Tree of Awakening itself, and a Great Brahma requests that they teach the Dhamma. One of these weeks is of particular importance, as it is the time when the Buddha thinks through the Abhidhamma-pitaka. Buddha Gotama spent this week seated in the Cetiya of the Jewel House (Ratanaghara-cetiya) created by Devas to the north-west of the Tree of Awakening. When he began to contemplate the last part of the Abhidhamma, the Patthana, the rays of six colours began to shine forth.[11]

After receiving rice cakes and honey balls from the merchants Tapassu and Bhalluka, he sat down at the foot of the Ajapala Banyan tree. He was disinclined to teach the Dhamma he had realized because it is so profound others might not be able to understand it. The Great Brahma Sahampati requested that he teach the Dhamma and he accepted.

He considered whom he should teach first. he realized that the teachers under whom he had worked, Alara and Uddaka, had died, and he could not teach them. Then he thought of the group of five who had been helpful during his striving to become awakened. He saw that they were at the deer forest in Isipatana and decided to go there on the full-moon day of Asalha.

Migadaya at Isipatana, the Place the First Sermon was Taught

It is a general rule that Buddhas set rolling the Wheel of the Dhamma in a deer forest at Isipatana. Most Buddhas go from Bodh-Gaya to Isipatana by flying through the air, but Buddha Gotama saw that if he walked, he would meet Upaka on the way, so he walked.

At Isipatana, the Buddha overcame the reluctance of the group of five to recognize him as their teacher by directing his loving-kindness towards them.[12] Anna-Kondanna attained the first path of Sotapanna at the conclusion of the first sermon. The other four, Vappa, Bhaddiya, Mahanama, and Assaji, also became Sotapannas during the following days. As each of them reached the first path, he requested to be ordained, and this was the beginning of the Sangha. Then the Buddha taught the discourse on the lack of self (Anattalakhana Sutta) and all five bhikkhus attained Arahatship.

At that time, a young man named Yasa lived in the city of Baranasi. He led a life of luxury similar to what Prince Siddhattha had known. One night he woke, surrounded by sleeping female musicians. It seemed to him he was in a cemetery. he got up and left. Towards dawn, the Buddha saw him approaching the deer forest at Isipatana. He sat down and waited.

When he was near the Buddha, Yasa said, "What distress indeed, what affliction indeed!" Then the Buddha said, "This is not distress, Yasa; this is not affliction, Yasa. Come, sit down, Yasa. I will teach you the doctrine."

Yasa sat down and the Buddha taught him a progressive discourse on generosity, on leading a moral life, on how to attain rebirth in the higher abodes, and on the peril, vanity, and depravity of the sense pleasures as well as the advantage in renouncing them.

This discourse prepared Yasa for attaining the final goal by making his mind adaptable and then free of hindrances, by making it be uplifted and pleased. Then the Buddha taught him concerning suffering, the arising of suffering, the end of suffering, and the way that leads to the end of suffering. Yasa realized that "whatever has the nature of arising, all that has the nature of ceasing."

Yasa's mother noticed her son was missing and sent out his father to find him. When the father came to Isipatana, the Buddha used his psychic powers to render Yasa invisible. He taught Yasa's father and the father, without help from another, attained full confidence in the Doctrine. And he was the first person to take refuge in the Triple Gem. While the Buddha was teaching him, Yasa reviewed the stage he had reached and attained Arahatship. Only then did the Buddha let the father see his son.

The father at first wanted to take his son home to his mother who was worried about him, but the Buddha pointed out that Yasa could no longer return to lay life. So the father invited the Buddha and Yasa for a meal. Before the meal, the Buddha established Yasa's mother and former wife in the doctrine.

Next four of Yasa's friends (Vimala, Subahu, Punnaji, and Gavampati) followed his example. Another fifty friends followed the four. All fifty-four became Arahats, and, like Yasa, requested to be ordained.

This meant that sixty men had become Arahats and ordained under the Buddha. The Buddha sent them out to teach the Doctrine to others. Thus, it is most appropriate for us to hold our first conference here at the place where the Buddha taught the first sermon, established the Sangha, and sent forth the bhikkhus "for the blessing of many people, for the happiness of many people, out of compassion for the world, for the welfare, blessing, and happiness of Devas and men."[13]

Isipatana is also important outside the period of a Buddha's dispensation. Pacceka Buddhas, who generally reside on the Gandhamadana mountain range beyond seven mountain ranges in the northern Himalayas, will come to the Middle Country on their alms rounds after spending seven days in the attainment of the cessation state. They go through the air and descend at Isipatana -- thus the name, which means "the (place of) decent of the sages (Isi)" -- and when they return to Gandhamadan, they go up in the air at Isipatana. At times they also hold the day of observance, the Uposatha, at Isipatana.[14]

The Chinese pilgrim, Hiouen Thsang, who made a pilgrimage in the seventh century A.D., says that the name "The Deer Forest" (Migadaya) refers to the Nigrodhamiga Jataka[15] in which the Bodhisatta is the golden king of the deer. He impresses King Brahmadatta of Baranasi with his generosity, loving kindness, and pity in offering his own life in the stead of a doe. First, the king grants immunity to the king of the deer and the doe. Then, at the prompting of the Bodhisatta he extends this to all the deer in his park, then to all deer everywhere, then to all four-footed animals, then to birds and fish. Finally, the king takes the five precepts.

Baranasi will be known by the name of Ketumati when the next Buddha Metteyya arises. It will be the royal city of the Universal Monarch Sankha, who will ordain under Buddha Metteyya and attain Arahatship.[16]

Savatthi, the Site of the Regular Residence of the Buddha at Jetavana

We can associate three of the thirty regular rules for Buddhas with Savatthi. The Buddha's regular residence is the Jetavana monastery. This is where the Perfumed Hut is located. The Marvel of the Double, which is performed to confound the teachers of other doctrines, takes place at the gateway of Savatthi. It is after this that the Buddha goes to the Tavatimsa Deva world to teach the Abhidhamma during the three months of the rains retreat.

The Jetavana monastery was given to the Buddha by the rich merchant Anathapindika. He encountered the Buddha when on a visit to Rajagaha. He became a Sotapanna on hearing his first discourse and invited the Buddha to come stay in Savatthi.[17] Anathapindika saw that a park belonging to Prince Jeta would be the best site for the monastery, for the Buddha had made a point of saying that he preferred solitude. He bought it by covering all but a small portion of the ground with gold coins. Prince Jeta asked permission to give that portion and build a gatehouse on it. When the time came to dedicate the monastery, Anathapindika asked the Buddha to give him advice on how to proceed. The Buddha instructed him to give the Jeta Grove to the Sangha of the four quarters, both present and future.

There were two other monasteries at Savatthi: the Pubbarama monastery given by the lay woman Visakha and the Rajakarama built by King Pasenadi.[18]

The commentaries state that for the first twenty years after the Awakening, the Buddha did not spend the rains retreat in a regular place, but that Savatthi was the place of residence during the last twenty-five years.[19] Nineteen retreats were in the Jetavana monastery and six in the Pubbarama monastery. This was due to the great merit that had been acquired by the two families who offered these monasteries.

It is understandable, therfore, that a great number of discourses were given by the Buddha at Savatthi.[20] These include discourses, Jataka stories, and many of the verses of the Dhammapada.

It was also in Savatthi that King Pasenadi, aided by his wife, Queen Mallika, made the great offering to the Buddha of gifts beyond compare.[21]

Sankassa, the Place where the Buddha Descends After Teaching the Abhidhamma

As we said, it is Savatthi that the Buddha ascends to the Tavatimsa Deva world to teach the Abhidhamma. Afterwards, he descends a ladder that Sakka has built and sets foot on the ground at the gate of the city of Sankassa,[22] for this is another of the thirty unchanging rules for all Buddhas. It is on this occasion that the Buddha makes clear to all that Venerable Sariputta is second only to the Buddha in his comprehension of the Dhamma.

Kusinara, the Place where the Buddha Attained the Maha-Parinibbana

At the end of his life, the Buddha set out on a journey from Rajagaha to Kusinara, a capital city of the Mallas. The account of this trip and his demise is found in the Maha-Parinibbana Sutta.[23] Two of the thirty regular rules for all Buddhas are accomplished at this time: on the day they reach final Nibbana, they have a meal with meat, and final Nibbana is reached after having attained the twenty-four hundred thousand crores of attainments.

The account of the events leading up to the Buddha's Parinibbana shows clearly how his every move was made with the idea of benefitting others. He continually gives discourses, and in his instructions to Venerable Ananda, it is clear that practising the Dhamma is the essential.

When Ven. Ananda describes how upset he was when the Buddha fell ill, the Buddha points out that he has openly taught the full Doctrine without holding back anything. Through practising the Doctrine, a person will be an island to himself -- in other words, his own firm support. A person will become his own refuge. The Doctrine will be his refuge.

When Ven. Ananda asks how to honour the Buddha's body after his Parinibbana, the Buddha tells him to leave this to the laymen. He tells him the bhikkhus should strive to attain Nibbana. On the night he attained Parinibbana, a great crowd from Kusinara came to pay respects, but the Buddha made sure Subhadda had an opportunity to hear a discourse. The last words of the Buddha were:

> Handa 'dani bhikkhave amantayami vo: Vaya-dhamma sankhara; appamadena sampadetha.
>
> Indeed, bhikkhus, I say to you now: decay is inherent in the constituent elements. Strive with vigilance.

Digha Nikaya, II 156

The Buddha was lying between two sal trees when he breathed his last, with his head to the north. After his Parinibbana, his body was taken through the northern gate of the city and out through the eastern gate to the shrine of the Mallas. They were unable to light the funeral pyre until Ven. Maha-Kassapa came and paid his respects. After the cremation, the Brahmin Dona divided the relics into eight parts to be distributed among the various groups who claimed a share. Monuments were built in various places for the eight shares of the relics, for the vessel that contained them, and for the charred pieces of the firewood used in the cremation.

During our pilgrimage, we will be visiting the places where the Buddha lived. We will follow in his footsteps. We will meditate in Bodh-Gaya, where he gained Awakening and where, according to tradition, future Buddhas will also gain Awakening.

This is a great occasion for the disciples of Sayagyi U Ba Khin. We have come together to practise the Buddha's Teachings. We will venerate the Triple Gem, our teacher Sayagyi U Ba Khin, and our parents by practising the Buddha-Dhamma. It has been passed on to us in pristine purity by our teacher Sayagyi U Ba Khin, just as the Buddha taught it over twenty-five centuries ago. We must keep the Teachings alive and maintain their ourity. Through this conference and pilgrimage, we are able to pool our resources and coordinate our efforts in order to impart to other people all over the world the essentials of the Buddha-Dhamma which they so desperately need.

In closing this brief look at these places of pilgrimage, let us recall the Buddha's words to Ven. Ananda when many marvellous signs appeared in homage to the Buddha as he lay between the sal trees:

> "Ananda," the Buddha said, "mere acts of reverence of this kind cannot be deemed to honour, esteem, venerate, revere, and worship the Tathagata rightly. (Only) the bhikkhu, or bhikkhuni, or the lay disciple, or the female lay disciple who practises fully according to the Teaching, who is endowed with correctness in the practice of the Teaching, and who lives in perfect conformity with righteousness and truth, can be deemed to honour, esteem, venerate, revere, and worship the Tathagata in the highest degrees."[24]

TRUTH WILL TRIUMPH

Sayagyi U Chit Tin

FOOTNOTES:

[1] Digha Nikaya, II 140 f. (//Dialogues of the Buddha//, II 153f.; //Ten Suttas from Digha Nikaya// (Burmese Pitaka Association, 1984), pp. 271-273; //Thus Have I Heard: The Long Discourses of the Buddha// (Maurice Walshe, trans.; London: Wisdom Publications, 1987), pp. 263f.). This passage is found also in the Anguttara Nikaya, II 140 (//Gradual Sayings//, II 124f.).

[2] Digha Nikaya commentary (Sumangalavilasini), II 582. The references to Ashin Buddhaghosa which follow refer to this same passage.

[3] Tika (sub-commentary) on the Digha Nikaya, II 229f. The references to Ashin Dhammapala which follow refer to this same passage.

[4] //Ten Suttas//, p. 272.

[5] Digha Nikaya commentary, II 424; Majjhima Nikaya commentary (Papancasudani), II 166, and see the Buddhavamsa commentary (Madhuratthavilasini), pp. 133, 297f. (//Clarifier of the Sweet Meaning//, 188, 428).

[6] The Digha commentary uses the term "avijahita" (which we translate here by "which do not vary"); the Majjhima commentary uses the term "acala" ("immovable").

[7] B.C. Law, //Geography of Early Buddhism// (Bhartiya Publishing House, 1973), p. 53.

[8] See the introduction to the commentary on the Jataka, I, pp. 47ff. (T.W. Rhys Davids, //Buddhist Birth Stories//, 2nd ed., 1925, pp. 144f.) and the Buddhavamsa commentary (//Clarifier of the Sweet Meaning//, pp. 389-395). See all //The Dictionary of Pali Proper Names// under "Buddha."

[9] See the Buddhavamsa commentary, p. 79 (//Clarifier//, p. 110).

[10] See the Buddhavamsa commentary, p. 298 (//Clarifier//, p. 429).

[11] See the Atthasalini, pp. 13f. (//The Expositor//, pp. 16ff.).

[12] For the events at Isipatana, see Vinaya, I 7-21 (//The Book of the Discipline//, IV 13-28).

[13] Vinaya, I 21 (//The Book of the Discipline//, IV 28).

[14] See "Isipatana" in //The Dictionary of Pali Proper Names// and Ria Kloppenborg, //The Paccekabuddha// (Leiden: E.J. Brill, 1974), pp. 60-64 (selected passages published under the same title in //The Wheel//, nos 305-307, see pp. 53-55). See also under "Isipatana" in //A Critical Pali Dictionary//. The mention of holding the Uposatha is found in the Anguttara commentary (Manorathapurani), I 347.

[15] No 12. See //The Dictionary of Pali Proper Names// under "Isipatana".

[16] See //Dialogues of the Buddha//, III 73f.

[17] For details, see Vinaya, II 154ff. (//The Book of the Discipline//, V 216-223, 229f.) and //Buddhist Birth Stories//, pp. 228-232.

[18] On the gift of the Pubbarama, see //Buddhist Legends//, II 79-82; on the gift of the Rajakarama, see the commentary on the Samyutta Nikaya (Saratthappakasini), III 218f., and the introduction and conclusion to the Bharu Jataka (no 213).

[19] See //Buddhist Legends//, I 147, and //Clarifier//, pp. 4f.

[20] See //Kindred Sayings//, p. xvii. Woodward identifies 871 discourses in the four Nikayas as being given at Savatthi: 844 at the Jetavana, 23 at the Pubbarama, and 4 near the city.

[21] See //Buddhist Legends//, III 24-28.

[22] See //Buddhist Legends//, III 52-54.

[23] //Dialogues of the Buddha//, II 78-191; //Ten Suttas//, pp. 187-303; //Thus Have I Heard//, pp. 231-277.

[24] This translation is from //Ten Suttas//, p. 269 Cf. //Thus Have I Heard//, p. 272, where the opening words are translated, "Never before has the Tathagata been so honoured,..."

Worldwide Contact Addresses in the Tradition of Sayagyi U Ba Khin
~~~
~~~

AUSTRIA: International Meditation Centre, A-9064 St. Michael/Gurk 6, Austria;Tel: +43 4224 2820, Fax: +43 4224 28204
Email: CIS, IMC-Austria, 100425,3423

EASTERN AUSTRALIA: International Meditation Centre, Lot 2 Cessnock Road, Sunshine NSW 2264, Australia;
Tel: +61 49 705 433, Fax: +61 49 705 749

UNITED KINGDOM: International Meditation Centre, Splatts House, Heddington, Calne, Wiltshire SN11 OPE, England;
Tel: +44 1380 850 238, Fax: +44 1380 850 833, Email: CIS, IMC-UK,100330,3304

USA (East Coast): International Meditation Centre, 438 Bankard Road, Westminster MD 21158, USA;
Tel: +1 410 346 7889, Fax: +1 410 346 7133;
Email: CIS, IMC-USA, 74163,2452

WESTERN AUSTRALIA: International Meditation Centre, Lot 78 Jacoby St, Mahogany Creek WA 6072, Australia;
Tel: +61 9 295 2644, Fax: +61 9 295 3435

CANADA: IMC-Canada, 336 Sandowne Drive, Waterloo, Ontario, N2K 1V8, Canada;
Tel: +1 519 747 4762, Fax: +1 519 725 2781

GERMANY: Sayagyi U Ba Khin Gesellschaft, Christaweg 16, 79114 Freiburg, Germany,
Tel: +49 761 465 42, Fax: +49 761 465 92

JAPAN: Sayagyi U Ba Khin Memorial Trust, Komatsuri-Cho 923, Kishiwada-Shi, Osaka-Fu, 596 Japan, Tel: +81 724 45 0057

THE NETHERLANDS: Sayagyi U Ba Khin Stichting, Oudegracht 124, 3511 AW Utrecht, The Netherlands,
Tel: +31 30 311 445, Fax: +31 30 340 612

SINGAPORE: Sayagyi U Ba Khin Memorial Association, 9 Penang Road #07-12, Park Mall, Singapore 0923
Tel: +65 338 6911, Fax: +65 336 7211

SWITZERLAND: Sayagyi U Ba Khin Gesellschaft, Greyerzstrasse 35, 3013 Bern, Switzerland;
Tel: +41 61 271 4184, Fax: +41 61 271 4188;
Email: CIS, 100256,3576

USA (West Coast): Contact Address: IMC-USA c/o Joe McCormack, 77 Kensington Rd., San Anselmo, CA 94960, U.S.A.
Tel: +1 415 459 3117, Fax: +1 415 459 4837

BELGIUM: Address as for the Netherlands, Tel: +32 2 414 1756

DENMARK: Contact Address: Mr. Peter Drost-Nissen, Strandboulevarden 117, 3th, 2100 Kopenhagen, Denmark.
Tel: 031 425 636

ITALY: Contact address: Mr. Renzo Fedele, Via Euganea 94, 35033 Bresseo PD, Italy.
Tel: +39 49 9900 752

Published by the Sayagyi U Ba Khin Memorial Trust, United Kingdom
Address as above, registered charity no. 280134

This folder contains two MS WORD files.

The first file (32KB only) contains a sample of all the Sanskrit Font Family. All the Sanskrit fo be installed in order to read the samples.

The second file (953 KB) contains the same Skt fonts samples, but here the fonts have been document. The samples can be looked at for perusal without having to install the Skt fonts.

The Skt Font Family Folder contains 4,25 MB of fonts.

The font "Skt Calligraphic" has been used in the header of the BSV's announcement forms.

This document was originally distributed on Internet as a part of the Electronic Buddhist Archives, available via anonymous FTP and/or COOMBSQUEST gopher on the node COOMBS.ANU.EDU.AU

The document's ftp filename and the full directory path are given in the coombspapers top level INDEX file.

This version of the document has been reformatted by Barry Kapke and is being distributed, with permission, via the DharmaNet Buddhist File Distribution Network.

[Last updated: 26 April 1993]

POISON AND JOY

This text addresses some of the most fundamental and delicate religious issues. Therefore, it should be read, quoted and analysed in a mindful way.

All copyrights to this document belong to John Tarrant, California Diamond Sangha, Santa Rosa, Cal., USA
Enquiries: The Editor, "Mind Moon Circle", Sydney Zen Centre, 251 Young St., Annandale, Sydney, NSW 2038, Australia. Tel: + 61 2 660 2993

TEISHO
John Tarrant Roshi

POISON AND JOY

October 17, 1992

Center for Seven Generations
Occidental, California

The title of today's talk is "Poison and Joy". Please sit comfortably.

In the great work that we do what eventually appears is a great fire or light in us that we realize was always there and touches all things with its joy, but we always begin the work in darkness, I think. Buddha, I'm sure, was not the first to observe that there is something very unsatisfactory about life a lot of the time. He made it the first principle of his teaching saying that you cannot escape from suffering. But then he said, "But there is an end to suffering." So already we are getting into paradox very quickly here. And then there is a method. There is a cause of suffering, and an end to suffering, and a method. What we must do, I think, is to attend so closely to our lives that they start to open. We spend a great deal of time skirting around the edges of anything that's painful. Diligently walking the circumference of our difficulty. And in zen really the way is through. We just go through the middle of it. We don't need to walk around the edges any longer like an ox in an old-fashioned mill grinding corn, walking around and around in circles.

So, the darkness in life appears immediately when we sit down to do zazen because immediately we'll find out that our best intentions to do zazen well don't come off. Usually we don't do zazen quite as well as we want to. And we also find out a curious thing that even when we are very sincere, unbidden thoughts arise, unbidden feelings. Things come out of nowhere that we had no intention of summoning. And usually we spend some time fighting with these. I certainly did. A lot of time fighting with these. And I think some fighting can be good because we can feel our strength and our sincerity, but in the long run you just feed the demon when you fight it. You give it energy. In the long run what happens is that if we just attend, things settle. In that way, I think, we go into the poison. We darken the darkness.

Tung-shan was asked, "How do we deal with cold in winter and heat in summer when they visit us? How do we deal with them? He said to go where there is neither cold nor heat. And naturally the student said, "Well, where is that?" So he said, "When it is hot, kill yourself with heat. When it is cold, kill yourself with cold."

This is a very famous story and I'm sure everyone here has heard this before, but if you think about doing it, it becomes a great thing. Even though it is well known, it still has enormous power.

So that when you are sleepy, kill yourself with sleepiness. When you are in despair, that despair, too, is something that has appeared. It, too, has Buddha nature. When your knees hurt, kill yourself with pain in the knees.

So when we stop avoiding and holding back from life, then we will find the joy will open. And there is a way in which it opens. I think it only opens when we have been willing to suffer some. Nobody seems to come to meditation without having suffered something. My personal observation. Something that was true for me. But then everybody suffers. We are drawn by the natural course of life to zazen, to seek some simplicity and to find a natural, authentic way. And I think that one of the important things about the difficulty and suffering generally is to allow ourselves to be in it without to much complaint. There is a very strong, sort of addictive longing in humanity. It's very strong in our culture, but it's in others, too, of course, but I think it's just a human thing. Where we have this great longing for life and very little patience in cultivating it. So that we want magic and we want it now. And there is a great, powerful magic in zen, but the strangeness of the magic is after awhile the least interesting thing, I think. So you will get attended by synchronistic events, perhaps. Many people are. You know what people are thinking and things like that, but that's not very interesting. The great magical event of zen is the joy that comes out of the simplest and most natural thing. The joy that comes out of just standing up and sitting down. Everything. "Walking is zen; sitting is zen." Eating, drinking, making love, sleeping, being miserable on your cushion is zen. Having your knees hurt in the long, hot afternoon is zen.

Darkness is a kind of foundation, actually, the darkness that we find arising in us. When Bodhidharma was asked, "What is the first principle of the holy teaching", the emperor asked him, Emperor Wu, he didn't say suffering. He said, "Vast emptiness. Nothing holy." This is what the Heart Sutra says, too. The Heart Sutra says, "Things are founded on emptiness." This means really that things don't truly have a cause. Things have a virtue in themselves beyond anything we can say that causes them. So you have a virtue in yourself beyond anything that brought it about. Any suffering that arises in you because of your history, any gifts you have because of your history, these are strong things, yet they are also just a pure appearance of Buddha nature. Even your suffering and also your joy. I think in some sense we can't take credit for either. We just have to learn to love our lives so deeply that we welcome whatever comes. Zazen teaches us that love.

Different people had different kinds of difficulty, I think. You will find various kinds of fragmentation of attention, I think, perhaps that deepest kind of difficulty that we have. You will notice that when you are suffering, your attention suffers, too, and you don't have a lot of it. And that if you are complaining about yourself or others, which is easy to do, if you begin to turn your attention inward, to go against that easy current of complaint, you will then find that your attention has not been very good. And that way you go into the darkness. You begin to attend to your situation. You begin to notice what is going on. This is the great lesson of zazen. Is to do nothing. To stop doing things and then you notice what is going on. And as you begin to notice, you'll find that the suffering transforms and you do not suffer the way you did. Because the suffering is something added to it.

Torei-Zenji with his poem, "Bodhisattva's Vow", talks about the nature of this inner transformation, I think. He talks about the right attitude to have to bring about this inner transformation. I never much liked "Bodhisattva's Vow" for many years. I still think it's kind of over written, but it's very beautiful and powerful, too. I always thought it was kind of sentimental. I came out of a rather fierce political-activist tradition. Wasn't inclined to blame myself when somebody blamed me. But the enormous value of looking at our own part in a difficulty in our lives is so wonderful. Sometimes your own part might be that you're being a wimp and you're not standing up to somebody. So it's not just a matter of a sort of overly sweet compliance with life. You can fight with life, too, if you want. But to look at our own part is so valuable and powerful. He talks about the great virtue of abusive words. Think about that next time you run up against some petty office tyranny or you're jerked around by somebody you trusted and feel betrayed. The virtue of abusive words.

There is a koan in the Book of Serenity, "The Diamond-Cutter Sutra's Revilement", Number 58.

The Diamond-Cutter Sutra says, "If someone is reviled by others, this person has done wicked acts in previous ages and should fall into evil ways (will probably fall into evil ways), but because of the scorn and revilement of people in the present age, the wicked deeds of the past are dissolved."

So, on the face of it this is a fairly simple karmic atonement kind of thing. If you're being reviled, if you're having a difficulty, it's because you were a schmuck in a previous life in some way. You did something, you committed some sort of wrong against the universe and you're just reaping the karma now. And normally because of your bad karma you would fall into evil ways, but because you suffer you do not fall into evil ways. The suffering somehow balances that out and atones for it.

In zen we regard this in a more immediate and less philosophical fashion. But I think there are two ways to hold this. In zen everything that appears we treat as Buddha nature. And it really doesn't matter. Whatever appears has that shocking, profound light of the Buddha nature. So if somebody comes up and gives you a present, that is Buddha nature. The great Lin-chi (Jap. Rinzai) used to yell, "Kaatz!" all the time. Someone would come up and say something very wise to him and he'd go, "Kaatz!" and hit them. Or he'd say something stupid and he'd yell, "Kaatz!" and hit them. And that way he really encouraged people to go deeper and deeper. And the people that stayed around him did get wiser. So when somebody comes up and abuses you, it is Lin-chi saying, "Kaatz!" without an intention of harming you here. The universe is encouraging you, deepening you.

From a personal point of view, there is a way in which when we get immersed in darkness and life just overwhelms us and overtakes us, we either go under or we become wise. If you have a solid meditation practice, you will become wise and you can trust that. So you can trust yourself in the most extremely difficult situations. And I know zen students often choose to work in difficult kinds of work. And so again, I want to reiterate, you can trust the practice to hold you through the greatest difficulty, and it will.

The I Ching puts it in a more descriptive way. It says, essentially, the same thing. That what is happening to us in the darkness is that our character is transforming. We are building the great foundation which the joy can inhabit. And without that foundation there is nothing to hold the joy when it comes. And you must know this. Almost everybody who has come to zen has had some experiences of eternity being present. When you are a child, children have these experiences. And suddenly everything is alive and interconnected and you see the compassion in a leaf, in a hillside, in the ants crawling up the vine stem. And we lose it because there is nothing to hold it. When we go into the darkness, one thing that poison in our lives does for us is it makes our foundation so that the joy can be held.

The I Ching has a wonderful hexagram called jen (sp??) or obstruction which is No. 39. It says, as it often does, "perseverance brings good fortune." Well, there are some situations in which perseverance doesn't, and you just need to stop everything. You broke your leg and walking on it really won't help. You need to stop. So when we're obstructed, when we're in darkness and difficulty, perseverance does help. The image is, "Water on the mountain. The image of obstruction. Thus the superior person turns her attention to herself and molds her character." So that when you are blocked in the outer world, you need "an unswerving inner purpose to bring good fortune in the end," it says. "An obstruction that lasts for a time is useful for self-development. This is the value of adversity. Difficulties and obstructions throw a person back on herself. While inferior people seek to put the blame on others, bewailing their fate; the superior people seek the error within themselves and through this introspection the external obstacle becomes an occasion for inner enrichment and education."

Well this is the deepest kind of inner transformation that is going on here. And what kind of introspection do you have. I don't think there's much point in those kind of listing of faults that some spiritual traditions do. Maybe we can learn something from it. I'm not sure. I think the greatest kind of introspection is when we just stop, and we look, and we notice what is. If you're working with a koan, if you put the koan at the center of the whole universe, then you'll find that everything becomes the koan. And when you notice the koan, you notice what is. You are the koan and you notice what is. And we stop having so many opinions about what is. We are so full of those opinions about what is. And then we notice that those, too, the opinions, too, are just something else that rises in the mind. There is no need to feed them.

When we surrender to the truth that we can't control everything, we need to allow what is within us and without us to arise, there is a kind of relief and you'll find that your practice can become rather comfortable even in the darkness, even though it is full of mystery and you don't know what on earth you are doing. It can still be rather sweet at that time. This is one of the deeper levels of the imagery of Kuan Yin as the Bodhisattva of Compassion and Healing. The figure who hears the sounds of the world, hears the suffering of the world. And in hearing that darkness and allowing that darkness in, there is a kind of grace that appears, that is symbolized by the form of Kuan Yin. There is a cabalistic legend that the shekinah (sp??), who is the feminine, Kuan Yin aspect of god, follows us in our exile from god, our exile from the divine. We are warmed by that feminine divine force. I think we do experience this when we are willing to just let go and be in our meditation no matter how difficult it is. But sometimes that's a minute by minute thing. When some people walk in in such pain or it interacts with me in some way, I realize well I have to take this session minute by minute. And just walk through each minute, each second, really. And other times I don't need that attentional discipline, but it's good to have it. And when you have that force of attention there is a kind of warmth that will come attend you. I don't think it's a great fruit of the practice or anything, but you will notice it then.

So while this is going on character is something that is being built, really unconsciously in the darkness. It's like the temple is being built when we are not attending to building the temple. We're just attending to what is. We're just washing the dishes and getting through the next hour sitting quietly loving the world, really.

So it's a kind of initiation, I think, our difficulty in zen. And initiations always come with an ordeal. You know some tribal people have very severe initiations where there bodies are mutilated in various ways. What the ordeal part of an initiation does, I think, is it overwhelms our previous ideas about the world. When you find that you haven't sat a sesshin for awhile or you've gotten far away from the practice and you've come back to the practice, you'll often find that the first day of sesshin can be kind of hard or you'll have a really hard day there in a retreat. This is just the ordeal part of the initiation. It's a kind of purifying going on, but also we don't let go of those ideas and the way we see the world easily. And so it's sort of extracted from us with dental equipment. And sometimes it's painful. The great trust and truth of the practice is that it really is worth it. That if you endure that, and if you don't give up just before the joy comes, the joy really will come. The grace and the light will be all about you and you'll see it in the faces of your companions. You'll see it in the gardens. You will see it all around you and you'll find it in your own heart. And it is the great reason, really, that we sit. And it is the source of all that is creative in us. All that we do that heals and helps each other. It is that great fire in life that appears when we just attend to what is.

So this is why a retreat as well as being difficult can also be rather simple and sweet and joyful. And I encourage you to relax into it. To truly be simple and relaxed actually requires more discipline in some ways than struggling. So please enjoy the rest of this retreat. Taste each moment. Don't sit there waiting for it to pass. If you are just willing to taste each moment, then the sun will rise all on its own without the help of human hands.

Thank you very much.

---

end of record

Q. What facilities does one get in Nirvana ?.

A. Ha! Haa!. Nirvana is not a place, where one can expect facilities. It is not a five-star Hotel or the kind.
The Sanskrit word 'Nirvana' has its Pali equivalant 'Nibbana'.
Nibbana is the state one reaches at the successful culmination of trodding the middle path (magga) ie. when one becomes an 'Arahatta'.

When one eradicates in total one's defilements, one reaches the sublime state of 'Nibbana'.

ÚÄÄÄ

ÚÄÄÄ

ÚÄÄÄ

ÚÄÄÄ

ÚÄÄÄ

ÚÄÄÄ

ÚÄÄÄ

ÚÄÄÄ

ÚÄÄÄ

ÚÄÄÄ

ÚÄÄÄ

ÚÄÄÄ

ÚÄÄÄ

ÚÄÄÄ

ÚÄÄÄ

Q. Is there an equivalant to the "Pope" in Buddhism ?.

A. The short answer is NO.
However in various traditions there are some orderly, organizations, wherein one comes across leaders.
eg. In the Tibetan tradition the 'Dalai-Lama' is the accepted leader.

Q. Why should I learn about the Dhamma ?.

A. The dhamma being the collection of Universal Laws, is worthy of knowing whether one is a Buddhist or not.

'Dukkha' is one of the central teachings in the Dhamma. Everyone experiences 'Dukkha' irrespective of colour, cast, creed or whatever. The study of the 'Dhamma' helps in the eradication of 'Dukkha', and who would not like this?.

É͍͍»
º º
º * BuddhaNet BBS * Buddha Dhamma Meditation Assoc. º º The Buddhist Bulletin Board PO Box K1020 Haymarket NSW 2000 º º +612 212-3061 Online: 24hrs Telephone: +612 212-3071 º º º È͍͍¼

POVERTY, HUNGER AND UNDER - DEVELOPMENT

A little bit of relevant Buddhist thinking.

Neither the teachings of the Buddha, nor the members of the Buddhist Sangha who are regarded as their custodians and exponents could be expected to clear and sweep clean , all by themselves and that with the minimum delay, the social entanglements into which a reckless society, in any part of the world, is seen slipping day after day. What is possible here on the one hand is only adequate cautioning, and on the other, the generation of an awareness in the minds of those involved to put themselves on the right gear. Then with a change of pace and a change of heart, a crisis may be averted.

Poverty [Pali daliddiya / Skt. daridrya]

To one who is not a mendicant, to one who lives the life of a householder in the world, poverty is indeed a cause of grief. Poverty means that one possesses only a little or nothing at all called one's own [assako]; one is not affluent and in plenty [analhiko]; one has to be constantly in debt to others, borrowing money [inam adiyati] on the promise of repayment, with or without interest [vaddhim patisunati]. The precise statement of this whole idea in Pali in the Buddhist texts occurs in the Anguttara Nikaya as follows:

Daliddiyam bhikkhave dukkham lokasmim kamabhogino ' ti ? Evam bhante . Yam ' pi bhikkhave daliddo assako analhiko inam adiyati inadanam ' pi bhikkhave dukkham lokasmim kamabhogino ' ti ? ... Iti kho bikkhave daliddiyam ' pi dukkham lokasmim kamabhogino inadanam ' pi ...vaddhi ' pi... codana ' pi... anucariya ' pi... bandhanam ' pi dukkham lokasmim kamabhogino. [A.III.351.f.]

We choose to refer the reader to the primary sources in this manner, wherever necessary, mainly to intimate to him the wealth of clear and positive Buddhist thinking which pertains to areas of human well-being. Buddhist thinking also closely scrutinizes the presence and absence of wellness in the human community. Buddhism does not turn its back on the happiness of the man of the world or the success or failure of his living. Nor does it explain its absence in society as the outcome of divine misanthropy or heavenly vengeance. Buddhist thinking knows a layman as being caught up in ramified relationships with persons and institutions. It also knows that to put himself in a meaningful and acceptable position in society, man needs the means, i.e. wealth and property [dhana and bhoga]. The well-known Sigala Sutta [D.III.180.ff.] is a learned thesis of the highest order on this subject which not only stresses the diversity of these human relationships but also their reciprocity and mutual interdependence.

Basic Needs

Even in terms of every man's basic needs of food and clothing, the Buddhist texts appear to know, as it were, of the millions who daily go to bed at night without a meal. They say, almost with distressing pain of mind , that the food and clothing of such people who are in utter poverty is obtained with utmost difficulty:

Dalidde appannapanabhojane kasiravuttike yattha kasirena ghasacchado labbhati [A. III, 385].

Here it is immediately reckoned with that poverty and hunger go hand in hand. That is why poverty or the absence of such means of existence makes a man unhappy in society, both in relation to himself and in relation to the community in which he lives.

Having thus recognized poverty as the bane of social order in the world , Buddhism concerns itself with the successful production of wealth, its economical and productive use and its conservation as reserves for leaner times. Buddhist texts thus penetrate deep into many areas of advanced economic thinking of the world today, second to none even in the most sophisticated political ideologies. Starting at a lamentably low economic level so much as not to possess even the basic minimum of food and clothing [kasirena ghasacchado labbhati], the first remedial measure recommended is that the person in such a sad situation should himself take the initiative to acquire some amount of money or wealth [dhana]. When the question is put as to how riches are obtained [katham su vindate dhanam. Sn.v. 185] , as was done by Alavaka who is referred to as a Yakkha [perhaps a prosperous and affluent chieftain] in the Alavaka Sutta, the prompt and direct Buddhist reply was: ' He riches finds whose life is in the right, who bears his yoke with strenuous resolve '. These words, we believe, need no commentary.

In the Pali we have it as : Patirupakari dhurava utthata vindate dhanam. Sn.187 If one were looking at this reply as a Buddhist, or as any one with sense and sanity at that, one must immediately take note of three basic concepts:

1. He whose life is in the right [patirupakari]
2. He who bears his yoke [dhurava]
3. He who with strenuous resolve [utthata]

To the Buddhist, there is such a thing as ethics of living , ethics derived through down to earth human considerations and not those derived through divine sanctions. Therefore so basic and vital to mankind. So even as he gets down to gather together his basic needs, it has to be within a visibly inviolable ethical frame-work. His life has to be in the right [patirupakari]. The other two considerations centre on the role of the individual and his active involvement, as well as on the strength of his personality. Accepting personal responsibility [dhurava] to better his economic situation in life [vindate dhanam] , one has to put in a good deal of honest striving [utthata]. This line of action for economic redress, undoubtedly carries with it a dignity and a sense of triumph and achievement. The almost soul-elevating Pali word used here is the verb utthahati which means `strives with firm resolve.' Wherever the Buddhist texts speak of the wealth of a virtuous good man against which there can be no slogan shouting , they speak of it as being acquired with effort and striving [utthanaviriyadhigata A.III. 45 & 76] and add that it has been earned with the sweat of one's brow [sedavakkhitta] and the might of one's arms [bahabalaparicita]. It is also said to be righteously acquired [dhammika and dhammaladdha]. If it were not so, not only would money be the root of all evil but money would also be rooted in evil. This is why the Dhammapada very firmly says that it would be the tragedy of household life if a man who dwells therein does not strive with firm resolve to establish his economic well being [anutthanamala ghara Dhp.v.241]. It would be of interest to note here that only a very few translators of the Dhammapada get this correct. Many others who translate it as ' non-repair is the bane of houses ', guided by Commentarial misdirection , only provide amusement and entertainment and hardly any sense.

Relief Measures.

Buddhists also recommend relief measures, both at society level and state level , to ease this lamentable situation of poverty. Accepting as real the age old social malaise of haves and have-nots, the Buddhists recommend the act of dana or charitable giving as a corrective measure. One is called upon to view this act of making good a deficiency in one's social group as a source of joy and satisfaction, yielding good results, right here and now [danasamvibhagarato: delighting in giving and sharing at A.III.53]. It is also looked upon as a willingness on the part of men and women to part with some of their possessions [vossaggarato Ibid.]. Dana thus viewed from the religious angle stimulates the growth of such high ranking virtues like metta [friendliness, loving kindness] , karuna, [compassion] and mudita [appreciative joy]. They are noble modes of living in the life of man [brahmavihara].

As part of state policy, the rulers are expected to alleviate poverty by making planned gifts of money to put people on their feet and enable them to make a start in life on their own [See Cakkavattisihanada sutta. DIII 66 f. Imina tvam ambho purisa dhanena attano matapitaro ca posehi puttadaran ca brahmanesu ... saggasamvattanikan ' ti.]. It is also the responsibility of the state to some extent to open avenues of employment and correctly put people in places where they would make their best, there being no square pegs in round holes or vice versa. They are to be employed , each according to his ability and competence [Ye ranno janapade ussahimsu kasigorakkhe vanijjaya ...rajaporise.... D.1.136]. It is to be noted that in every case, whether it is for the production of wealth or for the correct and fruitful utilization of wealth , the efficiency and diligence of the person concerned is of primary importance. In Buddhism , the machinery for social upgrading is basically the culture of man [i.e. the development of his cultural components of word and deed and his basic social and religious values] which make him a man who has developed himself : bhavitatta.

Let us now turn our attention to the question of hunger to which we have already referred under the Buddhist concept of man's basic needs of food and clothing [ghasacchadanaparamo and ghasacchadanaparamata M.I.360; D.I.60]. It is at poverty level that these, namely food and clothing are obtained with utmost difficulty [dalidde ...kasirena ghasacchado labbhati . A.III 385]. Thus it goes without saying that poverty and hunger go hand in hand. Nevertheless, as far as Buddhist texts go, it is a painful situation which is not to be made light of. The Dhammapada which we wish to present as the Buddhist Guide Book , i.e. the book of guidance for both monk and layman , aptly calls hunger the dreaded disease [Jighaccha parama roga . Dhp.v.230].

Around this verse is told the well-known and at the same time the most touching story of how the Buddha once had a poor hungry peasant fed and comforted before he set about to preach the dhamma to him. [Annataraupasakavatthu in the Sukhavagga of the Dhammapadatthakatha Vol. III 261 f.].

In calling hunger the dreaded disease, it is said with a down to earth realism that no amount of medication ever cures this ailment. It is known to be the disease perennial , nevertheless by no means welcome or tolerable. The Buddha himself makes the precise comment that ' afflicted with pangs of hunger one comprehends not the dhamma, even while it is being preached ' [jighacchadukkhena dhamme desiyamane pi pativijjhitum na sakkhissati ' ti. DhA.III.263].

Moderation.

At the same time, over-eating is looked upon with disdain and is viewed as leading to ill- health and physical damage and discomfort. Moderation in eating , on the other hand , is considered contributory to good health and physical comfort [appabadhata and appatankata as well as lahutthana, bala and phasuvihara M.1.37]. One word of caution here. The media today, all the world over, misleads the world on the question of food and clothing , food in particular. Advertising has reached the peak of perfection, with its ability to deceive and entice. Eat in the interests of the salesman, and positively not of the consumer is more or less the slogan today. But be not misled by such cliches of the business world where consumerism reigns supreme today.

Buddhism is non-ascetic in its attitude to food . The Bodhisatta totally rejected the starvation policy which he had taken upon himself while he was experimenting with his severe austerities. He declared in no uncertain terms that he could never attain any blissful states with a body reduced to such utter emaciation [na kho tam sukaram sukham adhigantum evam adhimattakasimanam pattakayena . Yannuna ' ham olarikam aharam ahareyyam odanakummasan ' ti. M.1.247]. One look at the Gandharan image of Sakyamuni as Bodhisatta practicing austerities would convince us both of the severity of his austerities referred to above as well as of the wisdom of his judgement. He took a realistic view of the body 's need for food . Accepting its basic need on the one hand, he specifies firmly its limits on the other.

It is with such an attitude to life and its basic requirements that Buddhism endorses and encourages correct earning of money and honourable acquisition of wealth [Utthanadhigatam dhanam and dhammaladdha bhoga]. It is in order that one may feed and clothe oneself adequately as well as look after the needs of one's dependants like one's parents and one's wife and children. For want of space here we would only refer the reader to a delightful treatise on this subject under the title bhoganam adiya or Uses of Wealth which appears in the Anguttara Nikaya [A.III 45 f.].

Elimination of Hunger.

In order to eliminate hunger among the humans , Buddhist texts speak not only of the energetic production of wealth [utthanaviriyadhigatam dhanam] and the consequent increase of buying power but also recommend the industrious production of food through diligently handled agriculture. In the Therigatha , our exemplary Theri Patacara observes this commendable hunger-eliminating process through agricultural production in these words.

Nangalehi kasam khettam bijani pavapam chama puttadarani posenta dhanam vindanti manava.
Thig. 112

With ploughs ploughing their fields, the seeds they sow on the land.
To feed their wives and children the men thus earn their wealth.

She has obviously seen the activities of enterprising lay men, operating obviously in the more industrious and saner sections of the human community, and says that men plough their fields and sow seed therein to raise a harvest to feed their families and to build up their economy. It is undoubtedly the enterprise and industry of the lay community thus reflected which stirred her up into her spiritual earnestness.

It is the inspiration of this activity of well- meaning wise men which stirred Patacara up to her spiritual quest. While Buddhist texts essentially set their eyes on the attainment of transcendental goals, one discovers also a great wealth of information addressed to the lay householders which aim at achieving success for the man of the world , both from the point of economic prosperity and his harmonious social interrelatedness.

Conscious of the need to handle the problem of adequate food in society and its well managed distribution , Buddhist texts go so far as to instruct for the smooth handling of the provision of food even for workmen at work places. We discover here a vital point of labour disputes of today, namely the care and concern for the welfare of workman , handled smoothly with ease and success. In the handling of human labour, provision of meals in addition to wages is considered a sine qua non. In addition to wages which are calculated and given on a monthly basis [masikam paribbayam] , there also had to be provision of meals in the handling of human labour [bhattavetana anuppadanena at D.III. 191]. This term bhattavetana certainly is not ' wages for food ' as is mistakenly rendered quite often in Sinhala with bat sandaha vatup by Sri Lankan scholars, both monk and layman at all levels. It must necessarily be bat ha vatup.

Insight with regard to the equitable distribution of food, cautioning against misappropriation and hoarding of food by unscrupulous individuals is also very much reflected in the Agganna Sutta of the Digha Nikaya [D.III,92]. Here we witness a rationing process of agricultural produce, almost at a food-gatherers age [salim vibhajeyyama , i.e. divide up the available portions of rice yield] and set up limits on consumption [mariyadam thapeyyama]. Mariyadam here [which we choose to translate as ' limits of consumption '] has been twice mistranslated by two different translators as ' rice fields ' in 1921 and 1987. Here is Rhys Davids of 1921: ' Come now, let us divide off the rice fields and set boundaries thereto. And so they divided off the rice and setup boundaries round it.' [Dialogues III.87 / D.III.92]. In 1987 Maurice Walshe translates it as : ' So now let us divide up the rice in to fields with boundaries. So they did so. [Thus Have I Heard by Maurice Walshe. p.412].

Under-development

Finally let us address ourselves to this talk about under development. Does anybody anywhere know as to what should be the correct meter reading as far as development is concerned? Can there be such a standardization?. It is unimaginable that there could be such a thing as Greenwich Meridian time in the development process. Its variability has to be conceded in terms of religious, cultural and ethnic differences, to mention only a few basics of variation. Schumachor in his The Small is Beautiful , we believe, makes an honest attempt to view this problem with detachment. It is colonialist or pedagogical to think otherwise. Or putting it differently, it is Apartheid-like thinking. The dangers of accepting such value judgements for whatever reason, without questioning, are too numerous. It exposes groups of people of smaller stature to certain types of contamination , infection and deterioration , under the crushing pressure of clumsy boots of the bigger brothers. Policy wise , the talk of under development and under developed countries makes available new markets for the disposal and sale of the stock-in-trade of such vociferous groups. Whether they trade in political cliches, social concepts, religious dogmas or lifestyles, the painful global process of trafficking and the equally painful products of overriding are the same. It makes dressed up Chimpanzees and Orangutans of poor humans who have a right to retain their identities with a legitimate pride and dignity. This generally is what the humans in the so-called developing countries have to face and put up with in their process of development.

People should move towards a more meaningful goal of development, well within their means, a goal which finally does not shatter their image, a goal which they can well afford. Unborn generations should not have to pay for our fallacies of today. Let every Buddhist, both at the top and the bottom, realize that the sky is not the limit in development. Policy- makers would do well to remember, at least out of sympathy for the people for whom the policies are being made, not to take the affluent countries with their top - heavy material culture as our models.

Conclusion

In conclusion, let it be remembered that Buddhism upholds a policy of dignified detachment both from persons and things of the world, while advocating the greatest measure of philanthropy and magnanimity. Our identities being discerned both at personal and at group levels, religion or culture- wise, we should do nothing to jeopardize that position. The required degree of detachment depends on that identity, like that of teacher from pupil. So also is the direction of alignment. This is where a real and intelligent understanding of sammavimutti plays its vital role. Develop sammaditthi, i.e., correct vision in a philosophy of life contributing as it does to detachment, remember without tears, and to consequent cessation and peace. The results should be as good as that of an unmanned space- ship. Sammaditthi in its upward process would ultimately end up in perfect release, sammavimutti two stages beyond the Noble Eightfold Path: dasangasamannagato araha hoti (M III, 76)

Ven. Professor Dhammavihari Siri Vajiranana Dharmayatanaya Maharagama

THE POWER OF MINDFULNESS

An Inquiry into the Scope of Bare Attention and the Principal Sources of its Strength

by

Nyanaponika There

The Wheel Publication No. 121/122

BUDDHIST PUBLICATION SOCIETY
KANDY SRI LANKA

Copyright 1968 Buddhist Publication Society

ISBN 955-24-000 2-3

First Printing 1968
Second Printing 1971
Third Printing 1976
Fourth Printing 1980
Fifth Printing (revised) 1986

* * *

DharmaNet Edition 1994

This electronic edition is offered for free distribution via DharmaNet by arrangement with the publisher.

DharmaNet International
P.O. Box 4951, Berkeley CA 94704-4951

Transcribed for DharmaNet by Maureen Riordan

* * * * * * * *

CONTENTS

Introduction
Four Sources of Power in Bare Attention
1. The Functions of "Tidying" and "Naming" Tidying Up the Mental Household
    Naming
2. The Non-coercive Procedure
    Obstacles to Meditation
    Three Countermeasures
3. Stopping and Slowing Down
    Keeping Still
    Spontaneity
    Slowing Down
    Subliminal Influences
4. Directness of Vision
    The Force of Habit
    Associative Thought
    The Sense of Urgency
    The Road to Insight
Notes
Further Reading
About the BPS
Distribution Agreement

* * * * * * * *

INTRODUCTION

Is mindfulness actually a power in its own right as claimed by the title of this essay? Seen from the viewpoint of the ordinary pursuits of life, it does not seem so. From that angle mindfulness, or attention, has a rather modest place among many other seemingly more important mental faculties serving the purpose of variegated wish-fulfillment. Here, mindfulness means just "to watch one's steps" so that one may not stumble or miss a chance in the pursuit of one's aims. Only in the case of specific tasks and skills is mindfulness sometimes cultivated more deliberately, but here too it is still regarded as a subservient function, and its wider scope and possibilities are not recognized.

Even if one turns to the Buddha's doctrine, taking only a surface view of the various classifications and lists of mental factors in which mindfulness appears, one may be inclined to regard this faculty just as "one among many." Again one may get the impression that it has a rather subordinate place and is easily surpassed in significance by other faculties.

Mindfulness in fact has, if we may personify it, a rather unassuming character. Compared with it, mental factors such as devotion, energy, imagination, and intelligence, are certainly more colorful personalities, making an immediate and strong impact on people and situations. Their conquests are sometimes rapid and vast, though often insecure. Mindfulness, on the other hand, is of an unobtrusive nature. Its virtues shine inwardly, and in ordinary life most of its merits are passed on to other mental faculties which generally receive all the credit. One must know mindfulness well and cultivate its acquaintance before one can appreciate its value and its silent penetrative influence. Mindfulness walks slowly and deliberately, and its daily task is of a rather humdrum nature. Yet where it places its feet it cannot easily be dislodged, and it acquires and bestows true mastery of the ground it covers.

Mental faculties of such a nature, like actual personalities of a similar type, are often overlooked or underrated. In the case of mindfulness, it required a genius like the Buddha to discover the "hidden talent" in the modest garb, and to develop the vast inherent power of that potent seed. It is, indeed, the mark of a genius to perceive and to harness the power of the seemingly small. Here, truly, it happens that "what is little becomes much." A revaluation of values takes place. The standards of greatness and smallness change. Through the master mind of the Buddha, mindfulness is finally revealed as the Archimedean point where the vast revolving mass of world suffering is levered out of its twofold anchorage in ignorance and craving.

The Buddha spoke of the power of mindfulness in a very emphatic way:

> "Mindfulness, I declare, is all-helpful" (Samyutta, 46:59).
> "All things can be mastered by mindfulness" (Anguttara, 8:83).

Further, there is that solemn and weighty utterance opening and concluding the Satipatthana Sutta, the Discourse on the Foundations of Mindfulness:

> "This is the only way, monks, for the purification of beings, for the overcoming of sorrow and lamentation, for the destruction of pain and grief, for reaching the right path, for the attainment of Nibbana, namely the four foundations of mindfulness."

In ordinary life, if mindfulness, or attention, is directed to any object, it is rarely sustained long enough for the purpose of careful and factual observation. Generally it is followed immediately by emotional reaction, discriminative thought, reflection, or purposeful action. In a life and thought governed by the Buddha's teaching too, mindfulness (//sati//) is mostly linked with clear comprehension (//sampajanna//) of the right purpose or suitability of an action, and other considerations. Thus again it is not viewed in itself. But to tap the actual and potential //power// of mindfulness it is necessary to understand and deliberately cultivate it in its basic, unalloyed form, which we shall call //bare attention//.

By bare attention we understand the clear and single-minded awareness of what actually happens //to// us and //in// us, at the successive moments of perception. It is called "bare" because it attends to the bare facts of a perception without reacting to them by deed, speech or mental comment. Ordinarily, that purely receptive state of mind is, as we said, just a very brief phase of the thought process of which one is often scarcely aware. But in the methodical development of mindfulness aimed at the unfolding of its latent powers, bare attention is sustained for as long a time as one's strength of concentration permits. Bare attention then becomes the key to the meditative practice of satipatthana, opening the door to mind's mastery and final liberation.

Bare attention is developed in two ways: (1) as a methodical meditative practice with selected objects; (2) as applied, as far as practicable, to the normal events of the day, together with a general attitude of mindfulness and clear comprehension. The details of the practice have been described elsewhere, and need not be repeated here.[1]

The primary purpose of this essay is to demonstrate and explain the efficacy of this method, that is, to show the actual power of mindfulness. Particularly in an age like ours, with its superstitious worship of ceaseless external activity, there will be those who ask: "How can such a passive attitude of mind as that of bare attention possibly lead to the great results claimed for it?" In reply, one may be inclined to suggest to the questioner not to rely on the words of others, but to put these assertions of the Buddha to the test of personal experience. But those who do not yet know the Buddha's teaching well enough to accept it as a reliable guide, may hesitate to take up, without good reasons, a practice that just on account of its radical simplicity may appear strange to them. In the following a number of such "good reasons" are therefore proffered for the reader's scrutiny. They are also meant as an introduction to the general spirit of satipatthana and as pointers to its wide and significant perspectives. Furthermore, it is hoped that he who has taken up the methodical training will recognize in the following observations certain features of his own practice, and be encouraged to cultivate them deliberately.

* * *

FOUR SOURCES OF POWER IN BARE ATTENTION

We shall now deal with four aspects of bare attention, which are the mainsprings of the power of mindfulness. they are not the only sources of its strength, but they are the principal ones to which the efficacy of this method of mental development is due. These four are:

1. The functions of "tidying-up" and "naming" exercised by bare attention.
2. its non-violent, non-coercive procedure;
3. the capacity of stopping and slowing down;
4. the directness of vision bestowed by bare attention.

* * *

1. THE FUNCTIONS OF "TIDYING" AND "NAMING"

Tidying Up the Mental Household

If anyone whose mind is not harmonized and controlled through methodical meditative training should take a close look at his own everyday thoughts and activities, he will meet with a rather disconcerting sight. Apart from the few main channels of his purposeful thoughts and activities, he will everywhere be faced with a tangled mass of perceptions, thoughts, feelings, and casual bodily movements showing a disorderliness and confusion which he would certainly not tolerate in his living-room. Yet this is the state of affairs that we take for granted within a considerable portion of our waking life and our normal mental activity. Let us now look at the details of that rather untidy picture.

First we meet a vast number of casual sense-impressions such as sights and sounds, passing constantly through our mind. Most of them remain vague and fragmentary; some are even based on faulty perceptions and misjudgments. Carrying these inherent weaknesses, they often form the untested basis for judgements and decisions on a higher level of consciousness. True, all these casual sense impressions need not and cannot be objects of focused attention. A stone on the road that happens to meet our glance will have a claim on our attention only if it obstructs our progress or is of interest to us for some reason. Yet if we neglect these casual impressions too often, we may stumble over many stones lying on our road and also overlook many gems.

Besides the casual sense impressions, there are those more significant and definite perceptions, thoughts, feelings and volitions which have a closer connection with our purposeful life. Here too, we find that a very high proportion of them are in a state of utter confusion. Hundreds of cross-currents flash through the mind, and everywhere there are "bits and ends" of unfinished thoughts, stifled emotions and passing moods. Many meet a premature death. Owing to their innately feeble nature, our lack of concentration or suppression by new and stronger impressions, they do not persist and develop. If we observe our own mind, we shall notice how easily diverted our thoughts are, how often they behave like undisciplined disputants constantly interrupting each other and refusing to listen to the other side's arguments. Again, many lines of thought remain rudimentary or are left untranslated into will and action, because courage is lacking to accept their practical, moral or intellectual consequences. If we continue to examine more closely our average perceptions, thoughts or judgements, we shall have to admit that many of them are unreliable. They are just the products of habit, led by prejudices of intellect or emotion, by our pet preferences or aversions, by laziness or selfishness, by faulty or superficial observations.

Such a look into long-neglected quarters of the mind will come as a wholesome shock to the observer. It will convince him of the urgent need for methodical mental culture extending below the thin surface layer of the mind to those vast twilight regions of consciousness we have just visited. The observer will then become aware that the relatively small sector of the mind that stands in the intense light of purposeful will and thought is not a reliable standard of the inner strength and lucidity of consciousness in its totality. He will also see that the quality of individual consciousness cannot be judged by a few optimal results of mental activity achieved in brief, intermittent periods. The decisive factor in determining the quality of consciousness is self-understanding and self-control: whether that dim awareness characteristic of our everyday mind and the uncontrolled portion of everyday activity tends to increase or decrease.

It is the daily little negligence in thoughts, words and deeds going on for many years of our life (and as the Buddha teaches, for many existences), that is chiefly responsible for the untidiness and confusion we find in our minds. This negligence creates the trouble and allows it to continue. Thus the old Buddhist teachers have said: "Negligence produces a lot of dirt. As in a house, so in the mind, only a very little dirt collects in a day or two, but if it goes on for many years, it will grow into a vast heap of refuse."[2]

The dark, untidy corners of the mind are the hideouts of our most dangerous enemies. From there they attack us unawares, and much too often succeed in defeating us. That twilight world peopled by frustrated desires and suppressed resentments, by vacillations, whims, and many other shadowy figures, forms a background from which upsurging passions--greed and lust, hatred and anger--may derive powerful support. Besides, the obscure and obscuring nature of that twilight region is the very element and mother-soil of the third and strongest of the three roots of evil (//akusala mula//), ignorance or delusion.

Attempts at eliminating the mind's main defilements--greed, hate and delusion--must fail as long as these defilements find refuge and support in the uncontrolled dim regions of the mind; as long as the close and complex tissue of those half-articulate thoughts and emotions forms the basic texture of mind into which just a few golden strands of noble and lucid thought are woven. But how are we to deal with that unwieldy, tangled mass? Usually we try to ignore it and to rely on the counteracting energies of our surface mind. But the only safe remedy is to face it--with mindfulness. Nothing more difficult is needed than to acquire the habit of directing bare attention to these rudimentary thoughts as often as possible. The working principle here is the simple fact that two thoughts cannot coexist at the same time: if the clear light of mindfulness is present, there is no room for mental twilight. When sustained mindfulness has secured a firm foothold, it will be a matter of comparatively secondary importance how the mind will then deal with those rudimentary thoughts, moods and emotions. One may just dismiss them and replace them by purposeful thoughts; or one may allow and even compel them to complete what they have to say. In the latter case they will often reveal how poor and weak they actually are, and it will then not be difficult to dispose of them once they are forced into the open. This procedure of bare attention is very simple and effective; the difficulty is only the persistence in applying it.

Observing a complex thing means identifying its component parts, singling out the separate strands forming that intricate tissue. If this is applied to the complex currents of mental and practical life, automatically a strong regulating influence will be noticeable. As if ashamed in the presence of the calmly observing eye, the course of thoughts will proceed in a less disorderly and wayward manner; it will not be so easily diverted, and will resemble more and more a well-regulated river.

During decades of the present life and throughout millennia of previous lives traversing the round of existence, there has steadily grown within each individual a closely knit system of intellectual and emotional prejudices, of bodily and mental habits that are no longer questioned as to their rightful position and useful function in human life. Here again, the application of bare attention loosens the hard soil of these often very ancient layers of the human mind, preparing thus the ground for sowing the seed of methodical mental training. Bare attention identifies and pursues the single threads of that closely interwoven tissue of our habits. It sorts out carefully the subsequent justifications of passionate impulses and the pretended motives of our prejudices. Fearlessly it questions old habits often grown meaningless. It uncovers their roots, and thus helps abolish all that is seen to be harmful. In brief, bare attention lays open the minute crevices in the seemingly impenetrable structure of unquestioned mental processes. Then the sword of wisdom wielded by the strong arm of constant meditative practice will be able to penetrate these crevices, and finally to break up that structure where required. If the inner connection between the single parts of a seemingly compact whole become intelligible, they then cease to be inaccessible.

When the facts and details of the mind's conditioned nature are uncovered by meditative practice, there is an increased chance to effect fundamental changes in the mind. In that way, not only those hitherto unquestioned habits of the mind, its twilight regions and its normal processes as well, but even those seemingly solid, indisputable facts of the world of matter--all will become "questionable" and lose much of their self-assurance. Many people are so impressed and intimidated by that bland self-assurance of assumed "solid facts," that they hesitate to take up any spiritual training, doubting that it can effect anything worthwhile. The application of bare attention to the task of tidying and regulating the mind will bring perceptible results--results which will dispel their doubts and encourage them to enter more fully a spiritual path.

The tidying or regulating function of bare attention, we should note, is of fundamental importance for the "purification of beings" mentioned by the Buddha as the first aim of satipatthana. This phrase refers, of course, to the purification of their minds, and here the very first step is to bring initial order into the functioning of the mental processes. We have seen how this is done by bare attention. In that sense, the commentary to the "Discourse on the Foundation of Mindfulness" explains the words "for the purification of beings" as follows:

"It is said: 'Mental taints defile beings; mental clarity purifies them.' That mental clarity comes to be by this way of mindfulness (//satipatthana magga//).

Naming

We said before that bare attention "tidies up" or regulates the mind by sorting out and identifying the various confused strands of the mental process. That identifying function, like any other mental activity, is connected with a verbal formulation. In other words, "identifying" proceeds by way of expressly "naming" the respective mental processes.

Primitive man believed that words could exercise a magical power: "things that could be named had lost their secret power over man, the horror of the unknown. To know the name of a force, a being or an object was (to primitive man) identical with the mastery over it."[3] That ancient belief in the magical potency of names appears also in many fairy tales and myths, where the power of a demon is broken just by facing him courageously and pronouncing his name.

There is an element of truth in the "word-magic" of primitive man, and in the practice of bare attention we will find the power of naming confirmed. The "twilight demons" of the mind--our passionate impulses and obscure thoughts--cannot bear the simple but clarifying questions about their "names," much less the knowledge of these names. Hence, this is often alone sufficient to diminish their strength. The calmly observant glance of mindfulness discovers the demons in their hiding-places. The practice of calling them by their names drives them out into the open, into the daylight of consciousness. There they will feel embarrassed and obliged to justify themselves, although at this stage of bare attention they have not yet even been subjected to any closer questioning except about their names, their identity. If forced into the open while still in an incipient stage, they will be incapable of withstanding scrutiny and will just dwindle away. Thus a first victory over them may be won, even at an early stage of the practice.

The appearance in the mind of undesirable and ignoble thoughts, even if they are very fleeting and only half-articulate, has an unpleasant effect upon one's self-esteem. Therefore such thoughts are often shoved aside, unattended to and unopposed. Often they are also camouflaged by more pleasing and respectable labels which hide their true nature. Thoughts disposed of in either of these two ways will strengthen the accumulated power of ignoble tendencies in the subconscious. Furthermore, these procedures will weaken one's will to resist the arising and the dominance of mental defilements, and strengthen the tendency to evade the issues. But by applying the simple method of clearly and honestly naming or registering any undesirable thoughts, these two harmful devices, ignorance and camouflage, are excluded. Thence their detrimental consequences on the structure of the subconscious and their diversion of mental effort will be avoided.

When ignoble thoughts or personal shortcomings are called by their right names, the mind will develop an inner resistance and even repugnance against them. In time it may well succeed in keeping them in check and finally eliminating them. Even if these means do not bring undesirable tendencies fully under control at once, they will stamp upon them the impact of repeated resistance which will weaken them whenever they reappear. To continue our personification, we may say that unwholesome thoughts will no longer be the unopposed masters of the scene, and this diffidence of theirs will make them considerably easier to deal with. It is the power of moral shame (//hiri-bala//) that has been mustered here as an ally, methodically strengthened by these simple yet subtle psychological techniques.

The method of naming and registering also extends, of course, to noble thoughts and impulses which will be encouraged and strengthened. Without being given deliberate attention, such wholesome tendencies often pass unnoticed and remain barren. But when clear awareness is applied to them, it will stimulate their growth.

It is one of the most beneficial features of right mindfulness, and particularly of bare attention, that it enables us to utilize all external events and inner mental events for our progress. Even the unsalutary can be made a starting point for the salutary if, through the device of naming or registering, it becomes an object of detached knowledge.

In several passages of the Satipatthana Sutta the function of naming or "bare registering" seems to be indicated by formulating the respective statements by way of direct speech. There are no less than four such instances in the discourse:

(1) "When experiencing a pleasant feeling, he knows 'I experience a pleasant feeling'," etc.;
(2) "He knows a lustful (state of) mind, 'Mind is lustful'," etc.;
(3) "If (the hindrance of) sense desire is present in him, he knows, 'Sense desire is present in me'," etc.;
(4) "If the enlightenment factor mindfulness is present in him, he knows, 'The enlightenment factor mindfulness is present in me'," etc.

In concluding this section, we briefly point out that the //tidying-up// and //naming// of mental processes is the indispensable preparation for fully understanding them in their true nature, the task of insight (//vipassana//). These functions, exercised by bare attention, will help dispel the illusion that the mental processes are compact. They will also help us to discern their specific nature or characteristics, and to notice their momentary rise and fall.

* * *

2. THE NON-COERCIVE PROCEDURE

Obstacles to Meditation

Both the world surrounding us and the world of our own minds are full of hostile and conflicting forces causing us pain and frustration. We know from our own bitter experience that we are not strong enough to meet and conquer all these antagonistic forces in open combat. In the external world we cannot have everything exactly as we want it, while in the inner world of the mind, our passions, impulses, and whims often override the demands of duty, reason and our higher aspirations.

We further learn that often an undesirable situation will only worsen if excessive pressure is used against it. Passionate desires may grow in intensity if one tries to silence them by sheer force of will. Disputes and quarrels will go on endlessly and grow fiercer if they are fanned again and again by angry retorts or by vain attempts to crush the other man's position. A disturbance during work, rest or meditation will be felt more strongly and will have a longer-lasting impact if one reacts to it by resentment and anger and attempts to suppress it.

Thus, again and again, we meet with situations in life where we cannot //force// issues. But there are ways of mastering the vicissitudes of life and conflicts of mind without applications of force. Non-violent means may often succeed where attempts at coercion, internal or external, fail. Such a non-violent way of mastering life and mind is satipatthana. By the methodical application of bare attention, the basic practice in the development of right mindfulness, all the latent powers of a non-coercive approach will gradually unfold, with the beneficial results and their wide and unexpected implications. In this context we are mainly concerned with the benefits of Satipatthana for the mastery of mind, and for the progress in meditation that may result from a non-coercive procedure. But we shall also cast occasional side glances at its repercussions on everyday life. It will not be difficult for a thoughtful reader to make more detailed application to his own problems.

The antagonistic forces that appear in meditation and that are liable to upset its smooth course are of three kinds:

1. external disturbances, such as noise;
2. mental defilements (//kilesa//), such as lust, anger, restlessness, dissatisfaction, or sloth, which may arise at any time during meditation; and
3. various incidental stray thoughts, or surrender to day-dreaming.

These distractions are the great stumbling blocks for a beginner in meditation who has not yet acquired sufficient dexterity to deal with them effectively. To give thought to those disturbing factors only when they actually arise at the time of meditation is insufficient. If caught unprepared in one's defence, one will struggle with them in a more or less haphazard and ineffective way, and with a feeling of irritation which will itself be an additional impediment. If disturbances of any kind and unskillful reactions to them occur several times during one session, one may come to feel utterly frustrated and irritated and give up further attempts to meditate, at least for the present occasion.

In fact, even meditators who are quite well informed by books or a teacher about all the details concerning their subject of meditation often lack instruction on how to deal skillfully with the disturbances they may meet. The feeling of helplessness in facing them is the most formidable difficulty for a beginning meditator. At that point many accept defeat, abandoning prematurely any further effort at methodical practice. As in worldly affairs, so in meditation, one's way of dealing with the "initial difficulties" will often be decisive for success or failure.

When faced by inner and outer disturbances, the inexperienced or uninstructed beginner will generally react in two ways. He will first try to shove them away lightly, and if he fails in that, he will try to suppress them by sheer force of will. But these disturbances are like insolent flies: by whisking--first lightly and then with increasing vigor and anger--one may perhaps succeed in driving them away for a while, but usually they will return with an exasperating constancy, and the effort and vexation of whisking will have produced only an additional disturbance of one's composure.

Satipatthana, through its method of bare attention, offers a non-violent alternative to those futile and even harmful attempts at suppression by force. A successful non-violent procedure in mind-control has to start with the right attitude. There must be first the full cognizance and sober acceptance of the fact that those three disturbing factors are co-inhabitants of the world we live in, whether we like it or not. Our disapproval of them will not alter the fact. With some we shall have to come to terms, and concerning the others--the mental defilements--we shall have to learn how to deal with them effectively until they are finally conquered.

1. Since we are not the sole inhabitants of this densely populated world, there are bound to be //external disturbances// of various kinds, such as noise and interruptions by visitors. We cannot always live in "splendid isolation," "from the noise of men and dogs untroubled," or "ivory towers" high above the crowd. Right meditation is not escapism; it is not meant to provide hiding-places for temporary oblivion. Realistic meditation has the purpose of training the mind to face, to understand and to conquer this very world in which we live. And this world inevitably includes numerous obstacles to the life of meditation.

2. The Burmese meditation master, the Venerable Mahasi Sayadaw said: "In an unliberated worldling //mental defilements// are sure to arise again and again. He has to face that fact and know these defilements well in order to apply again and again the appropriate remedy of Satipatthana. Then they will grow weaker, more short-lived, and will finally disappear." To know the occurrence and nature of defilements is therefore as important for a meditator as to know the occurrence of his noble thoughts.

By facing one's own defilements one will be stirred to increase the effort to eliminate them. On the other hand, if out of a false shame or pride one tries to avert one's glance when they arise, one will never truly join issue with them, and will always evade the final and decisive encounter. By hitting blindly at them, one will only exhaust or even hurt oneself. But by observing carefully their nature and behavior when they arise in one's own mind, one will be able to meet them well prepared, to forestall them often, and finally to banish them fully. Therefore meet your defilements with a free and open glance! Be not ashamed, afraid or discouraged!

3. The third group of intruders disturbing the meditator's mind are //stray thoughts// and //daydreams//. These may consist of various memories and images of the past, recent or remote, including those emerging from subconscious depths; thoughts of the future--planning, imagining, fearing, hoping; and the casual sense-perceptions that may occur at the very time of meditation, often dragging after them a long trail of associated ideas. Whenever concentration and mindfulness slacken, stray thoughts or daydreams appear and fill the vacuum. Though they seem insignificant in themselves, through their frequent occurrence they form a most formidable obstacle, not only for the beginner, but in all cases when the mind is restless or distracted. However, when these invaders can be kept at bay, even long continuous periods of meditation can be achieved. As in the case of the mental defilements, stray thoughts will be entirely excluded only at the stage of Arahatship, when the perfect mindfulness thereby obtained keeps unfailing watch at the door of the mind.

If they are to shape our attitude, all these facts about the three kinds of disturbing factors must be given full weight and be fully absorbed by our mind. Then, in these three disturbing factors, the noble truth of suffering will manifest itself to the meditator very incisively through his own personal experience: "Not to obtain what one wants is suffering." The three other noble truths should also be exemplified by reference to the same situation. In such a way, even when dealing with impediments, the meditator will be within the domain of Satipatthana. He will be engaged in the mindful awareness of the Four Noble Truths--a part of the contemplation of mental objects (//dhammanupassana//).[4] It is characteristic of right mindfulness, and one of its tasks, to relate the actual experiences of life to the truth of the Dhamma, and to use them as opportunities for its practical realization. Already at the preliminary stage devoted to the shaping of a correct and helpful attitude, we have the first successful test of our peaceful weapons: by understanding our adversaries better, we have consolidated our position which was formerly weakened by an emotional approach; and by transforming these adversaries into teachers of the truths, we have won the first advantage over them.

Three Countermeasures

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

If we are mentally prepared by a realistic view of these three factors antagonistic to meditation, we shall be less inclined to react at once by irritation when they actually arise. We shall be emotionally in a better position to meet them with the non-violent weapons of which we shall now speak.

There are three devices for countering disturbances that arise in meditation. The three should be applied in succession whenever the preceding device has failed to dispose of the disturbance. All three are applications of bare attention; they differ in the degree and duration of attention given to the disturbance. The guiding rule here is: to give no more mental emphasis to the respective disturbance than is actually required by circumstances.
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

1. First, one should notice the disturbance clearly, but lightly: that is, without emphasis and without attention to details. After that brief act of noticing, one should try to return to the original subject of meditation. If the disturbance was weak or one's preceding concentration fairly strong, one may well succeed in resuming contemplation. At that stage, by being careful not to get involved in any "conversation" or argument with the intruder, we shall on our part not give it a reason to stay long; and in a good number of cases the disturbance will soon depart like a visitor who does not receive a very warm welcome. That curt dismissal may often enable us to return to our original meditation without any serious disturbance to the composure of mind.

The non-violent device here is: to apply bare attention to the disturbance, but with a minimum of response to it, and with a mind bent on withdrawal. This is the very way in which the Buddha himself dealt with inopportune visitors, as described in the Mahasunnata Sutta: "...with a mind bent on seclusion...and withdrawn, his conversation aiming at dismissing (those visitors)." Similar was Shantideva's advice on how to deal with fools: if one cannot avoid them, one should treat them "with the indifferent politeness of a gentleman."

2. If, however, the disturbance persists, one should repeat the application of bare attention again and again, patiently and calmly; and it may be that the disturbance will vanish when it has spent its force. Here the attitude is to meet the repeated occurrence of a disturbance by a reiterated "No," a determined refusal to be deflected from one's course. This is the attitude of patience and firmness. The capacity for watchful observation has to be aided here by the capacity to wait and to hold one's ground.

These two devices will generally be successful with incidental stray thoughts and daydreams, which are feeble by nature, but the other two types of disturbances, the external ones and defilements, may also yield quite often.

3. But if, for some reason, the do //not// yield, one should deliberately turn one's full attention to the disturbance and make it an object of knowledge. Thus one transforms it from a //disturbance// to meditation into a legitimate //object// of meditation. One may continue with that new object until the external or internal cause for attending to it has ceased; or, if it proves satisfactory, one may even retain it for the rest of that session.

For instance, when disturbed by a persistent noise, we should give the noise our undivided attention, but we should take care to distinguish the object itself from our reaction to it. For example, if resentment arises, it should be clearly recognized in its own nature whenever it arises. In doing so we shall be practicing the contemplation of mind-objects (//dhammanupassana//) according to the following passage of the Satipatthana Sutta; "He knows the ear and sounds, and the fetter (e.g. resentment) arising through both." If the noise is intermittent or of varying intensity, one will easily be able to discern the rise and fall (//udayabbaya//) in its occurrence. In that way one will add to one's direct insight into impermanency (//aniccata//).

The attitude towards recurrent mental defilements such as thoughts of lust and restlessness, should be similar. One should face them squarely, but distinguish them from one's reaction to them, e.g. connivance, fear, resentment, irritation. In doing so, one is making use of the device of "naming," and one will reap the benefits mentioned above. In the recurrent waves of passion or restlessness, one will likewise learn to distinguish gradually phases of "high" and "low," their "ups and downs," and may also gain other helpful knowledge about their behavior. By that procedure, one again remains entirely within the range of Satipatthana by practicing the contemplation of the state of mind (//cittanupassana//) and of mind-objects (dhammanupassana: attention to the hindrances).

This method of transforming disturbances to meditation into objects of meditation, as simple as it is ingenious, may be regarded as the culmination of non-violent procedure. It is a device very characteristic of the spirit of satipatthana, to make use of all experiences as aids on the path. In that way enemies are turned into friends; for all these disturbances and antagonistic forces have become our teachers, and teachers, whoever they may be, should be regarded as friends.

We cannot forego to quote here a passage from a noteworthy little book, //The Little Locksmith// by Katherine Butler Hathaway, a moving human document of fortitude and practical wisdom acquired by suffering:

> I am shocked by the ignorance and wastefulness with which persons who should know better throw away the things they do not like. They throw away experiences, people, marriages, situations, all sorts of things because they do not like them. If you throw away a thing, it is gone. Where you had something you have nothing to work on. Whereas, almost all those things which get thrown away are capable of being worked over by a little magic into just the opposite of what they were... But most human beings never remember at all that in almost every bad situation there is the possibility of a transformation by which the undesirable may be changed into the desirable.

We said before that the occurrence of the three disturbing elements cannot always be prevented. They are parts of our world, and their coming and going follows its own laws irrespective of our approval or disapproval. But by applying bare attention we can avoid being swept away or dislodged by them. By taking a firm and calm stand on the secure ground of mindfulness, we shall repeat in a modest degree, but in an essentially identical way, the historic situation under the Bodhi Tree. When Mara, the Evil One, at the head of his army, claimed the soil on which the future Buddha sat, the latter refused to budge. Trusting in the power of mindfulness, we may confidently repeat the Bodhisatta's aspiration on that occasion: //Ma Mam thana acavi!// "May he (Mara) not dislodge me from this place" (Padhana Sutta).

Let the intruders come and go. Like all the other members of that vast unceasing procession of mental and physical events that passes before our observant eyes in the practice of bare attention, they arise, and having arisen, they pass away.

Our advantage here is the obvious fact that two thought moments cannot be present at the same time. Attention refers, strictly speaking, not to the present but to the moment that has just passed away. Thus, as long as mindfulness holds sway, there will be no "disturbance" or "defiled thought." This gives us the chance to hold on to that secure ground of an "observer's post," our own potential "throne of enlightenment."

By the quietening and neutralizing influence of detached observation as applied in our three devices, the interruptions of meditation will increasingly lose the sting of irritation, and thereby their disturbing effect. This will prove to be an act of true //viraga// (dispassion), which literally means "decoloring." When these experiences are stripped of the emotional tinge that excites towards lust, aversion, irritation and other defilements of the mind, they will appear in their true nature as bare phenomena (//suddha-dhamma//).

The non-violent procedure of bare attention endows the meditator with the light but sure touch so essential for handling the sensitive, evasive, and refractory nature of the mind. It also enables him to deal smoothly with the various difficult situations and obstacles met with in daily life. To illustrate the even quality of energy required for attaining to the meditative absorptions, //The Path of Purification (Visuddhimagga)// describes a test which students of surgery in ancient days had to undergo as a proof of their skill. A lotus leaf was placed in a bowl of water, and the pupil had to make an incision through the length of the leaf, without cutting it entirely or submerging it. He who applied an excess of force either cut the leaf into two or pressed it into the water, while the timid one did not even dare to scratch it. In fact, something like the gentle but firm hand of the surgeon is required in mental training, and this skilful, well-balanced touch will be the natural outcome of the non-violent procedure in the practice of bare attention.

* * *

3. STOPPING AND SLOWING DOWN

Keeping Still

For a full and unobstructed unfoldment of the mind's capacities, the influence of two complimentary forces is needed: //activating// and //restraining//. That twofold need was recognized by the Buddha, the great knower of mind. He advised that the faculties of energy (//viry'indriya//) and of concentration (//samadh'indriya//) should be kept equally strong and well balanced.[5] Furthermore, he recommended three of the seven factors of enlightenment (//bojjhanga//) as suitable for rousing the mind, and three for calming it.[6] In both cases, among the spiritual faculties and the enlightenment factors, it is mindfulness that not only watches over their equilibrium, but also activates those that are sluggish and restrains those that are too intense.

Mindfulness, though seemingly of a passive nature, is in fact an activating force. It makes the mind alert, and alertness is indispensable for all purposeful activity. In the present inquiry, however, we shall examine how it makes for disentanglement and detachment, and how it positively helps in the development of the mental qualities required for the work of deliverance.

In practicing bare attention, we //keep still// at the mental and spatial place of observation, amidst the loud demands of the inner and outer world. Mindfulness possesses the strength of tranquility, the capacity for deferring action and applying the brake, for //stopping// rash interference and for suspending judgement while pausing to observe facts and to reflect upon them wisely. It also brings a wholesome //slowing down// in the impetuosity of thought, speech and action. Keeping still and stopping, pausing and slowing down--these will be our key words when speaking now of the restraining effect of bare attention.

An ancient Chinese book states:

> "In making things end, and in making things start, > there is nothing more glorious than //keeping still//."

In the light of the Buddha's teaching, the true "end of things" is Nibbana which is called the "//stilling// of formations" (//sankharanam vupasamo//), that is, their final end or cessation. It is also called "the stopping" (//nirodha//). The "things" or "formations" meant here are the conditioned and impersonal phenomena rooted in craving and ignorance. The end of formations comes to be by the end of "forming," that is, by the end of world-creating kammic activities. It is the "end of the world" and of suffering, which the Buddha proclaimed cannot be reached by walking, migrating or transmigrating, but can be found within ourselves. That end of the world is heralded by each deliberate act of //keeping still, stopping//, or //pausing//. "Keeping still," in that highest sense, means stopping the accumulation of kamma, abstaining from our unceasing concern with evanescent things, abstaining from perpetually adding to our entanglements in samsara--the round of repeated birth and death. By following the way of mindfulness, by training ourselves to keep still and pause in the attitude of bare attention, we refuse to take up the world's persistent challenge to our dispositions for greed or hatred. We protect ourselves against rash and delusive judgements; we refrain from blindly plunging into the whirlpool of interfering action with all its inherent dangers.

> "He who abstains from interfering is everywhere secure" > (Sutta Nipata, v.953)

> "He who keeps still and knows where to stop will not meet danger" > (//Tao-Te-Ching//, Chapter 44)

The Chinese saying quoted earlier states in its second part that there is nothing more glorious in //making things start// than in keeping still. Explained in the Buddhist sense, these things effectively started by keeping still are "the things (or qualities) making for decrease of kammic accumulation." In dealing with them, we may follow the traditional division of mental training into morality (or conduct), concentration (or tranquility) and wisdom (or insight). All three are decisively helped by the attitude of //keeping still// cultivated by bare attention.

1. //Conduct//. How can we improve our conduct, its moral quality and its skill in taking right decisions? If we earnestly desire such an improvement, it will generally be wisest to choose the line of least resistance. If we turn too quickly against those shortcomings deeply rooted in old habits or in powerful impulses, we might suffer discouraging defeat. We should pay attention first to our blemishes of action and speech and our errors of judgement caused by thoughtlessness and rashness. Of these there are many. In our lives there are numerous instances where one short moment of reflection might have prevented a false step, and thereby warded off a long chain of misery or moral guilt that started with a single moment of thoughtlessness. But how can we curb our rash reactions, and replace them by moments of mindfulness and reflection? To do so will depend on our capacity to //stop and pause//, to apply brakes at the right time, and this we can learn by practicing bare attention. In that practice we shall train ourselves "to look and wait," to suspend reactions or slow them down. We shall learn it first the easy way, in situations of our own choice, within the limited field of experiences met with during the periods of meditative practice. When facing again and again the incidental sense impressions, feelings or stray thoughts which interrupt our concentration; when curbing again and again our desire to respond to them in some way; when succeeding again and again in keeping still in face of them--we shall be preparing ourselves to preserve that inner stillness in the wider and unprotected field of everyday life. We shall have acquired a presence of mind that will enable us to pause and stop, even if we are taken by surprise or are suddenly provoked or tempted.

Our present remarks refer to those blemishes of conduct liable to arise through thoughtlessness and rashness, but which may be more or less easily checked through mindfulness. Dexterity in dealing with these will also affect those more obstinate deviations from moral conduct rooted in strong passionate impulses or in deeply ingrained bad habits. The increased tranquility of mind achieved in keeping still for bare attention will restrain the impetuosity of passions. The acquired habit of pausing and stopping will act as a brake to the ingrained habits of indulging in unwholesome deeds.

By being able to keep still for bare attention, or to pause for wise reflection, very often the first temptation to lust, the first wave of anger, the first mist of delusion, will disappear without causing serious entanglement. At which point the current of unwholesome thought process is stopped will depend on the quality of mindfulness. If mindfulness is keen, it will succeed at a very early point in calling a stop to a series of defiled thoughts or actions before we are carried along by them too far. Then the respective defilements will not grow beyond their initial strength, less effort will be required to check them, and fewer kammic entanglements, or none, will follow.

Let us take the example of a pleasant visual object which has aroused our liking. At first that liking might not be very active and insistent. If at this point the mind is already able to keep still for detached observation or reflection, the visual perception can easily be divested of its still very slight admixture of lust.

The object becomes registered as "just something seen that has caused a pleasant feeling," or the attraction felt is sublimated into a quiet aesthetic pleasure. But if that earliest chance has been missed, the liking will grow into attachment and into the desire to possess. If now a stop is called, the thought of desire may gradually lose its strength; it will not easily turn into an insistent craving, and no actual attempts to get possession of the desired object will follow. But if the current of lust is still unchecked, then the thought of desire may express itself by speech in asking for the object or even demanding it with impetuous words. That is, unwholesome mental kamma is followed by unwholesome verbal kamma. A refusal will cause the original current of lust to branch out into additional streams of mental defilements, either sadness or anger. But if even at that late stage one can stop for quiet reflection or bare attention, accept the refusal, and renounce wish-fulfilment, further complications will be avoided. However, if clamoring words are followed by unwholesome bodily kamma, and if, driven by craving, one tries to get possession of the desired object by stealth or force, then the kammic entanglement is complete and its consequences must be experienced in their full impact. But still, if even after the completion of the evil act, one stops for reflection, it will not be in vain. For the mindfulness that arises in the form of remorseful retrospection will preclude a hardening of character and may prevent a repetition of the same action.

The Exalted One once said to his son, Rahula (Majjhima 61):

> "Whatever action you //intend// to perform, by body, speech or mind, you should consider that action... If, in considering it, you realize: 'This action which I intend to perform will be harmful to myself, or harmful to others or harmful to both; it will be an unwholesome action, producing suffering, resulting in suffering'-- then you should certainly not perform that action.
>
> "Also //while// you are performing an action, by body, speech or > mind, you should consider that action... If, in considering it, you realize: 'This action which I am performing is harmful to myself, or harmful to others or harmful to both; it is an unwholesome action, producing suffering, resulting in suffering'--then you should desist from such an action.

>
> "Also //after// you have performed an action, by body, speech or mind, you should consider that action... If, in considering it, you realize: 'This action which I have performed has been harmful to myself, or harmful to others, or harmful to both; it was an unwholesome action, producing suffering, resulting in suffering-- then you should in the future refrain from it."

2. //Tranquility//. We shall now consider how stopping for bare attention also helps one to attain and strengthen tranquility (//samatha//) in its double sense: general peace of mind and meditative concentration.

By developing the habit of pausing for bare attention, it becomes increasingly easier to withdraw into one's own inner stillness when unable to escape bodily from the loud, insistent noises of the outer world. It will be easier to forego useless reactions to the foolish speech or deeds of others. When the blows of fate are particularly hard and incessant, a mind trained in bare attention will find a refuge in the haven of apparent passivity or watchful non-action, from which position it will be able to wait patiently until the storms have passed. There are situations in life when it is best to allow things to come to their natural end. He who is able to keep still and wait will often succeed where aggressiveness or busy activity would have been vanquished. Not only in critical situations, but also in the normal course of life, the experience won by observant keeping still will convince us that we need not actively respond to every impression we receive, or regard every encounter with people or things as a challenge to our interfering activity.

By refraining from busying ourselves unnecessarily, external frictions will be reduced and the internal tensions they bring will loosen up. Greater harmony and peace will pervade the life of every day, bridging the gap between normal life and the tranquility of meditation. Then there will be fewer of those disturbing inner reverberations of everyday restlessness which, in a coarse or subtle form, invade the hours of meditation, producing bodily and mental unrest. Consequently, the hindrance of agitation, a chief obstacle to concentration, will appear less often and will be easier to overcome when it arises.

By cultivating the attitude of bare attention as often as opportunity offers, the centrifugal forces of mind, making for mental distraction, will peter out; the centripetal tendency, turning the mind inward and making for concentration, will gather strength. Craving will no longer run out in pursuit of a variety of changing objects.

Regular practice of sustained attention to a continuous series of events prepares the mind for sustained concentration on a //single// object, or a limited number of objects, in the strict practice of meditation. Firmness or steadiness of mind, another important factor in concentration, will likewise be cultivated.

Thus, the practice of keeping still, pausing and stopping for bare attention, fosters several salient components of meditative tranquility: calmness, concentration, firmness, and reduction of the multiplicity of objects. It raises the average level of normal consciousness and brings it closer to the level of the meditative mind. This is an important point because often too wide a gap between these two mental levels repeatedly frustrates attempts at mental concentration and hinders the achievement of smooth continuity in meditative practice.

In the sequence of the seven factors of enlightenment, we find that the enlightenment factor of tranquility (//passaddhi sambojjhanga//) precedes that of concentration (//samadhi-sambojjhanga//). Expressing the same fact, the Buddha says: "If tranquilized within, the mind will become concentrated." Now in the light of our previous remarks, we shall better understand these statements.

3. //Insight//. It has been said by the Exalted One: "He whose mind is concentrated sees things as they really are." Therefore, all those ways by which bare attention strengthens concentration also provide a supporting condition for the development of insight. But there is also a more direct and specific help which insight receives from keeping still in bare attention.

Generally, we are more concerned with handling and using things than with knowing them in their true nature. Thus we usually grasp in haste the very first few signals conveyed to us by a perception. Then, through deeply ingrained habit, those signals evoke a standard response by way of judgements such as good-bad, pleasant-unpleasant, useful-harmful, right-wrong. These judgements, by which we define the objects in relation to ourselves, lead to corresponding reactions by word or deed. Only rarely does attention dwell upon a common or familiar object for any longer time than is needed to receive the first few signals. So, for the most part, we perceive things in a fragmentary manner and thence misconceive them. Further, only the very first phase of the object's life-span, or a little more, comes into the focus of our attention. One may not even be consciously aware that the object is a process with an extension in time--a beginning and an end; that it has many aspects and relations beyond those casually perceived in a limited situation; that, in brief, it has a kind of evanescent individuality of its own. A world perceived in this superficial way will consist of shapeless little lumps of experiences marked by a few subjectively selected signs or symbols. The symbols chosen are determined mainly by the individual's self-interest; sometimes they are even misapplied. The shadow-like world that results includes not only the outer environment and other persons, but also a good part of one's own bodily and mental processes. These, too become subjected to the same superficial manner of conceptualization. The Buddha points out four basic misconceptions that result from distorted perceptions and unmethodical attention: taking the impure for pure, the impermanent for lasting, the painful and pain-bringing for pleasant, and the impersonal for a self or something belonging to the self. When the seal of self-reference is thus stamped again and again upon the world of everyday experience, the basic misconception, "This belongs to me" (//attaniya//) will steadily put forth roots into all the bodily and mental factors of our being. Like the hair-roots of a plant, these will be fine, but firm and widespread--to such an extent, in fact, that the notions of "I" and "mine" will hardly be shaken by mere intellectual convictions about the non-existence of self (//anatta//).

These grave consequences issue from that fundamental perceptual situation: our rush into hasty or habitual reactions after receiving the first few signals from our perceptions. But if we muster the restraining forces of mindfulness and pause for bare attention, the material and mental processes that form the objects of mind at the given moment will reveal themselves to us more fully and more truly. No longer dragged at once into the whirlpool of self-reference, allowed to unfold themselves before the watchful eye of mindfulness, they will disclose the diversity of their aspects and the wide net of their correlations and interconnections. The connection with self-interest, so narrow and often falsifying, will recede into the background, dwarfed by the wider view now gained. The processes observed display in their serial occurrence and in their component parts a constant birth and death, a rise and a fall. Thereby the facts of change and impermanence impress themselves on the mind with growing intensity. The same discernment of rise and fall dissolves the false conceptions of unity created under the influence of the egocentric attitude. Self-reference uncritically overrides diversity; it lumps things together under the preconceptions of //being// a self or //belonging to a self//. But bare attention reveals these sham unities as impersonal and conditioned phenomena. Facing thus again and again the evanescent, dependent and impersonal nature of life-processes with and without, we will discover their monotony and unsatisfactory nature: in other words, the truth of suffering.
Thus, by the simple device of slowing down, pausing and keeping still for bare attention, all three of the characteristics of existence--impermanence, suffering, and non-self--will open themselves to penetrative insight (//vipassana//).

Spontaneity
~~~~~~~~~~~

An acquired or strengthened habit of pausing mindfully before acting does not exclude a wholesome spontaneity of response. On the contrary, through training, the practice of pausing, stopping, and keeping still for bare attention will itself become quite spontaneous. It will grow into a selective mechanism of the mind that, with an increasing reliability and swiftness of response, can prevent the upsurge of evil or unwise impulses. Without such a skill we may intellectually realise those impulses to be unwholesome, but still succumb to them due to their own powerful spontaneity. The practice of pausing mindfully serves, therefore, to replace unwholesome spontaneity or habits by wholesome ones grounded in our better knowledge and nobler intentions.

Just as certain reflex movements automatically protect the body, similarly the mind needs spontaneous spiritual and moral self-protection. The practice of bare attention will provide this vital function. A person of average moral standards instinctively shrinks from thoughts of theft or murder. With the help of the method of bare attention, the range of such spontaneous moral brakes can be vastly extended and ethical sensitivity greatly heightened.

In an untrained mind, noble tendencies and right thoughts are often assailed by the sudden outbreak of passions and prejudices. They either succumb or assert themselves only with difficulty after an inner struggle. But if the spontaneity of the unwholesome is checked or greatly reduced, as described above, our good impulses and wise reflections will have greater scope to emerge and express themselves freely and spontaneously. Their natural flow will give us greater confidence in the power of the good within us; it will also carry more conviction for others. That spontaneity of the good will not be erratic, for it will have deep and firm roots in previous methodical training. Here appears a way by which a premeditated good thought (//sasankharika-kusala//) may be transformed into a spontaneous good thought (//asankharika-kusalacitta//). According to the psychology of the Abhidhamma, such a thought, if combined with knowledge, takes the first place in the scale of ethical values. In this way we shall achieve a practical understanding of a saying in //The Secret of the Golden Flower//:[7] "If one attains intentionally to an unintentional state one has comprehension." This saying invites a paraphrase in Pali terms: //Sasankharena asankharijam pattabbam//, "by premeditated intentional effort spontaneity can be won."
~~~~~~~~~~~

If the numerous aids to mental growth and liberation found in the Buddha's teaching are wisely utilized, there is actually nothing that can finally withstand the Satipatthana method; and this method starts with the simple practice of learning to pause and stop for bare attention.

Slowing-down

Against the impetuosity, rashness and heedlessness of the untrained mind, the practice of pausing and stopping sets up a deliberate slowing-down. The demands of modern life, however, make it impracticable to introduce such a slow-down of function into the routine of the average working day. But as an antidote against the harmful consequences of the hectic speed of modern life, it is all the more important to cultivate that practice in one's leisure hours, especially in periods of strict Satipatthana practice. Such practice will also bestow the worldly benefits of greater calm, efficiency and skill in one's daily round of work.

For the purpose of meditative development, slowing-down serves as an effective training in heedfulness, sense-control, and concentration. But apart from that, it has a more specific significance for meditative practice. In the commentary to the Satipatthana Sutta, it is said that the slowing down of movements may help in //regaining lost concentration// on a chosen object. A monk, so we read, had bent his arm quickly without remembering his subject of meditation as his rule of practice demanded. On becoming aware of that omission he took his arm back to its previous position and repeated the movement mindfully. The subject of meditation referred to was probably "clearly comprehending action," as mentioned in the Satipatthana Sutta: "In bending and stretching he acts with clear comprehension."

The slowing-down of certain bodily movements during strict meditative training is particularly helpful in gaining //insight-knowledge (//vipassana-nana//), especially the direct awareness of change and non-self. To a great extent, it is the rapidity of movement that strengthens the illusions of unity, identity, and substantiality in what is actually a complex evanescent process. Therefore, in the strict practice of Satipatthana, the slowing down of such actions as walking, bending and stretching, so as to discern the several phases of each movement, provides a powerful aid for direct insight into the three characteristics of all phenomena. The meditator's contemplation will gain increasing force and significance if he notices clearly how each partial phase of the process observed arises and ceases by itself, and nothing of it goes over or "transmigrates" to the next phase.

Under the influence of pausing for bare attention, the average rhythm of our everyday actions, speech and thoughts will also become more quiet and peaceful. Slowing down the hurried rhythm of life means that thoughts, feelings, and perceptions will be able to complete the entire length of their natural lifetime. Full awareness will extend up to their end phase: to their last vibrations and reverberations. Too often that end phase is cut off by an impatient grasping at new impressions, or by hurrying on to the next stage of a line of thought before the earlier one has been clearly comprehended. This is one of the main reasons for the disorderly state of the average mind, which is burdened by a vast amount of indistinct or fragmentary perceptions, stunted emotions and undigested ideas. Slowing-down will prove an effective device for recovering the fullness and clarity of consciousness. A fitting simile, and at the same time an actual example, is the procedure called for in the practice of mindfulness of breathing (//anapanasati//): mindfulness has to cover the whole extent of the breath, its beginning, middle and end. This is what is meant by the passage in the sutta, "Experiencing the //whole// (breath-) body, I shall breathe in and out." Similarly, the entire "breath" or rhythm of our life will become deeper and fuller if, through slowing-down, we get used to sustained attention.

The habit of prematurely cutting off processes of thought, or slurring over them, has assumed serious proportions in the man of modern urban civilization. Restlessly he clamors for ever new stimuli in increasingly quicker succession just as he demands increasing speed in his means of locomotion. This rapid bombardment of impressions has gradually blunted his sensitivity, and thus he always needs new stimuli, louder, coarser, and more variegated. Such a process, if not checked, can end only in disaster. Already we see at large a decline of finer aesthetic susceptibility and a growing incapacity for genuine natural joy. The place of both is taken by a hectic, short-breathed excitement incapable of giving any true aesthetic or emotional satisfaction. "Shallow mental breath" is to a great extent responsible for the growing superficiality of "civilized man" and for the frightening spread of nervous disorders in the West. It may well become the start of a general deterioration of human consciousness in its qualitative level, range and strength. This danger threatens all those, in the East as well as in the West, who lack adequate spiritual protection from the impact of technical civilization. Satipatthana can make an important contribution to remedying this situation, in the way we have briefly indicated here. Thus the method will prove beneficial from the worldly point of view as well.

Here, however, we are chiefly concerned with the psychological aspects of mindfulness and their significance for meditative development. Sustained attention, helped by slowing-down, will affect the quality of consciousness mainly in three ways: (a) in intensifying consciousness; (b) in clarifying the object's characteristic features; and (c) in revealing the object's relatedness.

(a) An object of sustained attention will exert a particularly //strong// and //long-lasting// impact on the mind. Its influence will be felt not only throughout the thought-series immediately following the particular perception, but may also extend far into the future. It is that causal efficacy which is the measure of the //intensity of consciousness//.

(b) sustained attention leads to a //fuller picture// of the object in all its aspects. Generally, the first impression we gain of any new sense-object or idea will be its most striking feature; it is this aspect of the object which captures our attention up to the culminating point of the impact. But the object also displays other aspects or characteristics, and is capable of exercising other functions, than those we initially notice. These may be less obvious to us or subjectively less interesting; but still, they may be even more important. There will also be cases where our first impression is entirely deceptive. Only if we sustain our attention beyond that first impact will the object reveal itself more fully. In the downward course of the first perceptual wave the prejudicing force of the first impact lessens; and it is only then, in that end phase, that the object will yield a wider range of detail, a more complete picture of itself. It is therefore only by sustained attention that we can obtain a //clearer understanding of an object's characteristic features//.

(c) Among the characteristic features of any object, physical or mental, there is one class we often overlook due to hasty or superficial attention, and therefore needs to be treated separately. This is the //relatedness// of the object. The object's relatedness extends back to its past--to its origin, causes, reasons, and logical precedents; it also extends outward to embrace the total context--its background, environment, and presently active influences. We can never fully understand things if we view them in artificial isolation. We have to see them as part of a wider pattern, in their conditioned and conditioning nature; and this can be done only with the help of sustained attention.

Subliminal Influences
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

The three ways of heightening consciousness just discussed are evidently of prime importance for the development of insight. When consciousness is intensified, and its objective field clarified and discerned in its relational structure, the ground is prepared for "seeing things according to reality." But besides its obvious direct influence, this threefold process also has an indirect influence which is no less powerful and important: it strengthens and sharpens the mind's subliminal faculties of subconscious organization, memory and intuition. These again, on their part, nourish and consolidate the progress of liberating insight. The insight aided by them is like the mountain lake of the canonical simile: it is fed not only by the outside rains, but also by springs welling up from within its own depths. The insight nourished by these "underground subliminal resources of the mind" will have deep roots. The meditative results that it brings cannot be lost easily, even with unliberated worldlings who are still subject to relapse.

1. Perceptions or thoughts which have been objects of sustained attention make a stronger impact on the mind and reveal their characteristic features more distinctly than when attention is slack. Thus, when they sink into the subconscious, they occupy there a special position. This holds true for all three ways of enhancing the consciousness of an object. (a) In a process of consciousness, if attention is as strong in the end phase as in the earlier phases, then when the process is finished and the mind lapses back into subconsciousness, the latter will be more amenable to conscious control. (b) If an impression or idea has been marked by numerous distinct characteristics, then when it fades from immediate awareness, it will not be so easily lost in the vague contents of the subconscious or dragged by passionate biases into false subconscious associations. (c) The correct comprehension of the object's relatedness similarly will protect the experience from being merged with indistinct subconscious material. Perceptions or thoughts of enhanced intensity and clarity, absorbed into the subconscious, remain more articulate and more accessible than contents originating from hazy or "stunned" impressions. It will be easier to convert them into full consciousness and they will be less accountable in their hidden effects upon the mind. If, through an improvement in the quality and range of mindfulness, the number of such matured impressions increases, the results might be a subtle change in the very structure of subconsciousness itself.

2. It will be evident from our earlier remarks that those impressions which we have called "matured" or "more accessible and convertible," lend themselves more easily and more correctly to recollection--more easily because of their greater intensity, more correctly because their clearly marked features protect them from being distorted by false associative images or ideas. Remembering them in their context and relatedness works both ways--it promotes both easier and more correct recollection. Thus //sati// in its meaning and function of mindfulness helps to strengthen //sati// in its meaning and function of //memory//.

3. The influence of sustained attention on the subconscious and on memory brings a deepening and strengthening of the faculty of intuition, particularly the intuitive insight which chiefly concerns us here. Intuition is not a gift from the unknown. Like any other mental faculty, it arises out of specific conditions. In this case the primary conditions are latent memories of perceptions and thoughts stored in the subconscious. Obviously, the memories providing the most fertile soil for the growth of intuition will be those marked by greater intensity, clarity, and wealth of distinctive marks; for it is these that are most accessible. Here, too, the preserved relatedness of the impressions will contribute much. Recollections of that type will have a more organic character than memories of bare or vague isolated facts, and they will fall more easily into new patterns of meaning and significance. These more articulate memory images will be a strong stimulation and aid for the intuitive faculty. Silently, in the hidden depths of the subliminal mind, the work of collecting and organizing the subconscious material of experience and knowledge goes on until it is ripe to emerge as an //intuition//. The break-through of that intuition is sometimes occasioned by quite ordinary happenings. However, though seemingly ordinary, these events may have a strong evocative power if previously they had been made objects of sustained attention. Slowing-down and pausing for bare attention will uncover the depth dimension of the simple things of everyday life, and thus provide stimuli for the intuitive faculty. This applies also to the intuitive penetration of the Four Noble Truths that culminates in liberation (//arahatta//). The scriptures record many instances of monks who could not arrive at intuitive penetration when engaged in the actual practice of insight meditation. The flash of intuition struck them on quite different occasions: when stumbling against a rock or catching sight of a forest fire, a mirage, or a lump of froth in a river. We meet here another confirmation of that seemingly paradoxical saying that "intentionally an unintentional state may be won." By deliberately turning the full light of mindfulness on the smallest events and actions of everyday life, eventually the liberating wisdom may arise.

Sustained attention not only provides the nourishing soil for the //growth// of intuition, it also makes possible the fuller utilization and even repetition of the intuitive moment. Men of inspiration in various fields of creative activity have often deplored their common experience; the flash of intuition strikes so suddenly and vanishes so quickly that frequently the slow response of the mind hardly catches the last glimpse of it. But if the mind has been trained in observant pausing, in slowing-down and sustained attention, and if--as indicated above--the subconscious has been influenced, then the intuitive moment too might gain that fuller, slower, and stronger rhythm. This being the case, its impact will be strong and clear enough to allow for full use of that flash of intuitive insight. It might even be possible to lead its fading vibrations upward again to a new culmination, similar to the rhythmic repetition of a melody rising again in harmonious development out of the last notes of its first appearance.

The full utilization of a single moment of intuitive insight could be of decisive importance for one's progress toward full realization. If one's mental grip is too weak and one lets those elusive moments of intuitive insight slip away without having utilized them fully for the work of liberation, then they might not recur until many years have passed, or perhaps not at all during the present life. Skill in sustained attention, however, will allow one to make full use of such opportunities, and slowing-down and pausing during meditative practice is an important aid in acquiring that skill.

Through our treatment of pausing, stopping and slowing-down, one of the traditional definitions of mindfulness found in the Pali scriptures will have become more intelligible in its far-reaching implications: that is, its function of //anapilapanata//, meaning literally, "not floating (or slipping) away." "Like pumpkin-pots on the surface of water," add the commentators, and they continue: "Mindfulness enters deeply into its object, instead of hurrying only over its surface." Therefore, "non-superficiality" will be an appropriate rendering of the above Pali term, and a fitting characterization of mindfulness.

* * *

4. DIRECTNESS OF VISION

//I wish I could disaccustom myself from everything, so that I might see anew, hear anew, feel anew, Habit spoils our philosophy//.
G.C. Lichtenberg (1742-1799)

In an earlier section we spoke about the impulsive spontaneity of the unwholesome. We have seen how stopping for bare and sustained attention is able to counter, or reduce, our rash impulsive reactions, thus allowing us to face any situation with a fresh mind, with a //directness of vision// unprejudiced by those first spontaneous responses.

By //directness of vision// we understand a direct view of reality, without any coloring or distorting lenses, without the intrusion of emotional or habitual prejudices and intellectual biases. It means: coming face to face with the bare facts of actuality, seeing them as vividly and freshly as if we were seeing them for the first time.

The Force of Habit

Those spontaneous reactions which so often stand in the way of direct vision do not derive only from our passionate impulses. Very frequently they are the product of //habit//. In that form, they generally have an even stronger and more tenacious hold on us--a hold which may work out either for our good or for our harm. The influence habit exercises for the //good// is seen in the "power of repeated practice." This power protects our achievements and skills--whether manual or mental, worldly or spiritual--against loss or forgetfulness, and converts them from casual, short-lived, imperfect acquisitions into the more secure possession of a quality thoroughly mastered. The //detrimental// effect of habitual spontaneous reactions is manifest in what is called in a derogative sense the "force of habit": its deadening, stultifying and narrowing influence productive of compulsive behavior of various kinds. In our present context we shall be concerned only with that negative aspect of habit as impeding and obscuring the directness of vision.

As remarked earlier, habitual reactions generally have a stronger influence upon our behavior than impulsive ones. Our passionate impulses may disappear as suddenly as they have arisen. Though their consequences may be very grave and extend far into the future, their influence is in no way as long lasting and deep reaching as that of habit. Habit spreads its vast and closely meshed net over wide areas of our life and thought, trying to drag in more and more. Our passionate impulses, too, might be caught in that net and thus be transformed from passing outbursts into lasting traits of character. A momentary impulse, an occasional indulgence, a passing whim may by repetition become a habit we find difficult to uproot, a desire hard to control, and finally an automatic function we no longer question. Repeated gratification turns a desire into a habit, and habit left unchecked grows into compulsion.

It sometimes happens that, at an early time, we regard a particular activity or mental attitude as without any special personal importance. The activity or attitude may be morally indifferent and inconsequential. At the start we might find it easy to abandon it or even to exchange it for its opposite, since neither our emotions nor reason bias us towards either alternative. But by repetition, we come to regard the chosen course of action or thought as "pleasant, desirable, and correct," even as "righteous"; and thus we finally identify it with our character or personality. Consequently, we feel any break in this routine to be unpleasant or wrong. Any outside interference with it we greatly resent, even regarding such interference as a threat to our "vital interests and principles." In fact at all times primitive minds, whether "civilized" or not, have looked at a stranger with his "strange customs" as an enemy, and have felt his mere unagressive presence as a challenge or threat.

At the beginning, when no great importance was ascribed to the specific habit, the attachment that gradually formed was directed not so much to the action proper as to the pleasure we derive from the undisturbed routine. The strength of that attachment to routine derives partly from the force of physical and mental inertia, so powerful a motive in man. We shall presently refer to another cause for attachment to routine. By force of habit, the particular concern--whether a material object, an activity, or a way of thinking--comes to be invested with such an increase of emotional emphasis, that the attachment to quite unimportant or banal things may become as tenacious as that to our more fundamental needs. Thus the lack of conscious control can turn even the smallest habits into the uncontested masters of our lives. It bestows upon them the dangerous power to limit and rigidify our character and to narrow our freedom of movement--environmental, intellectual and spiritual. Through our subservience to habit, we forge new fetters for ourselves and make ourselves vulnerable to new attachments, aversions, prejudices and predilections; that is, to new suffering. The danger for spiritual development posed by the dominating influence of habit is perhaps more serious today than ever before; for the expansion of habit is particularly noticeable in our present age when specialization and standardization reach into so many varied spheres of life and thought.

Therefore, when considering the Satipatthana Sutta's words on the formation of fetters, we should also think of the important part played by habit:

> "...and what fetter arises dependent on both (i.e. the sense organs and sense objects), that he knows well. In what manner the arising of the unarisen fetter comes to be, that he knows well."

In Buddhist terms, it is preeminently the hindrance of sloth and torpor (//thina-middha nivarana//) which is strengthened by the force of habit, and it is the mental faculties such as agility and pliancy of mind (//kaya// and //citta-lahuta//, etc.)[8] that are weakened.

This tendency of habits to extend their range is anchored in the very nature of consciousness. It stems not only from the aforementioned passive force of inertia, but in many cases from an active will to dominate and conquer. Certain active types of consciousness, possessing a fair degree of intensity, tend to repeat themselves. Each one struggles to gain ascendancy, to become a centre around which other weaker mental and physical states revolve, adapting themselves to and serving that central disposition. This tendency is never quite undisputed, but still it prevails, and even peripheral or subordinate types of consciousness exhibit the same urge for ascendancy. This is a striking parallel to the self-assertion and domineering tendency of an egocentric individual in his contact with society. Among biological analogies, we may mention the tendency toward expansion shown by cancer and other pathological growths; the tendency toward repetition we meet in the freak mutations which loom as a grave danger at the horizon of our atomic age.

Due to that will to dominate inherent in many types of consciousness, a passing whim may grow into a relatively constant trait of character. If still not satisfied with its position, it may break away entirely from the present combination of life forces until finally, in the process of rebirths, it becomes the very centre of a new personality. There are within us countless seeds for new lives, for innumerable potential "beings," all of whom we should vow to liberate from the wheel of samsara, as the Sixth Zen Patriarch expressed it.[9]

Detrimental physical or mental habits may grow strong, not only if fostered deliberately, but also if left unnoticed or unopposed. Much of what has now strong roots in our nature has grown from minute seeds planted in a long-forgotten past (see the Simile of the Creeper, Majjhima 45). This growth of morally bad or otherwise detrimental habits can be effectively checked by gradually developing another habit: that of attending to them mindfully. If we now do deliberately what had become a mechanical performance, and if prior to doing it we pause a while for bare attention and reflection--this will give us a chance to scrutinize the habit and clearly comprehend its purpose and suitability (//satthaka// and //sappaya-sampajanna//). It will allow us to make a fresh assessment of the situation, to see it directly, unobscured by the mental haze that surrounds a habitual activity with the false assurance: "It is right because it was done before." Even if a detrimental habit cannot be broken quickly, the reflective pause will counter its unquestioned spontaneity of occurrence. It will stamp it with the seal of repeated scrutiny and resistance, so that on its recurrence it will be weaker and will prove more amenable to our attempts to change or abolish it.

It need hardly be mentioned that habit, which has been rightly called "the wet-nurse of man," cannot and should not disappear from our life. Let us only remember what a relief it is, particularly in the crowded day and complex life of a city-dweller, to be able to do a great number of things fairly mechanically with, as it were, only "half-powered attention." Habit brings considerable simplification to our life. It would be an unbearable strain if all our little humdrum activities had to be done with deliberate effort and close attention. In fact, many operations of manual labor, much of the //technique// in art, and even standard procedure in complex intellectual work, generally bring better and more even results through skilled routine performance. Yet that evenness of habitual performance will also reach its end point. Unless enlivened by the creation of new interest, it will show symptoms of fatigue and start to decline.

Of course it would be absurd to advocate that all our little habits be abolished, for many are innocuous and even useful. But we should regularly ask ourselves whether we still have control over them, whether we can give them up or alter them at will. We can answer this question for ourselves in two ways: by attending to our habitual actions mindfully for a certain period of time, and second, by actually giving them up temporarily in cases where this will not have any harmful or disturbing effects upon ourselves or others. If we turn on them the light of //direct vision//, looking at them or performing them as if for the first time, these little routine activities, and the habitual sights around us, will assume a new glow of interest and stimulation. This also holds good for our professional occupation and its environment, and for our close human relationships if they should have become stale by habit. The relationship to one's marriage partner, to friends, to colleagues, may thus receive a great rejuvenation. A fresh and direct vision will also reveal that one can relate to people or do things in a different and more beneficial way than one did before by force of habit.

An acquired capacity to give up minor habits will prove its worth in the fight against more dangerous proclivities. It will also come to our aid at times when we are faced with serious changes in our life which forcefully deprive us of fundamental habits. Loosening the hardened soil of our routine behavior and thoughts will have an enlivening effect on our vital energy, our mental vigor, and our power of imagination. But what is most important, into that loosened soil we shall be able to plant the seeds of vigorous spiritual progress.

Associative Thought

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Mental Habituation to standard reactions, to sequences of activity, to judgements of people or things proceeds by way of associative thinking. From the objects, ideas, situations and people that we encounter, we select certain distinctive marks, and associate these marks with our own response to them. If these encounters recur, they are associated first with those marks selected earlier, and then with our original or strongest response. Thus these marks become a signal for releasing a standard reaction, which may consist of a long sequence of connected acts or thoughts familiar through repeated practice or experience. This way of functioning makes it unnecessary for us to apply new effort and painstaking scrutiny to each single step in such a sequence. The result is a great simplification of life, permitting us to release energy for other tasks. In fact, in the evolution of the human mind, associative thinking was a progressive step of decisive importance. It enabled us to learn from experience, and thus led up to the discovery and application of causal laws.

Yet along with these benefits, associative thinking can also bring many grave dangers if it is applied faultily or thoughtlessly and not carefully controlled. Let us draw up a partial list of these danger points:

1. Associative thinking, recurring again and again in similar situations, may easily perpetuate and strengthen faulty or incomplete initial observations, errors of judgement, and emotional prejudices such as love, hate and pride.
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

2. Incomplete observations and restricted viewpoints in judgement, sufficient to deal with one particular situation, may prove quite inadequate and entail grave consequences if mechanically applied to changed circumstances.

3. Due to misdirected associative thinking, a strong instinctive dislike may be felt for things, places or persons which in some way are merely reminiscent of unpleasant experiences, but actually have no connection with them.

These briefly-stated instances show how vital it is for us to scrutinize from time to time the mental grooves of our associative thoughts, and to review the various habits and stereotype reactions deriving from them. In other words, we must step out of our ruts, regain a direct vision of things, and make a fresh appraisal of our habits in the light of that vision.

If we look once again over the list of potential dangers deriving from uncontrolled associative thinking, we shall better understand the Buddha's insistence upon getting to the bedrock of experience. In the profound and terse stanzas called "The Cave," included in the //Sutta Nipata//, the Buddha says that the "full penetration of //sense impression (phassa)// will make one free from greed" and that "by understanding //perception (sanna)//, one will be able to cross the flood of samsara" (stanza 778 f.).[10] By placing mindfulness as a guard at the very first gate through which thoughts enter the mind, we shall be able to control the incomers much more easily, and shut out unwanted intruders. Thus the purity of "luminous consciousness" can be maintained against "adventitious defilements" (Anguttara, 1:51).

The Satipatthana Sutta provides a systematic training for inducing direct, fresh, and undistorted vision. The training covers the entire personality in its physical and mental aspects, and includes the whole world of experience. The methodical application of the several exercises to oneself (//ajjhatta//), to others (//bahiddha//), and alternatingly to both, will help uncover erroneous conceptions due to misdirected associative thinking and misapplied analogies.

The principal types of false associative thinking are covered, in the terminology of the Dhamma, by the four kinds of //misapprehension// or //perverted views (vipallasa)//, which wrongly take (1) what is impermanent for permanent, (2) what is painful, or conducive to pain, for happiness, (3) what has no self and is unsubstantial for a self or an abiding substance, and (4) what is impure for beautiful. These perverted views arise through a false apprehension of the characteristic marks of things. Under the influence of our passions and false theories, we perceive things selectively in a one-sided or erroneous way, and then associate them wrongly with other ideas. By applying bare attention to our perceptions and impressions, gradually we can free them from these misapprehensions, progressing steadily towards the //direct vision// of things as they really are.

The Sense of Urgency

One who has clear and direct vision, stirred to a sense of urgency (//samvega//) by things which are deeply moving, will experience a release of energy and courage enabling him to break through his timid hesitations and his rigid routine of life and thought. If that sense of urgency is kept alive, it will bestow the earnestness and persistence required for the work of liberation.

Thus said the teachers of old:

> "This very world here is our field of action.
> It harbors the unfoldment of the holy path,
> And many things to break complacency,
> Be stirred by things which may well move the heart,
> And being stirred, strive wisely and fight on!"

Our closest surroundings are full of stirring things. If we generally do not perceive them as such, that is because habit has made our vision dull and our heart insensitive. The same thing happens to us even with the Buddha's teaching. When we first encounter the teaching, we receive a powerful intellectual and emotional stimulation; but gradually the impetus tends to lose its original freshness and impelling force. The remedy is to constantly renew it by turning to the fullness of life around us, which illustrates the Four Noble Truths in ever new variations. A direct vision will impart new lifeblood even to the most common experiences of every day, so that their true nature appears through the dim haze of habit and speaks to us with a fresh voice. It may well be just the long accustomed sight of the beggar at the street corner, or a weeping child, or the illness of a friend, which startles us afresh, makes us think, and stirs our sense of urgency in treading resolutely the path that leads to the cessation of suffering.

We know the beautiful account of how Prince Siddhatta first came face to face with old age, illness and death while driving his chariot through the royal city after a long period of isolation in a make-believe world. This ancient story may well be historical fact, for we know that in the lives of many great men common events often gain a symbolic significance and lead to major consequences far beyond their ordinary appearance. Great minds find significance in the seemingly commonplace and invest the fleeting moment with far-reaching efficacy. But, without contesting the inner truth of that old story, we may reasonably believe that the young prince had actually seen before, with his fleshly eyes, old people, sick people, and those who had succumbed to death. However, on all these earlier occasions, he would not have been touched very deeply by these sights--as is the case with most of us most of the time. That earlier lack of sensitivity may have been due to the carefully protected, artificial seclusion of his petty, though princely, happiness, the hereditary routine of his life into which his father had placed him. Only when he broke through the golden cage of easy-going habits could the facts of suffering strike him as forcibly as if he had seen them for the first time. Then only was he stirred by them to a sense of urgency that led him out of the home life and set his feet firmly on the road to enlightenment.

The more //clearly// and //deeply// our minds and hearts respond to the truth of suffering manifest in the very common facts of our existence, the less often shall we need a repetition of the lesson and the shorter will be our migration through samsara. The clarity of perception evoking our response will come from an undeflected directness of vision, bestowed by bare attention (//sati//); and the //depth// of experience will come from wise reflection or clear comprehension (//sampajanna//).

The Road to Insight

Directness of vision is also a chief characteristic of the methodical practice of insight meditation. There it is identified with the direct or experiential knowledge bestowed by meditation, as distinguished from the inferential knowledge obtained by study and reflection. In the meditative development of insight, one's own physical and mental processes are directly viewed, without the interference of abstract concepts or the filtering screens of emotional evaluation. For in this context these only obscure or camouflage the naked facts, detracting from the strong immediate impact of reality. Conceptual generalizations from experience are very useful in their place; but if they interrupt the meditative practice of bare attention, they tend to "shove aside" or dispose of the particular fact, by saying, as it were: "It is nothing else but this." Generalizing thought inclines to become impatient with a recurrent type, and after having it classified, soon finds it boring.

Bare attention, however, being the key instrument of methodological insight, keeps to the particular. It follows keenly the rise and fall of successive physical and mental processes. Though all phenomena of a given series may be true to type (e.g., inhalations and exhalations), bare attention regards each of them as distinct, and conscientiously registers its separate birth and death. If mindfulness remains alert, these repetitions of type will, by their multiplication, exert not a reduced but an intensified impact on the mind. The three characteristics--impermanence, suffering, and voidness of self-inherent in the process observed, will stand out more and more clearly. They will appear in the light shed by the phenomena themselves, not in a //borrowed// light, not even a light borrowed from the Buddha, the peerless and indispensable guide to these experiences.

These physical and mental phenomena, in their "self-luminosity," will then convey a growing sense of urgency to the meditator: revulsion, dissatisfaction, awareness of danger, followed by detachment--though certainly joy, happiness, and calm, too, will not be absent throughout the practice. Then, if all other conditions of inner maturity are fulfilled, the first direct vision of final liberation will dawn with the stream-winner's (//sotapanna//) indubitable knowledge: "Whatever has the nature of arising, has the nature of vanishing."

Thus, in the unfoldment of the power of mindfulness, Satipatthana will prove itself as the true embodiment of the Dhamma, of which it was said:

> "Well-proclaimed is the Dhamma by the Blessed One, > visible here and now, not delayed, inviting inspection, > onward-leading, to be directly experienced by the wise."

* * * * * * * *

NOTES

[1] See Nyanaponika Thera, //The Heart of Buddhist Meditation// (London; Rider & Co., 1962).

[2] Comy. to Sutta Nipata v. 334.

[3] Anagarika B. Govinda, //The Psychological Attitude of Early Buddhist Philosophy (London: Rider & Co., 1961).

[4] //The Way of Mindfulness//, Bhikku Soma (Kandy: Buddhist Publication Society, 1975), p. 83.

[5] See //Path of Purification//, p. 135 f.

[6] //Ibid//, pp. 136 ff. The three rousing factors are investigation, energy and rapture; the three calming ones, tranquility, concentration and equanimity.

[7] A treatise of Chines Taoism, strongly influenced by Mahayana.

[8] About these important qualitative constituents of good, wholesome (//kusala//) consciousness, see the author's //Abhidhamma Studies// (Kandy, Sri Lanka: Buddhist Publication Society, 1965), pp. 51 f.

[9] This may be a somewhat ironical reference by that great sage to the fact that the well-known Mayayanic Bodhisattva vow of liberating all beings of the universe is often taken much too light-heartedly by many of his fellow Mahayanists.

[10] Compare also the passage on the significance of sense impression (or contact) in the concluding section of the Brahmajala Sutta (Digha 1).

* * * * * * * *

For further reading on

SATIPATTHANA MEDITATION

//The Way of Mindfulness//. The Satipatthana Sutta and Commentary. tr. with introduction by Soma Thera. 5th edition (Kandy: Buddhist Publication Society)

//The Foundations of Mindfulness//. (Satipatthana Sutta) tr. with introduction and notes by Nyanasatta Thera. WHEEL No. 19

//The Satipatthana Sutta and its Application to Modern Life//. V.F. Gunaratna. WHEEL No. 60

//"Protection through Satipatthana."// Nyanaponika Thera. BODHI LEAVES No. B 34

//The Progress of Insight// through the Stages of Purification. Mahasi Sayadaw. (Kandy: Buddhist Publication Society)

//Practical Insight Meditation//, Basic and Progressive Stages. Mahasi Sayadaw. (Kandy: Buddhist Publication Society)

//The Heart of Buddhist Meditation//. A Handbook of Mental Training based on the Buddha's Way of Mindfulness. Nyanaponika Thera. (London: Rider & Co.) (Also available in France, Germany, Italy and Spain in their respective languages.)

* * * * * * * *

THE BUDDHIST PUBLICATION SOCIETY

The BPS is an approved charity dedicated to making known the Teaching of the Buddha, which has a vital message for people of all creeds. Founded in 1958, the BPS has published a wide variety of books and booklets covering a great range of topics. Its publications include accurate annotated translations of the Buddha's discourses, standard reference works, as well as original contemporary expositions of Buddhist thought and practice. These works present Buddhism as it truly is -- a dynamic force which has influenced receptive minds for the past 2500 years and is still as relevant today as it was when it first arose. A full list of our publications will be sent upon request with an enclosure of U.S. $1.00 or its equivalent to cover air mail postage.

Write to:

The Hony. Secretary
BUDDHIST PUBLICATION SOCIETY
P.O. Box 61
54, Sangharaja Mawatha
Kandy Sri Lanka

or

The Barre Center for Buddhist Studies Lockwood Road
Barre, MA 01005
Tel: (508) 355-2347

[end of file]

Chapter 1
(Tape 1 / Ps: 1-22)
?

The name of the original book is Visuddhi Magga which means the path to purification or purification or purity. ¡¥Magga¡¦ means the path. ¡¥Visuddhi¡¦ means purification or purity.

This book was written in P??i language. Actually P??i was not the name of the language.
a category of P??i literature which are called ¡¥Texts¡¦. The word ¡¥P??i¡¦ is used in contrad the A??hakath?s (Commentaries) and Tik?s (Sub-Commentaries). The language came to b date. The word ¡¥P??i¡¦ can mean the Texts and also the language in which the texts are re are comprised of Vinaya, Sutta and Abhidhamma. They are called ¡¥P??i¡¦. The Commenta ¡¥A??hakath?s¡¦ and the Sub-Commentaries are called ¡¥Tik?s¡¦.

This book belongs to the category of Commentaries, one of the categories in P??i literatur were Texts. Then there were Commentaries. Later there were commentaries on the comme ¡¥Sub-Commentaries¡¦.

The author of this book was the Venerable Buddhaghosa. The name given is Bhadant?ca Actually his personal name was Buddhaghosa. The word in front is Bhadant?cariya. ¡¥Bhad and ¡¥?cariya¡¦ means teacher. So the meaning of the name is the venerable teacher Budd was his personal name. ¡¥Buddha¡¦ means the Buddha and ¡¥Ghosa¡¦ means voice. So ¡¥B voice of the Buddha.

He wrote or edited many Commentaries. The Visuddhi Magga is not the only Commentary this book was written first and then the other Commentaries followed later. We do not know published one after the other or more or less at the same time. The other Commentaries alw Visuddhi Magga when they have something to say in detail. So we can assume that this boo and then the other Commentaries came later.

Although this book is called a ¡¥Commentary¡¦, it is not a Commentary on a particular Sutt particular collection of Suttas, or a particular Pi?aka. It is called a ¡¥common Commentary o That means it quotes copiously from the Texts and then it explains these Texts in great deta Commentary of any particular Sutta, or collection of Suttas, or Pi?aka. It is a common Comm Texts.

The author of this book was Venerable Buddhaghosa. He lived in the fifth century AD. He removed from the Buddha.

The Commentaries he wrote were not his own creation. They were not originally his work Commentaries existed during the time of the Buddha. These Commentaries were carried do generation by word of mouth. Later they were written down and taken to Sri Lanka. Some w Sinhalese. Later in the fifth century the Venerable Buddhaghosa, who was a native of India, and worked with the monks at the great monastery in Anur?dhapura which was a stronghold

He got permission to write these Commentaries and so he wrote them for the Sa~gha ther as authentic exigical literature of the Texts or P??i.

There is a Commentary to this Commentary. We call it a ¡¥Sub-Commentary¡¦. Its name is It is mentioned in the introduction of this book. That Sub-Commentary was written by a teach called Venerable Dhammap?la. I am not sure to what age he belonged, maybe the seventh

The purpose in writing this book, as the name implies, was to show people the way to pu purification. ¡¥The way to purification¡¦ means purification of mind from mental impurities or in fact it is a book on meditation. It is a handbook of meditation written by a monk for monks.

When he wrote this book, he assumed that the readers had a knowledge of Abhidhamma. some places to understand this book without a knowledge of Abhidhamma.

The purpose in writing this book was just to help those who wanted to practice meditation. types of meditation are explained in this book. In some cases they are given in meticulous d

When he wrote this book, he followed the structure hinted at by the Buddha in one of the S picked one stanza from the Sutta Pi?aka in the Sa?yutta Nik?ya. That stanza is given at the book. Following that stanza and following let us say the Buddha¡¦s blueprint for spiritual deve structured this book.

There are three stages in Buddha¡¦s plan for spiritual development. The first is s?la. The s sam?dhi. The third is pa???. The first is called ¡¥virtue¡¦, following this translation. The seco concentration. The third is understanding. S?la or virtue is the foundation on which sam?dhi and pa??? (wisdom) are built. Without s?la there can be no concentration. And without conc be no pa??? or penetration into the nature of things. These three stages of development are one after the other. The author, the Venerable Buddhaghosa, followed this structure.

S?la or virtue is described in the first two chapters. The first chapter deals with s?la. The se deals with what we call ¡¥ascetic practices¡¦. Ascetic practices are for the further purification virtue.

From chapter three through chapter thirteen sam?dhi or concentration is explained. In thes forty subjects of tranquillity meditation are explained in detail. The last two chapters in this p benefits of tranquillity or serenity meditation.

From chapter fourteen through chapter 23 pa??? or wisdom is described. There are 23 ch
In chapters 14-17 a theoretical knowledge of the aggregates, bases, faculties, roots and so The description of vipassan? meditation begins with chapter 18 going through chapter 22. T explains the benefits of mental culture or vipassan?.

There are two editions of this book in P??i written in Roman script. One was published by Society of London. The other was published by Harvard University. The edition of PTS was is older than all of us here. The Harvard edition was published in 1950.

There are two English translations. The first was done by a Burmese layman named Pe M the editor of the first Commentary of the Abhidhamma, the A??has?lin?. In English it is calle Expositor¡¦. Pe Maung Tin¡¦s translation came first. It was published in 1923. The second tra ¡¥The Path of Purification¡¦ was done by Venerable N??amoli. He was an English man who war. He lived all his years as a monk in Sri Lanka. When he was doing this translation, I was When it came out in 1956, I was there. So there are two English translations. Many people t better translation, but I don¡¦t know. We will have to see.

We are going to cover only three chapters in eight weeks. Maybe we will take up the other year. In this part there are altogether only 120 pages. So we will have to read about 15 page means you will have to read three pages a day. I want you to really read the book before you because I cannot go into detail reading from the beginning to the end. We will not be able to in an hour because I will have to explain some of the difficult points in this book. So we will c chapters in eight weeks.

The first chapter deals with virtue or s?la. Unfortunately it deals only with the s?la of monk was written for monks. So the first chapter deals exclusively with the s?la for monks. The pu s?la is very much emphasized in this chapter.

There is a saying in Burma that if a monk studies Visuddhi Magga, after he has studied it, decide to disrobe or he will go into the forest and practice meditation. This is because s?la h very pure and it is difficult to keep all these precepts pure. So some may become disillusione afraid of being impure and may disrobe. Or if you are a real good monk, then you will keep s go to the forest and practice meditation.

Student: Or study it?

Teacher: Yes. Actually all monks study because if you are interested in meditation you have instructions for meditation are given in detail in this book. Everybody or every monk who wa meditation has to have at least some acquaintance with this book, even though they may no the entire book. Relying on their teachers and reading some portions of the book, they pract
This is the handbook of meditation teachers as well as the students of meditation.

The first chapter deals with the virtue of monks. At first the author gives us a stanza from t Nik?ya. Based on this stanza he planned this book. He wrote on the basis of this stanza whi sam?dhi and pa???. ¡§When a wise man, established well in virtue, develops consciousnes then as a bhikkhu ardent and sagacious, he succeeds in disentangling this tangle.¡¨ This is t the beginning of this book.

This stanza was in response to a question asked by a deity. The deity asked the Buddha: and the outer tangle, this generation is entangled in a tangle. So I ask of Gotama this questi in disentangling this tangle?¡¨

The explanation of this stanza was given below. When you read this book, you will at least of how the P??i Commentaries are written. There are word explanations and then some com see words in italics, these are the words that appear in the original P??i Text.

¡§Tangle is a term for the network of craving.¡¨ Actually craving is compared to a tangle he have craving, we are entangled in different things.

The deity asked how this tangle could be disentangled. The Buddha¡¦s answer was that fir well established in virtue, in moral conduct, in sila. Then you develop consciousness. Here ¡ really means sam?dhi. Sam?dhi is described as consciousness here. Then you develop und ¡§Then as a bhikkhu ardent and sagacious, he succeeds in disentangling this tangle.¡¨ Tha develop sam?dhi. You practice samatha meditation. Then you develop understanding. That vipassan? meditation. If you practice vipassan? meditation, you will succeed in disentanglin will succeed in destroying this craving. When craving is destroyed, when craving is eradicate no tangle of craving. So Buddha taught this deity to first be well established in virtue. Then h practice meditation or sam?dhi and then he was told to develop pa??? or wisdom.

Vipassan? and pa??? are synonymous. Sam?dhi and here citta (consciousness) are syno samatha are synonymous. Then the author describes how he is going to write this book.

¡§Herein, purification should be understood as Nibb?na.¡¦ ¡¥Purification¡¦ really means Nib purification should be understood as Nibb?na, which being devoid of all stains is utterly pure Purification is the path to that purification; it is the means of approach that is called the ¡¥pat

There may be some places where I would like to make corrections or suggest a better tran paragraph 5 - ¡§The Path of Purification is the path to that purification; it is the means of app think we should say ¡¥the means of attainment that is called the path¡¦. The P??i word ¡¥adh the sense of attainment, reaching. It is better to say ¡¥the means of attainment that is called

¡§The meaning is , I shall expound the path of purification. That path of purification is taug by insight alone (that is by vipassan? alone) according as it is said.¡¨ Always the ancient aut conscious that whatever they said must have proof of authenticity. So Venerable Buddhagh statements in the Texts or the P??i books. Here the author takes a statement from the Sutta authenticity.

¡§Formations are all impermanent; when one sees this with understanding and turns away that is the path to purity.¡¨ Vipassan? is meant. Sometimes the path of purification is taught b vipassan? only.

¡§And in some instances by jh?na and understanding according as it is said:¡¨ - here jhana tranquillity meditation. ¡¥Understanding¡¦ means vipassan? meditation. Sometimes the path and vipassan? meditation.

¡§He is near unto Nibb?na in whom are jh?na and understanding¡¨. This is a quote from th again here ¡¥jh?na¡¦ means samatha meditation. This will be described in great detail in the

¡§And in some instances by deeds (kamma) etc. according as it is said: ¡¥by deeds, vision righteousness, by virtue the most sublime life by these are mortals purified, and not by linea wealth¡¦.¡¨ In this stanza kamma, vision, righteousness, virtue and life sublime are described purification. When the Buddha taught, he taught in various ways depending upon the capabi listeners.

¡§And in some instances by virtue etc., according as it is said: ¡¥he who is possessed of c who has understanding, and is concentrated, who is strenuous (he who is energetic or he w and diligent as well will cross the flood so difficult to cross¡¦.¡¨

¡§And in some instances by the foundations of mindfulness (sometimes the path is describ foundations of mindfulness) etc., according as it is said: ¡¥Bhikkhus, this path is the only way purification of beings¡¦.¡¨

¡§Similarly in the case of right effort and so on¡¨ - sometimes by way of right effort and son of faculties and others this path is described.

¡§But in the answer to this question it is taught by virtue and the other two.¡¨ Here in this st stanza mentioned at the beginning of the book, the path is described or taught by virtue, con wisdom.

Then the detailed explanation of the stanza is given in paragraph 7 - ¡§established well in wise, develops consciousness and understanding¡¨ and so on. Now let us see the explanatio ¡¥wise¡¦. ¡§Wise: possessing the kind of understanding that is born of kamma by means of a with triple root-cause.¡¨ You are familiar with the roots, lobha, dosa, moha and their opposite adosa, and amoha. A relinking consciousness may be accompanied by two roots (alobha an roots (alobha, adosa and amoha). When it is accompanied by three roots, a person is called person¡¦. Only these three root persons can become enlightened in that particular life. If our consciousness is only accompanied by two roots, non-attachment and non-hatred, we canno enlightenment in this life. A ¡¥wise man¡¦ means a person that is born with three roots. The r consciousness has all three roots. Understanding or wisdom (amoha) is included in his relin Student: Lobha is hatred?
Teacher: Lobha is attachment. Dosa is hatred. Moha is delusion or ignorance. The opposite alobha, adosa and amoha. Only two or three of these last three roots accompany the relinki

If you remember the diagram of death and relinking thought process, you will remember th consciousness, Pa?isandhi. That consciousness is accompanied by some mental factors. A factors there may be all three good roots or there may be two roots. If a person is reborn wit consciousness accompanied by three roots, he is said to be ¡¥wise¡¦ here.

¡§Develops consciousness and understanding: develops both concentration and insight.¡¨ practices both samatha and vipassan? meditation.

¡§Sagacious: it is understanding that is called ¡¥sagacity¡¦; possessing that is the meaning shows protective understanding.¡¨ Actually here ¡¥understanding¡¦ means some kind of clea Clear comprehension of what is beneficial and clear comprehension of what is suitable is ca ¡¥understanding¡¦ here. Rather than saying ¡¥protective understanding¡¦ we should say ¡¥un in keeping meditation¡¦. That means when you practice meditation, you have to know what is is not and what is suitable and what is not. You have to keep this wisdom or understanding when you practice meditation. That is what is meant here.

¡§He sees fear (bhaya? ikkhati) in the round of rebirths, thus he is a bhikkhu.¡¨ The word ¡¥ translated as monk. Most of the Buddha¡¦s suttas are taught to monks. So you find the Budd very often. In one of the Suttas, the Sutta on the foundations of mindfulness, the Commenta anybody who practices meditation and who sees danger in existence can be called a ¡¥bhik Bhikkhu is derived from ¡¥bhi¡¦ and ¡¥ikkhu¡¦. ¡¥Bhi¡¦ here means fear or danger. ¡¥Ikkhu¡¦ m the meaning is one who sees danger in existence can be called a ¡¥bhikkhu¡¦. In this case n monks is meant, but anyone who sees danger in existence or in becoming can be called a ¡¥ person will be able to cut this tangle and become an Arahant.

By this stanza the Buddha shows many things - the three trainings, dispensation that is go and so on. They are all explained later.

The dispensation of the Buddha is said to be good in the beginning, good in the middle an Why is it good in the beginning? ¡§Because of the passage which says what is the beginning things?¡¨ ¡¥Profitable things¡¦ here means wholesome (kusala). Different authors have differ for the P??i word ¡¥kusala¡¦. I prefer the word ¡¥wholesome¡¦. The author here preferred pro ¡¥Profitable things¡¦ means wholesome things.

¡§The not doing of any evil, virtue is the beginning of the dispensation.¡¨ So s?la is the beg Buddha¡¦s dispensation or Buddha¡¦s religion.

¡§And that is good because it brings about special qualities of non-remorse and so on.¡¨ S to feelings of non-remorse because when one¡¦s moral conduct is pure, one does not suffer or remorse. The benefit of pure s?la, pure virtue is non-remorse.

What is meant by ¡¥and so on¡¦? One leads to another. In paragraph 32 we read about thi for the purpose of restraint, restraint is for the purpose of non-remorse.¡¨ When we have res have regrets; we are free from regrets.

¡§Non-remorse is for the purpose of gladdening.¡¨ When there is non-remorse, we are gla for the purpose of happiness.¡¨ Gladdening is a weaker form of happiness and happiness is happiness.

This happiness leads to tranquillity. Only when there is happiness, both happiness of the m (¡¥Happiness¡¦ also means comfort.) and comfort of the body, does tranquillity arise.

¡§Tranquillity is for the purpose of bliss (sukha).¡¨ ¡¥Sukha¡¦ is translated as bliss here. Tra is passadhi. You will come across these words in the 52 cetasikas - tranquillity of mental bo tranquillity of citta.

¡§Tranquillity is for the purpose of bliss and bliss is for the purpose of concentration; conce for the purpose of correct knowledge and vision.¡¨ For the purpose of concentration we need here means comfort or peacefulness. When there is no peacefulness, we cannot get concen ultimately, step by step, to liberation from all suffering, to the extinction of all suffering and to extinction of all mental defilements.

Concentration is the middle of Buddha¡¦s dispensation. ¡§Because of the passage beginni the profitable¡¦ - here also the usual translation is cultivating what is wholesome, what is goo remember a stanza that I talked about in the first or second Abhidhamma lecture? There is a the Dhammapada which describes in a very brief way the teachings of the Buddhas. It says: cultivate good and to purify one¡¦s mind - this is the teachings of the Buddhas.¡¨ The author that stanza.

¡§Entering upon the profitable¡¨ means cultivating what is wholesome. It is the middle of th because it means concentration.

¡§That is good because it brings about special qualities of supernormal powers and so on. concentration, you can get jh?nas and also supernormal powers.

¡§Its goodness is the end is shown by understanding.¡¨ Understanding, knowledge or wisd stage. ¡§Because of the passage ¡¥The purifying of one¡¦s own mind - this is the buddha¡¦s because understanding is its culmination, understanding is the end of the dispensation.¡¨ ¡¥ here means penetration of the Four Noble Truths.

Now paragraph 11 - ¡§Likewise the necessary conditions for the triple clear-vision is show you know the triple clear-vision? S?la is the necessary condition for the triple clear-vision. T clear-vision is the recollection of past lives, the knowledge of the passing away and reappea and the destruction of mental defilements. These three are called the ¡¥triple clear-vision¡¦.

Actually they are supernormal knowledge. They belong to supernormal knowledge.

¡§The necessary condition for the six kinds of direct-knowledge is shown by concentration of direct-knowledge are shown in the footnote. Three of them are the triple clear-vision. The of supernormal power (that means one knows how to perform some miracles), the divine ea (that means reading the minds of others), recollection of past lives, the knowledge of passin reappearance of beings, and the knowledge of the destruction of cankers.

¡§The necessary condition for the categories of discrimination is shown by understanding. difficult to understand this phrase, ¡§the categories of discrimination¡¨. What do you underst Actually it is a kind of understanding. Let us look at the footnote. It is the understanding of m understanding of law (¡¥Law¡¦ means Dhamma.), understanding of language and understan intelligence. These four are called ¡¥discriminative knowledge in the Pa?isambhid?. That me knowledge of these four.

The first one is meaning. Only meaning is given in the footnotes. In fact it is the knowledge something arises out of something. Something arises depending upon some other thing. It is effect. Instead of law we can interpret it to mean cause and also the words of his teaching. L language. Here with Therav?da interpretation it means P??i language.

You know everybody wants their language to be the original language of humanity. Theref brought up in pali tradition like to think that pali is the original language. They like to think tha was the language used by the people who appeared in the world in the beginning. People b Sanskrit tradition say that Sanskrit was the original language of human beings. So here ¡¥la P??i language. ¡¥Intelligence¡¦ just means understanding or wisdom.

So many things are shown by just this one verse. We are not sure that Buddha meant all commentators are very fond of explaining in many ways a single teaching or single verse of

In paragraph 12 ¡§Likewise the means for surmounting the states of loss is shown by virtu of loss¡¦ means the four states of misery or woe, the four ap?yas (the animal kingdom, hell, another kind of ghost).

¡§The means for surmounting the element of sense desires by concentration...¡¨ - do you k sense desire? What do you understand by that? ¡¥Element of sense desires¡¦ here means th desires, kamavacara loka. The Pali word used is ¡¥dhatu¡¦. Dhatu is normally translated as e the author translated it as element of sense desires, but that doesn¡¦t convey the intended m we have kamadhatu, rupadhatu, and arupadhatu. ¡¥Kamadhatu¡¦ means the realms of sens human world, the six lower celestial worlds and the four states of woe. So here I think we sh world of sense desire. That makes more sense.
Student: Venerable U S?l?nanda for some of the people who do not have books I would like and the answer again. The question that the Commentary is answering is: ¡§The inner tangl tangle, this generation is entangled in a tangle. And so I ask of Gotama this question: who s disentangling this tangle?¡¨ The answer was: ¡§When a wise man, established well in virtue, consciousness and understanding, then as a bhikkhu ardent and sagacious, he succeeds in tangle.¡¨ Teacher: Next time I think it will be better when you have read the passages. Today it is som are not familiar with. You may be lost in some places.

This is just the introductory talk before the author really explains what virtue is, what the m s?la is and so on. He proceeds in this manner. First he puts questions. Then he gives answe questions one by one.

The first question that he asks is what is virtue, what is s?la? The answer is: ¡§It is a stage with volition present in one who abstains from killing living beings etc.¡¨ When we abstain fro living beings, abstain from stealing and so on, consciousness arises in our minds. What kind arises? Wholesome or unwholesome? Wholesome. Together with that wholesome consciou mental factors arise. Among these mental factors there is one that is called ¡¥volition¡¦, ¡¥cet question is: what is virtue? The answer is: cetan? is virtue. When we say ¡¥virtue¡¦, we mean which accompanies the type of consciousness which arises in our minds when we abstain fr and so on.

¡§For it is said in the Pa?isambhid?¡¨ - that is the name of a book. In our countries it is incl Texts. Actually they are something like an appendix to the Tipi?ika. The Pa?isambhid? was Buddha. It was taught by the Venerable S?riputta. The commentator, the Venerable Buddha for this book, the Pa?isambhid?. He quotes from this book very often throughout the Visuddh

¡§For this is said in the Pa?isambhid?: ¡¥What is virtue? There is virtue as volition, virtue a consciousness-concomitant, virtue as restraint, virtue as non-transgression.¡¨ So in that boo volition is virtue, mental factors are virtue, restraint is virtue, and non-transgression is virtue.
can mean any of these things.

¡¥Consciousness-concomitant¡¦ means what according to our understanding? Cetasikas. S called ¡¥virtue¡¦. We have abstinences among the 52 cetasikas. Do you remember that? The right action and right livelihood. They are called ¡¥restraint¡¦ here. There may be others too.
Non-transgression is also called ¡¥virtue¡¦. You know volition. Volition arises with consciousn abstain from something.

¡§Virtue as consciousness-concomitant is the abstinence in one who abstains from killing so on.¡¨ Here ¡¥consciousness-concomitant¡¦ means the three abstinences. The three abstin ¡¥virtue¡¦. Sometimes cetan? is called ¡¥virtue¡¦ and sometimes the three abstinences are ca

¡§Furthermore, virtue as volition is the seven volitions (that accompany the first seven) of t courses of action (kamma) in one who abandons the killing of living beings and so on.¡¨ The ¡¥ten courses of action¡¦. That means abstaining from killing, abstaining from stealing, absta sexual misconduct, abstaining from lying, from backbiting, from harsh speech and from talki are these seven and we will come to the other three later. When the author said ¡¥seven¡¦, h There are three kinds of misconduct by body and four kinds of misconduct by speech. So th

¡§Virtue as consciousness-concomitant is the three remaining states consisting of non-cov non-ill-will and right view.¡¨ These three plus the seven mentioned above are called the ¡¥ter wholesome action (kusala).

¡§Virtue as restraint should be understood here as restraint in five ways.¡¨ There are five k restraint mentioned in the Suttas. The first is restraint by rules of the community. ¡¥Rules of community¡¦ really means the rules for monks. There are 227 rules for monks. When a monk then he has restraint in his bodily actions and in his verbal actions or speech.

There is restraint by mindfulness. Mindfulness is sometimes called ¡¥restraint¡¦. There is re knowledge, restraint by patience and restraint by energy.

¡§Herein restraint by P??imokkha is this: ¡¥He is furnished, fully furnished, with this P??im restraint¡¦. Restraint by mindfulness is this: ¡¥¡¦He guards the eye faculty, enters upon restra faculty¡¦.¡¨ That is when you see something, you try to just see it and not go to liking it or dis If you can just see it and avoid the arising of the unwholesome mental states, you are said to the eye faculty. In fact restraining the eye faculty does not mean closing your eyes or not loo You look at things that you see, but you do not get akusala from seeing them. This is restrai order not to be attached to things that you see or not to be upset by things that you see, you mindfulness. That is why mindfulness is called 'restraint' ¡¦ here.

¡§Restraint by knowledge is this: ¡¥The currents in the world that flow Ajita,¡¦ said the Bles ¡¥are stemmed by means of mindfulness¡¦.¡¨ The ¡¥currents¡¦ here means akusala. The curr stemmed by mindfulness. When there is mindfulness, they cannot arise. They are stopped.

¡§Restraint of currents I proclaim, by understanding they are dammed.¡¨ By understanding subdued or suppressed. So here understanding is called ¡¥restraint¡¦.

¡§And use of requisites is here combined with this.¡¨ That means the use of requisites is al ¡¥restraint¡¦ here. ¡¥Use of requisites¡¦ refers to monks. Monks have to use requisites with re understanding. That means for example whenever I put on this robe I have to say to myself reflect: ¡§I use this robe just to ward off cold, just to ward off heat, to ward off insect bites¡¦ a When we eat something also, we say: ¡§I eat not to take pride in my strength, not to make m but I eat this just to be able to practice buddha¡¦s teachings.¡¨ When we use the Vih?ra (the

we have to reflect that it is used for protection from heat, cold and so on. And when we take reflect that we take medicine just to get rid of disease and so on. Monks have to do this whe use of these four requisites. If there is no understanding or no knowledge, we cannot do it. T of requisites is called ¡¥restraint by knowledge¡¦.

¡§What is called restraint by patience? He is one who bears cold and heat.¡¨ We bear cold with cold. We are patient with heat. We are patient with thirst. We are patient with hunger. T ¡¥restraint by patience¡¦. Actually patience itself is restraint here.

¡§What is called restraint by energy? He does not endure a thought of sense desires wher means you have to make effort or you have to have energy not to endure such thoughts. As arise in your mind, you just stop them. That is called here ¡¥restraint by energy¡¦ because if energy, you cannot do that. You have to make effort to stop as soon as these thoughts arise ¡§Purification of livelihood is here combined with this.¡¨ Purification of livelihood is also me monks. Monks must have a very pure livelihood. Monks must not work to earn money. Monk or read palms in order to get something from people. If we do that, then our livelihood is said In order to have pure livelihood what must we do? We must go out for alms. We must make energy. That is the only purity of livelihood for monks. Monks must not work for money. Mon people to bring food to them. They must go out for alms.

I am in a very different country. We monks cannot go out for alms. So now we have to ask food to the monastery. ¡¥Purification of livelihood¡¦ means you must depend upon yourself. I says that you must rely on your foot muscles. You walk and collect food from house to hous monastery.

¡§So this fivefold restraint, and the abstinence, in clansmen who dread evil, from any chan transgression met with, should all be understood to be ¡¥virtue as restraint¡¦.¡¨

¡§Virtue as non-transgression (that is not breaking the rules) is the non-transgression by b of precepts of virtue that have been undertaken.¡¨ When you take the precepts, you keep the them. The precepts here are of body and of speech. We must understand that sila has to do and with verbal actions, not thoughts. You may think of killing a living being, but as long as kill it, you are not breaking that rule. You may think of telling a lie to another person, but if yo tell a lie, you are not breaking that rule. Therefore s?la is to control the bodily and verbal act person.

Student: We have a precept which is not to harbor ill-will. How does that work?

Teacher: It is included in sam?dhi in Therav?da Buddhism. Sam?dhi is for control of mind, fo thought. Just thinking something bad does not constitute breaking of rules. These rules cont the body and the actions of speech. Although it is not good to have unwholesome thoughts, do with your body or by your speech, you are still keeping these rules. In Therav?da Buddhi bodily and verbal actions. Sam?dhi is for control of mind. Pa??? is for eradication of mental

Although it is not a precept in Therav?da Buddhism, non-ill-will is the same as ¡§do not ha hatred or ill-will¡¦. That is included in the three courses of action of mind - non-covetousness and right view. They are included in kamma of mind. We have three kinds of kamma - bodily and mental kamma.

What is the meaning of the word ¡¥s?la¡¦? It may not be interesting to those who are not in P??i. The word ¡¥s?la¡¦ is explained here as meaning composing or upholding. What is this is either a coordinating, meaning non-inconsistency of bodily actions etc. due to virtuousnes ¡¥Non-inconsistency¡¦ really means non-scattering of one¡¦s actions. That means if we do ba actions are said to be scattered, non-coordinated. I think ¡¥scattered¡¦ is better than ¡¥incons ¡¥Consistence¡¦ means that it must not be different from others or something like that. If you it means that you do this thing always. It can be a bad habit. Here it means that your actions scattered when you have sila.

¡§S?la is an upholding, meaning a state of bliss owing to its serving as a foundation for pro states.¡¨ Only when you have s?la, can you have wholesome mental states. Therefore s?la i upholding. These are the two meanings of s?la.

¡§For those who understand etymology (that means grammarians) admit only these two m however, comment on the meaning here in the way beginning ¡¥ The meaning of virtue (s?la head (siras), the meaning of virtue is the meaning of cool (s?tala).¡¨ That is playing upon the word ¡¥s?la¡¦ is close to the word ¡¥siras¡¦ and is also close to the word ¡¥s?tala¡¦. So they m this way, but it is not accepted by the commentator here.

¡§What are the characteristic, function, manifestation and proximate cause of sila?¡¨ I think familiar with these. Whenever we have to understand something, we have to understand by function, manifestation and proximate cause. Only then do we understand thoroughly.

Especially when you practice meditation, you come to understand things sometimes by wa That means you see things by means of characteristic. Sometimes you see the function. So manifestation and sometimes you see the proximate cause. So with reference to these four things.

Therefore we must understand s?la with reference to these four aspects. What is its chara means what is its individual essence or its nature. The characteristic of s?la is just composin that mentioned earlier. ¡§Just as visibleness is the characteristic of the visible-data base ev analyzed into the various categories of blue, yellow etc., because even when analyzed into t it does not exceed visibleness, so also this composing, described above as the coordinating etc., and as the foundation of profitable states, is the characteristic of virtue even when anal various categories of volition etc., because even when analyzed into these categories, it doe state of coordination and foundation.¡¨ ¡¥Visible-data base¡¦ just means the visible object. Ar material properties there is one thing which can be seen. That is the only thing that can be s It is translated as form or visible object. The characteristic of that visible object just visiblene it can be seen is its characteristic. Although we may say that visible objects are red, yellow, and so on, but according to characteristic they are only one, visible data which has the chara visibleness.

In the same way we may describe cetan? as s?la. Cetasikas are s?la. Restraint is s?la. N s?la. However many varieties of s?la there may be, the characteristic, the common nature o different s?la is just composing. So it has the characteristic of composing.

What is its function? The P??i word for function is rasa. Rasa has two meanings. One mea function and the other meaning is achievement. Sometimes function as action is used. Som achievement is used. Here both are mentioned. The function of sila is the stopping of misco have sila, you do not break precepts. You do not have misconduct. Stopping misconduct is i its nature. Blamelessness is its function as achievement. That means when you achieve pur are blameless. Blamelessness is actually the outcome of the purity of s?la. Blamelessness i the function of s?la. The P??i word ¡¥rasa¡¦ has two meanings - action or achievement.

What is the manifestation of s?la? ¡§Now virtue, so say those who know, itself as purity wi its proximate cause they tell the pair, conscience and shame as well.¡¨ Manifestation of s?la When we concentrate on sila, it appears to us as purity. S?la is real purity. So purity is the m of s?la or virtue.

The proximate causes of s?la are conscience and shame. Actually the proximate causes a ¡¥Shame¡¦ is the shame to do unwholesome things. ¡¥Fear¡¦ is the fear to do unwholesome unwholesome things, if our moral conduct is not pure, we will get bad results. So this shame called ¡¥the proximate causes of s?la.¡¦ So long as people have this shame and fear, they w
The moment these two leave people, then they will do anything they like.

Student: Could you define what proximate cause is?

Teacher: There are two kinds of causes - near cause and far cause. It is near cause.

Please read about 20 or 20 pages for next week. After you have read, then you can come can discuss.

Student: I have heard that if you want to really study Therav?da Buddhism you need a cave book.

Teacher: That¡¦s right. It is held in very high esteem in Therav?da countries. It is next to the actually. This is the Burmese edition of the book in P??i, the first volume.

Student: This book is meant for monks. Does it have any place for ordinary folks like us?

Teacher: You have to be patient with the first two chapters because the rules and practices you can adapt some of the statements in this chapter and the next chapter to s?la for lay pe exhorted to be very strict with regard to their rules. They are exhorted not to break even a sm said that one should see danger even in the smallest transgression. In the same way if you practice meditation, then you have to clear the bases. You have to establish a firm foundatio first. As a lay person you take precepts, at least five precepts and you keep them. You are n one of these rules. You are to keep them intact. You may be exhorted not to break any of th though your life is in danger. We can adapt the admonition or the advice given in this chapte of lay people too. This chapter deals with monks¡¦ behavior, monks¡¦ s?la.

I am afraid you will find many improper conduct and resorts mentioned here. You will know clever in acquiring things for themselves and clever in not telling direct lies, but in saying wh something like that.

One thing that is good about the Commentaries is that they give many stories. We can lea stories. From the third chapter onward it is for those who practice meditation whether a lay p Still the emphasis is on monks because monks were those who practiced meditation more t that is no longer true. Lay people are also very interested in meditation now.

In Burma about the turn of the century monks became interested in the practice of vipassa
They gave chance to lay people to practice vipassan? meditation. Formerly lay people did n could practice much meditation because they had things to do in the world. Even though you think that you have to go to a very secluded place and stay there alone and practice meditat of my teacher, Venerable Mah?si Say?daw, was one of the pioneers of rekindling of interest meditation both by monks and by lay people. I think that he was the first who taught meditati and who accepted lay people at the monastery to practice intensive meditation like we do no Student: What was his name?
Teacher: His personal name was Venerable U N?rada, but he was known as the Mungun Sa mentioned in Venerable Nyanaponika¡¦s book, The Heart of Buddhist Meditation. So now ma vipassan? meditation. Also in this country many people are interested in meditation. I think t trend that Buddhism is going towards. After all practice is what counts. Just understanding o theoretically will not help us much. We must put this theoretical knowledge into practice.

The study and practice I think should go together. Just study will not help us much. Somet through the practice helps you to have deeper understanding of what you know from the boo go together - practice and meditation.

Thank you very much.
?

S?dhu! S?dhu! S?dhu!

(Tape 2 / Ps: 23-52)

Let us go back to the structure of the first chapter. I am referring to the detailed table of co
This chapter deals with what is translated as virtue. In P??i it is s?la. A stanza from the Sa?y used as an introduction. Then the author explains what the path of purification is along with the stanza at the beginning of the book. Then the author goes on to explain s?la or virtue - w what is virtue. He explained that volition is virtue, mental factors are virtue, restraint is virtue non-transgression is virtue. This he explained according to a Text called ¡¥Pa?isambhid?¡¦. restraint the author explained five kinds of restraint -restraint by P??imokkha, restraint by mi restraint by knowledge, restraint by patience, and restraint by energy. (paragraph 18)

After explaining what virtue is or what is taken to be virtue according to the teachings of Th Buddhism, the author goes on to explain the meaning of the P??i word ¡¥s?la¡¦ or why virtue in P??i. The explanation given is that it is called ¡¥s?la¡¦ because it coordinates the bodily ar actions. Also it serves as a foundation for the formation of wholesome states. So the two bas the word are given there. One is coordinating and the other is the basis for holding up.

Next the author gives the characteristic, function, manifestation and proximate cause of vir customary with Therav?da authors that whenever there is something to be studied or to be u explain that thing according to its characteristic, its function, its manifestation and its proxima In Abhidhamma also citta, the 52 cetasikas and so on are explained with reference to their c functions, manifestations and proximate causes. The characteristic, function, manifestation a cause of virtue are given in paragraphs 20-22.

Then the author gives the benefits of virtue, the benefits of having pure virtue or pure s?la describes the different kinds of virtue which takes up the rest of the first chapter.

This week we will begin with the benefits of virtue. In paragraph 23 the author first begins w from the A?guttara Nik?ya. Do you see A.v.1? ¡¥A¡¦ means A?guttara Nik?ya. It is the name collections. The translation of A?guttara Nik?ya is Gradual Sayings. There are five volumes.

Further down in paragraph 23 you see D.ii.86. ¡¥D¡¦ means D?gha Nik?ya. It is another co translation of this collection is called Dialogues of the Buddha. There are three volumes.

A little further down you will see M.i.33. ¡¥M¡¦ means Majjhima Nik?ya. It is another divisio
The translation of this collection is Middle Length Sayings. I hope you have read all these. T benefits of virtue.

On the next page in paragraph 24 the author gives the benefits of virtue in verse form. Abo from the bottom it says, ¡§Virtue does away with self-blame and the like.¡¨ ¡¥Self-blame and are the others? The benefits of being virtuous or of having pure or good s?la are four. The d being virtuous of having bad s?la are also four.

The first of these four is self-blame or self-reproach. When our moral conduct is impure, th comes from us because we are the first to know what we did. So self-blame or self-reproach

Then there is the blame of others or the reproach of others. If we do not keep our rules pro break our precepts, other people will also blame us. There is the blame of others or the repr

The third disadvantage of bad s?la is punishment. If we do not keep precepts, then we ma may kill beings or we may kill human beings. We may steal and so on. As a result of this, we punishment in this life. That is another danger of having impure moral conduct.

The fourth one is having an unhappy destiny. That means rebirth in the four woeful states states of loss - rebirth in hell, rebirth in the animal kingdom, rebirth as a hungry ghost and re another kind of ghost. These are the four disadvantages of being impure in moral conduct. T these are the four benefits.

¡§Virtue entirely does away with dread of self-blame and the like.¡¨ Virtue entirely does aw danger of these four namely self-reproach, reproach of others, punishment and unhappy des

Then the author gives the kinds of virtue. Western people often say that Eastern people ar numbers. Here virtue is explained as of one kind, two kinds, three kinds, five kinds. First the gives a list of them. Then they are explained in detail.

There is only one s?la or one kind of virtue according to the characteristic. When we take i characteristic, there is only one virtue which has the characteristic of coordinating bodily and actions and upholding people.

Then there are two kinds, three kinds and five kinds of virtue. You may read the list.

I want to make some changes in paragraph 41, section 16. The author is explaining four k mentions natural virtue, customary virtue, necessary virtue and virtue due to previous cause should say ¡¥ingrained virtue¡¦ instead of ¡¥necessary virtue¡¦. The P??i word here is Dhamm the way it is. That means ingrained virtue. The last one is virtue due to previous causes. Her causes¡¦ means causes in previous lives. People are virtuous because they were virtuous in too. This being virtuous is carried over from past lives.

In the detailed explanation in paragraph 26 - ¡§Herein, keeping is accomplished by faith an avoiding, by faith and mindfulness.¡¨ In this paragraph there are two kinds of virtue. One is k is avoiding. ¡¥Keeping¡¦ means following the advice that this should not be done. Most prece should not be done. One must not kill, one must not steal and so on. Sometimes we should we should not do that. If we do not do these things, we come to some state that lacks virtue

The ¡¥keeping¡¦ is accomplished by faith and energy. There are rules which say that the m certain things at the monastery for example. This kind of s?la or virtue is accomplished by fa faith or confidence in the Buddha, if you have energy or effort, then you can keep that s?la.

In this translation it says that ¡¥avoiding¡¦ is accomplished by faith and mindfulness. In the edition and also in the P??i Text Society edition there is no word for mindfulness. We should two words ¡¥and mindfulness¡¦ here. We should just say, ¡§Avoiding is accomplished by faith have faith and when you have confidence in the Buddha and in the rules, can you keep your the rules. This is accomplished through faith and not by mindfulness. ¡§Mindfulness¡¨ is not Commentary on this book. We call it a Sub-Commentary. In the Sub-Commentary also only P??i the word ¡¥saddha¡¦ is explained and not mindfulness or sati. We should say here, ¡§A accomplished by faith.¡¨ If you have faith or confidence in the Buddha and his teachings, the the rules that prohibit you from doing certain things.

Student: What does ¡¥keeping by energy¡¦ mean?

Teacher: You have to do something when you follow rules that say something must be done duties to be done for our teachers. We must get up early in the morning before the teacher g offer him water for washing his face. If there is something to eat, we must offer it to him. We chores for him and so on. This is the first kind of ¡¥keeping¡¦. If we do not have faith and if w effort, we will not accomplish that kind of s?la. So there both sila and energy are required. R something needs only faith, not necessarily mindfulness.

In the next paragraph ¡§that of good behaviour¡¨ and ¡§that of the beginning of the life of p are terms that are directly translated from P??i.

About four lines down it says: ¡§This is a term for the virtue that has livelihood as eighth.¡¨ lines before it says: ¡§this is a term for virtue other than that which has livelihood as eighth.¡¨ are given in the footnote. They are refraining from three wrong bodily actions, refraining from verbal actions and refraining from wrong livelihood. These constitute eight precepts. These e different from the eight precepts to be mentioned a little later. These precepts are called thos livelihood as eighth. The others are different.

¡§This is a term for the virtue that has livelihood as eighth. It is the initial stage of the path it has to be purified in the prior stage too.¡¨ I think there is no word for ¡¥too¡¦ in the original P should leave out ¡¥too¡¦.

This sila has to be accomplished before we take up the beginning of the life of purity. That we practice meditation, we have to purify our moral conduct. So it has to be accomplished o prior stage of the path. ¡¥The path¡¦ here means the practice of meditation leading to enlight

In paragraph 29 four kinds of s?la are mentioned. ¡§There are two kinds of dependence - c craving and dependence through false view.¡¨ Craving itself is dependence here. False view dependence here. Sometimes we have attachment. We have lobha. We want to be reborn i to be reborn as a deva or a celestial being. Or we may want to be reborn as a human being is something like that. We practice s?la in order that we may be reborn in a better existence. dependent upon craving or attachment. Because we have attachment to these lives we do s be reborn there. So craving itself is dependence. It is not dependence through craving, but c craving we may say.

Sometimes we have the false view that purification is through virtuous conduct. That mean we can become purified through virtue only. That is a false view because we have to practic then concentration and then wisdom. Virtue alone, by itself, will not help us to become enligh purified. ¡¥Purification¡¦ here means purification of mind in the form of enlightenment. Enligh gained only through vipassan? meditation, only through practice of wisdom. That practice of only when there is concentration. And concentration can be built only on the purification of m Purification of moral conduct alone, by itself, cannot lead us to emancipation or enlightenme false view. Through this false view we practice s?la. Here false view is a dependence for the s?la. So there are two kinds.

Let us go back a little. Do you understand the ¡¥Double Code¡¦ in about the middle of para what is included in the Double Code (the bhikkhus¡¦ and bhikkhunis¡¦ Patimokkha)¡K¡¨? Bhik bhikkhunis are nuns. Rules for monks and nuns are technically called ¡¥P??imokkha¡¦. The is given in the translation. Since there are two, it is called ¡¥Double Code¡¦. There are 227 r and 311 rules for nuns or bhikkhunis. Women have more rules than monks have. Both belon the life of purity.

¡§And that included in the duties set out in the Khandhakas (of Vinaya)¡¨ - you know there Pi?akas. The first is Vinaya Pi?aka. That Pi?aka consists of rules for monks and nuns and s is composed of the 227 rules for monks, the 311 rules for nuns, the stories leading to the lay these rules and some explanations of the words in the rules. They are called ¡¥Sutta Vibha~

Then there are some other books which are called ¡¥Khandhakas¡¦. ¡¥Khandhaka¡¦ just m Khandhakas mostly rules pertaining to ¡¥keeping¡¦ are given. There are Khandhakas telling ordination ceremony, what qualifications one must have to be ordained and so on. In anothe which are to be performed for our teachers or for our pupils, or for guest monks are mention called ¡¥Khandhakas¡¦. Included in the duties set out in the Khandhakas is that of good beha two books containing these Khandhakas. One is called ¡¥Great Khandhaka¡¦ and the other i Lesser Khandhaka¡¦ .

Those are very interesting books if you are interested in social conditions during the time o
What utensils they used, how they made houses, all these things are mentioned in these bo monks grew, there were more and more problems. Sometimes those monks were like childr Buddha and ask him what to do. For example monks have to prepare dye for themselves. T a tree or wood from which they would get color. Sometimes the pots would overflow or boil o would go to the Buddha and report it to him. They would ask him what to do and then he wo filter or something. These books are interesting. The duties and other things contained in the called ¡¥the virtue that is of good behaviour. They are set out in the Khandhakas.

In paragraph 32 - ¡§In the seventh dyad all virtue subject to cankers is mundane.¡¨ I hope what ¡¥subject to cankers¡¦ is. What is ¡¥subject to cankers¡¦? ¡¥Cankers¡¦ means mental de ¡¥Subject to mental defilements¡¦ really means the object of mental defilements. The virtue w object of mental defilements is called ¡¥mundane¡¦ and virtue which is not the object of ment called ¡¥supramundane¡¦.

In the next paragraph - ¡§In the first of the triads the inferior is produced by inferior zeal, (p consciousness, energy, or inquiry.¡¨ You have to understand these four. The P??i word for z have met chanda among the 52 mental factors. It is translated there as conation. ¡¥Chanda will-to-do. The mere will-to-do is called ¡¥chanda¡¦. It is not desire. It is not attachment. It is j will to do something. Let us say you want to pick up a book. That will to pick up the book is c ¡¥chanda¡¦. In the first instance that will, zeal or chanda is inferior.

There are four kinds of what are called ¡¥adhipati¡¦ (dominating factors). Please read The Abhidhamma, chapter 7. In that chapter you will find these four adhipati. These four are calle factors¡¦. They arise with other mental factors and one of them predominates. Sometimes ch Sometimes citta predominates and so on. They are called ¡¥dominating factors¡¦.

The next factor is (purity of) consciousness. Here it is not necessarily ¡¥purity of conscious just ¡¥consciousness¡¦. Then there is energy. After that we have inquiry. ¡¥Inquiry¡¦ means k understanding. It is not really inquiry into something. The P??i word for inquiry is v?ma?s?. V translated as inquiry. The basic meaning of v?ma?s? is inquiry. That is correct. It is a synony word ¡¥pa???¡¦ (understanding). So here sometimes understanding, or knowledge, or wisdo

If one of these four is inferior, then the s?la is called ¡¥inferior s?la¡¦. When they are medi the s?la is medium. When they are superior, the s?la is superior. Please read The manual o chapter 7, to learn more about these dominating factors.

¡§That motivated by craving, the purpose of which is to enjoy continued existence is inferio what it means here is to enjoy better existence and to enjoy wealth or something in that exis continued existence. It is to enjoy better existence and to enjoy some things there.

In paragraph 35,the third line - ¡§that practiced by the magnanimous ordinary man...¡¨ - w ¡¥magnanimous ordinary man¡¦? The P??i word is puthujjana. Puthujjana is a person who h the stages of enlightenment. We may call him an ordinary person. The usual translation of th worldling, so ordinary worldling.

Student: What does ¡¥magnanimous¡¦ mean?

Teacher: ¡¥Magnanimous¡¦ here actually means he has good moral habits and that he is we directly it is he has heard well. During the time of the Buddha and some time thereafter there Whatever you learned, you learned from someone.

I hope you have read these pages. I will be picking places where I want to give you some Please go to paragraph 40. ¡§In the second tetrad there are training precepts announced for irrespective of what is announced for bhikkhunis.¡¨ ¡¥Irrespective of what is announced for b what do you understand by that? There are 227 rules for monks and 311 rules for nuns. The are common to both monks and nuns and there are others which are not common. The mon and also some of the rules laid down for nuns. That is what is meant here. So there are not j monks, but also some other rules which were originally meant for nuns. Monks must also ke

For example there is no rule among the 227 rules that monks must not sing, or dance, or g on. However there is that rule for the bhikkhunis. Monks must also keep that rule even thoug included in the 227 rules. When we say ¡¥monks¡¦ rules¡¦, we mean these 227 rules plus son must keep these rules also, even though they are not in the rules for monks. There are rules to both monks and nuns. And there are other rules. Monks must keep those rules too.

Student: It is translated poorly.

Teacher: The translation is not so good here. The meaning is that. ¡¥Irrespective¡¦ is not cor

¡§The ten precepts of virtue for male and female novices are the virtue of the not fully adm training precepts - ten when possible - as a permanent undertaking...¡¨ - here also the transl little incorrect. The five training precepts are permanent training. They are called in P??i ¡¥n You know that the word ¡¥anicca¡¦ is impermanent. So nicca is permanent. These precepts a s?la¡¦. That means if you claim to be a follower of the Buddha, you must keep these five pre be with you always. So they are a permanent undertaking. Ten are to be undertaken when y to be taken as training precepts as a permanent undertaking, ten when possible.

¡§The five training precepts - ten when possible - as a permanent undertaking, and eight a Uposatha Day, for male and female lay followers are the virtue of the laity.¡¨ It should say ¡¥ factors of Uposatha¡¦, not day, just Uposatha. The P??i word ¡¥Uposatha¡¦ can mean two th and the day of observance. Here the day is not meant. ¡¥The eight as factors of Uposatha¡¦ precepts - the five permanent precepts plus not eating after mid-day, not using flowers, perfu and also not singing and dancing, and not using luxurious beds and seats. These precepts a precepts¡¦. The most important is not eating after mid-day. These eight precepts are called is Uposatha for lay people, we mean these eight precepts. Uposatha for monks is different. is just the recitation of the 227 rules in an assembly.

So lay people should take and always keep five precepts. If they can, they should take eig certain days of the month. The usual days these precepts are taken are the full moon day, th and the eighth day of each half month.

We go by the lunar months. The month is divided into two halves - the bright half and the d middle of the bright half is the eighth day. The middle of the dark half is also the eighth day. four days in the month people in Buddhist countries like Burma, Sri Lanka and Thailand obs Mostly they go to monasteries and keep eight precepts. The people stay and hear talks on D something to the monks and practice meditation. In Thailand, Laos and Cambodia they eve the monastery. They only go back home the next morning. That is called ¡¥Uposatha¡¦. It is t and female laity. For monks as I said, they assemble at some place. One of the monks recite and the other monks pay respectful attention to his recitation.

You know there were no books in the olden days. In order that they would not forget the ru that the monks would remember the rules, the monks had to recite the rules in this way. The by heart. At the Uposatha one monk recites the rules and the other monks pay attention to th is called ¡¥Uposatha for monks¡¦.

In paragraph 42 the author explains the four kinds of s?la or the four kinds of virtue often m the Suttas. For monks these are the important kinds of virtue. These will be explained in mo others. The author gives the texts from the Suttas.

¡§The virtue described by the blessed One thus: ¡¥Here a Bhikkhu dwells restrained with t restraint possessed of the (proper) conduct and resort, and seeing fear in the slightest fault, himself by undertaking the precepts of training¡¦ is virtue of P??imokkha restraint.¡¨ This is o s?la. ¡¥Virtue of P??imokkha restraint¡¦ means simply keeping the P??imokkha rules, keepin the 311 rules, keeping them unbroken.

Section b of paragraph 42 shows the restraint of the sense faculties. That means restraint and so on. Strictly speaking it is not s?la because it is not keeping any rules. When you have sense faculties, your s?la is practically pure. So it is included as sila.

¡§On seeing a visible object with the eye, he apprehends neither the signs nor the particul which, if he left the eye faculty unguarded, evil and unprofitable states of covetousness and invade him; he enters upon the way of restraint, he guards the eye faculty, undertakes the re eye faculty.¡¨ What it means is that when you see something, you try not to get akusala from is meant by restraint of the senses.

For example you may see a beautiful thing. If you have no wise attention, then you will get thing and there will be akusala. To keep yourself from getting akusala, from getting unwhole practice mindfulness actually. The practice of mindfulness is to prevent attachment to these not mean that we are to close our eyes or our ears and not look or listen to things. It does no will be seeing things and we will be hearing sounds. What the restraint here means is not to we come across these objects.

The third in section c is the virtue of livelihood purification. For monks ¡¥pure livelihood¡¦ m getting requisites by proper means. That means by going on alms round monks get food. By cloth they can make it into a robe and wear it and so on. This is good livelihood for monks. I follow these rules, then there is no virtue of livelihood purification. It will also be explained in later.

¡§Abstinence from such wrong livelihood as entails transgression of the six training precep with respect to livelihood and entails the evil states beginning with ¡¥scheming, talking, hintin belittling, pursuing gain¡¦ is the virtue of livelihood purification.¡¨ If you have read through this you will know what these are. I am afraid that you know more about the bad tricks monks us they want.

The six training precepts we will find in paragraph 60. In paragraph 60 these are given one livelihood as cause, with livelihood as reason, one of evil wishes, a prey to wishes, lays clain than human state that is non-existent, not a fact, the contravention of which is defeat.¡¨

Let us suppose that I want to be rich. I want to possess many requisites. I want to possess Even though I have not obtained any of the stages of enlightenment, I will say that I am enlig something similar. This is so that you will think much of me and offer me many things. It is so that. Such a breech of rules is caused by livelihood.

Or perhaps I don¡¦t want to go out for alms. I want to be at the monastery and just let peop food to me and so on. This also is impure livelihood for monks. These six rules are proclaim with regard to monks¡¦ livelihood.

You see the word ¡¥defeat¡¦ there. These are technical words. ¡¥Defeat¡¦ means if a monk he is finished as a monk. He is defeated as a monk. He is no longer a monk, even though he wearing the robes, even though he may still go on admitting himself as a monk. In fact, in re monk the moment that he says this and the other person understands it. There are these six to these six rules later.

Student: What happens if the person does not understand?

Teacher: If the person spoken to does not understand at that moment, he is not defeated. B whom he is speaking knows at that moment that the man is saying that he is enlightened an really enlightened, then there is defeat.

I think you have read what are resorts and others for monks and what are not resorts for m are things which monks must engage in and things which monks must not engage in. In para middle of the paragraph, you will find: ¡§Here someone makes a livelihood by gifts of bambo leaves, or by gifts of flowers, fruits, bathing powder, and tooth sticks, or by flattery, or by bea (do you know that?), or by fondling¡¨ - I will come to ¡¥bean-soupery¡¦ later. ¡¥By fondling¡¦ re baby-sitting, picking up a baby and taking care of it, not just by fondling. It is taking care of a Someone leaves a baby with a monk, and if he takes care of the baby in order to please tha called ¡¥fondling¡¦.

Now ¡¥bean-soupery¡¦ means having a livelihood that resembles bean-soupery. You still d right? Please turn to paragraph 75. ¡§Bean-soupery is resemblance to bean soup; for just as being cooked only a few do not get cooked, the rest get cooked, so too the person in whose little is true, the rest being false, is called a ¡¥bean soup¡¦; his state is bean-soupery.¡¨ Most such a person says is just lies.

There is an expression in English that is somewhat similar - ¡¥half-baked¡¦, but it does not thing. It does not mean this. If most of what I say is not true and only a little of what I say is t I am guilty of this ¡¥bean-soupery¡¦.

In paragraph 45 we have ¡¥resort¡¦. We have to understand this properly. There is proper improper resort. ¡§Herein, what is improper resort? Here someone has ¡¥prostitutes as reso widows, old maids, eunuchs, bhikkhunis, or taverns as resort¡¦.¡¨ ¡¥Having them as resort¡¦ r friends with them, being intimate with them, frequenting their houses. That is what is meant as resort¡¦. So there are some places which monks must always avoid, the places of these p

Then in paragraph 49 there is another kind of resort. ¡§Proper resort is of three kinds: prop support, proper resort as guarding, and proper resort as anchoring.¡¨

¡§Herein, what is proper resort as support? A good friend who exhibits ten instances of tal given in the footnote), in whose presence one hears what has not been heard¡K¡¨ and so on presence¡¦ really means depending on whom, not just in his presence. That means from him from him. That is what is meant here.

¡§...Corrects what has been heard, gets rid of doubt, rectifies one¡¦s view and gains confide these are the benefits of hearing Dhamma talk. The Buddha said in one Sutta that there are gained from listening to a Dhamma talk. The first one is that you hear what you have not hea is new information. Then you correct what has been heard. That means you can clarify what before. When you hear it again, then you get rid of doubt. That is the third benefit. One may view. If you have a wrong view, you can set it right when you listen to the Dhamma talk. You That means your mind becomes full of confidence. These are the five benefits to be gained Dhamma talk.

¡§...Or by training under whom...¡¨ - actually ¡¥not by training under whom¡¦, but by followin example. So it should be ¡§or by whose example one grows in faith, virtue, learning, genero called (proper) resort as support.¡¨

In the next paragraph it says, ¡§What is (proper) resort as guarding? Here ¡¥a bhikkhu, ha inside a house, having gone into a street¡¦,...¡¨. The translator always makes this mistake. Th antaraghara. ¡¥Ghara¡¦ means house. ¡¥Antara¡¦ means in, between, or within. He translate inside a house because ¡¥antara¡¦ can mean inside and ¡¥ghara¡¦ means house. But the rea which has houses in it. So it means a village. So ¡§A bhikkhu having entered a village, havin street, goes with downcast eyes, seeing the length of a plow yoke.¡¨ So it is not ¡¥inside a h must keep their eyes down when they go out into the village or into the town, not just inside a wrong rendering of the P??i word.

¡§Seeing the length of a plow yoke...¡¨ - in fact it is not a plow yoke. It is a carriage yoke. A said to be about four cubits long. That is about six feet. So a monk should look ahead about ground. He should not look up or sideways.

It may be possible where it is not so crowded. In modern cities it is impossible. You have t just look down and walk, you will be knocked down by a car or something. But monks are tra eyes down - ¡§not looking at an elephant, at a horse, a carriage, a pedestrian, a woman, a m ¡§Seeing fear in the slightest fault¡¨ means seeing danger in the slightest fault. Even a very or transgression can bring harm to you. Especially when you practice meditation, this can be to your progress or to your concentration. A monk is instructed to keep the rules intact. Even broken a minor rule and he has broken it intentionally, then the feeling of guilt is always with feeling of guilt will torment him when he practices meditation. There is danger in even the sli transgression. Seeing danger in the slightest transgression, he keeps his s?la (his virtue) rea

So we come to the end of P??imokkha restraint today. How many pages do we have to go of the first chapter? 58 pages. So maybe we will finish the first chapter in four weeks. Please as you can.

S?dhu! S?dhu! S?dhu!

(Tape 3 / Ps: 5-99)

This week we begin with paragraph 53. Beginning with this paragraph, there is a detailed e dealing with the passage given in paragraph 42b. There are four kinds of virtue - virtue perta P??imokkha restraint, virtue of the restraint of the sense faculties, virtue of livelihood purifica virtue concerning requisites. We have finished the first one and now we are going to the sec

In this paragraph the author speaks of the usage seeing with the eye, seeing the visible ob eye. ¡¥Seeing with the eye¡¦ really means seeing with eye consciousness or seeing conscio of old explained that the eye cannot see because it has no mind and the mind cannot see be sensitivity or eye; but when the object strikes against the sensitivity of the eye, there arises t consciousness or seeing consciousness. When we see something, we see with eye conscio consciousness.

The usage of ¡¥seeing with the eye¡¦ is described as ¡¥accessory locution¡¦. I don¡¦t know In P??i it is called ¡¥sasambh?rakath?¡¦. The example given here is: ¡§He shot himself with the meaning of ¡¥to shoot¡¦? The meaning of the Pali word is ¡¥to hit¡¦ or ¡¥to pierce¡¦. He hit bow. Actually he hit him with the arrow and not with the bow, but without the bow you canno
The usage is that he hits him with his bow.

You say shoot with a gun? So perhaps shooting is not correct.

Student: You can shoot arrows with a bow and you can shoot bullets with a gun. ¡¥To shoot correct. Perhaps it is more correct to say you shot him with a bow and arrow.

Teacher: That¡¦s right. When a monk sees a visible object, then he apprehends neither the s particulars. ¡¥The sign¡¦ here means the sign of a man or a woman. That means when a mo not to see that person as a man or as a woman - ¡§or any sign that is a basis for defilement of beauty etc., or as it is beautiful, or it is attractive and so on.¡¨ He stops at what is merely s must train himself in just seeing and not going into evaluations. He must not evaluate the thi observed.

This kind of advice is given in many Suttas especially to M?lunky?putta and B?hiya. Buddl stop at seeing and not to take the object as a man or as a woman, or as attractive or beautif

He does not take particulars. Here ¡¥particulars¡¦ means the aspects or shape or whatever laughter, talk, looking ahead, looking aside and so on. These are called ¡¥particulars¡¦. In P? anubya?jana. These things make known or particularize the defilements. When we take the see, the defilements grow in our minds. So we are not to take the signs or the particulars.

¡§He only apprehends what is really there.¡¨ That means he only apprehends the visible da seeing only a visible object, and not seeing a man or a woman. That is very difficult to achie be possible only when we practice mindfulness meditation. Without mindfulness meditation i to stop at just seeing, and not seeing a man or a woman, or to stop seeing the particulars.

For example you hear a sound from outside. In a fraction of a second you have gathered i of the sound - whose sound it is, where it comes from, whether it is loud or soft and so on. It difficult to stop at just hearing when we hear something and at just seeing when we see som practice of vipassan? meditation can help us to achieve this.

In this story the monk was not practicing vipassan? meditation actually. He was practicing contemplation on the foulness of the body or the 32 parts of the body. Among the 40 subject meditation there is one called ¡¥contemplation of the body¡¦. It consists in contemplating on parts of the body and viewing them as foul, repulsive and so on.

This monk was practicing this kind of meditation, especially contemplating on the bones. H laughed and showed her teeth. He got the sign of bones and not the particulars of that wom later he said: ¡§I did not know whether a man or a woman went this way; what I noticed was group of bones).¡¨ After that the sign of bones came to his mind. He contemplated on the bo as impermanent, as suffering, as without ego or insubstantial. In this way he was able to rea while standing there. He had been practicing calm meditation for a long time. At that momen vipassan? meditation depending upon his subject of calm (samatha) meditation. So he reach through the practice of vipassan? meditation actually.

In paragraph 57 and so on the author describes when restraint and non-restraint actually a you understand the passage. If you have gone through Abhidhamma, you will easily underst non-restraint is not actually in the eye faculty or the eye, since neither mindfulness nor forge in dependence on eye sensitivity. On the contrary when a visible datum as object comes into then, after the life-continuum has arisen twice and ceased, the functional mind-element acco function of adverting arises and ceases.¡¨ If you are familiar with Abhidhamma, you can und easily. ¡¥Life-continuum¡¦ is bhava?ga. ¡¥Functional mind-element accomplishing the functio just the five-sense-door-adverting (pa?cadv?r?vajjana).

Do you have the diagram of the thought process in mind? You have to understand this wit thought process. Actually moments of restraint or non-restraint only come at the moments o impulsion. Restraint is kusala and non-restraint is akusala. Therefore there can be restraint only during the moments of javana. That is what the Commentary is telling us in these parag five-sense-door-adverting there is neither restraint nor non-restraint. The same is true for se consciousness, receiving consciousness and so on. Only when we reach the javana stage c there be restraint or non-restraint.

In footnote 16 I would like to make some corrections or additions. In the second paragraph ¡§There is no unvirtuousness , in other words, bodily or verbal misconduct in the five doors; non-restraint (please put non-restraint) of unvirtuousness happens through the mind-door, a non-restraint (we should say ¡¥non-restraint) happens through the six doors.¡¨

¡§For the arising of forgetfulness and the other three could be (¡¥could be¡¦ is better than ¡ in the five doors because (They can arise in five doors as well as the mind-door.) since they states (¡¥unprofitable states¡¦ means ¡¥unwholesome states¡¦) opposed to mindfulness etc.; ¡¥and¡¦) there is no arising of unvirtuousness consisting in bodily and verbal transgression th five-door impulsions do not give rise to intimation.¡¨

Do you remember bodily intimation and verbal intimation among the 28 material properties material properties there are two which are called ¡¥bodily intimation¡¦ and ¡¥verbal intimatio intimation¡¦ means something like gesture and ¡¥verbal intimation¡¦ means not really speech causes speech. They are called ¡¥bodily intimation¡¦ and ¡¥verbal intimation¡¦.

The Sub-Commentaries and all the teachers of old explain that the verbal intimation or bo can be caused only by the javanas of the mind-door thought process, not the five-door thou explained here as ¡§because five-door impulsions do not give rise to intimation.¡¨

¡§And the five kinds of non-restraint beginning with unvirtuousness are stated here as the five kinds of restraint beginning with ¡¥restraint as virtue¡¦.¡¨ These are given in paragraph 1 back and read. So restraint or non-restraint only arise at the impulsion or javana stage.

Next let us go to paragraph 60, the ¡¥virtue of livelihood purification¡¦. Are you familiar with for monks? These are called the P??imokkha rules¡¦. There are 227 rules for monks or bhik for nuns or bhikkhunis. When a monk or nun transgresses these rules, they come to some k are seven kinds of offenses. Six are mentioned in this passage.

¡§With livelihood as cause, with livelihood as reason, one of evil wishes, a prey to wishes, a higher than human state that is non-existent, not a fact, the contravention of which is Defe breaks this rule, he is defeated. He is no longer a monk although he may still be wearing rob that he is a monk. In reality he is not a monk.

The next one is an offense entailing a meeting of the Order. That is the second gravest off monk comes to this offense, then he has to approach the Sa~gha or at least four monks in t Finally there needs to be twenty monks to perform an act of Sa~gha. In order to get rid of th meeting of the Order is required. That is the second gravest offense.

The third one is a serious offense. This one can be gotten rid of just by making a confessio says, not referring to himself directly, ¡§The monk who lives in your monastery that you have Arahant.¡¨ Actually he wants to say, ¡§I am an Arahant.¡¨ He comes to this offense. He is no Arahant and he does not directly say that he is an Arahant. But he says that the monk who l monastery is an Arahant. If the person to whom he is speaking understands what he is sayin this offense. It says in this translation : ¡§The contravention of which is a serious offense in c aware of it.¡¨ ¡¥Who is aware of it¡¦ does not give the meaning of the P??i. Actually it means person understands at that very moment.

The Vinaya or Disciplinary Rules for monks is very much like law, the secular law. The mo this offense when the person understands at that very moment. If he does not understand in perhaps he thinks about it later and understands, then the monk does not come to that offen Student: You mean the person he is talking to?
Teacher: That¡¦s right. Yes.
Student: If the person he is talking to thinks he is an Arahant, then it¡¦s OK?
Teacher: That¡¦s OK if the person doesn¡¦t believe him. If the person knows that he is referri then there is this offense.

Now let us go to the next one. ¡§With livelihood as cause, with livelihood as reason, a bhik sick eats superior food (I would say ¡¥rich food¡¦) that he has ordered for his own use.¡¨ ¡¥Or means to ask for. A monk must not ask people to give to him. His asking or begging is by sta pick up our bowls and stand in front of a house silently. That is our begging. It is called ¡¥Ari or ¡¥Noble begging¡¦. We don¡¦t say anything. We don¡¦t say, ¡§Please give food to us¡¨ or w bowls we stand at the entrance of a house. Then lay people come out and give us what they here means just asking. A monk must not ask.

¡§The contravention of which is an offense requiring expiation¡¨ - what is expiation?
Student: Forgiveness.
Teacher: Actually it is forgiveness by confession. Monks make confessions to each other. It confession like in Catholicism. We confess to each other.

¡§With livelihood as cause, with livelihood as reason, a bhikkhu who is not sick eats rich fo has asked for her own use, the contravention of which is an offense requiring confession.¡¨ I ¡¥special confession¡¦, not just confession. There are two kinds of confession that we make rules we have broken. The contravention of this rule requires a special confession to get rid Student: So for a bhikkhuni to do the same act is more of an offense?
Teacher: Not necessarily. There are some rules for monks also for which they must make sp Sometimes breaking the rule incurs different offenses for monks than for nuns.

These are rules laid down with regard to livelihood for monks. Actually to purify his liveliho must go out for alms. He must not do any other thing like fortune telling or reading palms an things. These are the six rules laid down especially with reference to the livelihood of a mon

Then there are other things given in the Visuddhi Magga. The author took them from anoth ¡¥Mah? Niddesa¡¦. It tells about ¡¥scheming¡¦ and other things. If you have read all these pa crafty monks were in those days. They are not difficult to understand.

Let us go to paragraph 74. ¡§Suggesting is insinuating by specifying thus, ¡¥That family al me¡¦.¡¨ That is not correct. The correct meaning here is: ¡§That family knows me only and no monk wants to impress others. So ¡¥I am the only one that the family knows¡¦. It should be ¡ me only¡¦ and not ¡¥that family alone understands me¡¦. If that family alone understands me, impressive.

In paragraph 78 ¡§And here there should be told the story of the bhikkhu supported by a fa it is not that the bhikkhu is supported by a family, but it is a bhikkhu who frequents families, w families quite often. This is so he may become acquainted with them in order to get some th translation should be ¡¥the bhikkhu who frequents families¡¦ not ¡¥supported by a family¡¦. V always makes this mistake. The P??i word is Kulapaka. ¡¥Kula¡¦ means family. ¡¥Upaka¡¦ m it means approaching families. That means visiting the families to get acquainted with them.

This is not a good quality for a monk. A monk should not visit families very often. When a m to as ¡¥one who frequents families¡¦, it is a kind of censure. The monk in this story is very cu end he gets what he wants. The woman became very frustrated and said: ¡§There is no hoo shaveling.¡¨ She could not deceive the monk. So she had to give the monk what there was i

Let me read footnote 24. ¡§You are a donkey, you belong to the states of loss, you belong a beast, there is not even a happy or an unhappy destiny to be expected for you.¡¨ That also If someone were to say to me that there is neither a happy nor an unhappy destiny for me, I because this is true only for an Arahant. These however are words of abuse. What it really m is not a happy destiny for you. There is only an unhappy destiny for you. You are going to he a happy destiny for you. Only an unhappy destiny is to be expected for you. It is taken from directly from the Visuddhi Magga. These are some words of abuse contemporary with the B a thief, you are a fool, you are an idiot¡¨ and so on.

In paragraph 85 towards the bottom of the paragraph ¡§Herein, reflecting wisely is reflectin and as the way, by knowing, by reviewing, is the meaning.¡¨ With regard to the four requisite to make reflection whenever they get any one of the four requisites and also when they mak we put on our robes, we have to reflect on it like ¡§I put on the robe to ward off cold, to ward avoid bites by insects.¡¨ When we eat also, we make reflection, ¡§I eat this not to beautify m take pride in my strength, just enough to keep me going in order to practice what the Buddha on. So reflection is meant here.

The P??i word used here is yoniso pa?isankh?. It is the explanation of these words. So ¡¥ means and as the way¡¦ really means reflecting by proper means or knowing by proper mea way. The meaning is just reviewing or reflecting with wisdom, with understanding. So reflect the robe and so on.

In paragraph 86 ¡§For protection: for the purpose of warding off, for the purpose of elimina may not arouse affliction in the body. For when the body is afflicted by cold, the distracted m wisely exerted. That is why the Blessed One permitted the robe to be used for protection fro instance, except that from heat means from the heat of fire, the origin of which should be un forest fires and so on.¡¨ Actually it is not the ¡¥origin¡¦ but the ¡§occurrence of which should b as forest fires and so on.¡¨ It is not origin. It should be occurrence or happening. The P??i w sa?bhava. ¡¥Sa?bhava¡¦ can mean a cause or just happening. Here it means happening. Th seen in a forest fire or a house fire and so on. ¡¥Fire¡¦ means that kind of fire.

In paragraph 90 ¡§And here the clause neither for amusement is stated for the purpose of for delusion.¡¨ Instead of ¡¥support¡¦ we may say ¡¥basis for delusion¡¦. Then farther down ¡§ smartening nor for embellishment is said for the purpose of preventing the arising of fetters f what does that mean? We should reflect this way in order not to have defilements and also s will not have defilements for us. For example if w take food for smartening our self, for embe self, then we will become attractive. So this may arouse defilements in other people as well. saying ¡§the arising of fetters for another¡¨ we should say ¡§the arising of fetters for others.¡¨ for others as well as ourselves.

At the end of paragraph 91 ¡§...for the endurance and continuance of this body can be unc we should put ¡¥also¡¦ after ¡¥to mean¡¦.

In paragraph 92 about the middle of the paragraph ¡§For while this bhikkhu is engaged in desert of existence by means of devotion to the three trainings¡¨ - that means the practice of trainings. You know the three trainings. S?la, sam?dhi and pa??? are called ¡¥the three train ¡¥Devotion to¡¦ really means ¡¥practice of¡¦.

¡§For while this bhikkhu is engaged in crossing the desert of existence by means of the pr three trainings depending on bodily strength whose necessary condition is the use of alms fo of it to assist the life of purity just as those seeking to cross the desert used their child¡¦s fles refers to a Sutta in the Sa?yutta Nik?ya. You may read that story in the Book of Kindred Say volume page 68. The reference given here is for the original P??i text. In the English version two page 68. It is not a real story. Buddha gave it just as an example. You should view food

Two people and a child were going through the desert. There was insufficient food supplie not make it to the end. The supplies dwindled so that they had nothing to eat. They discusse themselves. If we cross over to a safe place, we can get a new baby. If we kill the baby and cross the desert. It was not expressly said in the Sutta that they killed the baby. The Comme here that they did not kill the baby as though it were a real story. The father sent the baby to and the mother sent the baby to the father. Going back and forth the child died. So the idea eat the flesh of your own child, you eat it because you have to, not because you want to. Th here. ¡§Those seeking to cross the desert used their child¡¦s flesh, just as those seeking to c use a raft, and just as those seeking to cross the ocean use a ship.¡¨

At the bottom of paragraph 94 there is a verse. ¡§With four or five lumps still to eat, let him drinking water; for energetic bhikkhus¡¦ needs, this should suffice to live in comfort.¡¨ This is much quoted by our teachers or by monks who want to advise other monks not to be greedy or five lumps still to eat, let him then end by drinking water.¡¨ So one doesn¡¦t eat until one is about four or five lumps. Drink water instead. This way you will be comfortable. This is true. much especially when you are on a retreat and have to meditate, you will find it very difficult
It is better not to eat until you are full, but to eat a little less and to drink water instead.

¡§For energetic bhikkhus¡¦ needs this should suffice to live in comfort.¡¨ ¡¥Energetic bhikkh means a monk who has sent his mind to Nibb?na or to the attainment of Nibb?na. The P??i here differently by Western people from the traditional teachers. According to the traditional word means one who has directed his mind to the attainment of Nibb?na. Western scholars as having made effort or energetic. The P??i word is pahitata. It can have both meanings - o directed his mind to Nibb?na or one who has made effort. The second meaning is preferred So here it says ¡§for energetic bhikkhus¡¦ needs¡¨. Here ¡¥energetic¡¦ really means one who meditation for the purpose of attaining Nibb?na. ¡§This should suffice to live in comfort.¡¨ A monk should not eat much.

Now let us look at resting place or dwelling place. What is a ¡¥lean-to¡¦?
Student: It is like a tent, a very rickety tent.
Teacher: the P??i word is a??hayoga. Traditionally it is a building that has a roof in only one something like a lean-to. There are five kinds of dwellings for monks. One is a monastery. It ¡¥vih?ra¡¦ in P??i. Then there is a lean-to and there are three more. The P??i word for a dwe monks is sen?sana. ¡¥Sena¡¦ comes from the root which means ¡¥to sleep¡¦ or to ¡¥lie down the root which means ¡¥to sit¡¦. A place where a monk lies down or sleeps or a place where called his place, his dwelling place, his sen?sana. When a monk makes use of the dwelling he enters the building or when he goes out of the building, then he must make this reflection dwelling place to ward of the cold, to ward off heat, to ward off bites of insects¡¨ and so on.

The last one is the reflection on medicine. These are called ¡¥the four requisites of monks clothing, dwelling place, and medicine. In paragraph 96 it says, ¡§Any work of a medical ma honey, ghee, etc., that is suitable for one who is sick, is what is meant.¡¨ The word ¡¥ghee¡¦ P??i original.

In Vinaya butter, oil, ghee, honey and molasses are called ¡¥medicine¡¦. These five are ter Vinaya. They can be taken as medicine. Monks can take honey or ghee in the afternoon, bu medicine. ¡§Any requisite for life consisting of oil, honey, molasses, ghee etc., that is allowe man as suitable for the sick, is what is meant.¡¨

In paragraph 97 in the second part there is the explanation of the P??i word ¡¥paccaya¡¦. ¡ meaning here is this: because breathing things go, move, proceed, using (what they use) in robes etc., these robes, etc., are therefore called requisites.¡¨ In fact instead of ¡¥move, proc should say ¡¥live¡¦. ¡¥Breathing things¡¦ means living beings. So living beings live in depend robes and other things, using them. That is why they are called ¡¥paccaya¡¦ in P??i. It is not you understand the meaning of the word ¡¥paccaya¡¦. If you know that it means requisites h

In the next paragraph ¡§So, in this fourfold virtue, P??imokkha restraint has to be underta faith. For that is accomplished by faith, since the announcing of training precepts is outside t province.¡¨ It is very important. That is why we cannot change the rules. We cannot add any and we cannot take anything out of the rules because the announcing or laying down of rule province of disciples. We cannot do that. Only the Buddha can do that.

If a monk has no faith or devotion to the Buddha¡¦s teachings, he will not want to keep all t
That is why the P??imokkha restraint or the first virtue is to be undertaken by means of faith devotion to the Buddha.

¡§The evidence here is the refusal of the request to (allow disciples to) announce training Those in the brackets are to be stricken out. This refers to Vinaya. Venerable S?riputta aske the dispensation of different Buddhas fared. The dispensation of some Buddhas lasted long of other Buddhas did not last so long. Buddha answered that there were precepts and so on dispensation lasted long. So Venerable S?riputta requested the Buddha to lay down rules - rules so that the dispensation of the Buddha may endure long.¡¨ The Buddha said, ¡§No. It is the Buddha meant to say was that Venerable S?riputta did not know when to lay down rules the laying down of rules is not in the province of disciples. The words in the brackets are not original. They were put in by the translator wrongly. The evidence here is the refusal of the r announce precepts or to lay down rules.

¡§Having therefore undertaken through faith the training precepts without exception as ann should completely perfect them without regard (even) for life.¡¨ Let¡¦s put in the word ¡¥even for life¡¦.

¡§For this is said: ¡¥As a hen guards her eggs, or as a yak her tail, or like a darling child, o only eye - so you who are engaged your virtue to protect, be prudent at all times and ever so ¡¥Be prudent¡¦ really means be fond of your virtue. ¡¥Scrupulous¡¦ or the P??i word here me for the rules, the Buddha, the Dhamma, the Sa~gha and so on. Then we have the story. It is understand.

In paragraph 99 it says, ¡§He augmented his insight.¡¨ I hope you understand that. What¡¦s Student: He saw into the future?
Teacher: Actually he practiced vipassan? meditation.

In the second story ¡§Also they bound another Elder in Tambapa??i Island (Sr? Lanka) wi and made him lie down. When a forest fire came and the creepers were not cut...¡¨ - no, this Here it should be ¡§When the forest fire came, without cutting the creepers, he established i bound with creepers and when the forest fire came, he could easily cut the creepers and esc creepers means to break the rule of the Buddha. So he would sooner give up his life than br the Buddha. So without cutting the creepers, he practiced meditation. He became an Arahan

¡§When a forest fire came, without cutting the creepers, he established insight and attaine simultaneously with his death.¡¨ ¡¥Simultaneously¡¦ means almost simultaneously, not at the works very fast. So the two came almost simultaneously. He became an Arahant and then h

The advice given with regard to this story is: ¡§Maintain the rules of conduct pure, renounc there be need, rather than break virtue¡¦s restraint by the worlds¡¦ saviour decreed.¡¨ So you your life rather than breaking the rules laid down by the Buddha.

Do you have any questions?

Student: I am a little curious about all this which is essentially asceticism. The Buddha renou asceticism. How are these two resolved?

Teacher: When it says the Buddha renounced asceticism, it means that he renounced unne pain on oneself or self-mortification. For example when he was in the forest practicing to bec he reduced his food little by little. At first he went out for alms and ate that food. Then he too trees and ate that. Later he took only the fruit that had fallen. Later on he took only the fruit f tree under which he was living. So little by little he reduced eating so that his body became v emaciated. It was unnecessarily inflicting suffering upon himself. That asceticism Buddha re Ascetic practices given here are not that severe, not that rigorous. They are things such as bowl only or when you go out for alms, you do not skip any house. These are called ¡¥ascet they are not like those practiced by the other hermits or sages during the Buddha¡¦s time. W ascetic practices in the second chapter.

One thing that I want to say is that when I went to the Zen Center in Japan I saw that they bowls and then drank the water from the bowls. It reminded me of one of the ascetic practice monks practice. That practice is to eat in one bowl only. If you are to use one bowl only, ther that bowl and you drink in that bowl. So i think there are some practices carried to countries India. They have changed a little and so they seem to become very different practices, but I something common in both practices.

Student: In the Zendo we eat that way and wash our bowls. You are always served. It is like just comes. It is served to you. We don¡¦t do begging, but in the way that we eat in the Zend similar.

Teacher: Yes. That¡¦s right. When monks are invited to the houses of lay people during the t and even in the present time in Sr? Lanka, the monks sit in a row on the floor. The lay peopl put it in their bowls like you eat in Zen Centers. That is the practice in Sr? Lanka and also in Myanmar it is different. We can see many similarities or common practices that have becom depending on the country and on the people.

Student: The original intention seems to be the same.

Teacher: These are all dhuta~ga. ¡¥Dhuta~ga¡¦ means to shake off. These practices are und defilements. They develop good qualities like fewness of wants, non-attachment to food and Student: By that particular act you keep reminding yourself of why you are eating and so on.

Teacher: You always have to be on your guard to avoid mental defilements from coming to y

Student: Many people talk about not liking their job or not feeling good about their livelihood here how monks are warned to be careful. So that is a reflection in our more complex societ careful in our behaviour, perhaps not in the exact same way.

Teacher: That¡¦s right.
Student: In each act it is so easy to be selfish.
Student: So try to put Buddhism somewhere in everyday life. Be mindful.
Teacher: That¡¦s right. In one of the Suttas in A~guttara Nik?ya daily reflections are given th a lay person must make these reflections: I am old. I cannot avoid getting old. I will get disea cannot avoid that. One day I will die and I cannot get away from it. All that is mine will chang disappear. I am heir to kamma. Kamma is my only kinsman. These reflections have to be m monks and nuns and lay people. This is so they can get rid of pride in their youth, pride in th and so on. That is a very good Sutta both for monks and for lay people. This is in the A~gutt Gradual Sayings.
Student: But don¡¦t you think that there might be some problem for some people who are de that too much, you might jump off the Golden Gate Bridge.
Teacher: That¡¦s right. You have to follow the Middle Way. These reflections are to be made depressed. It is to get rid of pride in yourself, or in your appearance, or in your body. It is for purpose of getting rid of undesirable mental habits. They are not to be carried too far.

You know once when the Buddha taught about the foulness of the body, monks got so dis bodies that they killed themselves and they asked other people to kill them. That really happ time of the Buddha. Buddha knew it would happen, but he could not avoid it. It is explained i Commentaries that the kamma that these monks did together in the past got opportunity to g time. Buddha thought that if they had to die, let them die with this kind of meditation. It woul get a good rebirth. So the Buddha taught the foulness of the body meditation to them. Then not be approached by any monk for 15 days.¡¨ He said that he wanted to be alone and woul who brought food to him. After 15 days he came out of seclusion. Then he asked Venerable fewer monks. Venerable ?nanda answered that there were fewer monks because he had ta Venerable ?nanda asked the Buddha to teach some other kind of meditation. Then the Bud meditation at that time.
Student: Is that a true story?
Teacher: Yes. That story is in the Book of Discipline if you want to read it. I don¡¦t have the p It is given in connection with the third of the four rules of defeat. The third rule is not to kill hu beings. Killing human beings is a grave offense for monks. That story is given there.

OK. Thank you. Please read to the end of the first chapter for next week.

S?dhu! S?dhu! S?dhu!

(Tape 4 / Ps: 100-161)

We were in paragraph 100. There are four kinds of virtue or s?la. The first is called ¡¥P??i restraint¡¦. These are the rules in the disciplinary code for monks and nuns. That P??imokkh undertaken out of faith. Having faith in the Buddha and his teaching, the monks and nuns ke rules intact.

The next one is the restraint of the sense faculties. It is to be undertaken with mindfulness restraint of the sense faculties is not strictly virtue or s?la. It is the control of one¡¦s senses. T control of one¡¦s senses can be done by mindfulness or should be done by mindfulness. Wh one must keep mindfulness with him or her, so that he or she will not get unwholesome thou mental states with regard to that object. In order to guard against unwholesome thoughts fro minds we need mindfulness. So the second s?la or the restraint of the sense faculties is und mindfulness. By mindfulness one tries not to take the signs, not to apprehend the signs, and the particulars. One tries to just stop at seeing, hearing and so on.

In paragraph 101 ¡§When not undertaken thus, virtue of P??imokkha restraint¡¨, a word is ¡§restraint also is unenduring.¡¨ If we do not undertake the restraint of sense faculties with m then the virtue of the first one, the P??imokkha restraint, cannot endure long, cannot last lon

¡§It does not last, like a crop not fenced in with branches. And it is raided by the robber de a village with open gates is by thieves.¡¨ So the P??imokkha restraint becomes enduring wh sense faculties is undertaken by mindfulness. When we apply mindfulness and try not to tak particulars of objects, then we will not come to transgression of the rules in the P??imokkha.

With regard to the restraint of the sense faculties the story of the Elder Vang?sa was giver for alms and saw a woman. He had thoughts of lust arise in his mind. He asked Venerable ?
Venerable ?nanda said that because you perceived mistakenly, because you saw the perso of thoughts arose. So try to concentrate on the formations as alien, as suffering, as not self. this attitude, this understanding, you can extinguish this fire of lust in your mind. So the Elde lust from his mind and went on with his alms round.

Two more stories are given. These are inspiring stories about how monks control their ser not know that there was a painting in the dwelling where he lived. The same monk did not kn to him, the king or the queen. The monk always said, ¡§May the king be happy.¡¨ to whoever

In paragraph 108 ¡§Let him not be hungry-eyed.¡¨ The P??i word is lola. ¡¥Lola¡¦ means un this way and that way. That is called ¡¥lola¡¦. Hungry should be understood not in the sense something, but hungry for the visible object.

Student: Is it in the sense of distraction?

Teacher: Yes. Monks are taught to keep their eyes down especially when they go to the villa allowed to see about six feet in front of them. They are to keep their eyes down. They are no thing or that thing. When your eyes are going from this thing to that thing, it is called ¡¥lola¡¦.

Student: ¡¥Hungry-eyed¡¦ is not a common English word. It is one that is seldom used.

Teacher: Maybe the word ¡¥lola¡¦ can be translated as hungry. Lola is something that is not composed.

Then there is another story about the Elder Mah? Mitta. These stories are not difficult to un

The third virtue for monks is livelihood purification. Livelihood purification is to be undertak of energy, by means of effort because if you are lazy and if you are a monk and do not go ou your livelihood will not be pure. Livelihood purification is to be undertaken by means of effort order to keep livelihood pure a monk has to avoid wrong search or unsuitable search. In ord such things, a monk has to go out for alms every day.

In paragraph 112 it says, ¡§And if he has got putrid urine with mixed gall nuts...¡¨ Actually t nuts soaked in urine. It is not necessarily putrid urine, although the P??i word ¡¥p|ti¡¦ is used just be urine, especially cow urine. Do you know gall nut? I don¡¦t know. The other name is m kind of fruit or nut. It has a bitter taste. When it is soaked in cow urine, it is supposed to be m

If a person gets that kind of gall nut or myrobalam or the four sweets, they are supposed to for monks. The one is not so good, but the four sweets are good things. He who wants to ke pure should keep what is not good and give what is good to others.

The four sweets are medicinal sweets made of four ingredients. What are the four? In our Buddhist countries this is very common. Almost everybody knows at least what things monk afternoon. These four sweet things are ghee, honey, oil and molasses. They are mixed. If yo are not to cook them. You may put them in the sun and stir them. Some time later the mixtur thick. That could be eaten in the afternoon if you are weak or if there is some ailment to be g
The four sweets are called ¡¥catumadhura¡¦.

Student: This last part means that if you are offered both of these medicines and you take th and leave the good tasting medicine for others, that is a virtuous act.

Teacher: That¡¦s right. Such a monk is called ¡¥supreme in the Noble Ones¡¦ heritage¡¦.

Some kinds of hinting or indicating is allowed with regard to some requisites and is not allo regard to other requisites. In paragraph 113 it talks about that. ¡§As to robe and the other re hint, indication, roundabout talk, or intimation, about robes and alms food is allowable for a b purifying his livelihood.¡¨ A monk must not ask for requisites, not even hint or indicate, or use talk to get a robe or to get food.

¡§But a hint, indication, or roundabout talk, about a resting place (a dwelling place) is allow one who has not taken up ascetic practices.¡¨ This is allowable for monks with regard to dwe

¡§herein, a ¡¥hint¡¦ is when one who is getting the preparing of the ground etc., done for th (making) a resting place is asked: ¡¥What is being done, venerable sir? Who is having it dor ¡¥No one¡¦.¡¨ That means there is no one who is going to build this place. So if you can, plea something like that.

Student: If you can -

Teacher: If you can, please build this place for me.

¡§ An ¡¥indication¡¦ is saying ¡¥Lay follower where do you live?¡¦ ¡¥In a mansion, venerable lay follower, is a mansion not allowed for monks¡¦?¡¨ A mansion is allowed for monks. Is it no monks? You live in a mansion and I live in a hut. That is indication.

¡§ ¡¥Roundabout talk¡¦ is saying ¡¥The resting place for the community of bhikkhus is crow monastery is too small. It is not enough for monks or lay people to assemble. That is rounda means the monk wants a new monastery or an extension to the monastery.

These are allowed with regard to resting place or dwelling place. With regard to robes and are not allowed.

¡§All, however, is allowed in the case of medicine.¡¨ Medicine is a necessity. If you have a disease, you really need medicine. So with regard to medicine hinting and all these others a

¡§But when the disease is cured, is it or is it not allowed to use the medicine obtained in th
There is a difference of opinion with regard to this. Vinaya specialists say that it is all right, b Suttanta specialists say no. Vinaya specialists say that Buddha has permitted and so it is all medicine obtained by hinting and others even after the disease is cured. The Suttanta speci although there is no offense (That means there is no breaking of a certain rule.) nevertheles is sullied, therefore it is not allowable. If you want to purify your livelihood to the utmost, do n them.

This has to be undertaken by means of understanding. You have to reflect, ¡¥I use the rob heat, cold, bites of insects¡¦ and so on. You have to use your understanding. Therefore it is t by means of understanding.

Now paragraph 124 ¡§Herein, reviewing is of two kinds: at the time of receiving requisites of using them.¡¨ Sometimes you may receive a robe today, but perhaps you do not use it un there are two kinds of reviewing at receiving and at the time of using.

¡§For use is blameless in one who at the time of receiving robes, etc., reviews them either elements or as repulsive.¡¨ Here also the translation is a little inaccurate. Here what is mean monk receives the robe and others, he reflects or reviews them as mere elements or as repu them aside and later makes use of them. He does not just put them aside for later use, but h and later makes use of them.

¡§And in one who reviews them thus at the time of using them¡¨ - that means you have to r time of receiving and at the time of using. This passage may imply that if you review at the ti and if you do not review at the time when you are using, it is alright. However the emphasis reviewing at both times - both at the time of receiving and at the time when you make use of ¡§Here is an explanation to settle the matter. There are four kinds of use: use as theft, use as inheritance, use as a master. Herein, use by one who is unvirtuous and makes use (of re sitting in the midst of the community, is called ¡¥use by theft¡¦.¡¨ ¡¥Unvirtuous¡¦ really means has broken one of the four most important rules. If a monk breaks one of the four most impo no longer a monk. He may be wearing robes. He may be claiming to be a monk. His use of r be by theft. He is not entitled to receive the offerings given by lay people. So it is like stealin something. It is called ¡¥use as theft¡¦. ¡¥Unvirtuous¡¦ here refers to a person who is no long ¡§Use without reviewing by one who is virtuous is ¡¥use as a debt¡¦.¡¨ Monks depend on la requisites. Lay people offer these requisites to monks. Therefore monks have the responsib to review on these four requisites. If a monk does not review when accepting them or using said to be ¡¥using them as a debt¡¦ or he is indebted.

He must review the four requisites. When? The robe should be reviewed every time that y time that you pick up your robe, then you have to review the robe. ¡§I use the robe just to wa cold, bites of insects¡¨ and so on.

¡§The alms food (should be reviewed) lump by lump.¡¨ What do you call this? A morsel? S be reviewed at every morsel, at every mouthful. That is why talking while eating is discourag monk who talks while eating is supposed to be of bad behaviour because instead of reviewi When he is speaking, he is losing reviewing.

Student: During the chanting before our meals we say the first portion is for precepts, the se for sam?dhi and the third is to save all beings.

Teacher: Yes. Good. You have to be doing something while eating. I mean thinking of some without reviewing, you are using the food as a debt. So alms food should be reviewed lump cannot do this, should review it before the meal (That means in the morning.), after the mea watch, in the middle watch, and in the last watch. If dawn breaks on him without his having r finds himself in the position of one who has used it as a debt.¡¨ Dawn is the beginning of one day does not begin at midnight. The day is reckoned by dawn. When dawn breaks and a mo all, then he is said to be using the requisites as a debt.

¡§Also the resting place should be reviewed each time it is used.¡¨ When you go into the m you go out of the monastery, you must review.

¡§Recourse to mindfulness both in the accepting and the use of medicine is proper.¡¨ So w medicine you have to review both accepting it and making use of it.

¡§But while this is so, though there is an offense for one who uses it without mindfulness a acceptance, there is no offense for one who is mindful in using after accepting without mindf accept it without reviewing, but when you are using, you must really review it. That is what is ¡§Purification is of four kinds: purification by Teaching, purification by restraint, purification search, and purification by reviewing.¡¨ This also has to do with the four virtues or four s?las purification by Teaching. The word ¡¥Teaching¡¦ is not correct here.

There are two English translations of the Visuddhi Magga. One was made by a Burmese g by Venerable N??amoli. Both of them did not get the right translation here.

The P??i word here is desan?. The word ¡¥desan?¡¦ generally means a sermon, or a teach But here desan? is used in a technical sense in Vinaya. ¡¥Desan?¡¦ in Vinaya means reveali one¡¦s offenses, or confession. So it is purification by confession. When a monk has broken he confesses it to another monk. When he confesses, he gets free from the offense of break

There is a kind of s?la which is called ¡¥purification by confession¡¦. Just by confession yo of this offense. These are minor rules in the P??imokkha. For example cutting a tree - monk to cut trees. If a monk cuts a tree, or plucks a flower, or picks a fruit, he comes to a minor of order to get free from that minor offense he just has to confess it to another monk.

There are some graver offenses which need not only confession, but which require staying for a period of time. Also there are the gravest offenses which cause a person not to be a m ¡¥giving up robes¡¦ is called a purification. Giving up being a monk is what i mean. Becomin novice) or becoming a lay person is called a ¡¥purification¡¦ there. So offenses incurred with P??imokkha rules can be purified by confession.

¡¥Purification by restraint¡¦ is restraint of sense faculties. That is called ¡¥purification by restraint¡¦.

The third one, ¡¥purification by livelihood¡¦, is called ¡¥purification by search¡¦. That is beca have to search for requisites, especially food. ¡¥Search for¡¦ means to find by suitable mean or begging by word of mouth.

The last one is ¡¥purification by reviewing¡¦. In order to purify the last of the four s?las, you whenever you receive a requisite or when you make use of a requisite. These are the four p corresponding to the four s?las.

¡§Use of the requisites by the seven kinds of Trainers is called ¡¥use as inheritance¡¦.¡¨ Do are Trainers? You know that there are eight Noble Persons or eight kinds of Noble Persons. stages of enlightenment and eight types of consciousness that arise at the four stages of en are the Path of Stream-Entrant, the Fruition of Stream-Entrant, the Path of Once-Returner, t Once-Returner, The Path of No?-Returner, the Fruition of Non-Returner, the Path of Arahan Arahant. These are the eight types of consciousness. It is said that there are eight Enlighten eight Noble Persons. In P??i the word is Ariya. You may be familiar with the word ¡¥ariyan¡¦ the moment of Stream-Entrant Path consciousness is called the ¡¥First Noble Person¡¦. The of Stream-Entrant Fruition is called the ¡¥Second Noble Person¡¦ and so on. There are eight Persons.

What are Trainers? ¡¥Trainers¡¦ here means those who have attained to the lower stages Briefly Trainers are those who are not ordinary persons (puthujjanas) nor Arahants. They ar Once-Returners, Non-Returners, (and the Arahant at the moment of path consciousness on called ¡¥Sekhas¡¦. They are not puthujjanas or ordinary persons. And they are not Arahants. requisites is called ¡¥use as an inheritance¡¦.

¡§But how then is the Blessed One¡¦s requisites or the laity¡¦s requisites that are used? Alt the laity, they actually belong to the Blessed One, because it is by the Blessed One that they permitted.¡¨ Buddha permitted us to accept things from lay people. It is virtually the requisite Buddha and not of the lay people. When a son makes use of his father¡¦s belongings, his fat he is said to be ¡¥using them as an inheritance¡¦. ¡§That is why it should be understood that One¡¦s requisites are used. The confirmation here is in the Dhammad?y?da Sutta.¡¨ That Su Majjhima Nik?ya (The Middle Length Sayings) in the third Sutta. Buddha said in this Sutta, ¡ of Dhamma and not of requisites.¡¨ Buddha urged his disciples in this way.

¡§Use by those whose cankers are destroyed (That means those used by Arahants) is cal master¡¦: for they make use of them as masters because they have escaped the slavery of c

From among these four try to make use as a master. That is the best one. For those ordin not yet attained any stage of enlightenment there can be no use as an inheritance and also master. So there are only two - use as theft and use as debt. But the Commentary said that who keep their precepts, who keep their virtue pure could be included in the use as inheritar the opposite of the use as a debt.

¡§For one possessed of virtue is called a ¡¥trainer¡¦ too because of possessing this training stretching the meaning of the word. The word ¡¥Trainer¡¦ or the P??i word ¡¥Sekha¡¦ means neither puthujjanas nor Arahants, but here with the stretching of the meaning, a person who although he is a puthujjana, can be called a ¡¥trainer¡¦ here. Use of requisites can be include inheritance.

¡§As regards these three kinds of use, since use as a master is best, when a bhikkhu unde dependent on requisites, he should aspire to that and use them after reviewing them in the v There is one sentence missing here. I don¡¦t know why he left it out. ¡§For he who so does is what is to be done.¡¨ That sentence is missing.

Student: That comes where?

Teacher: After ¡¥in the way described¡¦. ¡§For who so acts (I think it is better to say ¡¥acts¡¦.) does what is to be done.¡¨

In paragraph 130 ¡§In connection with the fulfilling of the virtue dependent on requisites th told the story of the novice Sa~gharakkhita, the Nephew.¡¨ He was eating and his Preceptor your tongue burn.¡¨ Or ¡§Don¡¦t burn your tongue.¡¨ He was not eating hot food at that mome Preceptor said, ¡§Don¡¦t burn your tongue.¡¨ That means don¡¦t eat without reviewing. He be later.

In paragraph 131 about the middle of the paragraph it says, ¡§That of magnanimous ordin profitable things.¡¨ ¡¥Magnanimous ordinary men¡¦ means informed puthujjanas or good puth profitable things¡¦ really means devoted to vipassan? meditation.

The number of precepts given by Venerable N??amoli is different than that given in the tra interpretation. Traditionally the number of the rules for monks is - how do I say? There are to here. ¡§Nine thousand millions and a hundred and eighty millions, then as well, and fifty plu thousand and thirty six again to swell. The total restraint disciplines: these rules the Enlighte explains told under heads for filling out, which the Discipline restraint contains.¡¨ Traditionally is 91,805,036,000.

Student: That¡¦s a lot.

Teacher: That is because for one rule there are many minor offenses.

Student: It¡¦s 91 billion.

Student: It¡¦s 91 trillion.

Teacher: I don¡¦t know.

Student: Million, billion, trillion. That¡¦s right. No, it¡¦s only billion.

Teacher: So we take pride in saying, ¡§I am keeping 91 billion precepts.¡¨

Now in paragraph 134 ¡§The magnanimous ordinary man¡¦s virtue, which from the time of Order is devoid even of the stain of a (wrong) thought because of its extreme purity, like a g water.¡¨ ¡¥Gem of purest water¡¦ - what does that mean? It doesn¡¦t make sense. It should b well-polished¡¦. That is the meaning. It can be well-polished or well-washed.

Then there is a story. I will skip the story. The stories are not difficult to understand.

Then there are more stories on page 48 in paragraph 137. This is the story of a monk who asked the robbers to let him practice meditation for the night. He practiced meditation on pai broken bones. At dawn he became an Arahant. He meditated on the pain. Pain became his

On page 49 the quotation from Pa?isambhid? is not so easy to understand. We can skip it killing living beings, (a) abandoning is virtue, (b) abstention is virtue, (c) volition is virtue, (d) restraint is virtue, (e) non-transgression is virtue.¡¨ Then the others are given one by one - ¡§ of taking what is not given, in the case of sexual misconduct, in the case of false speech¡¨ a in the case of first jh?na the abandoning of hindrances is virtue. In the case of second jh?na of applied (vitakka) and sustained (vic?ra) thought is virtue and so on.

In paragraph 141 ¡§And here there is no state called ¡¥abandoning¡¦ other than the mere r killing of living things, etc., as stated.¡¨ ¡¥Abandoning¡¦ really means not letting them arise. I arisen, then they have already arisen, and you cannot do anything about them.

We come to the end of the questions and answers - ¡§What is Virtue? In what sense is it v on.

¡§What is the defiling of it?¡¨ and ¡§What is the cleansing of it?¡¨ Monks are exhorted to ke intact, to keep their s?la very pure. The ideal state is that the precepts are not broken anywh explained here.

¡§When a man has broken the training course at the beginning or at the end in any instanc classes of offenses, his virtue is called ¡¥torn¡¦, like a cloth that is cut at the edge.¡¨ His virtu be untorn. If it is broken at the beginning or at the end, it is called ¡¥torn s?la¡¦.

¡§But when he has broken it in the middle, it is called ¡¥rent¡¦, like a cloth that is rent in the
When he has broken it twice or thrice in succession, it is called ¡¥blotched¡¦, like a cow whos such color as black or red with a discrepant color appearing on the back or the belly. When (all over) at intervals, it is called ¡¥mottled¡¦, like a cow speckled (all over) with discrepant-co spots at intervals. This in the first place is how there comes to be tornness the breach that h as its cause.¡¨

¡§And likewise with the seven bonds of sexuality¡¨ - it means the seven kinds of engageme ¡§here, brahman, some ascetic or brahman claims to lead the life of purity rightly.¡¨ It is a litt inaccurate. It should say ¡¥some ascetic or brahman claiming to lead the life of purity rightly not.¡¦ It should go like that. ¡§Some ascetic or brahman claiming to lead the life of purity righ not enter into actual sexual intercourse with women. Yet he agrees to massage, manipulatio rubbing down by women.¡¦ In our country these are called ¡¥minor sexuality¡¦. It is not sexua but they pertain to sexuality. So these seven things, massage etc. are called ¡¥minor sexual person may not break the rule which forbids sexual intercourse, if he is thinking of this, then said to be ¡¥impure¡¦. It is not broken, but it becomes impure because he is thinking of these taking delight in massage etc. being done to him. This is a kind of sexuality. These things ar sexuality¡¦ in our country. If we want to keep s?la pure, then we must avoid doing these thing

In paragraph 154 about the middle ¡§owing to that unvirtuousness he is ugly as hemp clot is painful because those who fall in with his views¡¨ - ¡¥fall in with his views¡¦, what is that? W that mean?

Student: To agree with him.

Teacher: The P??i word means to imitate him, to follow his conduct. Sometimes the P??i wo if you do not know the exact formation of these words. The P??i word here is di??h?nugati. di??hi?nugati or di??h?nugati. It really is di??h?nugati and not di??hi?nugati. Venerable N? be di??hi?nugati. That¡¦s why you see the word ¡¥view¡¦ here. ¡¥Di??hi¡¦ means wrong view.
word is to be separated as di??h? ?nugati. ¡¥Di??h?¡¦ means what is seenand ¡¥?nugati¡¦ m following what is seen - that means following his conduct. Is there a good word for that?

Student: Imitating.

Teacher: So ¡§Those imitating his conduct are brought to long-lasting suffering in the states

¡§He is like a log from a pyre.¡¨ The reference is not 99 but 90.

Paragraph 155, do you understand that passage? ¡§Now the Blessed One has shown tha have their minds captured by pleasure and satisfaction in the indulgence of the five cords of in (receiving) salutation, in being honored, etc., the result of that kamma, directly visible in al very violent pain, with that (kamma) as its condition, capable of producing a gush of hot bloo agony of the heart with the mere recollection of it.¡¨

I have a fresh translation of that. ¡§Now the Blessed One who has directly seen the result ways (Buddha has seen kamma and its results in all ways.) and wanting to show the very bi experienced by unvirtuous persons whose minds are captured by pleasure and satisfaction said: (Then what kind of pain?) pain which is caused by pleasure and satisfaction in the indu five cords of sensual desires (When a person indulges in these sensual desires, then there pain.)caused by pleasure and satisfaction in receiving salutation.¡¨ Suppose that I am a mo broken the most important rules. Actually I am not a monk at all, but I claim myself to be a m receive salutation and bowing down from lay people. As a result of that, I may suffer in hell o states. ¡§Caused by pleasure and satisfaction in receiving salutations or being honored, etc. that kamma directly visible in all ways, is very violent pain, with that kamma as condition, ca producing a gush of hot blood by causing agony of heart with the mere recollection of unvirtu Suppose I am unvirtuous. When i think of my unvirtuousness, I will have remorse and depre me to vomit blood. So it is capable of producing a gush of hot blood by causing agony of the mere recollection of unvirtuousness. This kind of pain, very bitter pain, is to be experienced are unvirtuous and whose minds are captured by pleasure and satisfaction mentioned above translated that way although it is a little odd.

Devoid of Say?daw¡¦s explanations I believe the fresh translation is the following: ¡§Now t who has directly seen the result of kamma in all ways and wanting to show the very bitter pa experienced by unvirtuous persons whose minds are captured by pleasure and satisfaction said: pain which is caused by pleasure and satisfaction in the indulgence of the five cords of caused by pleasure and satisfaction in receiving salutation, or being honored, etc., the resul directly visible in all ways, is very violent pain, with that kamma as condition, capable of proc of hot blood by causing agony of heart with the mere recollection of unvirtuousness."

In paragraph 158 one word is missing. The word ¡¥therefore¡¦ should stand at the head of should read ¡§Therefore, what pleasure has a man of broken virtue¡¨ and so on. The advant and the disadvantage of being unvirtuous, these two are given here.

Towards the end of the verses ¡§He is not free from any sort of terror¡¨. It could be translat sort of danger¡¨. In the fourth line of this paragraph it says, ¡§He is well set upon the road to all the woeful states are meant by hell, it would be all right. Here what is meant is not hell on other woeful states also. There are four woeful states.

In paragraph 159 midway through the verses ¡§There are no cankers here and now¡¨. It sh no dangers here and now¡¨ not ¡¥cankers¡¦. ¡§there are no dangers here and now to plague all.¡¨

I think that is it for the first chapter. You have seen that mostly virtue for monks or precepts is what is treated mostly in this chapter. Some advice is applicable to the virtue of lay people nuns and so on. Much is only for monks. For lay persons the keeping of five precepts is just said that a person who claims himself to be a disciple of the Buddha should keep his moral c means he should keep five precepts. If you take five precepts before going to practice medit right.

For lay people it is easier to have purification of morals, purity of moral conduct, than monk disadvantage here. Monks have so many rules to keep. If they have broken some rules and these offenses, then that state can be a block to their concentration and progress. They mus if the offenses are graver, they must do something like living under probation for some perio not so easy for monks to have complete purity of morals as it is for lay people. For lay peopl may have broken rules in the past, before practice of meditation if they take precepts and m keep them, that is enough for them. Purity of morals for the practice of meditation is easier fo than for monks.

OK. Any questions?

Student: So why does anyone want to become a monk?

Teacher: A monk has fewer things to worry about. Monks have more time to devote to the st
That is why I said in one of the talks that those monks who study the Visuddhi Magga either robes or go into the forest and practice meditation.

Next week we go to ascetic practices.

S?dhu! S?dhu! S?dhu!

Chapter 2
(Tape 5 / Ps: 1- 46)

Today we come to the second chapter which deals with the ascetic practices. They are giv practice of these helps us to further scrape away the mental defilements. First we need the p or moral conduct. In addition to that we need to practice some of these ascetic practices so t least diminish the mental defilements.

In this chapter thirteen ascetic practices are treated. It is said in the book that these thirtee practices were allowed by the Buddha. In Vinaya Pi?aka and also in Sutta Pi?aka these prac They are not precepts. We practice them not as precepts but as something in addition to the are all together thirteen of them. A list of them is given in the book in paragraph 2. They are refuse-rag-wearer¡¦s practice, 2. The triple-robe-wearer¡¦s practice, 3. The alms-food-eater¡¦
The house-to-house-seeker¡¦s practice, 5. The one-sessioner¡¦s practice, 6. The bowl-food-e 7. The later-food-refuser¡¦s practice, 8. The forest dweller¡¦s practice, 9. The tree-root-dwelle practice, 10. The open-air-dweller¡¦s practice, 11. The charnel-ground-dweller¡¦s practice, 12 any-bed-user¡¦s practice, 13. The sitter¡¦s practice.

In the Visuddhi Magga the meaning of the words or the meaning of the names is explained practice itself is explained. The explanation of the names is mostly with regard to the P??i la Therefore the translation may be a little awkward.

The first one is called ¡¥the refuse-rag-wearer¡¦s practice. Before the robes given by lay pe allowed by the Buddha, monks had to collect the robes themselves. That means they had to rubbish heap or charnel ground or whatever and pick up pieces of cloth thrown away by peo away the parts that were weak. Then they would take the good parts and put them together of them. That is the way monks obtained robes before the Buddha allowed robes to be given

Actually Buddha did not refuse to allow robes for monks to be given by lay people, but no So Buddha did not lay down any rule. Then at one time the great physician, J?vaka, got two cloth. So he went to the Buddha and requested the Buddha to accept the cloth. Then he req allow the monks to accept robes offered by lay people. From that time on monks were free t by lay people or to collect pieces of cloth and make them into robes.

The first ascetic practice is the practice of the refuse-rag-wearer. That means if a monk un practice this ascetic practice, he must not accept robes from lay people. Instead he must pic a robe and make his own robe.

In the book in paragraph 15 there are 23 sources of robes or actually of material that can b robes. The first one is one from a charnel-ground. The second one is from a shop and so on described in the Visuddhi Magga. These 23 are the sources of material for robes allowed for those who undertake this practice.

After explaining these 23 sources of material for robes the author gives some explanation
Let us go to paragraph 19. ¡§One given thus ¡¥We give to the Order¡¦ or got by those who g is not a refuse-rag.¡¨ People sometimes give robes to the Community, to the Order, not to ar

So the Order accepts these robes. When there are enough robes to be distributed, the distri A robe which has been given to the Sa~gha and which is got by the monk who practices this refuse-rag. He must not use such a robe that is received as a share from the Sa~gha.

Suppose there are ten monks living at a monastery and there are ten robes. One of the m the robes to the different monks. The best robe goes to the eldest monk according to the se monk.

Then sometimes it seems that monks go out for alms-cloth. That means that they go out to instead of alms. The usual thing is that we go out every morning for alms. We pick up our bo the city to receive alms. Here they go out not for alms but for robes. A robe received in eithe is not a refuse-rag.

In the 23 sources of materials for robes there is one which is mentioned as a robe of a bhi
That means a robe given by a monk to another monk who undertakes this practice. With reg something to know.

In this passage in about two sentences Venerable N??amoli misunderstood the P??i word following his translation. A monk may give a robe to a monk who is undertaking this practice non-dhuta~ga monk (That means this monk is not practicing ascetic practices.) gives the rob monks (These monks practice the ascetic practices.), when he gives the robe to the dhuta~g according to seniority of the dhuta~ga monks, then that robe is not a refuse-rag. That robe is for that monk. There are people who build a monastery or a building. They decide that they the monks that will live in their monastery. That kind of robe is also not a refuse-rag. So if no monk gives robes to dhuta~ga monks, he must give them not according to seniority, but give gift. That is what is meant here.

In Venerable N??amoli¡¦s translation he misunderstood one word. ¡§And in the case of one bhikkhu, one given after it has been got (at a presentation of robes by householders), at the rains.¡¨ That is quite wrong. There is the P??i word ¡¥vassa¡¦. It means rain or it means year meaning is year. Also it means a year spent as a monk. If somebody asked me, ¡§How man I would say, ¡§I have 41 vassas.¡¨ That means I have 41 years as a monk. When the robes a are distributed according to seniority. Suppose there are 100 monks but only 50 robes. The distributed to the 50 most senior monks. They will stop there. When they get more robes, the 51st monk and so on. This is how robes given to the Order are distributed. When they distrib distribute according to seniority.

The P??i word ¡¥vassa¡¦ here means years spent as a monk and not ¡¥at the end of the ra interesting, but it is funny. The word is ¡¥vassagga¡¦. ¡¥Vassa¡¦ can mean rains, year, or yea monk. ¡¥Agga¡¦ can mean the end, but it is not usual that it means end. ¡¥Agga¡¦ means the to mean ¡¥the edge of the rains¡¦ or ¡¥the end of the rains¡¦. It is quite wrong. Here ¡¥agga¡¦ the edge. ¡¥Agga¡¦ is something like a portion or a proportion, proportion as the vassa. And does not mean rainy season but the years spent as a monk.

So when the non-dhuta~ga monk gives robes to dhuta~ga monks, he must not give accor the dhuta~ga monks. He must give them away. That is the meaning here. That is a robe giv monk to a dhuta~ga monk.

Now if that non-dhuta~ga monk got the robe when the lay people put the robe at his feet, r (The lay people put the robe at his feet and the monk picks up.), if it is that way and the non-into the hand of the dhuta~ga monk, then it is called ¡¥pure in one way¡¦. When a robe is put monk, it is called ¡¥pure¡¦. When it is given into the hand of a monk, it is not called ¡¥pure¡¦. pure in one way.

Then if lay people offer robes into the hands of a monk and that monk puts the robe at the dhuta~ga monk, it also is ¡¥pure¡¦ in one way only. If the lay people put the robe at the feet o that monk gives to the dhuta~ga monk by putting the robe at the feet of the dhuta~ga monk, called ¡¥pure¡¦ in both ways.

The robe which is put into the hand of a non-dhuta~ga monk and then is put into the hand is a not so good robe. Let me see. It is not a ¡¥strict man¡¦s robe¡¦.

The practitioners of this dhuta~ga are divided into three: the best one, the medium one an Three grades are given here.

¡§Herein, one who takes it only from a charnel ground is strict.¡¨ He is the best one. He tak a charnel ground only. It is impossible nowadays. Even in our country it is impossible. In the people wrapped the body with cloth and left it at the cemetery. The body was neither buried the monks could pick up such cloth from the charnel ground. So nowadays there can be no monk with regard to this particular practice.

¡§One who takes one left (by someone, thinking) ¡¥One gone forth will take it¡¦ is medium. somebody leaves the robe somewhere so that some monks can see. So when the monks se
If a dhuta~ga monk takes that robe he is said to be of medium grade.

¡§One who takes one given by being placed at his feet (by a bhikkhu) is mild.¡¨ So there a in every one of the 13 practices. There are three grades of practitioners.

The benefits of the practice are given. ¡§He actually practices in conformity with the Deper are four kinds of Dependence for monks - clothing, food, dwelling place and medicine. They ¡¥Dependence¡¦. When a monk depends upon the cloth got from a charnel ground and so o practicing in conformity with the teaching of this dependence.

¡§He is established in the first of the Noble One¡¦s Heritages.¡¨ The reference is given here There are four Noble One¡¦s Heritages. That is to be content with whatever robes one gets, whatever food one gets, to be content with whatever dwelling place one gets, and practicing is for monks. These are called the ¡¥Four Heritages of the Noble Ones¡¦. The Commentator established in the first of the Noble One¡¦s Heritages.¡¨ That is to be content with whatever r

The second one is the triple-robe-wearer¡¦s practice. There are three robes allowed for mo uses only three robes, then he is said to undertake this ascetic practice. Let me show you th This is the lower garment. This is one. This is the upper robe. It is twice the size of that one.

the usual two robes that we use everyday. There is another one called a ¡¥sa?gh??i¡¦ in P?? layers. We call it a ¡¥double-robe¡¦. It has more sections than the other robe. That robe has sections or five rooms. We call them ¡¥rooms¡¦. This may have about 25.
Student: Who makes these robes?
Teacher: Lay people now make them commercially. The sa?gh??i is actually used as a blan double-robe, so in winter we use them as a blanket. These three robes are allowed by the B

When he wanted to allow robes, the Buddha tried it himself. It is said in our books during t in the year, maybe December, he put on only one robe maybe during the night. He tried it ar with one robe for the first watch of the night. Then he felt cold. So he took another robe. He keep himself warm until the second watch of the night. Then he took another robe. Then tha maintain him until the third watch. At the end of the third watch he felt cold again. So he took So there were four robes. These four robes were allowable for the monks. These four robes two were made into one. We now have three robes. A monk who undertakes to wear only th robes, nothing to change - is called a monk who practices this kind of ascetic practice or dhu Student: I have a question. If someone wanted to become a monk and live strictly, it might b Buddha was not in Alaska.
Teacher: That¡¦s right. You know I am wearing this shirt here and this hat. I would never use Myanmar. We have to adapt to the climate of the place we live in. Buddha lived in India. Indi as America or as Alaska. We have to modify some of his sayings.

Maybe the minimum, the least of clothes, you can survive with is the idea. That should be Some people have ten or twelve sets of clothes maybe. They are actually not necessary. Wh necessity for you is one set of dress. It is something like that.

Monks had to dye the robes themselves in the olden days. At the time of dying first one dy cloth or inner garment. ¡¥Inner garment¡¦ means the smallest one or the upper garment. Hav should wear that round the waist and dye the other. When he dyes the robe, he puts on one other one. The other two robes can be worn as an upper robe or as a lower garment at that robes can be worn as an upper robe or as a lower garment at that moment. After he finishes the other robe, he dyes the other one and so on.

This is mentioned here in paragraph 24. The ¡¥cloak of patches¡¦ is the sa?gh??i. ¡§But he to wear the cloak of patches round the waist.¡¨ It should not be used as a lower garment eve sa?gh??i should never serve as a lower garment. ¡§This is the duty when in an abode inside means inside a village or close to a village. ¡§But it is allowable for him in the forest to wash together.¡¨ He may have nothing to put on, but since he is in the forest, he could do that. ¡§H should sit in a place near (to the robes) so that, if he sees anyone, he can pull a yellow cloth himself.¡¨
Student; Why is this color used?
Teacher: I think it is easy to get this color and it may be considered appropriate for those wh behind the home life and that have gone into the homeless life. The color is actually someth and brown. No specific color is mentioned, but it must not be bright yellow. It must not be blu somewhere between yellow and brown. We get the dye from the back of a certain tree, from jack-fruit tree. I¡¦ve asked people here whether they know the jack-fruit tree and they have s Jack-fruit is similar to bread-fruit tree. The outer skin of the fruit has something like thorns, b sharp thorns. It is a tropical fruit. The inner core of that tree is a dark brown color. We take th core and chop it into small pieces. From these we get the dye. When the cloth is dyed with t to resemble something like the color of these robes.

A monk who undertakes this practice can have a fourth robe or fourth piece of cloth. That here. It is called a shoulder cloth. That is just a piece of cloth, one span wide and three cubit a piece of cloth to wrap around his body - to keep warm and also to soak up sweat so it doe outer robe. So only this fourth piece of cloth is allowed for him.

The next one is alms-food-eater¡¦s practice. If a monk undertakes this practice, he must go everyday. He must not accept invitations. Four kinds of food are mentioned that are not acce paragraph 27 now this alms-food-eater should not accept the following 14 kinds of meal: a m Order, a meal offered to specified bhikkhus (There is one monk who assigns monks to acce a particular monk to accept food at a certain man¡¦s house. That kind of food is called that o specified monk.), an invitation, a meal given by a ticket (that means by lot or by ticket.), one half-moon day (That means once in a fortnight. Some people offer food once in a fortnight.), day (That means the same thing except it is the full-moon day or the new-moon day.), one e half-moon (that means one day after the full-moon and new-moon.), a meal given for visiting traveling monks, a meal for sick monks, a meal for those who are nursing sick monks, a mea particular residence (a particular vih?ra), a meal given in a principal house (That means the the village.), and a meal given in turn (By turns people give meals or food.). ¡§ These are the meals or food which a dhuta~ga monk must not accept. He must go out for alms and accept houses which he goes to.

There are also three grades in this practice. ¡§One who is strict takes alms brought both fr from behind.¡¨ Do you understand that? ¡¥From before and from behind¡¦ means - suppose front of this house. If he is standing in front of this house and if a person from the house beh food, that means ¡¥food from behind¡¦ and ¡¥food from before¡¦ means food from the next ho strict takes alms brought both from before and behind.

¡§He gives the bowl to those who take it while he stands outside a door.¡¨ He stands at th come out and say ¡§Please give us your bowl. We want to fill your bowl with food.¡¦ He will g them. That is allowable for him.

¡§But he does not take alms by sitting (and waiting for it to be brought later) that day. The takes it as well by sitting (and waiting for it to be brought later) that day; but he does not con being brought the next day.¡¨ He does not consent to be waiting the next day. ¡§The mild or (being brought) on the next day and on the day after. Both these last miss the joy of an inde You know sometimes I cannot do what I want to do because I have accepted an invitation a invitation. Something like that is meant here.

¡§Both these last miss the joy of an independent life. There is perhaps, a preaching on the Heritages in some village. The strict one says to the others ¡¥Let us go, friends, and listen to One of them says ¡¥I have been made to sit (and wait) by a man, venerable sir¡¦, and the oth consented to (receive) alms tomorrow, venerable sir¡¦. So they are both losers.¡¨ They both opportunity to go to the Dhamma talk. ¡§the other wanders for alms in the morning and then the taste of the Dhamma.¡¨

Let¡¦s read the benefits. ¡§He actually practices in conformity with the Dependence becaus ¡¥The Going Forth¡¦ by depending on eating the lumps of alms food; he is established in the Noble One¡¦s Heritages; his existence is independent of others; it is a requisite recommende One thus ¡¥Valueless, easy to get, blameless¡¦; idleness is eliminated; livelihood is purified; of the minor Training Rules of the P??imokkha is fulfilled (These minor Training Rules say th for alms. When you go for alms, you must be mindful.); he is not maintained by another (he upon another.); he helps others; pride is abandoned; craving for tastes is checked; the traini about eating as a group, substituting one meal (invitation for another), and good behaviour a contravened.¡¨

Here also the translator misunderstood one word. This sentence refers to three precepts monks. One rule says that if a group is invited, they must not go in a group and accept the fo one by one but not as a group. ¡¥A group¡¦ here means four monks or more.

¡¥Substituting one meal invitation for another¡¦ means accepting a later invitation. For exar comes to me and invites me to take food. Then another man comes and invites me to accep second invitation and actually accept the food of the second man, then I break this rule. Tha meant here. ¡¥Substituting¡¦ here means not accepting or taking the food of the first man, bu of the second man. That is why we have to be careful about invitations. It is on a first come f basis. We are not to skip one invitation in favor of another, in favor of the later invitation.

¡¥Good behaviour¡¦ is not good behaviour. He misunderstood the word ¡¥carita¡¦. There is forbids monks to visit houses either before or after taking a meal at a house. Suppose that I take a meal at a house. Before taking a meal at that house, I must not visit another house. A meal at that house, I must not visit another house. If I want to visit, then I must inform anothe ¡§Venerable sir, I am going to visit that house.¡¨ If he informs another monk who is close to h all right. If there are no monks or if he does not inform another monk, either before or after ta in that house, then he breaks that rule. That rule in P??i is called ¡¥carita¡¦. ¡¥Carita¡¦ can m behaviour. It can also mean wandering, going about. Here it is the second meaning, so visiti of these three rules is referred to here - accepting food as a group, accepting later invitation houses before or after taking a meal at the appointed house. If you go for alms every day, yo worry about any of these rules. You will not break any of these rules because you do not acc but you go out for alms. So there can be no breech of the rules if you undertake the practice alms every day.

The next one is the house-to-house-seeker¡¦s practice. That means if a monk undertakes t must not skip a house. Suppose he walks down one street. If there are ten houses on the st at ten houses. He must stop at each house. He must not skip this house and go to the next h is meant by a house-to-house-seeker.

The Commentator gives some advice here. First he must look to see if the road is clear. If he must not take that road. He must take another one. If he does not get food at a certain ho houses every day, then he may regard those houses as ¡¥not houses¡¦. He can skip those h day they do not give him food. In that case he can skip.

Let us look at the benefits in paragraph 33 about the third or fourth line. ¡§He avoids the da being supported by a family.¡¨ That is not correct here. He always makes this mistake. ¡§He in frequenting families.¡¨ A monk who frequents families is considered a bad monk, a monk w well. But if he goes for alms, he does not have to visit them. He avoids the danger of being i families or lay people.

The next ascetic practice is the one-sessioner¡¦s practice. That means eating at one sitting the one-sessioner sits down in the sitting hall, instead of sitting on an elder¡¦s seat, he shoul which seat is likely to fall to him and sit down on that.¡¨ In a monastery where many monks li a dining hall, the monks sit according to seniority. He must go a little early and try to find a p he will not have to give his seat to a senior monk. Monks sit according to seniority. After he h his teacher or his preceptor arrives and the meal is still unfinished (He sat down and is still e is allowable for him to get up and do the duties. Actually it is not only allowable, but he shou get up and do the duties. We have duties to our teachers and our preceptors. If we are sittin or a preceptor comes in, we must stand up and greet him and do whatever we can for his co sitting and eating, and his teacher or preceptor comes and he is a one-sitting-eater, he shou the duty. After getting up, he must not eat again.

¡§But the Elder Tipi?aka Cula-Abhaya said ¡¥He should either keep his seat (and finish his gets up he should leave the rest of) his meal (in order not to break the ascetic practice).¡¨ He either of the two. He should ignore his duty to his teachers and go on eating or he should ge duties for his teachers and forfeit the meal. ¡§And this is one whose meal is still unfinished, t him do the duties, but in that case let him not eat the (rest of the) meal.¡¨ This is what the El Student: How long would one undertake these practices?

Teacher: As long as one wants to. There is no fixed duration of time.

Student: Is this usual?

Teacher: Now it is very unusual. Monks do not practice this much now. Out of the 13 the one practice most are eating at one sitting, one bowl eating, sometimes staying at a cemetery, s under a tree, but not for long.

Student: Do you choose one at a time, or two, or three?

Teacher: You may practice two, or three, or four. We will come to that later. It is said that if y suitable place such as an open-air-place close to a cemetery you can practice all 13 at the s

Elder Mah? Kassapa is said to have practiced all 13 practices all through his life. He was the those who undertake the ascetic practices.

¡§One who is strict may not take anything more than the food that he has laid his hand on little or much. And if people bring him ghee, etc., thinking ¡¥The Elder has eaten nothing¡¦, w allowable for the purpose of medicine, they are not so for the purpose of food.¡¨ As medicine allowable but not as food.

¡§The medium one may take more as long as the meal in the bowl is not exhausted; for he stops when the food is finished¡¦. The mild one may eat as long as he does not get up from either ¡¥One who stops with the water¡¦ because he eats until he takes (water for) washing t who stops with the session¡¦ because he eats until he gets up.¡¨

There is a joke among monks that you can sit from morning until noon and eat as much as not break your sitting position, you can sit from morning until noon.

¡§The benefits are these. He has little affliction and little sickness; he has lightness, streng happy life; there is no contravening (rules) about food that is not what is left over from a mea about that later.); his life conforms to the (principles of) fewness of wishes, and so on.¡¨ Thes benefits for the one-session-eater or the one-sitting-eater.

The next one is the one-bowl-eating practice. It is not so easy. You use only one bowl whe

¡§When at the time of drinking rice-gruel, the bowl-food eater gets curry that is put in a dis first either eat the curry or drink the rice-gruel.¡¨ He may not eat both at the same time. He m rice-gruel first and then eat the fish curry.

¡§If he puts it in the rice-gruel, the rice-gruel becomes repulsive when a curry made with cu etc., is put into it.¡¨ In Burma we have what we call ¡¥fish paste¡¦. It is very smelly. ¡§So it is (to do this) only in order to use it without making it repulsive. Consequently this is said with r such curry as that. But what is not repulsive, such as honey, sugar, etc., should be put into i taking it should be the right amount.¡¨

¡§It is allowable to take green vegetables with (one) hand and eat them.¡¨ But he ¡¥should ¡¥unless¡¦. ¡§But he should not do so for they should be put into the bowl.¡¨ ¡¥Unless he doe correct here. Although he can take or put the vegetable in his hand, it is not proper for him to should put it in the bowl.

¡§Because a second vessel has been refused, it is not allowable (to use) anything else, no of a tree.¡¨ Sometimes people use the leaf of a tree as a bowl or as a receptacle. Even that i

There are three grades. ¡§Herein, for one who is strict, except at the time of eating sugarc allowed (while eating) to throw rubbish away, and it is not allowed while eating to break up ri meat and cakes. (The rubbish should be thrown away and the rice-lumps etc., broken up be The medium one is allowed to break them up with one hand while eating and he is called a mild one is called a ¡¥Bowl Ascetic¡¦; anything that can be put into his bowl he is allowed, wh is allowed to break up (rice-lumps, etc.) with his hand or (such things as palm sugar, ginger, teeth.¡¨

¡§The moment any one of these three agrees to a second vessel, his ascetic practice is br use only one bowl. In our country after taking a meal, we drink water. It is customary. When water, we put the water into the bowl and drink from the bowl. So when I saw Zen people ea bowls, washing their bowls, and then drinking water from their bowls, I was reminded of this have some connection with this practice.

Here the practice is to have only one bowl. You put everything into one bowl and eat from including water and other beverages.

¡§The benefits are these. Craving for variety of tastes is eliminated; excessiveness of wish abandoned; he sees the purpose and the (right) amount in nutriment.¡¨ ¡¥The right amount¡¦ meant here is that he sees the near purpose in taking food. Buddha said that monks must ta proud of themselves or to make merriment, just enough to keep themselves alive so that the Buddha¡¦s teachings. That is the purpose in food. Here I think ¡¥food¡¦ may be better than ¡¥ although it is not wrong. The purpose of taking food is not to beautify oneself, not to take pri strength and so on. Here he eats in only one bowl, so he cannot have that kind of pride and ¡§He is not bothered with carrying saucers, etc., about; his life conforms to the principles o wishes and so on.¡¨ One word is not translated. That word is that ¡¥He is not distracted while Because he uses only one bowl, he doesn¡¦t have to be looking for other bowls. So he is not word is missing in the translation. This is the one-bowl-eater.

The next one is the later-food-refuser¡¦s practice. It is difficult to understand this one. Whe eats and if he refuses to take some more, he must not eat other food after changing his post am sitting and I am eating. Somebody comes and offers something to me. I say, ¡§No, I don enough.¡¨ If I have done so, I can eat on until I finish my meal. That is so if I remain sitting. If up or if I walk and then want to eat again, I cannot eat. There must be some act of Vinaya to order for me to eat. That is what ¡¥later-food-refuser¡¦ means. As soon as I sit down, I am no refusing anything. But after eating something even one lump of food, and then I refuse, if I c position or posture, I cannot eat other food.

This monk who undertakes this ascetic practice cannot take food after having made it allow Suppose I refuse the offering. If I want to eat after breaking this posture, then I must take tha another monk and let him eat a little and say ¡§That is enough for me.¡¨ It is what is left over Then I can eat it.

It is something like a punishment. You refuse and then you want to eat. You must eat anot leftovers. It is something like that.

A monk who does not undertake this ascetic practice can eat that way if he wants to eat m undertakes this practice must not eat in this way. He must avoid picking up the food and goi and having him give what is left over. He cannot do that. That is what is meant here. The wo brackets I do not know from where he got them. They don¡¦t help much in understanding.

There are three grades here. ¡§There is no showing that he has had enough with respect t but there is when he refuses more while that is being swallowed.¡¨ That means in the rule it monk who refuses while eating or a monk after he has started eating, so if he has not eaten be no refusal. He eats one lump and the next lump he refuses. So there can only be refusal other lumps. ¡§So when one who is strict has shown that he has had enough¡¨ (That means does not eat the second lump.¡¨ He must stop there. He has only one mouthful and then he

¡§The medium one eats also that food with respect to which he has shown that he has had medium one could go on eating.

¡§But the mild one goes on eating until he gets up from his seat.¡¨ That means he can eat likes provided that he does not change his posture.

This involves a certain rule. That rule says that if you have refused to accept something an to eat again, then you must do something if you change posture. That is why monks do not when something is offered to them. They may accept it even though they may not eat it. The ¡¥no¡¦ because that amounts to refusal. They cannot eat later.

There is something like talking in a roundabout way. In Burmese we have an expression fo goes around that road. When someone offers something to me, I will not say ¡¥no¡¦, but I wil like, directly translated, ¡¥It is complete¡¦ or something like that. Sometimes the lay people d monks¡¦ language. So I will say ¡¥It is complete.¡¦ or something like that and the lay person that I refuse to accept. So it is better to accept and then you can leave it. This is the later-food-refuser¡¦s practice. This practice involves a rule in the P??imokkha.

OK. I think we should stop here. It will take two weeks to finish this chapter.

Student: Are the other practices from the P??imokkha too?

Teacher: No. These practices are not from the P??imokkha.

Student: But you said this one was.

Teacher: This one involves a P??imokkha rule. The P??imokkha rule is that I must not eat if Even though I have refused if I want to eat later, I can have it made left over by another mon this practice, then I cannot do that.

Student: it would seem from this that fasting is not permissible as a practice.

Teacher: Fasting?

Students: Not eating.

Teacher: Not eating altogether?

Student: Just drinking water.

Teacher: No. That is not accepted.

Student: Even for one, or two, or three days?

Teacher: It is OK to fast if you want to but not as a practice because one has to eat to keep in Buddhism is fasting for half a day. When people keep eight precepts, they do not eat from next morning.

Student: Can you eat if you do not get alms-food in the morning?

Teacher: Then you must go without food. You cannot eat after noon on any account. Somet have to skip meals. You know when you board a plane they don¡¦t serve a meal until afterno

Student: In Burma you never have that problem.
Teacher: Yes because in Burma you always get enough to eat. People are very willing. They monks. So it is not a problem in Buddhist countries. But here and in other countries it can be Student: The robes are done commercially now. There is one season or festival when they c Teacher: No. Actually what lay people do is to make cloth not robes. Now is the season for c robes. Ka?hina robes are different from ordinary robes. The difference is that we must make day. Suppose a lay person comes to a monastery and offers not a finished robe but the cloth Ka?hina robe. If we accept it, then we must finish it that day. It must become a robe that day olden days when no ready-made robes were available or they do not want to offer ready-ma all the monks in the monastery must work together. Some boil dye. Some do stitching. Some on. Everyone must lend a hand.

Following that tradition people in Burma now have a festival weaving cloth. They transfer t ¡¥unstale¡¦ to their weaving. They try to weave from say 6pm until just before dawn the next a contest. Girls enter this contest weaving cloth for robes. I don¡¦t know how they decide the Actually the word ¡¥unstale¡¦ is used among monks. That means we must make the robe c the cloth is accepted. It must not go ¡¥stale¡¦ into the next day. We call such a robe an ¡¥uns ¡¥unstale robe¡¦ is a robe that is made on the same day.

People now say that they are offering ¡¥¡¦unstale robes¡¦. But actually what they do is just and the monks have to do that. Now we are in better shape because now there are ready-m have to do anything. But sometimes people want monks to do something as they did in the c living in my country in Sagaing a certain head of a monastery said why not do something like olden days. So he had people bring cloth to the monastery. It was a great work because eve of the robe has to be dyed two or three times, not just one time. If there was rain, it would be difficult. It was lucky that it was in Upper Burma. We were able to finish the robe in time. It w dry, but it could be used as a robe.

That is why there are commercial robes. Now monks do not know how to make robes - the parts or how to stitch them. Most monks do not know that now.

When I first came to this country, people asked me to order robes from Burma. I said why here. So I gave them the dimensions of the robes.
Student: What are the rectangles in the robe?
Teacher: Actually they represent according to our books the patterns of the fields. Buddha w was up on a mountain. He looked down and saw the fields. You know fields are small in Indi in the United States. Here machines are used so fields may be two or three miles long. Then only ten or twenty yards wide. So the Buddha saw these boundaries of the fields. Then the B Venerable ?nanda if he could make a robe like this. Venerable ?nanda said yes he could. So made a robe which looked like the pattern of the fields.

We usually have five sections for this robe. This is one section. There is some stitching. Th section. The third section is wider than the other two. There is a small room here. There are section. These stitches must be cut and then stitched together again. But nowadays they do fold it and stitch it.

Student: The idea is that you get pieces of cloth from where ever.
Teacher: That¡¦s right. You may not get the right size. You have to pick up small pieces of cl them into a robe.
Student: Does everybody follow the same pattern?
Teacher: Yes. This has more sections. The number of sections is odd - 7,9,11, 13, 15. OK.

S?dhu! S?dhu! S?dhu!

(Tape 6 / Ps: 47-93)

Today we come to the forest-dweller¡¦s practice. Before we study the forest-dweller¡¦s prac understand which is a forest and which is a village in contrast to the forest. In order to under village we need to understand the precincts of a house - what is a house, what is its precinc village, and then a forest.

A village is a habitation of human beings. It may consist of only one house or many house wall surrounding it or there may be no wall. Human beings may be living there or may not be the present moment. Even a caravan is called a ¡¥village here if it has been inhabited for at months. Such a place is called a ¡¥village¡¦.

Then the Visuddhi Magga describes the precincts of a village. You will find that in paragra precinct of a village is determined according to whether a village has a wall surrounding it or a wall surrounding it, and if it has two gate-posts like that of the city of Anur?dhapura in Sr?
Anur?dhapura is an ancient city. It was the place or stronghold of Therav?da Buddhism in S that city that the great monastery was situated where Venerable Buddhaghosa went. He got monks there to compile the Commentaries. It seems that there were two gate-posts, one ins person standing not between the gate-posts as is stated in the translation, but a person star gate-posts (So gate-posts may be two - one is the outer gate-posts, the other is the inner ga throw a stone.

How the stone should be thrown - there is a difference of opinion here. Those who are wel said that they should throw the stone as when they want to show their strength. That means the stone with their maximum strength. The place where the stone falls is called the ¡¥precin village¡¦.

However those who are well-versed in Suttanta said that the stone should not be thrown in said it should be thrown just as when you scare away the crows. You may not use much stre away the crows. In that way where the stone falls is the precinct of a village. That is with reg village which has a wall around it.

What about the village which has no wall? There must be an outermost house. From the p outermost house one must throw a stone in the same way. So we have a house, a precinct a precinct of a village. Now someone standing at the precinct of a house throws a stone an

That is a village. Then there is another throw of a stone and that is the precinct of the village with regard to villages that have no walls surrounding them. Outside that area it is called a ¡¥

What is a forest? According to Vinaya a ¡¥forest¡¦ means a place other than a village and t village.

Student: Does ¡¥precinct¡¦ just mean boundary?

Teacher: It¡¦s not boundary. It is some area which belongs to the village. It is not the village it is the vicinity of a village, the area of a village.

Student: I guess here they would call it a sphere of influence.

Teacher: It is an area outside the village proper, but it is supposed to belong to the village. C area is what we call a ¡¥forest¡¦ here.

Forest according to Vinaya is one thing, to Suttanta it is another, and to Abhidhamma it is We have three kinds of forest. According to Vinaya a forest is something other than a village precinct. According to Abhidhamma an area outside the gate-posts, immediately outside the called a ¡¥forest¡¦. According to Suttanta there is still another definition of a village. We shall follow the Suttanta method here. By Suttanta method a forest is a place at least 500 bow-len village or village precincts. That bow should be the bow used by the teachers of archery. It is A strong bow is said to be about 4 cubits in length. That means about 6 feet. So we multiply about 3000 feet. So a forest is about 3000 feet from a village or the precinct of a village. Suc forest here.

If a forest monastery has no wall, then we have to measure from the outermost building. F we have someone throw a stone. And then from where that stone falls there is another throw these two stone throws there must be 3000 feet.

The way to throw the stone is as stated in the Majjhima Nik?ya and the Commentaries. Ro place called a ¡¥forest¡¦ should be away from human habitation about 3000 feet or 1000 yard than that, it is not called a ¡¥forest¡¦.

In paragraph 50 there is the following statement: ¡§This is the measure here¡¨. The P??i w pam??a which can mean measure and which can also mean means of right knowledge. In H of right knowledge - right knowledge by perception, by inference, by textual authority and so ¡¥measure¡¦ really means authority. So this is the authority. That means we have to follow th the Majjhima Nik?ya. ¡§In the Majjhima Commentary it is said that, omitting the precincts of the village, the distance to be measured is that between where the two stones fall.¡¨ That me fall from the monastery and stones that fall from the village. Between where these two stone be 500 bow-lengths.

Student: I don¡¦t know anybody who could throw a stone 2000 yards.

Teacher: No. It is `1000 yards from the stone-throws The stone-throw should not be 1000 y bow-lengths. You stand at the gate-post of a village and throw a stone. Then another person precinct of a forest monastery and throws a stone. Between these two stones there must be Student: Why does a religious document define such things? Was it because they were the time?

Teacher: That is not a government measurement. I think if it is about 1000 yards you get so don¡¦t hear much noise from the village in the olden days. Nowadays you can get noise eve planes, from loud-speakers. It is very difficult now to get a place which we can really call a ¡¥

¡§Even if the village is close by and the sounds of men are audible to people in the monas is not possible to go straight to it because of rocks, rivers, etc., in between, the 500 bow-len reckoned by that road (That means by the regular road.) even if one has to go by boat.¡¨ Ma road but if it is 500 bow-lengths away it is all right.

¡§But anyone who blocks the path to the village here and there for the purpose of (lengthe be able to say that he is) taking up the practice is cheating the ascetic practice.¡¨ The P??i w thief, so a thief of the ascetic practice.

I think the others are not difficult to understand. The best person, the strict person, should the dawn in the forest. He must be in the forest at the time of dawn. The medium one is allo village for the four months of the rain. When it is the rainy season, he can live in the monast one could stay in the Vih?ra for the winter months too. So he may live in the Vih?ra for four rainy season and four months of winter. He practices this ascetic practice for only four mont This is the mild one.

The benefits are not difficult to understand. This is the forest-dweller¡¦s practice.

The next is the tree-root-dweller¡¦s practice. It means living under a tree. That person shou certain kinds of trees given here. One should avoid a tree near a frontier because there can between two kings or two people that rule those places. He must avoid such a tree.

He must avoid a shrine-tree because people gather around that tree. He could not get sec

He should avoid a gum tree. That is dangerous. He should avoid a fruit tree, a bat¡¦s tree, (A ¡¥hollow tree¡¦ means one that has a hollow where snakes and other wild animals may liv standing in the middle of a monastery. Many people come to the monastery and so he may can choose a tree standing on the outskirts of a monastery (away from where people gather of tree he has to choose.

There are three grades. ¡§Herein, one who is strict is not allowed to have a tree that he ha up.¡¨ The strict one must live there just as it is. ¡§He can only move the fallen leaves with his dwelling there.¡¨ He must not make that place lovely and attractive.

¡§The medium one is allowed to get it tidied up only by those who happen to come along. take up residence there after summoning monastery attendants and novices and getting the level it, scattering sand and making a fence round with a gate fixed in it.¡¨ There are always people. The moment he enters a covered place he breaks his practice.

The next one is the open-air-dweller¡¦s practice. There is no building, no tree. He must live open-air. This may be possible only in the tropical countries of Asia, not in this country. He is enter the Uposatha-house. That is the house where monks assemble twice a month and rec P??imokkha and listen to the recitation. ¡§An open-air-dweller is allowed to enter the Uposa purpose of hearing the Dhamma or for the purpose of the Uposatha. If it rains while he is ins out when the rain is over instead of going out while it is still raining. He is allowed to enter th hall or the fire room (Fire room is the sweat room. It is something like a sauna.) in order to d or to go under a roof in order to ask elder bhikkhus in the eating hall about a meal (to invite t meal or to ask them what they want), or when teaching or taking lessons, or to take beds, ch that have been wrongly left outside.¡¨ For those purposes he can enter the place with a roof.

¡§If he is going along a road with a requisite belonging to a senior monk and it rains¡¨ - Tha taking some things of a senior monk. If he is doing so - ¡§he is allowed to go into a wayside he has nothing with him, he is not allowed to hurry in order to get to a rest-house; but he car normal pace and enter it and stay there as long as it rains.¡¨

Here also there are three grades. ¡§The strict one is not allowed to live near a tree, or a ro house.¡¨ He must be away from them. He must not live close to such things. ¡§He should ma out in the open and live in that.¡¨ That means a tent made out of cloth or robes. It may be us the wind, heat and cold.

¡§The medium one is allowed to live near a tree, or a rock, or a house so long as he is not them.¡¨ So he can live near these things.

¡§The mild one is allowed these: a (rock) overhang without a drip-ledge cut in it (It is some patio. When the raindrops fall, they flow away and not into that area.), a hut of branches, clo with paste, and a tent treated as a fixture, that has been left by field watchers, and so on.¡¨ T such a building. Then when they leave, they just leave that building. He can take up that bui

The next one is the charnel-ground-dweller¡¦s practice. ¡§The charnel-ground-dweller shou some place just because the people who built the village have called it ¡¥the charnel-ground charnel ground unless a dead body has been burnt on it.¡¨ When they first build a village, the space for a cemetery. If no dead body has yet been buried or cremated, then it is not yet a c least one body must have been burnt there. As soon as even one body has been burnt on it ground. Even if it has been neglected for a dozen years it is so still.¡¨

A person who dwells at a cemetery has to be very careful. He has to follow some kind of r who dwells there should not be the sort of person who gets walks, pavilions, etc., built, has b set out and drinking and washing water kept ready and preaches Dhamma (He must not do this practice is a momentous thing (It is a very important thing.).

¡§Whoever goes to live there should be diligent. And he should first inform the senior elder or the king¡¦s local representative in order to prevent trouble.¡¨ Sometimes thieves may frequ They may leave something there. When the owners come and the thieves have left, they ma thief. There is danger of being suspected. So a monk who is going to live in a cemetery shou senior monk at the monastery and also an official of the government.

¡§When he walks up and down, he should do so looking at the pyre with half an eye.¡¨ Tha the pyre and looks at the walkway, back and forth in that way.

¡§On his way to the charnel ground he should avoid the main roads and take a bypath. He the objects (there) while it is day.¡¨ So he must go there during the day and then make notes because if he does not make notes of things there and goes at night, he may get frightened there. So he has to make notes of all these things - ¡§so that they will not assume frightenin at night. Even if non-human beings wander about screeching, he must not hit them with any are supposed to be the place of ghosts and spirits. And they may make noise.

¡§It is not allowed to miss going to the charnel ground even for a single day. The reciters o A~guttara say that after spending the middle watch in the charnel ground, he is allowed to le watch.¡¨ A night is divided into three parts - first watch, second watch, and third watch. ¡§Sp middle watch in the charnel ground, he is allowed to leave in the last watch.¡¨ So the last wa 2-6am. From 6-10pm is the first watch and from 10pm-2am is the middle watch.

¡§He should not take such foods as sesamum flour, pease pudding, fish, meat, milk, oil, su are liked by non-human beings.¡¨ ¡¥He should not take¡¦ means he should not eat these thin these things to the cemetery. He cannot do that either.

Student: What is pease pudding?

Teacher: I don¡¦t know what that means. What does ¡¥pease¡¦ mean?

Student: Some sort of sesame.

Teacher: I think it is pea or it may be rice mixed with peas, m?sabhatta. In our countries peo with peas.

¡§He should not enter the homes of families.¡¨ The reason is given in the footnote. ¡§He sh families¡¦ houses because he smells of the dead and is followed by pis?ca goblins.¡¨

The strict one should stay where there is constant activity, where there are always burning and mourning. The medium one is allowed to live where there is one of these three - burning people crying. The mild one is allowed to live in a place that possesses the bare characteris ground already stated.¡¨ If the place is one where at least one dead body has been burned, place for him.

Student: ??? mindfully to see non-human beings?

Teacher: It is a belief that there are non-human beings at the charnel ground or cemetery. T themselves to the monk staying there. It is believed that ordinary human beings cannot see ghosts wish, they can show themselves to human beings. They can assume frightening feat people away from the charnel ground.

Student: What is the actual experience? Do monks really see spirits?

Teacher: They want to scare people away from the place, but a monk must be firm and not he must not hit them. If he wants to hit them, he must hit them with mett? (loving-kindness). loving-kindness is necessary for monks who live at cemeteries. This is undertaken as a spe shake away the defilements.

Student: You say this is a special practice. It sounds like the hate-type from among the three not go to the charnel ground. Maybe greedy people should go there.

Teacher: That¡¦s right. It is most suitable for those that are greedy.
The twelfth one is the any-bed-user¡¦s practice. Actually it does not necessarily mean ¡¥an means ¡¥any place to stay¡¦. It may be a small hut for him. When a person visits some mona a monk who is in charge of assigning places or huts to guest monks. If he is assigned a hut, that. The strict one must just take that; he must not refuse. He must not go and see before a is called ¡¥any-bed-user¡¦s¡¦ or ¡¥any-hut-user¡¦s practice¡¦.
¡§The any-bed-user should be content with whatever resting place he gets thus.¡¨ ¡¥Restin means a place for him to stay. ¡§ ¡¥This falls to your lot¡¦. He must not make anyone else sh bed).¡¨ Sometimes older monks have the right to claim a hut given to a younger monk. If he practice, then he must not do that. He just takes what is given to him or what falls to him.
There are three grades. ¡§Herein, one who is strict is not allowed to ask about the resting fallen to his lot ¡¥Is it far?¡¦ or ¡¥Is it too near?¡¦ or ¡¥Is it infested by non-human beings, snal on?¡¦ or ¡¥Is it hot?¡¦ or ¡¥Is it cold?¡¦.¡¨ He is not to do any of these things.
¡§The medium one is allowed to ask, but not to go and inspect it. The mild one is allowed t and, if he does not like it, to choose another.¡¨
Now the last one, the sitter¡¦s practice. That means he does not lie down at any time.
¡§The sitter can get up in any one of the three watches of the night and walk up and down is the only posture not allowed.¡¨ There are three grades once again. ¡§Herein, one who is strict is not allowed a back-rest, or binding-strap (to) prevent falling while asleep.¡¨ The back-rest is obvious. It is not difficult understand. The cloth band and the binding-strap are difficult to understand. The cloth band cloth you put around your body when you sit. It may be something like this - a cloth or a robe is a band, not necessarily a big cloth, but a band of cloth wrapped around the body. There is but it is not mentioned here. That is a hand-band. That means sitting this way. (The hands a to support the legs.) That is not allowed for monks.
Student: During meditation or at any time?
Teacher: It is not allowed at any time for monks.
Student: In our tradition we have something called a ¡¥chin-rest¡¦. It is a stick where you can chin.
Teacher: No. This is not a chin-rest. It is a cloth wrapped around the body or a band of cloth ¡§The medium one is allowed any one of these three. The mild one is allowed a back-rest, binding strip, a cushion, a ¡¥five-limb¡¦, and a ¡¥seven-limb¡¦. A ¡¥five-limb¡¦ is (a chair) made legs and) a support for the back. A ¡¥seven-limb¡¦ is one made with (four legs), a support for (arm) support on each side.¡¨ So most chairs here nowadays are seven-limb - four legs, bac support on each side. A mild one can use such a chair to sit on and to sleep in it (in a sitting may use a cushion.
¡§They made that, it seems for the Elder P??h?bhaya.¡¨ Some people made such a thing, for the Elder P??h?bhaya. He practiced that ascetic practice and meditation. He became a N attained Nibb?na. It is allowable to use such things when you take up this ascetic practice.

I think you have heard of the Say?daw at Taungpulu who was the founder of Taungpulu M Creek. He always undertook this practice. He never lied down to sleep for whatever reason. a chair or on a couch. All of his disciple monks have to undertake this kind of practice. It is n Student: Always?
Teacher: So you don¡¦t see a bed at Taungpulu Monastery. You see only chairs or somethin and they sleep this way, resting on the back-rest.

These are the thirteen ascetic practices which are said to shake off defilements. In order to defilements monks have to practice one, two or more of these ascetic practices as and when

Now we come to the explanation on miscellaneous aspects. The first one is treating asceti according to Abhidhamma. The first one is ¡¥As to the Profitable Triad¡¦. That is difficult to un ¡§Herein, to the Profitable Triad: all the ascetic practices, that is to say, those of Trainers, or and Men whose cankers have been destroyed, may be either profitable or (in the Arahant¡¦s indeterminate.¡¨ At the beginning of Abhidhamma the ultimate realities are treated in triads, triads. There are 21 such different triads. In the first triad it is said ¡§There are those that are there are those that are akusala and there are those that are neither kusala nor akusala.¡¨ If the ascetic practices according to this triad, it is said that the ascetic practices are either kus indeterminate (neither kusala nor akusala). There can be no akusala ascetic practice. When (puthujjana) who has not reached any stage of enlightenment and also those who have attai enlightenment but who are not Arahants (Sekhas) practice these ascetic practices, their acti belong to kusala. When the Arahants practice the ascetic practices, their practice belongs n nor to akusala. It is indeterminate (aby?kata). There can be no akusala in the ascetic practic

But there is someone who asks ¡§Can we practice one of these practices wit an evil purpo popular with people. I want to get gifts from them. I pretend to practice these ascetic practice there be akusala there? The answer is ¡¥no¡¦. Even though you can live in a forest with an a akusala consciousness, the ascetic practice itself cannot be akusala.

¡¥Ascetic practice¡¦ means the practice of an ascetic. An ascetic is one who shakes off aku who does not shake off akusala is not called ¡¥an ascetic¡¦. If he cannot be called ¡¥an asce practice cannot be called ¡¥an ascetic¡¦s practice¡¦. So ascetic practice cannot be akusala. It kusala or in P??i it is called aby?kata (indeterminate). ¡¥Aby?kata¡¦ or ¡¥indeterminate¡¦ mea kusala nor akusala.

Also an ascetic practice is defined as knowledge. Knowledge is called ¡¥an ascetic practic ¡¥Knowledge¡¦ here means pa???. ¡¥Pa???¡¦ means either kusala or indeterminate. There c akusala. Since ascetic practices are taken to be pa???, they cannot be akusala. So ascetic only kusala or aby?kata (wholesome or indeterminate).

There are some people who say that ascetic practices are out of this triad. They don¡¦t bel the triad. Ascetic practices do not belong to wholesome (kusala), unwholesome (akusala) or (aby?kata). They are outside these three.

There was a monastery in Anur?dhapura in Sr? Lanka which differed from the opinions of They held some views that were different from the views of the great monastery. Those peo ascetic practices do not belong to any of the three - neither to kusala, nor to akusala, nor to

The Commentator, Venerable Buddhaghosa, said if so it must be a concept. ¡¥Concept¡¦ a is not reality, is not paramattha. If it is not reality, how can it be practiced. Therefore we cann their opinion. Also if we take ascetic practices to be concept, to be non-existing, then there w contradiction with the words said by the Buddha - ¡§proceeded to undertake the ascetic qua ascetic practices should not be taken as pa??atti or as concept. Ascetic practices are to be kusala or aby?kata.

Then there are the explanations of the words: ¡¥ascetic¡¦, ¡¥ascetic practices¡¦, ¡¥those wh ascetic practices¡¦ and so on. They are not difficult to understand. Some people practice the not encourage others to practice. Some only encourage others to practice and do not practic

The examples are given here like the Venerable Bakkula in paragraph 82. ¡§One who has defilements with an ascetic practice but does not advise and instruct another in an ascetic p Venerable Bakkula, is ¡¥ascetic¡¦ but not a ¡¥preacher of asceticism¡¦.¡¨ He practiced himsel encourage others to practice.

Then the other is Upananda. He encouraged others to practice, but he did not practice him is another one who did not practice himself nor did he encourage others to practice.

The last one is the dhammasen?pati. What is that? The General of the Dhamma. Do you k Venerable S?riputta. Venerable S?riputta is always called in P??i ¡¥dhammasen?pati¡¦, ¡¥G Dhamma¡¦. Venerable ?nanda is called the ¡¥Treasurer of the Dhamma¡¦. He is the ¡¥Keepe ¡§Ascetic states: the five states that go with the volition of an ascetic practice, that is to say of wishes, contentment, effacement, seclusion, and that specific quality are called ¡¥ascetic of the words ¡¥Depending on fewness of wishes and so on¡¦.¡¨ I do not agree with the transla specific quality¡¦. The P??i word here is a strange word. It means desire for those practices, these wholesome states. It is desire to practice or desire for these wholesome states. Actua knowledge. It is explained later in paragraph 84.

The desire to practice or desire for wholesome states is knowledge. ¡§Herein, by means o shakes off greed for things that are forbidden. By means of non-delusion (knowledge) he sh delusion that hides the dangers in those same things.
And by means of non-greed he shakes off indulgence in pleasure due to sense desires that heading of using what is allowed.¡¨

Now let us look at the thirteen practices and who can practice which ones. Let us look at w for which person. They are suitable for one of greedy temperament and for one of deluded t are six temperaments. We will study them in the next chapter.

¡§Because the cultivation of ascetic practices is both a difficult progress (Actually it means practice. It is not an easy thing to take up ascetic practices.) and an abiding effacement; and with the difficult practice, while delusion is got rid of in those diligent by effacement. Or the c of the forest-dweller¡¦s practice and the tree-root-dweller¡¦s practice here are suitable (also) hating temperament; for hate too subsides in one who dwells there without coming into conf so he does not quarrel with any person. He might quarrel with himself.

¡§As to groups and also singly. Now 6 as to groups: these ascetic practices are in fact only to say three principal and five individual practices. Herein, the three, namely, the house-to-h practice, the one-sessioner¡¦s practice, and the open-air-dweller¡¦s practice, are principal pra one who keeps the house-to-seeker¡¦s practice will keep the alms-food-eater¡¦s practice, and bowl-food-eater¡¦s practice; and the later-food-refuser¡¦s will be well-kept by one who keeps one-sessioner¡¦s practice.¡¨ When one is undertaken, the others are virtually undertaken.

¡§And what need has one who keeps the open-air-dweller¡¦s practice to keep the tree-root practice or the any-bed-user¡¦s practice? So there are these three principal practices that, to the five individual practices, that is to say, the forest-dweller¡¦s practice, the refuse-rag-wear practice, the triple-robe-wearer¡¦s practice, the sitter¡¦s practice, and the charnel-ground-dwe practice, come to eight only.¡¨ So thirteen can be counted as eight only when we just take th

Then there are two connected with robes, five connected with alms food, five connected w and so on. What is interesting or what is important is who can practice which ascetic practic

In paragraph 90 ¡§Singly: with thirteen for bhikkhus (Monks can practice all thirteen practic for bhikkhunis (the nuns can practice eight.), twelve for novices (S?ma?eras can practice tw female probationers and female novices.¡¨ There are two kinds of female ordained persons bhikkhuni - probationers and novices. If a girl or woman wants to become a nun, she must s probation, about two years keeping only six precepts. Then she becomes a s?ma?eri, a fem she becomes a nun, a bhikkhuni. For such persons seven are allowable. ¡§And two (are allo female lay followers.¡¨ Lay people can also practice some of these practices and there are tw practice. Altogether there are 42.

¡§If there is a charnel ground in the open that complies with the forest-dweller¡¦s practice, is able to put all the ascetic practices into effect simultaneously.¡¨ So a monk can practice al practices if there is a charnel ground in the open and it is away from the village by about 100 living there can practice all thirteen of these practices simultaneously.

¡§But the two, namely, the forest-dweller¡¦s practice and the later-food-refuser¡¦s practice a to bhikkhunis by training precepts.¡¨ Bhikkhunis have to keep those training precepts, so the those ascetic practices. Bhikkhunis must not be on their own. They must live not too close, b monks. So they cannot practice the forest-dweller¡¦s practice. ¡§It is hard for them to observe namely, the open-air-dweller¡¦s practice, the tree-root-dweller¡¦s practice, and the charnel-gr practice, because a bhikkhuni is not allowed to live without a companion.¡¨ A bhikkhuni is no alone. She must have a companion. ¡§And it is hard to find a female companion with like de place, and even if available, she would not escape having to live in company.¡¨ The purpose practices is to enjoy seclusion. If you have to live with another person, then you lose that. ¡§ cultivating the ascetic practice would scarcely be served. It is because they are reduced by f this inability to make use of certain of them that they are to be understood as eight only for b So bhikkhunis can practice eight of them.

¡§Except for the triple-robe-wearer¡¦s practice all the other twelve as stated should be und novices.¡¨ So male novices can practice twelve of them. Novices cannot use the third robe, t robe. That is used by or allowed for monks only. S?ma?eras or novices do not use the third cannot practice the ascetic practice of having three robes only.

¡§All the others seven (are) for female probationers and female novices.¡¨ So female proba novices can practice seven out of the eight for nuns.

¡§The two, namely, the one-sessioner¡¦s practice and the bowl-food-eater¡¦s practice, are and female lay followers to employ.¡¨ Lay people can employ one-sessioner¡¦s practice (eati only) or the bowl-food-eater¡¦s practice (eating in one bowl only). These two lay people can this way there are two ascetic practices. This is the commentary ¡¥as to groups and also sin

So these thirteen practices are not much practiced nowadays. Those living in villages or to practice most of these practices. Those who live in forest monasteries can practice many of still monks who practice many of them like living in a cemetery, living under a tree, eating in lying down, and keeping only three robes.

These practices are meant for effacement of mental defilements. We cannot do away with altogether by these practices. We can reduce them. We can scrape them away little by little practices.

According to the Visuddhi Magga a monk must first purify his moral conduct. A monk must Then he must practice some of these ascetic practices. Next he will go on to practice medita chapters are about the basic practices before one practices the calm (samatha) meditation o (vipassan?) meditation.

OK. Next week we go to concentration. There are very detailed instructions for taking up th meditation.

Student: Are these ascetic practices and virtue etc., are those sort of an absolute requireme go on to concentration or the next step? Are they the basics? How important are they? Espe people what is their relevance?

Teacher: Purity of morals is absolutely necessary because without purity of morals one cann concentration when one practices meditation. But the ascetic practices are just extra practic you are a monk and you do not practice the ascetic practices, still it is possible for that monk people to practice meditation provided that they have moral purity. Moral purity is essential f of meditation. That is because if there is no moral purity, we suffer from remorse or feelings

Suppose my s?la is not pure. When my s?la is not pure, i have this feeling of guilt. People I am a good monk, but in fact I am bad. When I try to practice meditation, this thinking come and again and torments me.

When there is this feeling of guilt, there can be no happiness or no joy. There can be no tr concentration and so on. In one of the Suttas the successive stages to realization are given. moral purity. Moral purity helps us to be free from remorse. Freedom from remorse promote happiness. Happiness promotes tranquillity. Tranquillity promotes another kind of comfort or then happiness of mind and body promote sam?dhi (concentration). In order to get concentr kind of comfort or happiness, happiness in the sense of peacefulness. So moral purity is ver Ascetic practices are just extra practices. For lay people it is not difficult to get moral purity though their moral habits were not pure in the past before the practice of meditation, they ca mind that they will not break rules in the future and they will keep their moral habits pure and precepts. And then that is all there is to it.

But for monks it is not so easy because there are some offenses which cannot be exonera confession. Some rules when they are broken require confession only. Others require confe of the things involved in it. Then some require that one stay under probation as long as one offense.

Suppose I touch a woman with lusty thoughts. That is an offense. If I do not declare the of monk for ten days, then I must be under probation for ten days. If I cover it up for one month under probation for one month and so on. Also I need monks to assemble and do some kind me back into the fold of Sa~gha. Such offenses are not easy to get rid of. For a monk it is m get purity of morals than for lay people.

Student: Because lay precepts are fewer?

Teacher: Lay precepts are fewer, yes. The minimum requirement for lay people is only five p killing, not stealing, no sexual misconduct, no lying, and no intoxicants. These are the five. S break one or two of these rules. If before the practice of meditation, that person really sincer refrain from breaking these rules in the future and to keep his moral conduct pure during the that is all right for him. He is said to be pure in his moral habits. A monk must do something making up his mind and confessing. So it is more difficult for a monk to get purity of morals t persons.

Student: That doesn¡¦t make so much sense. If a lay person can just make up his mind and mind in meditation, why couldn¡¦t a monk just make up his mind and achieve peace of mind

Teacher: A monk has broken the rule laid down by the Buddha. The five precepts are not lai Buddha. They are something like universal precepts. But the rules to be followed by monks Buddha. When I break a rule, I show some disrespect for the Buddha, for the one who laid d there is a double offense there - breaking the rule is one offense and disrespect for the Budd There are two things. So monks have to get free from such offenses by some procedure. Or some offenses just by confessing to another monk. Other offenses require being under prob or some months. It is more difficult for monks to be pure in morals than lay people.

Student: What does ¡¥probation¡¦ mean?

Teacher: That means first you must ask the Sa~gha to assemble. Then the Sa~gha must fo being under probation. When you are under probation, you are not to enjoy being given resp monks. At the dining hall you have to sit at the end of the line although you may be the elde there. It is a kind of punishment. At the end you need twenty monks to assemble and perfor Sa~gha to take you back into the fold of Sa~gha. While you are under probation, you do not privileges of a monk. You are not to accept respect from younger monks. You are not to slee roof with another monk. So it is more difficult for a monk than a lay person to get purity of m the practice of meditation.

Student: I have another question about the ¡¥concept idea¡¦. Does that controversy or confu there are some kinds of practices which might be similar to ascetic practices which are done purpose of attaining a certain type of power, psychic powers, magical powers and so on, bu doing those practices, which may be similar to the ascetic practices, may not have virtue, m worldly power? Is it possible that this sort of practice is confused with the ascetic practices t mentioned here? By definition if it is not done with a wholesome mind, it is not an ascetic pr Teacher: I think that the difference of opinion is whether ascetic practices are to be included categories of wholesome, unwholesome or neither wholesome nor unwholesome. Those pe to be outside those three. To them it is just a concept. So there is no reality to represent the According to the opinion of the Visuddhi Magga and so the common opinion of the Elders, t is reality. When you take up these practices, you have volition in your mind or the knowledg units of reality, paramattha. Those other monks took these practices to just be concepts. Th the side of Venerable Buddhaghosa is that if they are concept, then concept has no existen exist only in the mind, in the imagination. So they cannot be realities. But ascetic practices b reality, to the four ultimate truths - consciousness, mental factors, material properties, and N ascetic practices are not concepts. They are realities. Therefore they belong to wholesome cannot be unwholesome, and they cannot be outside of wholesome, unwholesome and inde Student: Are there practices just from a historical aspect where people do things very simila attain some kind of supernatural state?
Teacher: That¡¦s right. But they cannot be called ¡¥ascetic practices¡¦ because they promote defilements. They promote greed or some kind of attachment and so on. OK.

S?dhu! S?dhu! S?dhu!

Chapter 3
(Tape 7 / PS: 1-72)

Today we come to the third chapter. With this chapter we begin the second stage of spiritu the stage of sam?dhi or concentration. The first chapter deals with the first stage, s?la. The deals with ascetic practices which are a kind of s?la. From the third chapter through the thirt the second stage, the stage of sam?dhi or concentration, is described in detail.

The third chapter begins with the definition of the word ¡¥sam?dhi¡¦. It is important that we learn what we are talking about. The word ¡¥sam?dhi¡¦ is translated as concentration. In ord properly we have to go back to the P??i word ¡¥sam?dhi¡¦. The word ¡¥sam?dhi¡¦ is compos and ¡¥dh?, plus ¡¥i¡¦. The prefix ¡¥sam¡¦ here has two meanings. The first meaning is evenly unifying way, without scattering. The second meaning is rightly. That means without being d and ¡¥dh?¡¦ together mean putting or placing. So sam?dhi means placing without scattering them unified and undistracted.

Placing what? Placing the consciousness and its concomitants or the mental factors. Plac Placing on a single object. Sam?dhi is a mental factor. It is one of the 52 mental factors. Am mental factors we call it ¡¥one-pointedness of mind¡¦ or ¡¥ekaggat?¡¦. Ekaggat? and sam?dh synonymous. Sam?dhi is that mental factor which puts consciousness and its concomitants without scattering them, keeping them unified and undistracted. Sam?dhi coordinates consc mental factors arising with it and does not allow them or itself to be distracted or to wander a

In another chapter of the Visuddhi Magga sam?dhi is described as the steadiness of mind steadiness of a lamp¡¦s flame when there is no draft. In a room with no draft there might be a flame. Like that flame sam?dhi is steady.

The steadiness of sam?dhi is a series of moments of steadiness. It is not one moment onl of moments of consciousness arising again and again on a single object. Sam?dhi is a ment mental factor it must arise and disappear in just three sub-moments. So here ¡¥being on the time without scattering, unified and undisturbed¡¦ means a series of sam?dhi moments arisin taking one and the same object, taking a single object. That is what is called ¡¥sam?dhi¡¦ in

Whenever we want to understand something, we have to understand it with reference to c function, manifestation, and proximate cause. These are given in paragraph 4.¡¨ Concentrati non-distraction as its characteristic.¡¨ The characteristic of sam?dhi is non-distraction, non-w ¡§Its function is to eliminate distraction. It is manifested as non-wavering (non-shaking). Its p cause is bliss.¡¨ ¡¥Bliss¡¦ means sukha, comfort or something like happiness. Only when the like comfort of the mind and the body can there be concentration or sam?dhi.

In another chapter characteristic and the others are given a little differently, although they less the same thing. In that chapter the characteristic is given as non-wandering or non-distr function is to conglomerate conascent states as water does bath powder. That means you h flour and you put some water in it. The water conglomerates them into one solid thing. As wa the particles of powder, sam?dhi conglomerates, or coordinates, or collects concomitants. It concomitants (both citta and cetasikas) arising with it to scatter. It keeps together conscious factors. It does not let them be scattered. Its manifestation there is described as peace beca is sam?dhi there is peacefulness. The proximate cause again is sukha (bliss).

Then the author describes different kinds of concentration. ¡§First it is of only one kind with characteristic of non-distraction.¡¨ According to this characteristic there is only one kind of sa then it can be of two kinds, three, four and so on.

¡§It is of two kinds as access concentration and absorption concentration¡¨ I think it is impo understand these two at least - access concentration and absorption concentration. ¡¥Acces means neighborhood concentration. It is in the neighborhood of jh?na or Magga. Therefore i ¡¥neighborhood¡¦ or ¡¥access concentration¡¦.

Suppose a person practices kasi?a meditation, looking at a disk, taking it into his mind, rem or memorizing it. When he has got the image in his mind, he is said to have got the ¡¥graspe dwells upon this ¡¥grasped sign¡¦, this mental image again and again until that image becom defects, very pure. At that time he is said to have gained the neighborhood concentration or concentration. He has very strong concentration at that time. Neighborhood or access conce jh?na or absorption concentration. It also precedes Magga, the Path concentration. That kin is called ¡¥access concentration¡¦ or ¡¥neighborhood concentration¡¦. The other concentratio following that concentration is called ¡¥absorption concentration¡¦.

Here ¡¥absorption¡¦ does not mean jh?na only. The P??i word is appan?. ¡¥Appan? conce jh?na concentration and Magga (Path) concentration.

Student: So sam?dhi can be broken up into jh?na and Pth types of sam?dhi.

Teacher: Yes. Jh?na sam?dhi and Magga sam?dhi belong to absorption (appan?) concentra access concentration and then absorption concentration. Absorption concentration can be d jh?na concentration and Magga concentration.

Student: So sam?dhi is the larger term and then jh?na is a subset within sam?dhi.

Teacher: Yes. That¡¦s right.

These two kinds of concentration (access and absorption) are for samatha (tranquillity) me vipassan? we have another kind of concentration which is called ¡¥momentary concentration concentration. It is not really access concentration because there is no jh?na there. But with samatha meditation there are these two kinds of concentration - neighborhood or access co absorption concentration. And again let me repeat ¡¥absorption concentration¡¦ does not me means Magga also.

In paragraph 6, section 2, the subjects of meditation which lead to the attainment of neighb concentration, but not jh?na concentration are given. I want you to look at this chart (the ha in P??i so it will not be easy at this stage. If you look at the chart the last column is jh?na. Yo that if you practice a particular subject of meditation, you can get for example first through fif or first jh?na only, or no jh?na at all.

Please look at the middle of the page at the anussati ten. The first one is Buddh?nussati, r the virtues of the Buddha. If you practice that meditation, you will not get jh?na. You will get access concentration. You will not get jh?na concentration or jh?na through the practice of th meditation. Similarly with Dhamm?nussati, Sa~gh?nussati and so on you will not get jh?na. meditation you will only get access concentration and not absorption concentration. This cha for the other chapters too.

I deliberately used P??i because it is shorter to use P??i words. If you write English, you h ¡¥recollection of the virtues of the Buddha¡¦ and so on. I need space on the page.

The forty subjects of meditation are given in this chapter later on. The list of the forty subje meditation is given in paragraphs 104 and 105. You may check with that.

Student: Are they in the same order in the book as on the chart?

Teacher: Let me see. In the book there are ten kasi?as, ten kinds of foulness, ten recollectio abodes, four immaterial states, one perception and one defining. No, they are not the same.
are the kasi?a ten, the asubha or ten kinds of foulness, the ten recollections, the four divine are the same. In the book the four immaterial states are next. They are the last group on the perception¡¦ means sa??? one on the chart. ¡¥One defining¡¦ means vavatth?na one on the the chart is taken from The Manual of Abhidhamma.

The other kinds of sam?dhi like mundane and supramundane, with happiness or without h and without p?ti, accompanied by bliss, accompanied by equanimity and so on - in order to divisions you have to remember the five jh?nas. The first jh?na is accompanied by vitakka (i application), vic?ra (sustained application), p?ti, sukha and ekaggat? (one-pointedness of m jh?na is accompanied by vic?ra, p?ti, sukha, and ekaggat?. The third jh?na is accompanied ekaggat?. The fourth jh?na is accompanied by sukha and ekaggat?. The fifth jh?na is accom (indifferent feeling) and ekaggat?.

I hope that you remember that jh?nas can be four or five. In the Sutta Pi?aka jh?nas are d
It is very rare that they are described as five in the Suttas. But in Abhidhamma they are desc four and five. According to the fourfold method there are four jh?nas, but according to fivefol are five jh?nas. Actually they are the same. The first of the fourfold method is the same as th fivefold method. The second of the fourfold method is the third of the fivefold method. If you you will understand these divisions, but if you don¡¦t, don¡¦t worry.

In paragraph 14 ¡§In the first of the tetrads there is concentration of difficult progress and s direct knowledge.¡¨ ¡¥Difficult progress¡¦ means difficult practice. You have to practice much spend a lot of time practicing in order to make progress. ¡¥Sluggish direct knowledge¡¦ mean understanding. Understanding is slow. Understanding can be swift or it can be slow. The pra difficult for some and it is not so for others. That depends on many factors. They are given in

With regard to the previous practice let us look at paragraph 17. ¡§Besides, they should be classed according to craving and ignorance, and according to whether one has had practice insight.¡¨ Here what is meant is whether one had the practice of samatha or vipassan? (insig his former lives. If you have the practice of samatha meditation in your former lives, then wh the practice of samatha meditation here, your progress is not difficult. You have easy progre have such practice in the past, then it may be difficult. So ¡§If he has had no practice¡¨ mean former lives.

In paragraph 22 about the middle of the paragraph ¡§the state of partaking of distinction is of higher distinction.¡¨ ¡¥Higher distinction¡¦ here means higher jh?nas. Sometimes ¡¥distinct enlightenment. Here ¡¥distinction¡¦ means jh?nas.

¡§The state of partaking of penetration is accessibility to perception and attention accompa dispassion.¡¨ That means vipassan?. ¡¥Partaking of penetration¡¦ means leading to vipassan Student: What is the ¡¥partaking of diminution¡¦?
Teacher: That means he does not practice it well. ¡¥Diminution¡¦ means something like regre the degree of concentration if you do not practice. There is accessibility to opposition. ¡¥Opp the hindrances. When the hindrances are close to you, then you may lose sam?dhi. That kin called ¡¥partaking of diminution¡¦. ¡¥Stagnation¡¦ is when the sam?dhi does not regress nor d It just stands there, not making progress. That is called ¡¥partaking of stagnation¡¦. That is b person cannot get rid of attachment to that sam?dhi. He is attached to sam?dhi and so he ca

And then how should it be developed? This is the important part of this chapter. In order to meditation the author described in detail how to prepare before you take up the real practice Preparations should be done with meticulous care.

In paragraph 28 ¡§Mundane concentration should be developed by one who has taken his is quite purified in the way already stated.¡¨ The first thing a person must do in preparation fo practice of meditation is to purify his virtue, to purify his moral conduct.

¡§He should sever any of the ten impediments that he may have.¡¨ The next thing is to sev get rid of impediments. They are said to be ten and they will be described in detail.

After severing impediments, what should he do? ¡§He should approach the Good Friend.¡ find a teacher who can give him a meditation subject, who can teach him a meditation subje a good friend or a teacher.

¡§He should apprehend from among the forty meditation subjects.¡¨ ¡¥Apprehend¡¦ means meditation subject. He should take from among the forty meditation subjects one that suits h temperament.

People have different temperaments. There are meditation subjects which are exceptional certain kind of temperament. They will be given later. So it is good to select a meditation sub most suitable for one¡¦s own temperament. One should take up or study a meditation subjec temperament.

¡§After that he should avoid a monastery unfavorable to the development of concentration must find a suitable place for meditation. For a monk he must avoid unfavorable monasterie favorable monastery.

¡§He should sever the lesser impediments.¡¨ There are lesser impediments like having lon robes that need to be mended. They are called ¡¥lesser impediments¡¦. He must cut the less

Then the author goes into the practice of meditation. These have to be done before one go practice of meditation. Purification of s?la, purification of moral conduct is described in the fi second chapters.

The next one is to get rid of impediments. There are ten kinds of impediments mentioned I family, and gain, a class and building too as fifth.¡¨ The P??i word here is kamma. It is like th kamma that we are familiar with, but ¡¥kamma¡¦ here means work. So ¡¥building¡¦ here mea monastery, repairing the monastery. Then the other impediments are travel, relatives, afflicti study or books, and then supernormal powers. These ten are called ¡¥impediments¡¦. A pers practice meditation after purifying virtue must cut these impediments so that he can practice without hindrances, without obstacles. The first one is a dwelling place. I don¡¦t think they ar understand.

Let me say something about paragraph 30 towards the end of the paragraph: ¡§ - who has stored there, or whose mind is caught up by some business¡¨. That is not so accurate a tran really means ¡¥who has attachment, whose mind is caught up by some reason, not by busin reason of attachment to the dwelling place, to the monastery. For others it is not an impedim

¡§Two clansmen (two friends) left Anur?dhapura it seems, and eventually went forth at the Th|p?r?ma is a pagoda just outside the city of Anur?dhapura. Anur?dhapura is in Sr? Lanka

¡§One of them made himself familiar with the Two Codes.¡¨ We have met this word ¡¥Two remember? ¡¥Two Codes¡¦ means the two sets of rules, one for monks and the other for nur ¡¥Two Codes¡¦. Monks have to study both the rules for monks and the rules for nuns becaus some of the rules that are laid down for nuns also. ¡¥Two Codes¡¦ means the two P??imokk

The footnote here is not quite helpful. The Commentary he quoted here is not at this place place. Here the ¡¥Two codes¡¦ just means the two sets of rules in Vinaya. In another place th observers of the Codes¡¨ are commented upon by the Sub-Commentary as those who study and the Abhidhamma. At the beginning of Abhidhamma Pi?aka there is a portion called ¡¥M means contents or something like a list of things to be explained in detail later. The word ¡¥M to mean two things. One is the rules for monks and nuns and the other is the first section of of Abhidhamma. Here after going forth, after becoming monks, they learned these two code monks and nuns. ¡§when he had acquired five years seniority, he took part in the Pavarana the place called P?c?nakhandar?j?¡¨ and so on. Here ¡¥Two Codes¡¦ means the two sets of here is out of place.

With regard to footnote 10 ¡§ ¡¥Pavarana¡¦ Ceremony at the end of the Rains, during three season bhikkhus have to undertake to live in one place in order to avoid travel while crops a consists in a meeting of the bhikkhus who have spent the Rains together, at which each me the Community (or they invite each other) to point out faults, breaches of Vinaya rules.¡¨ Unt is all right. Then it says ¡§committed during the preceding three months.¡¨ This is not so. Tha Vinaya books. Sometimes the authors just say what they think would be the case, but it is re

At the end of the Rainy Season we have this ceremony of inviting the Sa~gha or inviting e invitation is not for just the offenses committed in the preceding three months. It is for any ti ¡§I invite the monks, I invite the venerable ones, whether you see me breaking a rule, or you a rule, or have suspicion I am breaking a rule, please talk to me. If I see it as an offense, I w amends.¡¨ That refers to any time. After one has invited in this way, then he can be told abo from any time. It is not an invitation for the faults committed just during that preceding three for any time. Although the ceremony is done at the end of the three months of the Rainy Sea not for just the three months.

We just did that ceremony at the monastery. It is to be done on the full moon day of Octob countries we have four months of Rainy Season, not three. Monks are to observe and live w of the monastery for three months however, not four. After three months there is a ceremony other. The monks are free to point out the mistakes or misconduct of each other. ¡§Committe months¡¨ is not correct and it is not in the Vinaya.

Student: Is that ceremony received well by the monks?

Teacher: It is something like a routine activity. Whether you really want to do it or not, you ha
You are invited so that other monks can tell you about your faults or whatever anytime.

Student: Is this difficult? You have to do it, but do you dread doing it?

Teacher: Oh, no. It¡¦s not dreadful.

Student: Do people say ugly things to each other?

Teacher: No. Someone will say ¡§Venerable, you have broken this rule. You ought to make do something to exonerate this offense.¡¨ It is something like that. In this way monks help ea good conduct, to get rid of offenses if there are any.

Sometimes a person may not be conscious of what he is doing. Suppose I am eating and 12:15pm. Perhaps I am not aware of that. Then another monk may say to me ¡§When you a twelve.¡¨ It is like that. I broke the rule in that case. So I must make confession about that.

The first impediment is dwelling. One monk has many things that he brought with him whe Anur?dhapura. These are inspiring stories.

In paragraph 43 ¡§Gain is the four requisites.¡¨ ¡¥Gain¡¦ is what monks get as donation fro
These requisites are called ¡¥gain¡¦.

Further down in paragraph 43 ¡§Again even at dawn alms-food eaters fond of opulence co ¡¥Venerable sir, such and such a man lay follower, woman lay follower, a friend, a friend¡¦s is not friend. It should be minister. I don¡¦t know why he took it to mean friend. The P??i wor ¡¥Amacca¡¦ means minister, a political minister and not a religious minister. Instead of friend minister. And instead of friend¡¦s daughter we should have minister¡¦s daughter.

Student: Maybe ¡¥official¡¦ would be better because ¡¥minister¡¦ in this country usually mean minister.

Teacher: Oh.

Now with regard to building he gives the word ¡¥kamma¡¦. ¡¥Kamma¡¦ really means somet building itself. It is called ¡¥nava kamma¡¦ here. So it is new work to do at the monastery. It r repair something at the monastery. When a monk is engaged in working, he cannot practice has to be concerned about these things.

¡§Travel is going on a journey. If someone is expected to give the Going Forth somewhere it means if there is someone who wants to ¡¥Go Forth¡¦, who wants to ordain. It is not ¡¥is ex the Going Forth¡¦. So ¡§If someone wants to Go Forth somewhere else, or if some requisite and he cannot rest content without getting it, that will be an impediment.¡¨

¡¥Ascetic duties¡¦ means practice of monk¡¦s duties. ¡¥Duties¡¦ here means the practice of ¡§So one in this position should apply himself to the ascetic¡¦s duties only after he has done transacted the business.¡¨ ¡¥Only¡¦ is missing there.

In paragraph 49 ¡§Mother and father should be treated like the Preceptor.¡¨ Monks are allo medicine to their mothers and fathers. ¡§If they live within the kingdom and look to their son should be given. Also if they have no medicine, he should give them his own. If he has none search of it as alms and give that. But in the case of brothers and sisters one should give the theirs.¡¨

What do you understand? The monk should give them what is theirs. Does that make sens Student: Their own medicine?
Teacher: If they already have their own medicine, he does not need to give to them. What it must compound or mix together the ingredients and give it to them. This is because monks l medicine. The people may not know, but the lay people have the ingredients at their house. ingredients together in different proportions and then gives it as medicine. So "give them wh the medicine, after the monk has compounded the ingredients. The ingredients must belong sister, and not to the monk.

With regard to books ¡§Books means responsibility for the scriptures.¡¨ About a third of the the paragraph ¡§The Elder asked him ¡¥How are you in the scriptures friend?¡¦ - I am studyin venerable sir¡¦.¡¨ The P??i word here means ¡¥I am familiar with the Majjhima Nik?ya.¡¦ It is studying; it is I am familiar with the I Majjhima Nik?ya. A little further on ¡§When a man is stil the first fifty by heart, he is faced with the middle fifty.¡¨ The P??i word is reciting, so ¡§recitin first fifty.¡¨ ¡§And when he is still reciting (not learning) that by heart, he is faced with the last fifty.¡¨ There are all together 150 Suttas, actually three more, in that collection of Middle Len They are divided into three - the first, the second and the third group. When you are reciting group, the second group may come to you and you may mix them up. When you are reciting third group may come to your mind and you will mix them up. So it is not an easy task being Majjhima Nik?ya. That is what is meant here. It is not learning, but reciting.

In paragraph 52 ¡§Then he recited the Dh?tukath? to the bhikkhus.¡¨ ¡¥Recited¡¦ here mea not just reciting. Dh?thukath? is the third book of Abhidhamma.

In paragraph 53 about ten lines from the bottom ¡§ Go and learn it from our own teachers. be ¡¥your¡¦ because this monk proclaimed he would expound the three Pi?akas without the other monk wanted to make him realize that he was not qualified to do that. So he asked a c other monk gave an answer. Then the monk said ¡§Hum¡¨ something like meaning it is not c three times he asked this question and three times he said ¡§Hum¡¨. The other monk gave d different times. So the Elder later on said ¡§The first answer you gave was the correct answe have not learned from a teacher, you are not firm on your answers. When I said ¡¥Hum¡¦, yo and then another different answer. So go and learn from your own teacher.¡¨ - not from just is something like that.

Even in these modern times just learning from books is not quite enough. For example wit Abhidhamma you need a teacher or a friend to help you. Otherwise you will not understand ¡§Go and learn from your own teachers.¡¨

At the end of paragraph 54 ¡§What are you saying, venerable sir, have I not heard it all fro teaching that monk, the teacher-monk asked the pupil-monk to give him a subject of meditat said ¡§ What are you saying, venerable sir, have I not heard it all from you?¡¨ You have been these things and now you are asking me to give you a subject of meditation. ¡§What can I ex you do not already know?¡¨ Then the senior Elder said ¡§ This path is different for one who h traveled by it.¡¨ The P??i sentence really means ¡§this is the path of one who has actually tr
That means I know only from books. You have practiced meditation and gained some enligh different from me. Please teach me meditation although I have taught you the books. That is here. ¡§This path is different for one who has actually traveled by it.¡¨ Or it means ¡§This is one who has actually traveled by it.¡¨ Those who have not traveled by it do not really know th have not traveled this path, so please teach me meditation.

A little further down ¡§The Arahant path befits our teacher.¡¨ That means the attainment of The teacher practiced meditation and became an Arahant. So the pupil said ¡§Arahantship b

In the next paragraph regarding supernormal powers ¡§They are hard to maintain, like a p young corn.¡¨ In my book it is like a baby hare. Prone infant, what is ¡¥prone¡¦?

Students: Lying down.

Teacher: Face down?

Student: It doesn¡¦t matter.

Teacher: I don¡¦t know. In P??i it means lying down face up. And like young corn- that mean fragile. In the first edition he had a baby hare because he did not read correctly. The P??i w but the first time he read it as sasa. ¡¥Sasa¡¦ means hare. ¡¥Sassa¡¦ means a crop, or corn, grows. The editors or he himself corrected it in the second edition.

Supernormal powers are an impediment only for vipassan? meditation. They are gained th sam?dhi. So they are not an impediment for sam?dhi or samatha meditation, but for vipassa impediment.

¡§Approach the Good Friend, the giver of a meditation subject.¡¨ So you must find a teach you a meditation subject. Approaching a teacher is described in detail. It is very different fro in this country or in the West. Teachers want to attract pupils. They are very willing or very e

The one who wants to practice meditation has to approach a teacher in a very careful way, r and so on. So it is very different. Here teachers want to please those who come to them.

The practice of loving-kindness is mentioned here. ¡§ ¡¥May they be happy and free from a he should develop it towards all deities within the boundary.¡¨ ¡¥Boundary¡¦ means within the monastery. The P??i word that is used here is s?m?. It also means a consecrated place whe Sa~gha are performed, but here it simply means a boundary, the boundary of the monastery loving-kindness towards the monks living in the monastery, just that - ¡§May they be happy a affliction.¡¨ Then he should develop it towards all deities within the boundary, within the mon should develop it towards the principal people in the village that is his alms resort, where he Then he should develop loving-kindness to all the human beings there and to all living being the human beings.¡¨ There is a misunderstanding of one word in P??i. What really is meant beings beginning with human beings. After sending loving-kindness thoughts to the principa village (That means a village headman or an official in the village.), he sends to all beings, b all human beings. So ¡§May all human beings be well happy and peaceful. May all beings be peaceful.¡¨ So it is not to all human beings there and to all dependent on the human beings.
The translation should be ¡§ Then to all beings, beginning with the human beings.¡¨

Student: What does ¡¥toward all deities¡¦ mean?

Teacher: It refers to the spirits, the guardian spirits, and tree spirits living within the precinct monastery. We Buddhists believe there are spirits all around - tree spirits, guardian spirits, g monastery, guardian of a person and so on. So we send loving-kindness to them.

In the next paragraph ¡§With mindfulness of death, thinking ¡¥I have got to die¡¦, he gives search and with a growing sense of urgency he comes to live without attachment.¡¨ Actually to live without sluggishness¡¨, not attachment. When there is a sense of urgency, when there I may die, then I cannot afford to be lazy. I cannot afford to be sluggish. I must practice med make effort. The word here should not be attachment, but sluggishness.

Is there another word for that? It is laziness, something like that. Indolence, right? To live w indolence or sluggishness. That means to be energetic in the practice of meditation.

Then paragraph 61, the good friend:

¡§He is revered and dearly loved,
And one who speaks and suffers speech;
The speech he utters is profound,
He does not urge without a reason.¡¨

That means he does not urge to do improper things.

¡§He is wholly solicitous of welfare and partial to progress.¡¨

What is ¡¥partial to progress¡¦?

Student: ¡¥Partial¡¦ often means favors.

Teacher: Here the meaning is that he is on the side of progress. That means he is making p this word up in the dictionary and it said ¡§to be fond of¡¨. But it does not mean ¡¥to be fond the side of progress.

Student: So its ¡¥progressing¡¦.
Teacher: ¡¥Progressing¡¦, yes.
At the end of paragraph 62 ¡§And has reached the destruction of cankers by augmenting i means by practicing insight.
In paragraph 63 ¡§ ¡¥I am one whose cankers are destroyed. Why not? He declares himse his instructions will be carried out.¡¨ Actually he knows that the other one practices; it is not t instructions will be carried out. If you know that the other one is a meditator, you may tell th what you have attained. Normally monks do not tell their attainment to other people.
Student: So it would be ¡¥practice carried out¡¦?
Teacher: Not instructions. He knows that the other one is a practicioner. He knows that the o practices meditation.
In paragraph 70 about four lines down ¡§If he does not allow it when asked, they can be d opportunity offers. When he does them, three tooth-sticks should be brought.¡¨ Instead of ¡¥ should say ¡§should be given to him, should be presented to him.¡¨ In paragraph 72 ¡§If he does not ask but agrees to the duties being done, then after ten da fortnight have gone by, he should make an opportunity by staying back one day at the time o That means even though he is dismissed, he should ask permission and announce his purp monk, to that teacher. ¡¥Make an opportunity¡¦ - I don¡¦t know what that means. The P??i wo permission. So when he is dismissed, he must not go away. He must ask permission - ¡§I w something.¡¨ Then when he asks permission , he must tell him that he comes for the practice is how to approach a teacher.
OK. We will talk about temperaments next week. The explanation about temperaments is

S?dhu! S?dhu! S?dhu!

(Tape 8 / PS: 74 - 132)

Today we come to temperaments. In paragraph 74 ¡§There are six kinds of temperament, temperament, hating temperament, deluded temperament, faithful temperament, intelligent t speculative temperament.¡¨ On this sheet the second column represents the six temperame the second column ¡¥carita¡¦ means temperament. The temperaments are r?ga, dosa, moha vitakka.
Greedy temperament is r?ga. Hating temperament is dosa. Deluded temperament is moha is saddha. Intelligent temperament is buddhi. Buddhi is a synonym for ???a or pa??? (wisdo temperament is vitakka. Some teachers say there are more than six kinds of temperament a They are not so interesting because they are confusing. Following the author we take six ter Three are good temperaments and three are bad temperaments. Each one has parallel in Faithful temperament is similar to greedy temperament because ¡§faith is strong when profit in one of greedy temperament, owing to its special qualities being near to those of greed.¡¨ T is similar to faith or saddha. ¡§For in an unprofitable way, greed is affectionate and not over-so, in a profitable way, is faith.¡¨

Instead of saying ¡§in an unprofitable way¡¨ we should say ¡§on the side of unwholesome of akusala¡¨. So it means among akusala states greed is affectionate and not over-austere. A (wholesome states) faith has the same qualities; faith is affectionate and not over-austere. S similar.

The same is true for hateful temperament and intelligent temperament. They are also simi habitually gets angry may be of intelligent temperament. There are some people who are sh get angry for a very small reason. Those people may be of sharp intelligence. They are simi qualities.

In paragraph 76 ¡§And hate occurs in the mode of condemning living beings.¡¨ The P??i w ¡¥avoid¡¦. Does ¡¥condemn¡¦ mean ¡¥avoid¡¦/

Student: No.

Teacher: ¡§And hate occurs in the mode of avoiding living beings, while understanding occu avoiding formations.¡¨ ¡¥Formations¡¦ means mind and matter (sa~kh?ra).

Speculative temperament has its parallel in moha or deluded temperament. They are simil

Then there is a discussion on the source or cause of these temperaments. Here the autho that are given by other teachers. He says that they are all inconclusive or indecisive.

In footnote 19 ¡§ ¡¥Some¡¦ is said with reference to the Elder Upatissa. For it is put in this in the Vimutti Magga.¡¨ There is a book called ¡¥Vimutti Magga¡¦. It was written before the Vi was written by an Elder named Upatissa in P??i language. There is a book by Professor Bal study of Visuddhi Magga and Vimutti Magga.

We call the Visuddhi Magga a Commentary. It is not a Commentary of one particular Sutta collection of Suttas. It is a Common Commentary of all Suttas. There is a Sub-Commentary Magga. The name of the Elder as well as the name of the book is mentioned in the Sub-Com Visuddhi Magga nothing is mentioned. It just says ¡§some say¡¨. ¡¥Some say¡¦ refers to the wrote the Vimutti Magga.

In that book it is said that ¡§there are three kinds of temperament to begin with have their previous habit; and they have their source in the elements and humours.¡¨ ¡¥Elements¡¦ mea elements - earth, water, fire and air. Humour - what is ¡¥humour¡¦? ¡¥Humour¡¦ here means body - wind, phlegm, blood. They (the elements, the humours, and previous habits) are the kinds of temperament.

¡§Apparently one of greedy temperament has formerly had plenty of desirable tasks and g do, or has reappeared here after dying in a heaven.¡¨ ¡¥Reappeared here¡¦ means ¡¥reborn dies as a deva and is reborn here tends to have a greedy temperament.

¡§And one of hating temperament has formerly had plenty of stabbing and torturing and br has reappeared here after dying in one of the hells or the n?ga existences.¡¨ One who is rel in hell or in the existence of serpents tends to have hating temperament.

¡§And one of deluded temperament has formerly drunk a lot of intoxicants and neglected l questioning, or has reappeared here after dying in the animal existence.¡¨ This is according habit.

Then they are explained according to the elements. ¡§A person is of deluded temperamen elements are prominent, that is to say, the earth element and the fire element.¡¨ and so on. C elements prominent in his body tends to be of deluded temperament and so on.

¡§Not all of those who have had plenty of desirable tasks and gratifying work to do, and wh reappeared here after dying in a heaven are of greedy temperament¡¨ and so on. So they ar

The author gives the exposition given by the teachers of the Commentaries. That means g Therav?da tradition. ¡§the fact that these beings have prominence of greed, prominence of h delusion, prominence of non-greed, prominence of non-hate, prominence of non-delusion, is root-cause. For when in one man at the moment of his accumulating (rebirth-producing) kam and non-greed is weak, non-hate and non-delusion are strong and hate and delusion are we non-greed is unable to prevail over his greed, but his non-hate and non-delusion being stron prevail over his hate and delusion. That is why, on being reborn through rebirth-linking given he has greed, is good-natured and unangry, and possesses understanding with knowledge, flash.¡¨

¡§At the moment of his accumulating (rebirth producing kamma) greed is strong and non-g here it does not mean that the kamma and the greed or non-greed arise at the same momen mental state and non-greed is a wholesome mental state. They cannot arise together. The k results relinking in human existence and so on is good kamma, wholesome kamma. It canno When kusala kamma arises in our minds, there can be no greed arising at the same time. H after that kamma. That is what is meant here by ¡§at the moment of his accumulating kamm they arise at the same time, at the same moment, but the kamma is influenced by strong gre weak and so on. When at the moment of accumulating kamma greed is strong, non-greed is is this difference of being of different temperament. These are explained with reference to w which hetus, are predominant or strong or weak at the moment of accumulating good or bad good kamma.

Then we go to how it is known that this person is of greedy temperament and so on. This i psychology. We guess the temperament of a person by the posture he takes, by his actions eating, by his seeing, by the kinds of states occurring in his mind. These are explained in de

¡§When one of greedy temperament is walking in his usual manner, he walks carefully (tha gracefully.), puts his foot down slowly, puts it down evenly, lifts it up evenly, and his step is s What is ¡¥springy¡¦?

Students: Bouncy.

Teacher: Bouncy. Oh. The explanation given in the footnote is that the footprint - you know w left a footprint, his footprint is even. The footprints of ordinary people are not so even, do not equally. ¡¥Springy¡¦ means not touching in the middle. That is springy.

Student: The Buddha was flat-footed?
Teacher: Yes. ¡§One of hating temperament walks as though he were digging with the point his foot down quickly, lifts it up quickly, and his step is dragged along.¡¨

¡§One of deluded temperament walks with a perplexed gait, puts his foot down hesitantly, hesitantly, and his step is pressed down suddenly.¡¨

Then there is a verse. This is the account of the origin of the M?gandiya Sutta. The name M?gandiya. He had a beautiful daughter. He wanted to give his daughter to a deserving man found one yet. One day he saw the footprints of the Buddha. He knew these footprints belon extraordinary man. He followed the footprints and came to the Buddha. Then he offered his Buddha. This verse was uttered by him when he saw the footprints of the Buddha. The footp greedy person; they were not of a hating person; they were not of a deluded person. They m extraordinary person.

In paragraph 89 about the middle of the paragraph ¡§He sleeps in a confident manner.¡¨ A in a pleasant manner, pleasant to look at, not confident. A little further down in this paragrap body flung down he sleeps with a scowl.¡¨ What is ¡¥scowl¡¦?
Students: Frown.
Teacher: Yes, with a frown. That is right. Then two lines down ¡§One of deluded temperame all awry and sleeps mostly face downwards with his body sprawling. When woken, he gets u ¡¥Hum¡¦.¡¨

These are by posture or deportment. Now let us look at actions. ¡§Also in the acts of swee greedy temperament grasps the broom well, and he sweeps cleanly and evenly without hurr sand, as if he were strewing sinduv?ra flowers.¡¨ We can guess his temperament by how he possible in this country because we use vacuum cleaners.

Then by eating ¡§One of greedy temperament likes eating sweet food.¡¨ Those who like sw be of greedy temperament.

¡§One of hating temperament likes eating rough sour food.¡¨ So if you like sour food, you m temperament.

If you are not decided or have no settled choice, then you are of deluded temperament. So I like sour food.

Then by seeing and so on: ¡§When one of greedy temperament sees even a slightly pleas looks long as if surprised, he seizes on trivial virtues, discounts faults and when departing, h regret as if unwilling to leave.¡¨ ¡¥With regret¡¦ - the actual word used is ¡¥with attachment¡¦. attachment or something like concern for that object.

¡§When one of hating temperament sees even a slightly unpleasing visible object, he avoi if he were tired, he picks out trivial faults, discounts genuine virtues, and when departing, he without regret (or attachment) as if anxious to leave.¡¨

Then for the deluded ¡§If he hears others criticizing, he criticizes; if he hears others praisin praises: but actually he feels equanimity in himself.¡¨ I want to use ¡¥indifferent¡¦ instead of ¡¥equanimity¡¦. So ¡§Actually he feels indifference in himself - the indifference of unknowing.
¡¥indifference¡¦ means not knowing, moha. ¡§So too by sounds, and so on.¡¨

¡§By the kind of states occurring: in one of greedy temperament there is frequent occurren as deceit, fraud, pride, evilness of wishes, greatness of wishes, discontent, foppery and pers

¡§In one of faithful temperament there is frequent occurrence of such states as free genero see Noble Ones, desire to hear the Good Dhamma, great gladness.¡¨ In the original it mean gladness. He experiences gladness frequently; it is not necessarily great.

In paragraph 97 it discusses what is suitable for those of different temperaments. ¡§A suita one of greedy temperament has an unwashed sill and stands level with the ground, and it ca overhanging (rock with an) unprepared (drip-ledge), a grass hut, or a leaf house, etc., it ougl spattered with dirt, full of bats, dilapidated, too high or too low.¡¨ It is the opposite of his temp
He is of greedy temperament. So bad lodging is suitable for him.

Then with regard to bowl because he is talking about monks: ¡§And the right kind of bowl f clay bowl disfigured by stoppings and joins, or a heavy and misshapen iron bowl as unappe Some words are misplaced here. ¡§And the right kind of bowl for him is an ugly clay bowl or misshapen iron bowl disfigured by stoppings and joins.¡¨ If an ugly clay bowl has defects, he away. It may have cracked and it is difficult to mend. An iron bowl if it has holes or somethin stoppings and joins to keep the bowl together. So ¡¥disfigured¡¦ by stoppings and joints¡¦ sho heavy and misshapen iron bowl¡¦.

In paragraph 101 ¡§The right lodging for one of deluded temperament has a view and is no the four quarters are visible to him as he sits there.¡¨ He is of deluded temperament, so he n

¡§As to the postures, walking is right. The right kind of object for his contemplation is not s is to say, the size of a winnowing basket or the size of a saucer.¡¨ That means he should not object the size of a winnowing basket or a saucer. Those are small objects. A person of delu needs large objects.

Suppose he wants to practice earth kasi?a meditation, looking at the earth disk or the eart deluded temperament, he needs to have a big plot of land or something to look at, not just a His mind needs to look at a larger object. The object for his contemplation is not small. It is n of a winnowing basket or saucer. ¡§For his mind becomes more confused in a confined spac is an empty large kasi?a.¡¨ Maybe it should be about the size of a tennis court or a football fi

For one of speculative temperament a small one is right. For a person of vitakka temperam speculative. He wants to think of many things. A small object is suitable, about the size of a basket or a saucer.

Now we come to the forty subjects of meditation. The forty subjects of meditation are giver 104 and the following paragraph.

The word ¡¥kasi?a¡¦ means orb or total. When you look at the disk, you look at the whole o total. There are ten kasi?as, ten kinds of foulness, ten recollections, four divine abidings, fou states, one perception, one defining. All together there are forty subjects. These are the forty samatha meditation.

¡§Herein, the ten kasi?as are these: earth kasi?a, water kasi?a, fire kasi?a, air kasi?a, blu yellow kasi?a, red kasi?a, white kasi?a, light kasi?a, and limited-space kasi?a.¡¨ There are t to prepare these kasi?as and how to practice is explained in the next chapter.

¡§The ten kinds of foulness are these: the bloated, the livid, the festering, the cut-up, the g scattered, the hacked and scattered, the bleeding, the worm-infested, and a skeleton.¡¨

¡§The ten kinds of recollection are these: recollection of the Buddha (that means recollecti qualities of the Buddha.), recollection of the Dhamma, recollection of the Sa~gha, recollectio (That means recollection of one¡¦s own s?la.), recollection of generosity, recollection of deiti recollection (or mindfulness) of death, mindfulness occupied with the body, mindfulness of b recollection of peace.¡¨ ¡¥Peace¡¦ here means Nibb?na. These are the ten recollections.

¡§The four divine abidings are these: loving-kindness, compassion, gladness (or sympathe equanimity.¡¨

The four immaterial states are just the four ar|pavacara jh?nas, the formless types of cons four immaterial states are these: the base consisting of boundless space, the base consistin consciousness, the base consisting of nothingness, and the base consisting of neither perce non-perception.¡¨

¡§The one perception is the perception of repulsiveness in nutriment (food).¡¨

¡§The one defining is the defining of the four elements.¡¨ That means trying to see the four clearly, one different from the other. This is earth element. This is water element and so on.

¡§This is how the exposition should be understood ¡¥as to enumeration¡¦.¡¨ This is the list subjects of samatha meditation.

¡§As to which bring access only and which absorption¡¨ - sam?dhi, if you remember, is div different kinds - into neighborhood or access concentration and into absorption concentratio of meditation can lead to access concentration only, not to absorption. The others can lead t concentration and absorption concentration. ¡§The eight recollections - excepting mindfulne the body and mindfulness of breathing - the perception of repulsiveness in nutriment, and th four elements, are ten meditation subjects that bring access only.¡¨ You may look at the cha the jh?na column, the last column. If we say ¡¥no jh?na¡¦, that means that they can lead to a concentration only. They cannot lead to jh?na concentration. If you practice the recollection you may get concentration of mind, but you will not get jh?na from that type of meditation. T the Buddha are profound. And there are many qualities to keep your mind on. It cannot help concentration or to get jh?na. The eight recollections, the perception of repulsiveness in nutr defining of the four elements can lead you to gaining access concentration only. You will not you practice those meditation subjects.

On the chart ¡¥AP¡¦ means absorption development. ¡¥P¡¦ means preliminary developmen development.

The other thirty subjects of meditation bring absorption. If you practice these subjects of m may gain absorption or jh?na.

Then ¡§As to the kind of jh?na: (Please look at the jh?na column on the chart.) among thos absorption, the ten kasi?as together with mindfulness of breathing bring all four jh?nas.¡¨ ¡¥F means five. There are two ways of describing jh?nas according to the fourfold method and a fivefold method. We are familiar with the fivefold method - first jh?na, second jh?na, third jh? jh?na, fifth jh?na. In the Visuddhi Magga and in many Suttas only the fourfold method is men to adapt to this.¡¨ ¡§Bring all four jh?nas¡¨ means bring all five jh?nas. The ten kasi?as can b practice one of the ten kasi?as, you can get first, second, third, fourth, fifth jh?na. So you ca five jh?nas. Then breathing meditation can bring all five jh?nas.

Student: What is k?yagat?sati?

Teacher: This ¡¥k?yagat?sati¡¦ means contemplating on different parts of the body like head nails, teeth, skin and so on.

Student: And an?p?nasati?

Teacher: That is breathing.

Student: And which one is peace?

Teacher: Upasam?nussati is peace. The order in the chart is a little different than the order i Maranassati is the recollection of death.

¡§The ten kinds of foulness together with mindfulness occupied with the body bring the firs ten asubhas and k?yagat?sati can lead to the first jh?na only because the object is gross. S to keep your mind on the object. Without vitakka your mind cannot dwell on these objects.

It is explained as when you are going against a strong current. You need some pole to kee In the same way since the objects are gross, you need vitakka for your consciousness or yo object. In the foulness meditations you look at a corpse. So these objects are gross. Therefo first jh?na only.

¡§The first three divine abidings bring three jh?nas.¡¨ That means here four jh?nas - first, s and fourth. The three divine abidings are mett?, karun? and mudit?.

¡§The fourth divine abiding (upekkh?) and the four immaterial states (ar|pavacara) bring th jh?na.¡¨ That means the fifth jh?na. Upekkh? and these four also can lead to fifth jh?na. So a jh?na they are to be understood that way.

¡§As to surmounting¡¨ - ¡¥as to surmounting¡¦ means overcoming. ¡§There are two kinds o is to say, surmounting of factors and surmounting of objects.¡¨

Let us say you have first jh?na. If you want to get second jh?na, you have to overcome or eliminate the factor vitakka. ¡¥Surmounting¡¦ really means eliminating. By eliminating factors jh?nas. When you get the first jh?na, it has five factors. When you get the second jh?na, you eliminate one factor. Then when you want to get the third jh?na, you have to eliminate anoth on. The r|pavacara jh?nas are those surmounting factors.

Ar|pavacara jh?nas are those surmounting objects. In all the ar|pavacara jh?nas there are factors. There is no difference of factors in the four ar|pavacara jh?nas. What makes them d object that they take. If you want to get the first ar|pavacara jh?na, you have to overcome or kasi?a sign because kasi?a sign is sign of r|pavacara jh?nas. If you want to get the second a you have to overcome the first ar|pavacara jh?na and so on. So here by surmounting or elim get higher jh?nas. There are two kinds of surmounting - surmounting of factors and surmoun Student: Basically these chapters on concentration are on samatha. The chapters on knowle
They are both meditation. The problem is when I think of sam?dhi, sam?dhi includes vipassa Teacher: That¡¦s right.
Student: The translation of sam?dhi is concentration. This is where I get confused. I think thi meditation, but the third section is also on meditation.
Teacher: Actually beginning with the third chapter we come to meditation. The third chapter preparation. You have not gone into meditation. You have to purify your virtue. You have to impediments, find a teacher, get a meditation subject. You are preparing for the practice of m this chapter. You have not come to the real practice yet. And this meditation is samatha med maybe chapter thirteen - Student: Chapter fourteen begins the third section.
Teacher: Actually chapter fourteen does not deal with vipassan? yet, but the basis for vipass actually begins with purification of view, chapter eighteen. From there we get vipassan?.
Student: This is always a confusion I come up against because when I think of meditation, I samatha and vipassan?. But in the Visuddhi Magga when they talk about sam?dhi, they are samatha.
Teacher: that¡¦s right. There are three steps - s?la, sam?dhi, and pa???. ¡¥Sam?dhi¡¦ here is samatha meditation. But we need sam?dhi in vipassan? meditation too. As a technical term samatha meditation.

¡§As to extension and non-extension¡¨ - that means whether you can extend the sign you h mind or whether it is not possible or it is not beneficial to extend. For example when you hav of the kasi?a in your mind, then you can expand it. At first the kasi?a may be about eight inc or ten inches in diameter. You look at it and you try to get it in your mind. When you have re image in your mind and you can see it with your eyes closed, then you dwell upon it again a becomes clearer, very refined, then you can expand it as much as you like.

So some subjects of meditation can be expanded and some cannot. There are ten kasi?as meditation subjects that need to be extended. That means you need to extend them. It is by the counterpart sign that you become able to hear sounds or see things in that area.

Suppose you have all five jh?nas and also all the ar|pavacara jh?nas. And also suppose y what we call supernormal knowledge, abhi???. ¡¥Abhi???¡¦ is specially developed fifth jh?na those that allow yogis to see things far away and to hear sounds far away, or perform some you want to hear the sounds far away. It depends on how large you extend the kasi?a sign.

kasi?a as big as the city of San Francisco, then you may hear sounds in the city of San Fran outside.

¡§The ten kasi?as among the forty meditation subjects need to be extended. For it is withi space as one is intent upon (that means that one covers, that one extends over.) with the ka hear sounds with the divine ear element, see visible objects with the divine eye, and know th beings with the mind.¡¨ Before you experience the supernormal knowledge you have to exte sign. That means you are defining the area within which your supernormal knowledge will ap need to be extended.

¡§Mindfulness occupied with the body and the ten kinds of foulness need not be extended have a definite location and because there is no benefit in it. The definiteness of their locatio clear in explaining the method of development.¡¨ Later the author explains how to practice m bodies and the explanation will become clear. ¡§If the latter are extended, it is only a quantit that is extended (with regard to foulness meditation).¡¨You can extend in your mind the quan but there is no benefit.

¡§And this is said in answer to the question of Sop?ka ¡¥Perception of visible forms is quite Blessed One, perception of bones is not clear.¡¦; for here the perception of visible forms is ca clear¡¦ in the sense of extension of the sign, while the perception of bones is called ¡¥not qui the sense of non-extension. But the words ¡¥I was intent upon this whole earth with the perc skeleton¡¦ are said of the manner of appearance to one who has acquired that perception.¡¨ has acquired that perception before and now he extends this perception. It is all right becaus practicing to get that perception. He has already got that perception so he may extend it.

¡§For just as in Dhamm?soka¡¦s time the karav?ka bird uttered a sweet song when it saw i in the looking glass walls all around and perceived karav?kas in every direction, so the Elde thought when he saw the sign appearing in all directions through his acquisition of the perce skeleton, that the whole earth was covered with bones.¡¨

Then there is a footnote on the karav?ka bird. It is interesting, but it is a little difficult to bel
It is a kind of bird and it is said that its sounds is very sweet. The queen asked the communi was the sweetest. They all said the sound of the karav?ka bird was the sweetest. So the que to the sound of the karav?ka bird. She asked her king, King Asoka, to bring a karav?ka bird King Asoka did was to send a cage. The cage flew through the air and landed near the bird. cage and the cage flew back to the city. After reaching the city, the bird would not utter a sou was depressed. The king asked why the bird did not make any sound. His advisors said that make any sound because he was lonely. If the bird had companions, he would make noise. around him. The bird saw his image in the mirrors and thought that there were other birds. H he made sounds. The queen when she heard the sounds was very pleased. She was very h meditation on that happiness. She practiced vipassan? and became a Stream-Winner. ¡§Sh the Fruition of Stream-Entry.¡¨ That means she became a Sot?panna.

This is just an example. So just as the karav?ka bird saw many other birds in the mirrors a the Elder here ¡§when he saw the sign appearing in all directions through his acquisition of t a skeleton, (thought) that the whole earth was covered with bones.¡¨ It appeared to him as th that he extended the kasi?a sign.

In paragraph 112 ¡§If that is so, then is what is called the measurelessness of the object o produced on foulness contradicted?¡¨ the jh?na produced on foulness is mentioned as meas mentioned as without measure.

The answer is that when a person looks at a small corpse, then his object is said to be wit looks at a big corpse, then his object is said to be measureless although it is not really mea ¡¥Measureless¡¦ here means large. So there is large object and small object.

In paragraph 115 it says ¡§As regards the immaterial states as objects.¡¨ It should read ¡§A objects of the immaterial states¡¨. It is not ¡¥as regards the immaterial states as object¡¦, but the immaterial states¡¦.

¡§Space need not be extended since it is the mere removal of the kasi?a.¡¨ With regard to ar|pavacara jh?nas the object of the first ar|pavacara jh?na is infinite space. That cannot be because it is nothing. It is obtained through the removal of the kasi?a. ¡¥Removal of the kas paying attention to the kasi?a sign. First there is the kasi?a sign in his mind. Then he stops attentionto that kasi?a sign. So that kasi?a sign disappears. In place of the kasi?a sign just s Space is space. So that cannot be extended. ¡§If he extends it, nothing further happens. So happen.

¡§And consciousness need not be extended (Actually consciousness should not be or cou since it is a state consisting in an individual essence.¡¨ That means it is a paramattha. It is a reality, a reality which has its own characteristic or individual essence. Only the concept can not the ultimate reality. Ultimate realityis just ultimate reality and it does not lend itself to be
The second ar|pavacara consciousness cannot be extended.

¡§The disappearance of consciousness need not be extended.¡¨ Actually it is concept and What is non-existent cannot be extended.

¡§And the base consisting of neither perception nor non-perception¡¨ - here also it should of the base consisting of neither perception nor non-perception need not be extended since consisting in an individual essence.¡¨ Do you remember the object of the fourth ar|pavacara of the fourth ar|pavacara jh?na is the consciousness of the third ar|pavacara jh?na. The thir consciousness is again ultimate reality having its own individual essence. So it cannot be ex is not a concept. These paragraphs are about whether objects may be extended or not.

Then as to the object in paragraph 117 ¡§Of these forty meditation subjects, twenty-two ha signs as object.¡¨ On the chart in the column nimitta ¡¥Pt¡¦ means counterpart sign. In the bo twenty-two have counterpart signs - ten kasi?as, ten asubhas or foulness meditation, k?yag (mindfulness of the body) and an?p?nassati. ¡§Twenty-two have counterpart signs as object ten kasi?as, the ten kinds of foulness, mindfulness of breathing and mindfulness occupied w rest do not have counterpart sign as object.¡¨

¡§Then twelve states consisting in individual essences as object, that is to say, eight of the recollections - except mindfulness of breathing and mindfulness occupied with the body - the repulsiveness in nutriment, the defining of the elements, the base consisting of boundless co the base consisting of neither perception nor non-perception.¡¨ They have ultimate reality as

¡§And twenty-two have counterpart signs as object, that is to say, the ten kasi?as, the ten foulness, mindfulness of breathing, and mindfulness occupied with the body; while the rema so classifiable objects.¡¨ These are the descriptions of the objects of meditation in different w

¡§Then eight have mobile objects in the early stage though the counterpart sign is stationa say, the festering, the bleeding, the worm-infested, mindfulness of breathing, the water kasi? kasi?a, the air kasi?a, and in the case of the light kasi?a the object consisting of a circle of s etc.¡¨ They are shaking objects. They can be shaking objects. ¡§the rest have immobile obje shaking objects only in the preliminary stage. When the yogi reaches the counterpart sign st stationery. It is only in the preliminary stage that there are shaking objects.

¡§As to place (That means the thirty-one planes of existence.): here the twelve, namely, th foulness, mindfulness occupied with the body, and perception of repulsiveness in nutriment, deities.¡¨

Student: Does that mean that in the fourth jh?na the breath stops?

Teacher: That¡¦s right, yes. You got the point. We will come to that in the description of the b meditation.

Then ¡§As to apprehending (That means as to taking the objects by sight, by hearing and exposition should be understood according to sight, touch, and hearsay (He means just hea These nineteen, that is to say, nine kasi?as omitting the air kasi?a and the ten kinds of fouln extended by sight.¡¨ You look at something and practice meditation. ¡§The meaning is that in their sign must be apprehended by constantly looking with the eye.¡¨

¡§In the case of mindfulness occupied with the body the five parts ending with skin must b sight and the rest by hearsay.¡¨ Head hair, body hair, nails, teeth, skin - these you look at wi and practice meditation on them. Some you cannot see like the liver, intestines and other thi practice through hearsay.

¡§Mindfulness of breathing must be apprehended by touch.¡¨ When you practice mindfulne meditation, you keep your mind here and are mindful of the sensation of touch here, the air of the nostrils.

¡§The air kasi?a by sight and touch¡¨ - it will become clearer when we come to the descrip practice air kasi?a. Sometimes you look at something moving, for example branches of a tre wind. You practice air kasi?a on that. The wind may be blowing against your body and then of touch there. You concentrate on the air element there. In that case you practice by the se

¡§The remaining eighteen are by hearsay.¡¨ That means just by hearing.

¡§The divine abiding of equanimity and the four immaterial states are not apprehended by cannot practice upekkh? and the four ar|pavacara jh?nas at the beginning because in order jh?nas you must have got the five r|pavacara jh?nas. And in order to practice upekkh? brahı to have practiced the first three brahma vih?ras - loving-kindness, compassion and sympath divine abiding equanimity cannot be practiced at the beginning. Only when you have practic can you practice equanimity.

¡§As to condition: of these meditation subjects nine kasi?as omitting the space kasi?a are immaterial states.¡¨ That means if you want to get ar|pavacara jh?nas, you practice one of th omitting the space kasi?a. That is because you have to practice the removing of the kasi?a space. Space cannot be removed. Space is space. The space kasi?a is exempted from tho for the immaterial states or ar|pavacara jh?nas.

¡§The ten kasi?as are conditions for the kinds of direct knowledge.¡¨ So if you want to get knowledge or abhi??? (That means supernormal power.) then you practice first one of the te if you want to get different results, then you practice different kasi?as.

Suppose you want to shake something. Suppose you want to shake the city hall building b power. Then first you must practice water kasi?a or air kasi?a but not the earth kasi?a. If you kasi?a and try to shake, it will not shake.

There is the story of a novice who went up to the abode of the gods. He said ¡§I will shake He tried to shake it and he could not. So the celestial nymphs made fun of him. He was asha to his teacher. He told his teacher that he was shamed by the nymphs because he could not He asked his teacher why this had happened. His teacher said, ¡§Look at something there.¡ floating in the river. He got the hint. Next time when he went back to the celestial abode, he kasi?a first. Then he was able to make the mansion shake. According to what you want from practice with different kasi?as. They are mentioned in the later chapters. ¡§The ten kasi?as a for the kinds of direct knowledge.¡¨

¡§The three divine abidings are conditions for the fourth divine abiding.¡¨ The fourth divine cannot be practiced at the beginning, but only after the first three.

¡§Each lower immaterial state is a condition for each higher one. The base consisting of n nor non-perception is a condition for the attainment of cessation.¡¨ That means cessation of activities, the cessation of perception and feeling. Actually it is the cessation of mental activi

¡§All are conditions for living in bliss (That means living in bliss in this very life.), for insight for the fortunate kinds of becoming (That means for a good life in the future.).¡¨

¡§As to suitability to temperament¡¨ - they are important. ¡§here the exposition should be u according to what is suitable to the temperaments.¡¨ It describes which subjects of meditatio for which kinds of temperament.

Student: You said the three divine abidings are conditions for the fourth. Is it possible to prac third before the first or the second before the first? It doesn¡¦t say that you have to practice a Teacher: Right. But the normal procedure is to practice loving-kindness first. Then one pract one and the third one. This means you practice so that you get jh?na from this practice. If yo state of jh?na with these, then you can even practice equanimity. Here it is meant for jh?na. to the fifth jh?na. In order to get the fifth jh?na you need to have the first, second, third, and jh?nas. Those can be obtained through the practice of the other three divine abidings.

Student: But you don¡¦t reach jh?na through the other three divine abidings?
Teacher: You reach jh?na, but not to the fifth jh?na. You reach only the fourth jh?na. By the equanimity you reach the fifth jh?na.

Now the different kinds of meditation suitable to the different kinds of temperament - ¡§All stated in the form of direct opposition and complete suitability.¡¨ That means if he says this k meditation is suitable for this kind of temperament, it means this meditation is the direct opp temperament and it is very suitable for it. But it does not mean that you cannot practice othe ¡§But there is actually no profitable development that does not suppress greed etc., and hel on.¡¨ In fact you can practice any meditation. Here the subjects of meditation and the tempe to show which are opposites and most suitable.

Suppose that I am of deluded temperament. Then the most suitable meditation for me is t meditation. But that does not mean that I cannot practice any other meditation. That is beca will help me to suppress mental defilements and to develop wholesome mental states.

Even in the Suttas Buddha was advising Rahula and other persons to practice meditation, meditation, but different kinds of meditation. Any kind of meditation can be practiced by any to get the best out of it, you choose the one that is most suitable for your temperament.
Student: All kasi?as as objects imply seeing consciousness?
Teacher: Kasi?as should first be practiced by looking at them. When you look at them, then consciousness. Then you try to memorize or take it into your mind. That means you close y take that image. When you can get that image clearly in your mind, then you have the learni mind, actually the grasped sign. After you get the learning sign, you no longer need the actu actual object. You dwell on the sign that you get in your mind. From that time on it is not see consciousness. It is manodv?ra, through mind-door, not through the eye-door. First through at the kasi?a and practice meditation. After you get the learning sign, your meditation is thro You see through the mind but not through the eye.

Then dedicating oneself to the Blessed One or to the teacher - that means relinquishing o Blessed One or to the Buddha is all right. To the teacher I do not recommend because not a be trusted considering what is happening these days. In paragraph 126 ¡§When he dedicate teacher, he should say ¡¥I relinquish this my person to you, venerable sir¡¦.¡¨ So he is saying to you. It may be dangerous if a teacher has ulterior motives. It is better to give yourself to t not to the teacher these days.

In paragraph 128 ¡§For it is one of such sincere inclination who arrives at one of the three enlightenment.¡¨ The three kinds of enlightenment are enlightenment as a Buddha, enlighte Buddha, and enlightenment as an Arahant.

¡§Six kinds of inclination lead to the maturing of the enlightenment of the Bodhisattas.¡¨ Th something like the paramitas found in Mah?yana. These are non-greed, non-hate, non-delus are the six qualities that the Bodhisattas especially develop.

¡§With the inclination to non-greed Bodhisattas see the fault in greed. With the inclination t Bodhisattas see the fault in hate.¡¨ and so on. Although it is a quotation, we cannot trace this any Text available nowadays. So some Texts may have been lost or it may refer to some so Therav?da.

In paragraph 132 ¡¥apprehend the sign¡¦ - the P??i word ¡¥nimitta¡¦ has different meanings sign¡¦ here just means paying close attention to what you hear from the teacher. ¡§this is the clause, this is the subsequent clause, this is the meaning, this is the intention, this is the sim so on. So first paying close attention and hearing the words of the teacher and trying to unde called here ¡¥apprehending the sign¡¦. It is not like apprehending the sign when you practice ¡¥Apprehending the sign¡¦ in meditation will come later in chapter four. Here ¡¥apprehending paying close attention to what the teacher says.

¡§When he listens attentively, apprehending the sign in this way, his meditation subject is apprehended.¡¨ He knows what he should know about meditation.

¡§Then, and because of that, he successfully attains distinction.¡¨ ¡¥Attains distinction¡¦ me jh?nas, attains supernormal knowledge, attains enlightenment.

It should be ¡¥but not others¡¦ not ¡¥but not otherwise¡¦. He will successfully attain distincti others who do not listen attentively and apprehend the sign and so on. ¡¥Otherwise¡¦ should others. It is not ¡¥otherwise¡¦. ¡§He successfully attains distinction, but not others.¡¨

OK. That is the end of the third chapter. So we are still preparing. Preparing is not over ye avoid 18 faulty monasteries and find a suitable place for meditation. Thank you very much.

S?dhu! S?dhu! S?dhu!

Chapter 4
(Tape 9 / PS: 1-73)

We have had a long break. I think we need to at least remember the third chapter which d prepare for the practice. Before really going to the practice we have to prepare ourselves. T have to do is to purify our virtue. That means to keep our moral conduct clear, to take and k That is the first thing.

The next thing is - please go to paragraph 28 in chapter 3 - there the steps are given. Firs purifying virtue. The second is severing any of the ten impediments or ten obstacles. That w the third chapter. Then one must find a good friend, a good meditation teacher from whom t about the meditation subject. And also he should choose a subject that is suitable for his ow There is a description of the six kinds of temperaments and what kind of temperament a per After that the yogi should avoid a monastery unfavorable to the development of concentratio one that is favorable. The fourth chapter picks up there.

The fourth chapter begins with the 18 faults of a monasteries not suitable for the practice o and the 5 qualities or factors of suitable monasteries. Then the author goes on to explain ho kasi?a disk or the earth kasi?a and how to practice.

We begin the fourth chapter with the 18 faults of a monastery. Before that the author state should live in a monastery not too far from where the teacher lives because if he has doubt a of meditation he could go to the teacher and ask and let him clarify the teaching.

¡§If it is inconvenient there, he can live in another monastery - a suitable one - a quarter or even a whole league distant.¡¨ A league is said to be about 8 miles. The monastery of the te most 8 miles from where you live so that you can walk to him in a day. People had to walk in well as go for alms along the way. It may be a quarter or a half or a whole league away. So t miles, four miles or eight miles.

Student: I think Daly City is about 10 or 12 miles from here (San Francisco).

Teacher: Oh. So it may be about this difference. So if the meditator has some doubt about h subject, he can go there and ask the teacher. Then he can go back to his monastery and pra

Then the Commentary gives the 18 faults of a monastery. When describing how to practic teachers of old are very detailed in explaining how to prepare for meditation. Maybe it is too monastery where a person lives and practices should be free of these 18 faults.

The first one is largeness. When a monastery is a large one, disturbances come up for the meditation. ¡§People with varying aims collect in a large monastery.¡¨ ¡¥People¡¦ here mean people. Monks with different aims collect in a large monastery. They will conflict with each o are many people, people will neglect the duties - sweeping the compound, setting up water a are not done and the person sees that they are not done, he should do them. And if he does he commits an offense of wrong-doing. It is a very minor offense, but still it is an offense. If h sweep the place, put out water and so on, then his time for meditation is reduced. So living i where monks are not doing their own duties is not a suitable one for a person who wants to meditation. If it is a large monastery and the monks do their duties and if there are no disturb practice of meditation, then he may live in a big monastery and practice meditation. The mai suitability for the practice of meditation. It may be a big monastery but if it is kept well and th novices do their own duties well and there is no disturbance or interference for the practice o then he can live in a big monastery. There are such big monasteries in our countries where very disciplined way. You don¡¦t hear a sound although 500 monks are eating. Such a mona suitable for the practice of meditation.

The next one is a new monastery. When a monastery is new, you have many thing to do.
suitable place for the practice of meditation. In paragraph 4 ¡§let the venerable one do the a
That really means the practice of meditation, not the ascetic practices or other duties.

The P??i word is sama?adhamma. ¡¥Sama?a¡¦ means an ascetic or monk. ¡¥Dhamma¡¦ h ¡¥Sama?adhamma¡¦ really means the practice of meditation, not just doing duties. Even tho monastery, if others take care of what is to be done there and let the person who wants to p practice freely, then that is a suitable monastery for him.

The next one is the delapidated monastery. When a monastery is not in good shape, then and do whatever needs to be done there. Then you have little time for meditation and so it is monastery.

The next one is a monastery with a nearby road. If it is close to a road or a main street, vis coming night and day. ¡¥Visitors¡¦ here means monk visitors. When visiting monks come, yo places for them. Sometimes you have to give your place to the visiting monk. You have to g place. You may have to go to the root of a tree or a flat rock. You have to give up your place monk. The next day is the same. So there is no opportunity to practice meditation. This is no place for him.

Student: when you say meditation here, are you talking about sitting or walking meditation?

Teacher: Both. Any kind of meditation.

Student: so then work is a kind of meditation.

Teacher: Here meditation is walking or sitting meditation. Doing things at the monastery, wo done with real intense mindfulness meditation. You may have light mindfulness doing what y when you are doing some work preparing the monastery, it is very difficult to keep mindfulne mindfulness. Here it means the intense practice of meditation.

A monastery near a pond is the next one. People come there and drink water. ¡§Pupils of elders supported by the royal family come to do dyeing work.¡¨ Here ¡¥supported by¡¦ means families or being familiar with or intimate with royal families. So it is not a suitable place.

The next one is near a place where there are vegetables. ¡¥Edible leaves¡¦ here really me When there are vegetables, women may come to gather the vegetables. They will sing and disturbance with sounds of the opposite sex. There is danger to the meditation.

The same is true for a monastery with flowering shrubs or trees. People come to gather flo is disturbance to the meditation.

The next one is a monastery with many fruits such as mangoes, rose-apples, jack-fruits ar there are many fruits, people come and pick fruits. There is disturbance.

Student: What is jack-fruit?

Teacher: Jack-fruit is a big tree. Some jack-fruit may be as big as this building. The fruit has like thorns outside. They are not really thorns; they are protrusions outside. When you cut op there is meat inside and a seed. Jack-fruit is grown in tropical countries like Burma, Sr? Lan it is also grown in Hawaii. Many people in this country don¡¦t know jack-fruit.

Jack-fruit tree was very important for monks because we used the inner core of jack-fruit t the robes. The inner core is color between brown and yellow. It is a dark yellow color. We ch core into small pieces. We boiled those small pieces and got the dye. Then we dyed the rob we got from the jack-fruit tree. The other thing we used for making dye was the bark of the b is not as good as the inner core of jack-fruit tree. I think now jack-fruit is imported into this co

Student: What does it taste like?

Teacher: Hard to say. It is sweet. If you eat too much, you will have stomach trouble.

And then if a monastery is famous, if it is renowned, many people will come. Then there w time for meditation. ¡§But if it suits him, he can live there at night and go elsewhere by day.¡¨ somewhere else during the day and go back at night. That you can do.

¡§In one with a nearby city objects of the opposite sex come into focus.¡¨ When it is close t is a kind of disturbance. In paragraph 10 ¡§Also important people spread out carpets in the r monastery and sit down.¡¨ Actually they do not spread out carpets, but they sit in the middle monastery, screened by curtains. That is what is meant. They will come to the monastery, si curtain around them. It is not just spreading carpets. The P??i word here means not a carpe Student: That was done to isolate them for meditation?

Teacher: Not for meditation, just for isolation. Here the ¡¥important people¡¦ are not monks. I king, or ministers, or anybody may come. They may wish to be separated or secluded from o will put the curtain around them.

The next one is a monastery nearby timber trees. The timber people come and cut down t good place.

Another one is a monastery near arable fields. When there are fields close to the monaste monastery as a thrashing place. So there is disturbance. Also when the monastery owns lan attendants of the monastery have to avoid cattle from coming into the field or sometimes hav water to them. It is what is said here. ¡§The monastery attendants impound cattle belonging deny the water supply to their crops. Then people bring an ear of paddy and show it to the C ¡¥Look at your monastery attendants work¡¦.¡¨ and so on.

Student: What is paddy?

Teacher: It is a kind of crop. We get rice from it.

The next one is the presence of incompatible persons. ¡§Where there are bhikkhus living v incompatible and mutually hostile, when they clash and it is protested ¡¥Venerable sirs, do n exclaim ¡¥We no longer count now that this refuse-rag wearer has come¡¦.¡¨ They are saying nobody or something like that. It is not a good place for a monk who wants to meditate.

Then a monastery near a land port of entry or a water port of entry may not be suitable. W is near such a place, the monks are inconvenienced by the people constantly arriving by shi asking for water, for salt, and so on.

The next one is a monastery near border countries. ¡¥Border countries¡¦ really means outl Mostly people living in the outlying districts are not of religious type. They do not have faith i or in the Buddha, Dhamma and Sa~gha. ¡¥Border countries¡¦ really means outlying districts

The next one is a monastery near the frontier of a kingdom. When a monk lives near the b kings may come and attack this place and that place. Sometimes it may fall to one king and another. When a monk is living there, he might be suspected of spying. It could be dangerou not suitable for him to live near a frontier and practice meditation.

¡§Unsuitability is that due to the risk of encountering visible data, etc., of the opposite sex or to haunting by non-human beings.¡¨ So if it is a haunted house you do not live and medita ¡§Here is a story. An elder lived in a forest, it seems. Then an ogress stood in the door of and sang. The elder came out and stood in the door. She went to the end of the of the walk went to the end of the walk. She stood in a chasm a hundred fathoms deep and sang. The e she suddenly grabbed him saying, ¡¥Venerable sir, it is not just one or two of the likes of you eaten¡¦.¡¨ So it is not safe to practice meditation in a haunted house.

The last one is lack of good friends. If you cannot get good friends, then you don¡¦t live the practice meditation. A teacher or the equivalent of a teacher is important for a person who p meditation.

These are the 18 faults that a monk has to avoid to make his meditation practice successf

Then there is a monastery which is suitable for monks to practice meditation. There are fiv such a monastery or resting place. ¡¥Resting place¡¦ here means a monastery. Sometimes V wanted to be very literal.

Student: so it is monastery.

Teacher: Actually it is a monastery. It is a dwelling place. A dwelling place for monks must n too near a village, or a town, or a city. A monk has to go for alms. If it is too far, it is difficult f to go. If it is too close, it is noisy and there is disturbance. So a monastery should be neither too near the village. ¡§It has a good path for going and coming.¡¨ That means it has a good go to the village and come back with comfort.

Number two: ¡§It is little frequented by day (That means seclusion.) with little sound and fe night.¡¨ So it is not too crowded during the day and it is not noisy at night.

The third factor is: ¡§There is little contact with gadflies, flies, wind, burning sun and creepi things.¡¨ So there should not be many mosquitoes, gadflies and so on.

The fourth is: ¡§the one who lives in that lodging easily obtains robes¡¨ and so on. The fou must be easily obtainable because if a monk has to go about getting robes and so on, then l meditation well. The monk must live in a place where these things are easily obtained.

The fifth one is a place where monks are living ¡§who are learned, versed in the scriptures the Dhamma, observers of the Vinaya, observers of the Codes.¡¨ ¡¥Observers¡¦ really mean ¡¥Observer¡¦ is a little softer. Here it means those who have learned by heart the Dhamma, t Codes. The P??i word is dhara. It is not just observers. It is those who are competent, those competent in Dhamma and Vinaya. ¡¥Dhamma¡¦ here means Suttas and Abhidhamma. Vina ¡¥Observers of the Codes¡¦ means ¡¥Holders of the Codes¡¦. ¡¥Codes¡¦ means the beginnin Pi?aka and the rules for monks.

I hope you remember there is a code of rules for monks, 227 rules and so on. These are c P??i they are called ¡¥M?tik?¡¦. ¡¥M?tik?¡¦ also means the very first section of Abhidhamma

Student: would you call them precepts?

Teacher: That¡¦s right, precepts for monks.

There should be such monks at a monastery, so that if you have doubt about anything, the them and ask them.

These are the five desirable qualities of a monastery. One should avoid the 18 faults and g where one finds these five factors and practice meditation.

Before practicing meditation you have to do one more thing. That is to sever the lesser imp have severed the grosser impediments. There were ten impediments mentioned in the third 29. He should sever the ten impediments. Then he should find a teacher, learn about medita faults of a monastery, and then find a monastery endowed with the five qualities. After takin of meditation, he has to do something. That is severing the lesser impediments. ¡¥Lesser im means when your hair is long, you have to cut it. When your nails are long, you have to cut t your robes need to be mended, you have to do that. If there is a stain on the bowl (That mea made of iron.) so it is not so good, then you have to bake it again. The bed, chair etc. should everything has to be done neatly, so that when you practice meditation, you don¡¦t have to w these things.

After severing the lesser impediments, we embark upon the practice of meditation. But stil something. You remember that there are 40 subjects of meditation. Now the author is going practice of the first subject of meditation given there, the earth kasi?a.

Student: If you were to follow the advice about avoiding the 18 faults of a monastery, are the in Burma today that don¡¦t have these hindrances?

Teacher: Yes. Mostly they are forest monasteries because in the cities you cannot get a mo from all these 18 faults. When you go to a forest, not the deep jungle, about a mile or two av village, you get a proper place for the practice of meditation. But I think the point here is that be a place where you can practice meditation without disturbance. It should be a place wher concentration. That is the main point.

The first subject of meditation mentioned in the third chapter is the earth kasi?a. ¡¥Kasi?a¡ or orb. We just say it is a disk because you look at a disk of earth and then practice meditati

¡§When a bhikkhu has thus severed the lesser impediments, then, on his return from his a meal and after he has got rid of drowsiness due to the meal.¡¨ That means after he has reste after a meal, you feel a little drowsy. You want to go to sleep. You may take rest for awhile.
meant by getting rid of drowsiness due to the meal.

¡§He should sit down comfortably in a secluded and apprehend the sign in earth that is eit not made up.¡¨ The earth kasi?a could be a made one or it may be not made up, a natural o

¡§For this is said: ¡¥One who is learning the earth kasi?a¡¦ - ¡¥learning the earth kasi?a¡¦ m practicing meditation on it. Here also Venerable N??amoli wanted to be literal. The P??i wor many meanings. ¡¥Picking up¡¦ is also uggaha. ¡¥Learning¡¦ is uggaha. ¡¥Taking hold of¡¦ or uggaha. Here it means practicing meditation on the kasi?a object or concentrating on the ka

¡§For this is said: ¡¥One who is learning the earth kasi?a apprehends the sign in earth tha up or not made up, that is bounded not unbounded, limited not unlimited, with a periphery no periphery, circumscribed not uncircumscribed, either the size of a bushel or the size of a sau bushel?

Student: It is a measure.

Teacher: How deep is it? In Burmese this word is translated as something like a tray, a roun inch deep. It is not a bushel basket. Now when you want to serve something, you use a tray like that.

¡¥The size of a saucer¡¦ - in Burmese we translate it as a lid of a pot. When you cook some pot made of clay and there is a lid. It is about nine or ten inches in diameter.

¡§He sees to it that the sign is well apprehended, well attended to, well defined.¡¨ He puts that object and tries to concentrate on that object, and tries to actually memorize the object s could see the object, see the sign with his eyes closed.

¡§Having done that, and seeing its advantages and perceiving it as a treasure, building up making it dear to him, he anchors his mind to that object.¡¨ He may even be attached to that have got it in your mind, you may be attached to it. You don¡¦t want to lose it. It is dear to yo

¡§He anchors his mind to that object thinking ¡¥Surely, in this way¡¦ - actually ¡¥Surely by t I shall be free from aging and death¡¦.¡¨ What the author is describing here is samatha medit samatha meditation should be directed towards getting free from aging and death. That mea samatha on it, he will go to vipassan?.

Samatha for samatha¡¦s sake is not praised by the Buddha. You practice samatha meditat concentration. Then you go to vipassan? meditation. With the help of the concentration from you can easily go to vipassan? meditation. Samatha meditation should be a basis for vipass is why it is said ¡§Surely by this practice I shall be freed from aging and death.¡¨

¡§Secluded from sense desires ...he enters upon and dwells in the first jh?na.¡¨ We will co not today but next week.

When a person has previous experience with the practice of meditation, then he may not n of earth. Just by looking at the natural earth he may get the sign, or the abstract sign, or the
If a person had experience in the past, then he may not need to make a kasi?a disk. If he do experience, then he will have to make a kasi?a disk. That is with regard to ¡¥made and unm is for those who have had experience in the past lives. For those who have not, they have to themselves.

¡§When a man has had no such previous practice, he should make a kasi?a, guarding aga of a kasi?a and not overlooking any of the directions for the meditation subject learned from the four faults of a kasi?a are due to the intrusion of blue, yellow, red or white.¡¨ When you m kasi?a it must not be blue color, yellow color, red color or white color. That is because amon kasi?as there are four color kasi?as - blue, yellow, red and white. So in order not to mix with kasi?a should not be blue, yellow, red or white.

¡§Instead of using clay of such colors he should make the kasi?a of clay like that in the str which is the color of the dawn.¡¨ It is somewhat red but not really red color. You may get up morning and look at the dawn. In our books it is defined as a little red, but not quite red, but red. It is that color. It is said in the book that you should use dawn-colored clay. You can ge stream Gang?. ¡¥Gang?¡¦ does not mean necessarily the Ganges river in India. A river is ca Gang? is a common noun meaning river. And it is also the name of a river in India.

He should make it not in the middle of the monastery in a place where novices, etc., are al confines of the monastery.¡¨ So he should make it in a secluded place.

When he makes the kasi?a, he can make it portable one or as a fixed one. ¡§A portable or tying rags, or leather, or matting onto four sticks and smearing thereon a disk of the size alre mentioned.¡¨ That means about the size of a round tray. Down further the size will be given.

¡§...Using clay picked clean of grass, roots, gravel and sand, and well kneaded. At the time preliminary work it should be laid on the ground and looked at.¡¨ So you put it on the ground and practice meditation on it.

¡§A fixture should be made by knocking stakes into the ground in the form of a lotus calyx, over with creepers. If the clay is insufficient, then other clay should be put underneath.¡¨ So dawn-colored clay is insufficient, then you can use other colored clay underneath and put th clay on the surface, on top.

¡§And a disk a span and four fingers across made on the top of that¡¨ - that is about the siz span and four fingers is about ten inches in diameter.

¡§So, having thus made it delimited and of the size prescribed, he should scrape it down w trowel.¡¨ He should not use a wooden trowel because it makes the color bad. ¡§And make it surface of a drum.¡¨ So it is very smooth.

¡§Then he should sweep the place out and have a bath.¡¨ We will come to that later. We n both internal as well as external.

¡§On his return he should seat himself on a well-covered chair.¡¨ Actually it is not a well-co

It is a well-placed chair on even ground.

¡§He should seat himself on a well-placed chair with legs a span and four fingers high (abo prepared in a place that is two and a half cubits from the kasi?a disk.¡¨ So the disk should be feet away. A cubit is 18 inches. So two cubits is 36 inches or three feet and then nine inches

¡§For the kasi?a does not appear plainly to him if he sits further off than that.¡¨ If he sits too is not plain to him. If he sits too close, then faults of the kasi?a appear. When you make an e may not be as smooth as a mirror. So you may see faults like impressions of your fingers or that. In order not to see them, you have to put it a little way back.

¡§If he sits higher up, he has to look at it with his neck bent; and if he sits lower down, his ache.¡¨ So he should sit in a place that is neither too high nor too low. The kasi?a should be from him nor too close to him Then he practices meditation.

When he looks at the disk, he should not open his eyes too wide. If he opens his eyes too fatigued and the disk becomes too obvious. And when the disk becomes too obvious, then t apparent to him. If he opens his eyes too little, then he cannot see the disk clearly. And so th become drowsy and fall asleep. It should be looked at with eyes open evenly, not too wide n he were looking at himself in a mirror. When you look at a looking glass or mirror, you look a not at the color of the glass or the characteristics of the mirror. In the same way when you lo you do not look at its color and so on. We will come to that later.

¡§The color should not be reviewed. The characteristics should not be given attention.¡¨ Th say that the color should not be looked at because you cannot avoid looking at color when y disk. The disk is somewhat red. When you look at the disk and practice meditation on it, you seeing color. But you do not pay attention to color because if you pay attention to color, then meditation will not be on the earth disk but on the colored disk. You are not to mix with the c You are not to pay attention to color.

¡§The characteristic should not be given attention.¡¨ Earth has the characteristic of hardne not concentrate on the hardness of the earth on the disk. If you concentrate on the characte earth disk, you are doing another kind of meditation, not this kasi?a meditation. There is anc meditation which is described in maybe chapter 10 where you concentrate on the characteri not on the things themselves. Here you pay attention to the earth kasi?a and not its characte

¡§The characteristic should not be given attention. But rather while not ignoring the color, a should be given by setting the mind on the (name) concept.¡¨ The earth is a concept. It is no is real is just the hardness. Hardness is a reality and earth is a concept. This kind of meditat concept as object and not reality. So the concept should be taken into account. Something li thing, the earth, the round earth you look at it. But you do not concentrate on its characterist hardness or softness. You do not look at the color or take care of the color but just what is c people.

Then you look at it and say ¡§earth, earth, earth¡¨. So it says here ¡§That conceptual state by any one he likes among the names for earth.¡¨ There are many words for the earth. They can use any synonym for the earth. In English there may not be as many as in P??i languag pathav?, mah?, medin?, bhumi, vasudh?, and vasudhar?. There are many words in P??i for ¡¥earth¡¦. Any one of them can be used. You look at the disk and you say in P??i ¡§Pathav? or ¡§Vasudh?, vasudh?¡¨. Whatever word you say, it just means the earth. One uses ¡§which perception.¡¨

¡§Still ¡¥earth¡¦ is also a name that is obvious¡¨. The sentence really means ¡¥earth¡¦ is a n commonly used. So you can just use the word ¡¥pathav?¡¦ and not the other words. That is v

¡§Still ¡¥earth¡¦ is (¡¥Also¡¦ is not needed here.) a name that is obvious, so it can be develo obvious one by saying ¡¥earth, earth¡¦.¡¨ That means pathav?, pathav?, pathav?. You look a open and say ¡¥earth, earth¡¦. Then you close your eyes and try to memorize it. Then you op close them again. In this way you practice meditation. You try to memorize the image or sign until you get it in your mind, until you see it in your mind without looking at it.

That is the time when you are said to have got what is called the ¡¥learning sign¡¦ here. Th abstract sign or let us say the memorized sign.

After you get that memorized sign, you leave that place and go to your own place and prac is because if you look at the disk and practice again and again, it is said that you cannot get counterpart sign.

¡¥Counterpart sign¡¦ is finer than the memorized sign. In order to get the counterpart sign yo practice looking in your mind and not looking at the thing itself.

In order not to see the thing, not to look at the thing, you get away from it because if you a it, you cannot help looking at it. So you just leave it there and go back to your own place and meditation, memorizing or seeing the sign in your mind and dwelling upon it again and again becomes refined and is changed into what is called a ¡¥counterpart sign¡¦.

Student: You are not memorizing or visualizing the word ¡¥earth¡¦?

Teacher: No, not the word but the thing we call ¡¥earth¡¦.

Student: So the counterpart sign is your mental image.

Teacher: Mental image, that¡¦s right. The first mental image here is called ¡¥learning sign¡¦. T image appears as the real thing is. You dwell on it again and again in your mind and it chang counterpart sign. When it changes into a counterpart sign, it is refined. It is smooth and very you have the memorized sigh in your mind, whatever faults there are on the disk also appea when you reach the stage of the counterpart sign, then the faults or defects of the kasi?a dis becomes like a polished mirror.

You dwell upon it again and again until you first reach the access concentration and then j concentration. There are two kinds of concentration - access concentration and absorption c Access concentration is the one you get before you reach the stage of jh?na. They are desc 32,33 and so on.

¡§Now concentration is of two kinds, that is to say, access concentration and absorption co mind becomes concentrated in two ways, that is, on the plane of access and on the plane of ¡¥Obtainment¡¦ means jh?na concentration.

¡§Herein, the mind becomes concentrated on the lane of access by the abandonment of th you get rid of hindrances (sensual desire, anger, sloth and torpor, agitation and remorse, an your mind is on the object and you are said to have got the plane of access concentration. W jh?na stage, you are said to have attained the absorption concentration.

¡§The difference between the two kinds of concentration is this. The factors are not strong During the time of access concentration the factors are the mental states accompanying tha which is practicing meditation. These factors are not strong. Because they are not strong en lapses into life-continuum or bhava~ga. Then the mind goes to the object again and then lap again. The factors there are not so strong.

When you reach the jh?na stage, your mind can be on that object for a whole day, for a wh being distracted to any other object. The factors or mental states accompanying the conscio at that time. These are the two kinds of concentration. When you reach access or jh?na con reach to one stage of the practice of meditation.

If you can get to the absorption stage easily, it is good. But if you cannot, then you have to here. What you have to do is ¡¥guarding the sign¡¦. You¡¦ve got the counterpart sign. You ha your mind. You have to keep it from slipping away from your mind. You have to do somethin Actually you have to avoid seven things that are unsuitable. The seven things that may be abode, resort, speech, person, food, climate and posture. For example if living in a certain p practice meditation and lose the sign, it is not a good place. It is not suitable for you. It is son like that with the others too.

¡¥Resort¡¦ really means a village where monks go for alms. That is called a ¡¥resort¡¦. It sh neither too far nor too near.

In paragraph 37 there is the word ¡¥kosa¡¦. One kosa is about two miles. So ¡¥one kosa an about three miles.

Then speech - ¡¥speech¡¦ means talking. If you talk too much and if you talk nonsense, the what you have got, the counterpart sign. So you have to be restrained with regard to talking.

¡§Person: one not given to aimless talk, who has the special qualities of virtue, etc., by acc with whom the unconcentrated mind becomes concentrated, or the concentrated mind more is much concerned with his body, who is addicted to aimless talk is unsuitable.¡¨ The latter k are unsuitable and you have to avoid them.

Student: When you say ¡¥pays too much attention to the body, what is too much attention?

Teacher: In the footnote it says in exercising and caring for the body. It is too much concern or too much concern with the body. However you need to have some exercise to keep your Student: Do they do yoga practices?

Teacher: I don¡¦t know. Yoga practices are for keeping your body in good shape. It may be p practice yoga postures or whatever with concentration or mindfulness meditation. But some concerned with their bodies. I think that is what is meant here. We have to pay proper attent physical bodies. If our physical bodies are not in good shape, we cannot practice meditation

Such persons are to be avoided because the attainments even the jh?nas can disappear i such persons who talk aimlessly and pay too much attention to their bodies.

Then food - for some sweet food is suitable. For others sour food is suitable and so on. Or suitable food to keep the counterpart sign from disappearing from you.

¡§Climate: a cool climate suits one, a warm one another.¡¨ That is why we need some kind practice meditation. We need to eat food which is suitable for us. Then we need to be in a su not too cold nor too warm and so on.

Posture - you can choose a posture which is best for you - walking, standing, sitting, mayb down. If walking suits you, then you walk. If sitting suits you, then you can sit. Here in the bo is also given.

Student: Is this something that the person decides for himself or that the teacher decides?

Teacher: Here the monk decides for himself. It is like the abode. You have to try it for three one - walking three days, sitting three days and so on. Then you choose which is best for yo

If after avoiding the seven which are not suitable and taking those which are suitable, you jh?na or absorption, then you have to go through these ten skills in absorption. The first is m clean. It is keeping your body clean and keeping the place clean. There is internal cleanlines cleanliness. The meditation room needs to be clean and neat. Also our bodies should be cle few pages before it said you take a bath and then practice meditation. Keeping the basis cle When our bodies are clean, then we have more chance to get concentration. Also when the neat and not too crowded with many things, it is conducive to the practice of meditation or co

The second one is maintaining balanced faculties. It is very important. When we practice m are said to be five faculties or working factors. They are faith or confidence, effort, mindfulne concentration, and understanding. These five faculties should be balanced so that we get go or we get absorption or jh?na, and also if we practice vipassan? we get the realization of tru be balancing of these faculties. If any one of these faculties is in excess, then the others car function well. They must be functioning well when they are working together. One must not e

If there is too much faith, too much confidence, then you have to reduce it by reviewing the essences of the states. That means if you have too much faith in the Buddha or you have to teacher, then you have to review the impermanence of the Buddha or the teacher. They are will go away one day. And so you get less attachment or less devotion to them. If there is too then you cannot practice meditation.

If there is too much energy, you cannot practice meditation either. There are two stories gi is of the Elder Vakkali and the other is of the Elder Sona.

The Elder Vakkali is the one who had too much faith in the Buddha, who was too devoted did not practice meditation. The buddha had to shake him up and dismiss him. He said some come to me. What is the good of looking at this putrid body of mine?¡¨ Buddha dismissed hi Vakkali was so sorry that he decided to kill himself by jumping off a cliff. When he was abou Buddha sent his rays to him. That is the story of Vakkali. I brought the story of the Elder Vak you don¡¦t have it here. It is in Buddhist Legends.

Student: We do have it. I will put it on reserve.
Teacher: The other story is about the Elder Sona who made too much effort and so could no the beginning. He was the son of a very rich man. It is said that he was very soft with regard was so very delicate that hair grew on his palms and on the soles of his feet. When he beca thought that he must make much effort in order to obtain attainment. So he walked up and d night. He put forth too much effort walking up and down. He could not get concentration. He the soles of his feet. After practicing for some time, he decided to leave the Order and go ba

The Buddha knew this. So Buddha went to him and told him the simile of the lute or harp. too tight, you cannot get good sound. If the strings are too loose, you cannot get good sound be found in The Book of Discipline and in the Gradual Sayings. I will give you the references the story in full. In the book of Discipline it is in volume 4, page 236 and the following pages.
Gradual Sayings it is in volume 3, pagee 266 and the following pages.

When one is too strong, the others cannot perform their respective functions well. It is not but ¡¥respective¡¦ functions. These factors have their respective functions. Faith has one fun has another function and so on. When one is too strong, the others cannot perform their res well.

¡§Particularly recommended is balancing faith with understanding, and concentration with are the most important - balancing faith with understanding and concentration with energy.

If you have too much faith, then you will believe in anything. You will believe in what you o believe. You will be led astray by those who deceive people. If your understanding is too stro too wise, you tend to become cunning or maybe tricky. These two have to be balanced. You much faith or too much understanding or wisdom.

Concentration and energy must be balanced also. If there is too much concentration, you t lazy. If there is too much energy, you tend to become agitated. In both ways you lose conce

Paragraph 48 is important because first the author said that there should be balance betw Particularly recommended is the balancing between faith with understanding and concentrat he is going to give another explanation, a different explanation than in the preceding paragra

Here the translation is not what it should be. Paragraph 48 says differently than what is sa was said above is that faith must be balanced with understanding and concentration should energy. There in paragraph 48 it is said that for a person who is practicing samatha meditati strong faith is permissible. If faith is stronger than other factors, it is still good. This is becaus faith he will make effort and get what he wants. That is he will get concentration and absorpt

With regard to concentration and understanding, not concentration and energy, here it is c understanding. For one practicing samatha meditation concentration can be stronger. When samatha meditation, concentration that is stronger is permissible. Stronger is good because concentration you will get to absorption. You will get to the jh?na stage. For one working on practicing vipassan? meditation, understanding that is stronger is permissible. Understandin should be stronger. This is because with that understanding or penetrative knowledge he wi penetration of characteristics. The ¡¥characteristics¡¦ mean impermanence, suffering and so one who is practicing samatha meditation, stronger concentration is permissible. For one wh vipassan? meditation, stronger understanding is permissible.

But with the balancing of the two he reaches absorption as well. We can ask what is their OK. When they are balanced, he can get absorption as well. He can get jh?na absorption.

When you practice meditation and you are trying to get jh?na, then there can be stronger
It¡¦s OK. But when you practice meditation to get the supramundane attainment, the balanci is necessary. This is what is meant in this paragraph.

The translation here is not quite like that. It is different from what has been said above. Ab that the faculties should be balanced. In this paragraph it says even though they are not per still it is OK.

What about mindfulness? Mindfulness is needed everywhere. Mindfulness is like salt seas there is no instance where mindfulness is in excess. Mindfulness is always needed.

Student: Concentration mentioned in paragraphs 47 & 48 is samatha. It¡¦s not jh?na or sam?
Teacher: Concentration in paragraph 47 is sam?dhi. In paragraph 48 ¡¥one working on conc practicing samatha meditation. For him sam?dhi can be stronger than pa???.
Student: What do you mean by sam?dhi?
Teacher: Concentration.
Student: Sam?dhi, jh?na and samatha can be translated as concentration in different contex Teacher: Yes. In P??i sam?dhi and samatha can be synonymous. It is concentration of minc translated as tranquillity, but samatha and sam?dhi can be synonymous. Sam?dhi may be w samatha because in vipassan? also we need sam?dhi. Sam?dhi is the ability of the mind to object, to be on the object. Samatha is defined as the stilling of the hindrances or getting rid hindrances. But sam?dhi and samatha are used synonymously in some contexts. ¡¥Concen means samatha and sometimes it really means sam?dhi.
Student: Samatha has a fixed object and sam?dhi may have a fixed object or variable objec Teacher: That¡¦s right. Because sam?dhi in vipassan? meditation does not have a fixed obje can be on a fixed object, it is better. But when you practice vipassan? meditation, you have everything that becomes prominent at the present moment. Therefore the object cannot be f Student: Jh?na in these definitions is a particularly developed kind of samatha concentration Teacher: Right. Jh?na is in the realm of samatha meditation.

For details on paragraph 54 you may read the book the Way of Mindfulness by Venerable give you the page numbers also. For paragraph 54 it is pages 135-140. For paragraph 55 yo book pages 141-143.

In paragraph 55 the fourth line it says ¡§ seeing benefit in obtaining the mundane and supr distinctions.¡¨ ¡¥Mundane distinctions¡¦ means the attainment of jh?na. ¡¥Supramundane dis attainment of enlightenment. ¡¥Distinction¡¦ here means jh?nas and enlightenment.

For paragraph 56 you may read that book The Way of Mindfulness, page 144. Then for pa read the Way of Mindfulness, pages 144-145. For paragraph 61 you should read The Way o 145-147. And for paragraph 62 you need to read in the same book pages 147-148.

Here how to exert the mind on occasions and how to restrain or how to suppress the mind given. So if a person cannot get absorption just by avoiding the seven that are unsuitable, th these ten things for skill in absorption. ¡¥Skill in absorption¡¦ means skill in getting or reachin absorption. These ten things he should do. And even at that stage after acquiring the ten ski reach the jh?na stage, he should not despair. He should do what is called equalizing the effo concentration. So the verses just mean that.

¡§A man wise in temperament Notices how his mind inclines;
Energy and serenity
Always he couples each to each.¡¨

So he should balance these two.

The Commentator gives five similes. The first is the bee getting the pollen. The second is t student practicing surgery on a lotus leaf. The third is taking the spider¡¦s thread or the spide fourth is the ship¡¦s skipper. The fifth is the oil tube. So there are five similes given.

At the beginning of the first simile it says ¡§When a too clever bee -¡§. Now there is a varia which means just not clever. So we can take either one. We may take ¡¥too clever¡¦ becaus the meaning. So we may say a ¡¥too clever bee¡¦ or a ¡¥bee which is not clever¡¦. The same other similes.

These five similes are just to teach us that we are not to be too eager or too lax in our effo equalize or balance concentration with energy. If we can keep energy and concentration on we will get what we are striving for or we will get the absorption states.

Next week we will go to the first jh?na.

Student: The reason that the first meditation is on the earth kasi?a is because it is easier for concentration? It is a natural concentration?

Teacher: Yes, for those who have had experience in the past it comes naturally. They just lo and they get the sign. This is true for other kinds of kasi?as also. Sometimes you just look a water and then you get the sign. So it is like natural.

Student: Is there some usual length of time using earth kasi?a to develop absorption? Is the variation?

Teacher: There may be variation between one individual and another. It depends on how he how much past experience he had.

Student: Are there pictures of kasi?as so we could see a typical kasi?a object?

Teacher: I have a color kasi?a. I can bring it next time or next week. Color kasi?a is easier t earth kasi?a. You find a board and paint it blue, yellow, red or white. There is one lady who i color kasi?a. She lives in marin County. She wanted to practice mett? meditation. So I sugg practice the white kasi?a first to get the conceptualized image of that disk. Then after getting could put anybody in that disk and then she could practice loving-kindness to that person. T

I don¡¦t know how far she has gone, but she said that she was doing that.
Student: Getting the mental image clearly is different from seeing the counterpart sign?
Teacher: there are two signs. The first one let us cal ¡¥the memorized sign. First you look at memorize it. Then you close your eyes and see it as clearly as if your eyes were open.At tha is the exact image of the disk. If there are defects on the disk, they appear in your memory t concentrate on that memorized image. You close your eyes and look at that image again an becomes more refined. And so eventually the faults disappear. It becomes smooth and clea where you get the counterpart sign. That is called the ¡¥counterpart sign¡¦.
Student: That is a transformed image that you experience with your concentration.
Teacher: That¡¦s right. The two signs differ in degree of clarity.
Student: It¡¦s a conceptualization. The second is more conceptualized.
Teacher: Yes. The counterpart sign is also a concept. It is not a reality. It is born of a percep mind. It exists in your mind. So it is a kind of concept.
Student: Is it something that you just know that you have when you see it or attain it?
Teacher: Oh yes. You know that you have that because it is in your mind. Whenever you ca eyes, it will appear to you.
Student: Is this a meditation that is done at just a particular time or is it something you do for your life?
Teacher: No, not the rest of your life. It is for a particular time to reach a certain stage of abs
The Buddha¡¦s wish is for people to practice samatha meditation as a basis for vipassan? m practice samatha meditation. Then you contemplate on the practice itself or on the other obj impermanent, unsatisfactory and soulless. So you go to vipassan? after you practice samath

S?dhu! S?dhu! S?dhu!

(Tape 10 / PS: 74 -137)

Today we will study the detailed exposition of the first jh?na. So far the yogi has prepared until he got the access concentration. With the gaining of access concentration he got the co his mind. That is the mental image of the kasi?a disk appears in his mind. He dwells on it ag concentrates on that mental image. When the time is ripe, there arises in him a thought proc jh?na consciousness.

¡§While he is guiding his mind in this way, confronting the sign (that means dwelling on the sign again and again.), [then knowing] ¡¥now absorption will succeed¡¦.¡¨ This is the place w translators misunderstood the P??i idiom. The P??i idiom here means just ¡¥when absorptio So we do not need the words in square brackets, ¡¥then knowing¡¦. The subject of this sente mind-door-adverting and not the person. Also the person does not know when the absorptio P??i idiom is: ¡¥when absorption is about to arise¡¦. Literally translated it should be ¡¥when i said that absorption will succeed or absorption will arise¡¦. When absorption or jh?na is abou happens is that mind-door-adverting arises cutting off the flow of the life-continuum or bhava

Please look at the sheet today of the jh?na thought process. I have given the diagrams of processes before. If you look at the beginning of the line the first two are ¡¥Bh¡¦. They are bh M is mind-door-adverting. When absorption is about to arise, there arises first in his mind mind-door-adverting. After that there are five moments of impulsion or javana. The first four k?mavacara (sense-sphere) consciousness. The fifth javana belongs to r|pavacara (fine-ma consciousness. The first four javanas are what we call beautiful-sense-sphere consciousnes is called preliminary work. the second javana is called access. The third javana is called con fourth javana is called change of lineage. The Commentary explains that all four of these jav called by each of these names - preliminary work, access, conformity. All four can be called If we want to give them separate names so that one excludes the other , then the first is prel the second is access, the third is conformity and the fourth is change of lineage.

It is at the fourth moment that the k?mavacara lineage stops. The fifth moment becomes th lineage, the fine-material lineage. That is why it is called change of lineage.

The second diagram shows another variety of the thought process, but here you do not ha work. There are three k?mavacara javanas and the fourth is jh?na. So in this thought proces k?mavacara javanas and then the fourth javana is the r|pavacara jh?na. The jh?na arises ei moment or at the fourth moment. In these thought processes we don not have the normal du javanas. Usually javanas repeat themselves seven times, but in this thought process there a four javana moments. Normally there are seven moments of javana in the thought process. when the object is really experienced. They are the moments when kamma is acquired, eith kamma. The commentator explains all this in paragraphs 74 & 75.

In paragraphs 76 & 77 another view is given of the Elder Godatta. There can be sixth and javana. This Elder felt there could be six or seven javana moments. This opinion is refuted b Buddhaghosa, the author of this book. If the javana were to go on to the sixth or seventh mo be able to stop as jh?na.

The analogy that is given is: When a person runs fast towards a precipice, he would not b there because he has gained momentum. In a similar manner one javana supports the next more and more powerful. At the third or fourth k?mavacara javana moments the flow of k?m can stop and the jh?na consciousness can arise. The common opinion of the teachers is tha at the fifth moment or at the fourth moment and not at the sixth or seventh moments. There k?mavacara moments or three k?mavacara moments preceding the arising of the jh?na thou a jh?na thought process arises.

In this book it is called ¡¥cognitive series¡¦. We call it a ¡¥thought process¡¦ and Venerable calls it a ¡¥cognitive series¡¦. In P??i it is called ¡¥v?thi¡¦.

When Buddha described the first jh?na he used something like a stereotyped expression. a detailed exposition of that Text. The translation of that Text I have given on the sheet to m clear. It is different from what you see in The Path of Purification., but they mean the same t

The passage runs like this: ¡§Quite secluded from k?mas, secluded from akusalas, he ent in the first jh?na which is accompanied by vitakka and vic?ra and which is born of seclusion secluded states and which is with p?ti and sukha.¡¨ This is the description of the first jh?na.

The first phrase says ¡¥quite secluded from k?mas¡¦ and the second phrase says ¡¥seclu
The Commentary explains that the word ¡¥quite¡¦ is to be understood in the second phrase a they do not repeat a word again and again, but let it be understood tacitly in later expression although it does not say ¡¥quite secluded from k?mas and quite secluded from akusalas¡¦, w that ¡¥quite¡¦ is meant in the second phrase also. The word ¡¥quite¡¦ here means something otherwise¡¦. There is definiteness here. Your mind must be secluded from k?mas and not oth get jh?na. Without seclusion from k?mas there can be no attainment of jh?na. The same is t Without being quite secluded from akusala there can be no attainment of jh?na. ¡¥Quite¡¦ sh in the second phrase also.

¡§He enters upon and dwells in the first jh?na which is accompanied by vitakka and vic?ra vic?ra are jh?na factors. They are mental factors. In English we call them ¡¥initial application ¡¥sustained application¡¦. This is why you need a certain knowledge of Abhidhamma in orde
The first jh?na is accompanied by vitakka and vic?ra (initial application and sustained applic

The first jh?na is born of seclusion. We will come to seclusion later. The first jh?na arises i states. That means it arises together with secluded states.

The first jh?na is with p?ti and sukha. ¡¥P?ti¡¦ is translated as joy. ¡¥Sukha¡¦ is translated a happiness. I think you remember the difference between p?ti and sukha. It is explained in Th Purification.

The word ¡¥k?ma¡¦ is important here. The word ¡¥k?ma¡¦ can mean objects of sense-desir themselves. Whenever we find the word ¡¥k?ma¡¦, we have to understand what it means. So the objects of sense-desires. Sometimes it may mean sense-desires. And sometimes it may word ¡¥k?ma¡¦ can mean both the objects of sense-desires and sense-desires themselves.

If I am attached to this cup, then this is the object of my sense-desire. Sense-desire is in m the object. This object is called ¡¥k?ma¡¦ and the desire arising in my mind is also called ¡¥k can mean the thing we are attached to or the attachment that we have.

When we take k?ma to mean the objects of sense-desires, then the first phrase shows tha secluded from these sense objects, desirable sense objects, objects which we can be attach be practicing in the middle of the city where there can be many attractions. We should be in or in a forest somewhere where there are not such attractive objects. The first phrase shows secluded bodily.

The second phrase ¡¥quite secluded from akusalas¡¦ means that we must be secluded fro all akusala. That means akusalas including sense-desires. Sense-desire is lobha. So it is inc

This is when we take k?ma to mean objects of sense-desire.

If we take k?ma to mean just sense-desires, then the first phrase shows seclusion from se first phrase shows we must be secluded from sense-desires. We must not have sense-desir The second phrase shows seclusion from all akusala and sense-desires. When we say ¡¥se mean secluded from lobha. ¡¥Secluded from akusala¡¦ means all akusala including lobha. W these two phrases in this way. This is the gist of what the Commentary or The Path of Purific these passages.

In order to get jh?na one must be secluded from sense objects and sense-desires, and als akusala, especially from what we call the ¡¥hindrances¡¦. There are five hindrances mention book. If our minds are not free from sense-desires and the other hindrances, concentration there is no concentration, there can be no attainment of jh?na. In order to get at least this fir minds should be away from the sense-desires, the sense objects and also away from the m hindrances are sense-desires, anger, sloth and torpor, restlessness and remorse, and doub hindrances that are mentioned later.

In the translation what is meant by ¡¥sense desires as object¡¦? Are objects sense desires not accurate. Suppose this is a sense object. This is the object of sense. This is not sense d the object of sense desire. I think we should not say ¡¥sense desires as object¡¦. I think we s ¡¥sense desires¡¦ object¡¦ or ¡¥object of sense desires¡¦. I think it should be like that.

Student: Sense desires as object - we would look at sense desires not their object.

Teacher: When we say ¡¥object of sense desire¡¦, what do you understand by that?

Student: That would be r|pa.

Teacher: They can be r|pa and n?ma also.

Student: The tea could be the object of sense desire.

Teacher: The tea could be the object of sense desire. Anything can be the object of sense d is the subject arising in our mind. The objects are something outside our mind or even withir they cannot be the same thing at the same moment. You know we are attached to thoughts is in the mind. That thought is the object of our sense desire.

Student: Aren¡¦t dharmas objects of sense desire?

Teacher: Everything in the world can be the object. There are six senses in Abhidhamma - e The visible object is the object of the eye, of seeing consciousness and so on. The other obj objects of the mind. Instead of saying ¡¥sense desires as object¡¦ I think it should say ¡¥obje desires¡¦. But we have ¡¥sense desires¡¦ objects¡¦ in the second line of paragraph 83. I think correct. It is an apostrophe. It is not a quote. There is confusion here in the typing also.

In paragraph 82 about a third of the way down we find ¡¥sense-desire-element¡¦. It actually of sense desire. We have come across this word in the past. Although it is translated as ele meant is the realm of sense desire. That means k?mavacara realm. Sometimes translators literal. The word ¡¥dh?tu¡¦ is used. The word ¡¥dh?tu¡¦ is normally translated as element. Fo are four great elements - earth element, water element, fire element and wind element. The is dh?tu. Here also the word dh?tu is used in a different sense, not in the sense that they are parts of something. Here ¡¥k?madh?tu¡¦ means simply the realm of k?ma. That means the k k?mavacara world.

In paragraph 88 ¡§So far the factors abandoned by the first (We need the word ¡¥first here been shown. And now, in order to show the factors associated with it, which is accompanied sustained thought etc. is said.¡¨ Etcetera is missing there.

Now we come to familiar ground. There is initial application or here it is called applied thou sustained thought. That means initial application and sustained application. Vitakka and vic? factors. The Commentary explains one by one initial application and sustained application. I the difference between these two. They arise at the same time with the same type of consci have different functions. So they are different.

In paragraph 89 ¡§And though sometimes not separate¡¨ - that means ¡¥though sometime with some types of consciousness. Initial thought and sustained thought arise together with consciousness. Actually with 55 kinds of consciousness they arise together. In the second jh initial application or applied thought. The same is true for the third, fourth and fifth jh?nas. Th sometimes not separate¡¦ means that although in some types of consciousness they arise to thought is one thing and sustained thought is another.

The author then gives the analogies of the differences between vitakka and vic?ra. I have these differences when we studied Abhidhamma here. Do you remember them? In the midd thought is ¡§like a bird¡¦s spreading out its wings when about to soar into the air, and like a b towards a lotus when it is minded to follow up the scent of it. The behaviour of sustained tho being the near non-interference of consciousness, like the bird¡¦s planing with outspread win into the air, and like the bee¡¦s buzzing above the lotus after it dives towards it.¡¨ Initial applic going to the thing first and sustained application is staying on it. There are other analogies to Student: It would seem that they would arise in sequence.

Teacher: They arise together and they have different functions. Initial application is the one t mind to the object. Sustained application is the one that keeps the mind there.

Student: Still it seems to me that initial application would arise first and then sustained applic

Teacher: They arise together. ¡¥Initial application¡¦ is not an exact translation of the word. Th word ¡¥initial¡¦, so we may think that vitakka comes first and then vic?ra follows. ¡¥Vitakka¡¦ j thinking or thought. ¡¥Vic?ra¡¦ means going here and there. That is vic?ra. They are togethe different functions.

Then there is the word that we just translated here as ¡¥born of seclusion¡¦. There are two this word in P??i - ¡¥born of seclusion¡¦ or ¡¥arises in secluded states¡¦. That means arises w states. ¡¥Secluded states¡¦ really means the jh?na consciousness and the other mental facto here means the disappearance of hindrances. So long as there are hindrances there can be can be no arising of jh?na consciousness. ¡¥Born of seclusion¡¦ means the disappearance o mental hindrances.

The jh?na is with p?ti and sukha, with joy and happiness. Here Venerable N??amoli transl happiness and sukha as bliss.

The Commentary gives five kinds of p?ti here. These kinds of p?ti the meditators experien meditation. There are said to be five kinds of such happiness, or joy, or zest. There are minc momentary p?ti, showering p?ti, uplifting p?ti, and pervading p?ti.

Minor p?ti is only able to raise the hairs on the body. Sometimes you have this hair standir may be caused by the cold. It is also caused by p?ti in the mind.

Momentary p?ti is a little stronger than minor p?ti. It is like flashes of lightening at different Sometimes you feel this when you practice meditation.

¡§Showering p?ti breaks over the body again and again like waves on the sea shore.¡¨ It is comes over the body and the subsides. Then it comes again and subsides. That is showerin

The fourth one is uplifting p?ti. When you have this kind of p?ti, your body can levitate. Tw given here in which two persons levitated or flew through the air. It was not by the power of j supernormal knowledge but by the power of this p?ti.

These stories are not difficult to understand. One story is about a monk and the other story who was left behind because she was pregnant. The girl was very desirous of going to the p got p?ti from thinking of the people going round the pagoda and making offerings to the Bud uplifting p?ti and was transported to the pagoda festival. She got there before her parents re That was by the power of uplifting p?ti.

The last one is pervading p?ti. ¡§the whole body is completely pervaded, like a filled bladd cavern invaded by a huge inundation.¡¨ It is something like when surgical cotton is put in wa totally soaked by the water. Your whole body is soaked in this kind of happiness.

I would translate sukha as happiness. P?ti is difficult to translate. It could be translated as The Commentary gives the difference between p?ti and sukha.

P?ti and sukha also arise at the same time with some types of consciousness. Although th in this case also there is difference because p?ti is not feeling according to Abhidhamma. P? formation aggregate and sukha belongs to feeling aggregate. So they are different. Sukha is P?ti is not vedan?, but it is something like ¡¥preceding sukha¡¦ although they arise at the sar

P?ti is compared to a man exhausted in the desert who saw a pond at the edge of the woo he went to the woods¡¦ shade, he would have sukha there. P?ti and sukha are something lik translated as pleasurable interest. When you are going on a journey and you are tired and y then you have some kind of joy. When you have reached the pond and made use of the wat have the real experience of that thing. One is interest in that thing. The other is the real expe that thing.

There is an alternate translation of the passage there. That is ¡§which is accompanied by v vic?ra, and which is with p?ti and sukha which are born of seclusion.¡¨ The word ¡¥born of se qualify jh?na or it can qualify p?ti and sukha. Although it is not so important which way we ta must understand this. ¡¥Born of seclusion¡¦ qualifies jh?na in the first translation. It is jh?na v born of seclusion. The alternative translation is that it is p?ti and sukha which are born of se Actually they mean the same thing because p?ti and sukha are constituents of jh?na.

Do you remember the five factors of jh?na? Vitakka, vic?ra, p?ti, sukha and the last is one (ekaggat?). Those are the five factors of jh?na.

So the word ¡¥p?tisukha¡¦ in P??i or ¡¥vivekajanp?tisukha¡¦ is interpreted in two ways. In t is the jh?na which is born of seclusion and which is accompanied by p?ti and sukha. In the a interpretation it is p?ti and sukha which are born of seclusion, and it is jh?na which is accom p?ti and that sukha. So if p?ti and sukha are born of seclusion the jh?na is also born of seclu sukha are part of jh?na.

¡§First jh?na: this will be explained below. Enters upon (upasampajja): arrives at; reaches meant; or else, taking it as ¡¥makes enter¡¦ (upasamp?dayitv?).¡¨ Actually the word ¡¥upasa something like having accomplished. The literal meaning is having approached.

Then the word ¡¥dwell¡¦ is explained in paragraph 103. ¡§And dwells in (viharati); by becor jh?na of the kind described above through dwell in a posture favorable to that {jh?na} he pro a procedure, a keeping, an enduring, a lasting, a behaviour, a dwelling, of the person.¡¨ ¡¥O really means ¡¥of the body¡¦.

The first jh?na abandons five factors and possesses five factors. Five factors are abandon and it possesses five factors. The five factors that are abandoned are the five mental hindra paragraph 104) they are stated as lust, ill will, stiffness and torpor, agitation and worry, and They are the five mental hindrances. ¡§For no jh?na arises until these have been abandone jhana when there are these five mental hindrances.

Student: What does ¡¥stiffness¡¦ mean?

Teacher: Actually it is sleepiness. It is the translation of the P??i word ¡¥th?na¡¦. It is not rea stiffness. It is the inability of the mind to be awake, to be alert. It is translated as sloth and to other books.

In paragraph 105 the second line it says ¡§become concentrated on an object consisting i means a single object because if you have to get jh?na your mind has to be on one and the single object. ¡¥Object consisting in unity¡¦ simply means one object. ¡¥Object which has the means a single object or one object.

Here again we have the word ¡¥sense-desire-element¡¦. it should be understood as meani desires (k?mavacara loka).

What are the five factors possessed by first jh?na? These are the five factors we met in Ab initial application, sustained application, p?ti, sukha and ekaggat?. In the passage here ekag mentioned. But we must understand that ekaggat? is a factor of the first jh?na, not only the f of all jh?nas. So although one-pointedness is not mentioned in the passage we should unde one-pointedness is one of the factors or one of the constituents of jh?na.

Student: Is that what ¡¥unification of mind¡¦ means?

Teacher: Yes. That is what is meant here. It is translated here as unification of mind. What w simply - (Tape is turned over.)

The commentary gives the analogy of the army with four factors, music with five factors, th eight factors and so on. The army with four factors means the army consisting of elephants, chariots.

Student: where are you reading now?

Teacher: In paragraph 107 ¡§The army with four factors and music with five factors¡¨ - there musical instruments like a drum with skin on one side and a drum with skin on two sides, a f you can strike together like cymbals. And then there is Eightfold Path. When we say Eightfo factors are the Path. There is no path apart from or different from the constituents. In the sa say jh?na, we mean these five factors in the first jh?na. In second jh?na we mean the four fa

We must understand jh?na, constituents or factors of jh?na, and jh?na consciousness. ¡¥J five factors - vitakka, vic?ra, p?ti, sukha, and ekaggat?. ¡¥Constituents of jh?na¡¦ means eac combination or group of five factors is jh?na. Each one is a jh?na factor. Consciousness acc five factors is called ¡¥jh?na consciousness¡¦. We must know the difference.

Now paragraph 109 ¡§Although unification of mind is not actually listed among these facto [summary] version [beginning] ¡¥which is accompanied by applied and sustained thought, n mentioned [later] in the vibhanga (¡¥Vibhanga¡¦ means an exposition.) as follows, ¡¥jh?na¡¦: thought, sustained thought, happiness, bliss, unification, and so it is a factor too; for the inte which the Blessed One gave the summary is the same as that with which he gave the expos it.¡¨

Although in the first passage Buddha did not mention unification of mind, later on when he exposition on that passage, Buddha said ¡§¡¥jh?na¡¦ means applied thought, sustained thou and unification.¡¨ So unification of mind is one of the factors of jh?na. Unification of mind is a important because it is what we call ¡¥sam?dhi¡¦ which is a synonym for jh?na also. These a factors.

The first jh?na abandons five and possesses the other five. The five that are abandoned a hindrances. The five that it possesses are initial application and others.

Student: The five mental hindrances are just abandoned for the duration of the jh?na?

Teacher: Yes. That¡¦s right. They are not totally abandoned. They may come back to the pe totally abandoned or eradicated only at the moment of enlightenment.

Student: through the power of concentration?

Teacher: Through the power of concentration and penetration into the nature of things. In ot the power of vipassan?. In order to be successful in vipassan? you need concentration beca concentration no vipassan? penetration can arise.

Student: But why then if you have insight and abandonment through insight, do the hindranc

Teacher: No. Insight can only abandon temporarily, not all together. Only when a person rea enlightenment does he abandon the mental defilements all together once and for all. That is reach the stage of enlightenment, they come back to us when we do not practice meditation practicing meditation, they are pushed aside for some time. They may not arise in our minds we stop meditation, then we may get one or many of these hindrances again. These are aba temporarily, not all together.

Student: Does that mean you can sort of backslide after the first jh?na?
Teacher: Even after the first jh?na they can come back. But when there is first jh?na, when f our minds, these mental hindrances do not arise. They are suppressed. This is because me jh?na are incompatible with each other. When one is there, the other is not. They cannot coe to get jh?na we have to abandon mental hindrances.
Student: Once you attain first jh?na does it become easier for you subsequently to experien Teacher: Yes. After you get the jh?na, this book tells you what to do to keep it for a long time on to the second jh?na and so on.

First it explains that it is good in three ways and possesses the ten characteristics and so these passages are a little difficult to understand.

¡§The first jh?na is good in three ways, that is good in the beginning, good in the middle, a end.¡¨ ¡¥Good in the beginning¡¦ is explained as first jh?na purification of the way. How many has the beginning? The beginning has three characteristics. The mind is purified of obstructi [jh?na]. That means the mind is freed of the mental hindrances. ¡§Because the mind is purifi for the central state of equilibrium which is the sign of serenity.¡¨ What does ¡¥makes way fo something happen?
Students: Prepares. For example if you walk into the room people would ¡¥make way for¡¦ y pass.
Teacher: But the P??i word here does not mean ¡¥make way for¡¦. It is ¡¥to go to¡¦ or ¡¥to re not mean ¡¥make way for¡¦. Because it is purified the mind reaches the central sign or the st or something like that. ¡¥Central¡¦ here means not too lax or not too active. The effort or ene just the right amount, neither too little nor too much.
Student: The middle way.
Teacher: That¡¦s right. ¡§Because it has reached (not ¡¥it has made way¡¦) the mind enters i And it is since the mind becomes purified of obstructions and, through being purified, (same ¡¥making way for¡¦) reaches the [central state of equilibrium which is the] sign of serenity an way, enters into that state.¡¨ and so on.

We will skip these passages and we will go to paragraph 119. ¡§It is called first jh?na beca numerical series.¡¨ That means it is just first and others are second, third, fourth and fifth. ¡§ first because it arises first.¡¨

¡§It is called jh?na because of lighting the object.¡¨ ¡¥Lighting is to put fire or to shine?
Student: To turn switch on for electricity.
Teacher: But here it does not mean ¡¥lighting¡¦. It means closely observing the object. ¡¥Upa intensely observing, not lighting.

The word ¡¥jh?na¡¦ has two meanings. One meaning is to look closely, to observe closely.

is to burn. When you get jh?na, your mind is close or your mind is on the object and you bur hindrances. That is why it is called jh?na. There are two meanings for the word ¡¥jh?na¡¦ - o closely or one that burns up the opposition. ¡¥Opposition¡¦ here means the mental hindrance Student: I thought you had to burn up mental hindrances in order to get into jh?na.
Teacher: Before getting into the state of jh?na they are not well-burned. They can come bac moment of jh?na they are well-suppressed.

¡§The disk of earth is called earth kasi?a.¡¨ When you practice earth kasi?a meditation, the get is also called earth kasi?a or earth kasi?a jh?na.

¡§The disk of earth is called earth kasi?a in the sense of entirety.¡¨ The P??i word ¡¥kasi?a entire or all. When you look at the disk, you look at the whole disk and not just part of it. You as a whole. The word ¡¥kasi?a¡¦ means entire.

¡§The sign acquired with that as its support and also the jh?na acquired in the earth-kasi?a called too.¡¨ The P??i word ¡¥pathav?-kasi?a¡¦, which is translated as earth-kasi?a, can mea and also the sign or image of the earth disk that you get in your mind. Also it can mean the j get keeping your mind on that sign of the earth disk. The P??i word ¡¥pathav? kasi?a¡¦ can m the disk itself, the mental image of the disk in the mind, and the jh?na that you get taking tha object.

¡§When it has been attained in this way, the modes (There should be an S.) of its attainme discerned by the meditator as if he were a hair-splitter or a cook.¡¨ After getting the first jh?n know its modes of attainment. That is so that if you lose that jh?na you know what to do aga jh?na when I was at a certain place or when certain things were suitable for one, like when I or was at a certain place. So when you lose the jh?na, you can experience them again. Afte the yogi must note or discern its modes of attainment.
Student: I don¡¦t understand. You attain jh?na while eating something?
Teacher: Not while eating. You know food is one of the suitable things to take into account. have desire to eat something and you don¡¦t get that, your meditation doesn¡¦t go well. You that food. There is something in your mind. When you have suitable food, your mind become practice meditation. The same is true for place. Sometimes a place is not suitable for you.
Student: In that case you haven¡¦t suppressed the sense desire. You have accomodated the Teacher: You know there are some foods which are not suitable. If you eat unsuitable food, indigestion or some sort of discomfort that interferes with your meditation. Suitable food is al important factor to be taken into account. Also a suitable place is important. If a place is noi it is difficult to get jh?na or even to practice meditation.

After getting jh?na you have to note this. I got the jh?na when I had a certain kind of food, was at a certain place, or when I was living with certain monks at a monastery and so on. Th
There are some other things to do too.

In paragraph 123 ¡§And when he recaptures those modes by apprehending the sign, he ju reaching absorption, but not in making it fast.¡¨ That means after getting jh?na, you must ma modes or signs of the attainment. This is so because if you happen to lose it, you may apply That will just help you to get the jh?na again, but it will not help you to keep it or sustain it. T after getting jh?na, you will enter into the sustained attainment of jh?na for one hour, two ho whole day. In order to be in the jh?na state for a long time you need to do some other things

¡§It lasts when it is absolutely purified from states that obstruct concentration.¡¨ He has to dangers to concentration or the obstructions of concentration. They are the five mental hindr yogi has to not only discern the modes or signs of attainment, but he also has to purify his m from the states which obstruct concentration - lust, ill will and other things.

In paragraph 126 ¡§So if he wants to remain long in the jh?na, he must enter upon it after purifying his mind from obstructive states.¡¨ That means after getting jh?na, you don¡¦t go ba objects. You just keep them away from you so that you are able to be in the jh?na for a long

¡§In order to perfect the development of consciousness he should besides extend the cou according as acquired.¡¨ After avoiding the obstructions to jh?na, he must extend the counte person gets jh?na, he practices on the counterpart sign. If the counterpart sign is eight inche then it is the same size in the jh?na. Then the Commentary says that he is to extend that sig must exercise his ability in dealing with the sign. He should extend the sign. The extension c be done during access or when he gets jh?na absorption. Before getting jh?na during the st concentration you can extend the sign or you can do so after getting jh?na.

¡§The meditator should not extend the sign as a clay bowl¡¨ and so on. That means I think pots, they do not decide for example that they want a pot which is five inches in diameter. Th and extend it little by little. They do not specify what size the pot will be. It is something like t

You are not to do like that. When you extend the sign, you must have a definite area. You example by the breadth of one finger, two fingers, three fingers, or I will extend it to the size or to the size of a building, or to the size of the whole world and so on. You have to extend t you become adept at dealing with the counterpart sign.

In paragraph 129 ¡§When a beginner has reached the first jh?na in this sign he should ent without reviewing it much.¡¨ After extending the sign what must he do? He must get into the and he must not spend much time reviewing. After getting into jh?na or after the jh?na thoug follow some thought processes of reviewing the constituents of jh?na, observing the constitu Commentary says not to do this too much because if you review too much the factors appea jh?na factors very crudely in one who review it too much. So you do not review it too much.
into it and get out and then enter it again and so on.

Student: what does ¡¥reviewing¡¦ mean?

Teacher: ¡¥Reviewing¡¦ means you get into jh?na; then you get out of it and concentrate on jh?na for example vitakka. You concentrate on vitakka, then you concentrate on vic?ra and reviewing the jh?na factors. You do not do that. If you do that, they will become crude. If you ¡§while he is endeavoring for the unfamiliar [higher jh?na] he falls away from the first jh?na a reach the second.¡¨ That actually does not mean ¡¥unfamiliar¡¦, but rather not so familiar. It i ¡¥higher jh?na¡¦. It means the first jh?na. After you get the first jh?na you are not so familiar You just have it. You are not well acquainted with that jh?na. You have to make yourself wel that jh?na by entering into it again and again. And you must not review too much the factors sentence should read: ¡§while he is endeavoring for the not so familiar first jh?na, he falls av first jh?na and fails to reach the second.¡¨ Student: So the process of becoming familiar with the first jh?na is to just touch upon the five Teacher: No. It is to just enter into the jh?na and let them arise in your mind, not reviewing th watching them.

Student: You let them present themselves normally.
Teacher: Yes. That¡¦s right. When they present themselves in a strong state, then they are c do not dwell upon each and every one of the factors. You just enter into the jh?na and get ou ¡§Thereafter he should acquire mastery in the five ways.¡¨ That is in paragraph 131. After jh?na and not reviewing much, one must acquire mastery in the five ways. There is mastery means mastery in reviewing the factors. There is mastery in attaining. That is getting into the is mastery in resolving. That is resolving how long you are going to stay in jh?na. There is m emerging. That is getting out of jh?na. There is mastery in reviewing. That is the same as th mastery in adverting. These are the five kinds of mastery you should acquire with regard to t attained.

Then there is the explanation of the five kinds of mastery one by one. ¡§When he emerges jh?na and first of all adverts to the applied thought, then next to the adverting that arose inte life-continuum, either four or five impulsions impel with that applied thought as their object.¡¨ review the jh?na factors, the javanas may run seven times. When you are reviewing in rapid jh?na factor after another, then the javanas do not run for six or seven times but only for fou because you have to hurry in this way.

¡§Then there are two life-continuum (bhava~ga) consciousness. Then there is adverting w thought as its object (similarly with p?ti and so on) and followed by impulsions in the way jus he is able to prolong his conscious process uninterruptedly in this way with the five jh?na fac mastery of adverting is successful. But this mastery is found at its acme of perfection in the Twin marvel, or for others on the aforesaid occasions. There is no quicker mastery in advert Adverting takes place in only four or five javana moments. Then two bhava~ga moments int of the next jh?na factor takes place with four or five javana moments and two bhava~ga mor and the next jh?na factor and so on.

The second one is getting quickly into the jh?na. ¡§The Venerable Mah? Moggall?na¡¦s ab jh?na quickly, as in the taming of the Royal N?ga Serpent Nandopananda is called mastery was a n?ga and he was very vicious. He was very angry with the Buddha because the Budd some dust fell on his head. He coiled around Mount Meru and got ready to attack the Buddh Mah? Moggall?na, the Buddha¡¦s disciple, requested to tame the dragon. Buddha let him do Mah? Moggall?na was foremost among those who have the psychic powers. At that time Ve entered inside the body of the n?ga. Then he came out and entered into it again. And so wh entrance of the mouth the dragon put forth fire to burn him. At that moment Venerable Mogg into jh?na very quickly. It is said that only Venerable Mah? Moggall?na could do that, not the disciples. So it is the ability to enter into the jh?na quickly.

¡§Ability to remain in jh?na for a moment consisting in exactly a finger-snap or exactly ten is called mastery in resolving.¡¨ ¡¥Resolving¡¦ here means just remaining in the jh?na, keepi while suppressing the bhava~ga. That is not letting bhava~ga arise. It is keeping the jh?na f time - for a finger-snap, or ten finger-snaps, or the whole day.

¡§Ability to emerge quickly in the same way is called mastery in emerging.¡¨ That is getting

¡§The story of the Elder Buddharakkhita may be told in order to illustrate both these last.¡¨ could enter into jh?na and get out of it very, very quickly. He saw a Royal Supa??a. What is Student: It says that it is a demon.
Teacher: Do you know garuda? It is a mythical bird. It is supa??a. Actually it might be a kite. enemy of snakes. It is that kind of bird.

¡§He saw a royal supa??a swooping down from the sky intending to seize an attendant ro he was getting rice gruel for the Elder. The Elder Buddharakkhita created a rock (maybe a m and seizing the royal n?ga by the arm, he entered the rock himself with the n?ga. The royal rock a blow and made off. The Senior Elder remarked: ¡¥Friends, if Rakkhita had not been t have been put to shame¡¦.¡¨ Alkthough there were many monks who had psychic power, nor save the n?ga from being taken by the bird (supa??a).

¡§Mastery in reviewing is described in the same way as mastery in adverting; for the revie are in fact those next to the adverting mentioned there.¡¨ Mastery in reviewing and mastery i the same thing because they are in one and the same thought process. Mastery in reviewing impulsions or javanas that are in the thought process. So javanas in that thought process ar reviewing. Adverting in that thought process is mastery in adverting. So they are in fact not s

¡§When he has once acquired mastery in these five ways, then on emerging from the now he can regard the flaws in it in this way.¡¨ That comes to the approach of the second jh?na. up next week.

This is the first jh?na. You try to get the first jh?na. You develop it so that you can get into and get out of it quickly. These five kinds of mastery are meant for going over to the second jh?na and so on. So first there is trying to get it, then getting it, keeping it, and then going ov higher ones.]
Student: How many jh?nas are there?
Teacher: Four or five jh?nas will be mentioned here. You know there is the fourfold method the fivefold method of jh?nas. They mean the same thing. Fourfold method of jh?nas is mos Suttas. We very seldom find five jh?nas mentioned in the Suttas. Whenever the Buddha talk mentioned four jh?nas. In Abhidhamma both four jh?nas and five jh?nas are mentioned.

There are four or five jh?nas depending upon the ability of the person to surmount the jh?n are persons who have powerful intelligence or knowledge. Such persons are able to get rid vitakka and vic?ra at the same time. For them there are only four jh?nas. There are others w rid of the jh?na factors one at a time. First they get rid of vitakka. Then they get rid of vic?ra. there are five jh?nas. Thank you.

Student: How long does it take to get first jh?na?
Teacher: I don¡¦t know. That depends upon a person¡¦s experience in the past. If a person h the past, it may not take too long. You know nowadays people practice some kind of kasi?a get access concentration they have to practice about six months, sometimes maybe longer. practice the color disk meditation. There is a monk in Los Angeles who said he practiced this got the access concentration but not the absorption concentration. Also it may depend on ho practice. If you practice two or three hours a day or if you practice eight or nine hours a day, difference.
Student: It seems like there are good things and then you have to give them up. Like there a the first jh?na.
Teacher: Yes. These are mentioned as sukha or happiness. Buddha first said there is happi enjoying sense pleasures. That is a kind of happiness although it is not in the ultimate sense the happiness you get from sense objects the happiness of first jh?na is better because ther desire. You are really calm and happy. Then the second jh?na happiness is better than the f happiness. There is no initial application and sustained application to disturb your equilibriun the third jh?na is better than the second jh?na and so on. Step by step the Buddha pointed o different kinds of happiness. Even the highest jh?na, the ar|pavacara jh?na, is still not all tog from suffering because there is the end of the jh?na. The jh?na cannot last forever. Jh?na co arises and then it must disappear. Then it arises and disappears again. Even that very high has a beginning and an end. It is also not ultimate happiness. Ultimate happiness is freedom formations. So the highest form of happiness is the happiness of Nibb?na, the abandonmen defilements. Buddha gave us the different kinds of happiness, one above the other. Jh?na h happiness, but still it is not enough for the Buddha.
Student: The attaining of the jh?nas in succession is the way to abandoning all the mental d Teacher: It is not the inevitable path. If you read Suttas, it seems like that. You go through th stage by stage. Then you change over to vipassan?. When Buddha described his own attain said that first he practiced breathing meditation. Then he got first, second, third and fourth jh attained the supernormal knowledge of seeing his past lives and so on. Only after getting tw supernormal knowledge did he practice vipassan? meditation. Only then did he change to vi Before that he practiced samatha meditation and got the jh?nas. Then during the last part of changed to vipassan? meditation.
Student: That¡¦s when he saw Dependent Origination?
Teacher: Yes. Immediately before attainment of Buddhahood he reflected upon the twelve li Origination and their relationships.

Student: Then seeing past lives and so on is related to samatha?
Teacher: Yes. The ability to see past lives comes from samatha meditation. Only after gettin get these kinds of knowledge. We can cll them special kinds of jh?na. Actually they are a va jh?na or fourth jh?na. After getting fifth jh?na you have to specially develop it in order to get of supernormal knowledge. So when you read the Suttas it goes like you first practice samat then you change over to vipassan? meditation. But in the later Commentaries it says that yo and practice vipassan?. Those who practice in this way are called ¡¥dry vipassan? meditato that they don¡¦t practice samatha meditation.

S?dhu! S?dhu! S?dhu!

(Tape 11 / Ps: 138 ¡V 202)

Today we come to the second jh?na, third jh?na, and then the fourth jh?na. The translatio sheets I think is easier to understand, clearer. Please look at these translations.

After getting the first jh?na, when a person wants to get the second jh?na, the first thing th do is find fault with the first jh?na. After getting the first jh?na, he thinks that it is not good en With first jh?na there are five jh?na factors - initial application, sustained application, p?ti, su one-pointedness of mind. This person after getting the first jh?na sees danger in being close hindrances. By overcoming hindrances he was able to get the first jh?na. When he gets the free from hindrances, but it is with initial application and sustained application and so on. No fault with initial application and sustained application or in P??i vitakka and vic?ra. He tries t dispassionate towards these two factors. He tries to eliminate them. When he is able to elim will get the second jh?na.

After gaining the first jh?na, he tries to get the five kinds of mastery like entering into it qui emerging from it and so on. In paragraph `138 ¡§When he has emerged from the first jh?na, sustained thought (vitakka and vic?ra) appear gross to him as he reviews the jh?na factors and full awareness.¡¨ He enters into the first jh?na and emerges from that jh?na. Then he re in that jh?na. There are five factors in first jh?na. When he reviews them, applied thought an thought appear gross to him while happiness and bliss (in P??i p?ti and sukha) and unificati (ekaggat?) appear peaceful.

¡§Then he brings the same sign ¡¥earth, earth¡¦ to mind again and again.¡¨ So after review factors, he dwells upon the counterpart sign that he got during the preliminary stages. He ta counterpart sign as the object of meditation and concentrates on it saying ¡¥earth, earth¡¦ ag ¡§with the purpose of abandoning the gross factors and obtaining the peaceful factors.

¡§Knowing now the second jh?na will arise¡¨ - we will have to correct this. It should say ¡§ jh?na is about to arise¡¨, not knowing. He does not know when it will arise. This is a P??i idi you about this before. ¡§When the second jh?na is about to arise, there arises in him mind-the same earth kasi?a as its object, interrupting the life-continuum.¡¨

If you look at the first jh?na chart, the same thought process arises here. After cutting off b there arises ¡¥m¡¦ (manodv?r?vajjana or mind-door-adverting). Then there are four moments javanas and the fifth moment is jh?na. For a person who has quick intelligence or quick reali will be only three sense-sphere javanas and the fourth moment is jh?na.

¡§There arises in him mind-door-adverting with the same earth kasi?a as object, interrupti continuum. After that either four or five impulsions (javanas) impel on that same object (depe whether the person is of quick intelligence or slow intelligence), the last one of which is an in (javana) of the fine-material sphere (r|p?vacara).¡¨ Here it is the second jh?na. ¡§The rest ar sense-sphere of the kinds already stated.¡¨ ¡¥The rest¡¦ means the preceding four or three.

Now comes the translation of the description of the second jh?na. I have made a new tran be used for all people, but for the class it is better.

¡§With the stilling (That means overcoming of vitakka and vic?ra.) of vitakka and vic?ra he dwells in the second jh?na which arises internally and (literally) which is confident and which singleness of mind, or which clarifies the mind and arouses singleness which is without vitak and which is born of concentration with p?ti and sukha or which is with p?ti and sukha born concentration.¡¨ This is the description of the second jh?na. Whenever there is a description jh?na, the same stock sentences are repeated many times in the Suttas and in Abhidhamma

The first phrase is ¡§with the stilling of vitakka and vic?ra¡¨. ¡¥Stilling¡¦ means the overcom vitakka and vic?ra. When a person wants to attain the second jh?na, he has to overcome or vic?ra.

Because of the overcoming of vitakka and vic?ra ¡§he enters upon and dwells in the secon arises internally.¡¨ Jh?na arises in one¡¦s mind. So it does not arise in other persons or outsi it is internal.

¡§Which is confidence and which arouses singleness of mind¡¨ - you will find this in paragr the word used is sampas?danam. It means confidence or saddha. You may remember sadd cetasikas. Saddha is confidence or faith. Here the jh?na itself is called confidence or faith. It figuratively speaking. But the meaning is which is accompanied by confidence or which is ac For this class we would say ¡¥which is confidence¡¦, but for general purposes we should say confidence¡¦, that is which arises together with confidence or faith (saddha). The function of confidence is to clear the mind of doubt and others.

¡§And which arouses singleness of mind¡¨ - ¡¥singleness of mind¡¦ really means concentra another explanation. That is which clarifies the mind and arouses singleness. The P??i word footnote #41. The P??i phrase is samps?dana? cetaso ekodibh?vam. ¡¥Cetaso¡¦ means of the two words ¡¥sampas?dana?¡¦ and ¡¥ekodibh?vam¡¦. The word ¡¥cetaso¡¦ can be connec with ekodibh?vam. When it is connected with the first one, then that means clarifying the mi clarifies the mind. When it is connected with the other word ¡¥ekodibh?vam¡¦, it means arous ¡¥cetaso¡¦ means of mind. So cetaso can be connected with the previous word or the followi what is being explained in paragraphs 142 and 143.

¡§Which is without vitakka and vic?ra and which is born of concentration¡¨ - that means aft first jh?na, he practices meditation and gets second jh?na. The second jh?na is said to be c caused by the concentration in the first jh?na. Or it is accompanied by concentration when it ¡¥concentration¡¦ can be taken as that which is with first jh?na or that which is with second jh can be taken.

¡§Which is born of concentration and which is accompanied by p?ti and sukha¡¨ is one exp
¡§which is with p?ti and sukha born of concentration.¡¨ P?ti and sukha are here conditioned and so they are said to be born of concentration. This is the explanation of the second jh?na

A person gets the second jh?na after removing, after abandoning vitakka and vic?ra. That That jh?na clarifies the mind and arouses singleness of mind. That jh?na is without vitakka a jh?na is born of concentration and accompanied by p?ti and sukha or it is accompanied by p of concentration.

Then there are some problems. They are all explained here. Here it is said that the second confidence. That means the second jh?na is accompanied by the cetasika saddha (confiden saddha also accompanies the first jh?na. Please look at paragraph 144. ¡§it might be asked faith exist in the first jh?na too, and also this concentration with the name of the ¡¥single[thin the first jh?na there arise a number of cetasikas and among them is saddha or faith and also mind or one-pointedness of mind. Then why is only this second jh?na said to have confidenc mind? They are in the first jh?na also. That problem the Commentator or The Path of Purific

¡§It may be replied as follows: It is because that first jh?na is not fully confident owing to th disturbance created by applied thought and sustained thought.¡¨ When there is vitakka and v the mind pushing it to this object and that object. They tend to distract the mind. When there vic?ra with the jh?na, saddha or confidence is not good enough. It does not fully clarify. It is confident. ¡§It is like water ruffled by ripples and wavelets. That is why, although faith does e (the first jh?na), it is not called ¡¥confidence¡¦. And there too concentration is not fully evider of the lack of full confidence.¡¨ When saddha is not strong, then concentration is also not str is why it is not called ¡¥arousing concentration¡¦ or ¡¥arousing singleness¡¦.

Student: Is that the highest form of concentration?

Teacher: No, not yet. This is just the second stage or level of concentration. We will have the fourth stages. In later chapters we will go to the formless jh?nas also. This is only the secon concentration.

¡§That may be understood as the reason why only this jh?na is described in this way. But actually stated in the Vibha~ga too with the words ¡¥Confidence is faith¡¦.¡¨ And so on. Altho and concentration are present in the first jh?na, the first jh?na is not described as having co concentration because they are not strong enough there. Why are they not strong enough? disturbance of vitakka and vic?ra. In this second jh?na there is no vitakka and vic?ra to distu they become strong. That is why only this jh?na is described as ¡§having confidence and are mind¡¨.

Student: So that means you don¡¦t need vitakka and vic?ra to create concentration and conf Teacher: Actually vitakka and vic?ra are not really hindrances or obstacles. They are some l to strong concentration let us say. The first jh?na also has strong concentration but compare it is not so strong.
Student: You need vitakka and vic?ra to get first jh?na?
Teacher: Yes. Then after you get first jh?na, you eliminate them in order to get second jh?na first when concentration is not strong, you need vitakka to support the mind being on the obj getting the second jh?na the mind does not need vitakka to take it to the object. The second or gets rid of vitakka and vic?ra.

We have solved one problem. Another problem is that the second jh?na is described as w vic?ra. The first sentence also means that it is without vitakka and vic?ra. Why is there repet ¡§with the stilling (or overcoming) of vitakka and vic?ra¡¨ in the first instance and here ¡§the is without vitakka and vic?ra.¡¨ The commentator explains this repetition by giving two or thre

The first one is in paragraph 146. The first explanation is that in order to get higher jh?nas eliminate the grosser factors. In order to let you understand this the phrase is repeated here ¡¥with the stilling of vitakka and vic?ra¡¦ and ¡¥it is without vitakka and vic?ra¡¦ are repeated. reason. It is repeated in order to show that only by eliminating the grosser factors in the lowe you attain the higher jh?nas. That is one explanation.

Another explanation is that the phrase ¡¥with the stilling of vitakka and vic?ra¡¦ is the cause jh?na having confidence and singleness of mind. It shows that. It does not show the mere al and vic?ra, but it shows that because of the stilling of vitakka and vic?ra this jh?na comes to ¡¥confidence and this jh?na arouses singleness of mind¡¦. To show this relationship as caus phrases are given here.
Student: Is this voluntary? It sounds like you are saying that one drops vitakka and vic?ra vo order to obtain the higher jh?na.
Teacher: Yes.
Student: But does that just naturally arise?
Teacher: Yes, when it arises, it arises naturally. But before the jh?na arises, you have to me you meditate you have the intention to get rid of vitakka and vic?ra. If you cannot eliminate v vic?ra, you cannot get the second jh?na.
Student: You eliminate them through more concentration?
Teacher: That¡¦s right. You arouse dispassion towards vitakka and vic?ra. It is just by thinkin emerge from jh?na, you review or concentrate on the jh?na factors. Since you find fault with vic?ra, they appear to be gross. The others appear to be subtle. These two gross factors you you get the second jh?na.

The elimination of vitakka and vic?ra is the cause. The second jh?na being with confidenc singleness of mind is the effect. To show this cause and effect relationship the first phrase is

Then there is another reason given. The second phrase ¡¥without vitakka and vic?ra¡¦ mea of vitakka and vic?ra, nothing more. The first phrase means not only without vitakka and vic without vitakka and vic?ra because they have been overcome. So in this case the first phras the second phrase. Because vitakka and vic?ra are stilled or because they are eliminated th and vic?ra in the second jh?na. In order to show that these two phrases are given or stated of the second jh?na.

Then it is born of concentration. P?ti and sukha are the same, are to be understood simila first jh?na.

¡§Born of concentration¡¨ - here also there is a problem. The first jh?na is also born of con you do not have concentration, you cannot get the jh?na, or you cannot get even access co jh?na. If you do not have concentration, you cannot get any of these jh?na or even the stage is this second jh?na described as ¡¥born of concentration¡¦? Again here concentration in the not so strong as concentration in the second jh?na. Again the second jh?na is stronger in co because it is not disturbed by vitakka and vic?ra. When vitakka and vic?ra are eliminated, co becomes very strong and the mind becomes very clear. In order to praise the second jh?na ¡¥born of concentration¡¦. We are to understand that not only the second jh?na is born of co also the first jh?na.

In paragraph 148 about the middle of the paragraph ¡§still it is only this concentration that worthy to be called ¡¥concentration¡¦ because of its complete confidence.¡¨ ¡¥Confidence¡¦ h clarifying, complete clarification.

¡§And extreme immobility¡¨ - what do you understand by immobility?

Student: Something that is still.

Teacher: Still, yes. Not moving. I think ¡¥extreme stillness¡¦ may be better here. The P??i wo ¡¥achala¡¦. ¡¥Achala¡¦ means not moving. The translator I think wanted to be literal so he use but that may mean some other thing than stillness of mind. So there is extreme stillness due vitakka and vic?ra.

In paragraph 147 ¡§Besides, this confidence comes about with the stilling, not the darknes
- actually the word does not mean darkness. The word means turbidness, muddiness, cloud is not darkness. The mind is always clear. So it is the turbidness of defilement.

In the second jh?na how many factors are there? Three factors - p?ti, sukha and ekaggat? mind). It abandons two factors - vitakka and vic?ra.

Then we go to the third jh?na. Now you find fault with p?ti. One by one you are going to el factors.

Paragraph 151 ¡§Once this has been obtained in this way, and he has mastery in the five described, then on emerging from the now familiar second jh?na he can regard the flaws in attainment is threatened by the nearness of applied thought and sustained thought.¡¨ Althou vic?ra are not in the second jh?na, it is close to the first jh?na which does have vitakka and (this second jh?na) is close to applied thought and sustained thought.

¡§Whatever there is in it of happiness, of mental excitement, proclaims its grossness.¡¨ Th factors are weak because of the grossness of p?ti which is described thus in the Sutta: ¡§Th declared to be gross with that very p?ti because it is mental excitement.¡¨ When you are fee something like floating on the surface. P?ti has the function of exciting the mind. Now this pe mind to be very calm and serene. He finds fault with p?ti now. ¡§Its factors are weakened by happiness (p?ti) so expressed. He can bring the third jh?na to mind as quieter and so end h the second jh?na and set about doing what is needed for attaining the third.¡¨

¡§When he has emerged from the second jh?na, p?ti appears gross to him as he review th mindfulness and full awareness, while sukha and ekaggat? (bliss and unification) appear pe brings that same sign to mind as ¡¥earth, earth¡¦ again and again, with the purpose of abanc factor and obtaining the peaceful factors, when the third jh?na is about to arise (not ¡¥knowi arises in him mind-door adverting with that same earth kasi?a as its object, interrupting the life-continuum.¡¨ The rest is the same.

Now we come to the third jh?na. The third jh?na is described in set phrases or set sentenc translation on the sheet. ¡§With the fading away of p?ti as well he dwells in equanimity, and fully aware¡¨ and so on. The words ¡¥as well¡¦ here are said to have the meaning of conjunc well¡¦ we can conjoin some others. They are described in the brackets. ¡§With the distaste fo fading away. ¡§With the fading away and stilling of p?ti as well¡¨ so here in the first case ¡¥as conjoins stilling. ¡§With the fading away and stilling of p?ti as well¡¨ means with the fading aw stilling of p?ti. ¡¥Stilling¡¦ is mentioned in the second jh?na. That is something like taken ove passage explaining the third jh?na. ¡§With the fading away as well¡¨ means with the fading a of p?ti.

It may also convey some other thing. In that case with the surmounting (That is fading awa the stilling of vitakka and vic?ra. It can mean one of these two things.

¡§With the fading away of p?ti as well¡¨ simply means with the distaste for and stilling of p? surmounting of p?ti and stilling of vitakka and vic?ra.

¡§He dwells in equanimity and is mindful and fully aware and experiences sukha (Here sul and mental.) with his mental body, he enters upon and dwells in the third jh?na, on account Ones announce (with regard to the person who has attained the third jh?na): he has equani and dwells in sukha.¡¨ This is the third jh?na.

Student: he experiences sukha both bodily and mental with his mental body?

Teacher: I will explain later. Vitakka and vic?ra are stilled. They do not arise with the second the stilling of vitakka and vic?ra¡¨ is said once again to praise the third jh?na. In praise of the jh?na some of the descriptions of the other jh?nas are repeated here. This is what the Comm Actually there are no vitakka or vic?ra in second jh?na much less third jh?na. In order to sho to higher jh?nas and in order to praise the third jh?na it is said here also. The stilling of vitak vic?ra is the way or condition for gaining the third jh?na.

¡§He dwells in equanimity¡¨ - in connection with the word ¡¥equanimity¡¦ the Commentator of (Let us use P??i.) upekkh?. It is very important when you see the word ¡¥upekkh?¡¦ in P?? understand what is meant. At least you should know that ¡¥upekkha¡¦ means feeling or it me Equanimity is not feeling here. Equanimity is impartiality. Impartiality is one of the cetasikas. also one of the cetasikas. Feeling upekkh? is different from equanimity upekkh?. This much understand. Whenever you find the word ¡¥upekkh?¡¦, you have to see whether it means fee equanimity upekkh?.

Upekkh? comes from ¡¥upa¡¦ and ¡¥ekkha¡¦. That is explained in paragraph 156. ¡§It watc arise (UPApattito IKKHATI), thus it is equanimity (upekkh? or onlooking); it sees fairly, sees partiality (a-pakkhapatita), is the meaning.¡¨

There are ten kinds of upekkh?. The first is called ¡¥six factored equanimity¡¦. It is the equa in the minds of Arahants. ¡§Here a bhikkhu whose cankers are destroyed (That is an Arahan nor sad on seeing a visible object with the eye: he dwells in equanimity, mindful and fully aw an Arahant sees a good object or a bad object he does not feel glad or sad with regard to th impartial to these objects. He can keep that impartiality in the face of objects desirable and u That is one of the qualities of the Arahants. This is because Arahants have eradicated all me And so they are not glad with attachment to things nor are they repulsed by things which are

The next one is equanimity as a divine abiding. Equanimity is one of the four divine abidin intent upon one quarter with his heart endued with equanimity.¡¨ That is not hating and not lo viewing with impartiality.

The next one is equanimity as an enlightenment factor. There are seven factors of enlighte equanimity is one of them. ¡§He develops the equanimity enlightenment factor depending on it is neutrality ¡§in conascent states¡¨. Actually it is neutrality among conascent states. Neutr a conascent state. Among the conascent states arising with consciousness this is neutrality, of neutrality. This is one of the factors of enlightenment.

The next one is the equanimity of energy. ¡¥Energy¡¦ is called ¡¥equanimity¡¦ here. Energy too much nor too little. It must be in the middle, so it is called ¡¥equanimity¡¦ here. Actually it or viriya - ¡§neither over-strenuous nor over-lax in energy.

The next one is equanimity about formations. That arises during vipassan? meditation. Wh practices vipassan? meditation and reaches the higher stages of vipassan? knowledge, then equanimity about formations. There is ¡§neutrality about apprehending reflexion and compos hindrances, etc., described thus.¡¨ That means he doesn¡¦t have to make effort to keep his m It is effortless observation at that moment. He is neither attached to nor repulsed by what he

¡§How many kinds of equanimity about formations arise through concentration? How many about formations arise through insight? Eight kinds of equanimity about formations arise thr concentration (through samatha). These are the eight kinds of jh?na. Ten kinds of equanimit arise through insight.¡¨ When you practice vipassan? meditation, then you go through ten kin

Those ten and the eight also are given in footnote 44. ¡§The ¡¥eight kinds¡¦ are those conn eight jh?na attainments. The ¡¥ten kinds¡¦ are connected with the four Paths, the four Fruitio liberation, and the signless liberation.¡¨ Actually the word ¡¥liberation¡¦ is not used in the Con is not ¡¥void liberation¡¦ but ¡¥dwelling in voidness¡¦, ¡¥dwelling in signlessness¡¦. ¡¥Dwelling voidness¡¦ means contemplating on the voidness of formations. He is still in the stage of vipa yet at the stage of enlightenment, not at the stage of Path and Fruition. So here ¡¥dwelling in means dwelling on voidness. ¡¥Dwelling in signlessness¡¦ means dwelling on the signless fo practices vipassan? meditation, he takes the formations as object. These formations he con void. That means void of permanency, void of satisfactoriness and void of soul or self. ¡¥Sig the same thing. These are the ten. When a person reaches that stage, he gains equanimity

The next one is equanimity as feeling. ¡§Equanimity as a feeling, is a name for the equani neither pain nor pleasure described thus: ¡¥On the occasion on which a sense-sphere profit has arisen accompanied by equanimity¡¦.¡¨ I don¡¦t think we should use the word ¡¥equanimi ¡¥Neutral feeling¡¦ I think is a better word.

¡§Equanimity about insight is a name for the equanimity consisting in neutrality about inve described thus.¡¨ It is more or less the same as equanimity about formations. Equanimity ab to do with vipassan? meditation just as this equanimity about insight. ¡§what exists, what ha abandons, and he obtains equanimity.¡¨

Equanimity as specific neutrality, this is the real equanimity which is one of the mental fact it is called ¡¥tatramajjhattat?¡¦.

¡§Equanimity of jh?na is a name for equanimity producing impartiality towards (them).¡¨ Th feeling upekkh?. It is jh?na upekkh?. It is a specific equanimity.

The next one - ¡§Purifying equanimity is a name for the equanimity purified of all oppositio thus.¡¨ Since it is purified of all opposition, there is no interest in stilling them because the yo succeeded in stilling the opposition. After this achievement he no longer has interest in stillin because they are already stilled. This is called ¡¥purifying equanimity¡¦. This also is a specifi

¡§Herein, six factored equanimity, equanimity as a divine abiding, equanimity as an enligh equanimity as specific neutrality, equanimity of jh?na, and purifying equanimity are one in m meaning¡¦ means one in reality, one in essence.), that is equanimity as specific neutrality.¡¨

¡§Their difference, however is one of position (or occasion), like the difference in a single boy, a youth, an adult, a general, a king, and so on. Therefore of these it should be understo equanimity as an enlightenment factor, etc., are not found where there is six factored equan mutually exclusive.); or that six factored equanimity, etc., are not found where there is equan enlightenment factor.¡¨

¡§And just as these have one meaning (That means just as these are the same in essence also equanimity about formations and equanimity about insight have one meaning too; for th understanding (pa???).¡¨ So these two are not specific neutrality, but they are really underst because they arise during vipassan? meditation.

At the bottom of paragraph 170 ¡§Equanimity of energy and equanimity as feeling are diffe each other and from the rest.¡¨ ¡¥Equanimity¡¦ just means energy. ¡¥Equanimity of feeling¡¦ i feeling.

How many kinds of equanimity do we get in essence or in reality? Four - specific neutrality energy, and neutral feeling. In essence there are four kinds of upekkh?. In detail there are te upekkh?. Whenever we see the word ¡¥upekkh?¡¦, we have to understand what kind of upek

Then in the phrase ¡§He dwells in equanimity¡¨ what upekkh? is meant? Specific neutralit feeling upekkh? because we are still in the third jh?na. In the third jh?na there is still sukha v neutral feeling. Sukha is pleasurable feeling. Here ¡¥equanimity¡¦ means specific neutrality o

Paragraph 176 ¡§He is mindful and fully aware, and he experiences sukha, both bodily and mental body.¡¨ It is better in translation than in the original P??i. In the original P??i the sent very involved. Also the Commentator used many relative pronouns, one relative of another, relative of that and so it goes on and on. It is very difficult to understand. I don¡¦t know why h way. In the translation it is better. We can understand.

¡¥He feels¡¦ means he experiences sukha. Here ¡¥sukha¡¦ means both bodily sukha and m jh?na arises, there is this sukha (pleasurable feeling). When there is pleasurable feeling, he experience it, although he has no intention that he will experience or will enjoy this sukha. S feeling is accompanying the jh?na, he just experiences it.

¡¥With his mental body¡¦ means other mental states. When the third jh?na arises, there are arising with it. There is third jh?na citta and there are cetasikas. Among these cetasikas ther sukha and ekaggat?. These are three jh?na factors. Actually they are called ¡¥jh?nas¡¦. The are here called ¡¥mental body¡¦. There is one consciousness and 33 cetasikas. So there is o citta and 33 cetasikas. Among them there is pleasurable feeling which is sukha. Since sukha with other mental concomitants, the person is said to experience sukha with the mental conc mental concomitants are here called ¡¥the mental body¡¦. In P??i the word ¡¥k?ya¡¦ is used.

Then when this third jh?na arises it causes material properties to arise. Some matter is ca some by consciousness (citta), some by climate, and some by food. When the third jh?na ci material properties to arise too. Since it is a very refined state of mind, state of consciousnes material properties it produces are also very fine, very subtle. Those very fine and very subtl properties, that tangible object the meditator or the one who has jh?na experiences. That fee through contact of his body with other tangible things, other tangible objects, like sitting on a cushion, something like that. During the time when the third jh?na arises, he is said to exper sukha with his mental body and physical sukha with his mental body.

This is because what we call ¡¥vedan?¡¦ (feeling) is in the mind. What we call feeling or se the material properties in the body. Suppose there is pain here. Pain is a collection of materi here. We feel that pain. That feeling of pain is in our mind. When we have a good touch, the That good touch is material properties and that we feel in our mind as sukha (pleasurable fe when the person gets third jh?na, his mind is so refined that it produces very refined materia These material properties are all scattered throughout his body or pervade his body. Therefo pleasant sensations in the body through his mind. That is why it is described here as ¡§expe bodily and mental with his mental body.¡¨ And ¡¥mental body¡¦ means a group of mental con of mental factors.

¡§He enters upon and dwells in the third jh?na on account of which the Noble Ones annou a person who has attained the third jh?na) he has equanimity, he is mindful, and he dwells i

Why do the Noble Ones recommend? I think ¡¥praise¡¦ is better than the word ¡¥recomme something in praise of something. The Noble Ones praise here this person who has attained because he can keep himself impartial. He is not attached to even the very high form of suk mindful that he can keep p?ti from arising. At that time in the third jh?na p?ti does not arise. this person is worthy of praise. He can keep impartiality and he can keep away p?ti by being dwells in sukha which is experienced by all Noble Persons. That is why he is worthy of prais praise him they say ¡§this person has equanimity. This person is mindful. This person dwells

In this jh?na there are how many factors? Two factors. What are they? Sukha and ekagga these two jh?na factors. This is the third jh?na. After third jh?na we go to the fourth jh?na.

Student: It says here ¡§He has equanimity, is mindful, and dwells in sukha.¡¨ Isn¡¦t there a th mindfulness?

Teacher: Mindfulness is with all jh?nas. Jh?nas can never be without mindfulness. Here his good that it can keep p?ti from arising. When you pay close attention to what is happening a can keep even p?ti away from you, from arising in your mind. That is why his mindfulness is just ordinary mindfulness. It is a very powerful and refined mindfulness.

He dwells in sukha. This is not an ordinary sukha. It is unmixed or unsullied sukha. It is the by Noble Persons.

Now we go to the fourth jh?na. The meditator has to do the same thing. He has to find fau is going to neutral feeling now.

In about the middle of paragraph 181 ¡¥knowing¡¦ should not be there but instead it should fourth jh?na is about to arise.¡¨ Fourth jh?na is different from the others because it is accom neutral feeling. First jh?na, second jh?na and third jh?na are accompanied by pleasurable fe

When we talk about the different conditions in Pa??h?na (There are 24 causal relations in we talk about repetition condition, the constituents must be of the same nature. That means consciousness arise one after the other, the concomitants arising together with the previous be a condition as repetition condition of the succeeding consciousness only when they are c Pleasurable must be followed by pleasurable. Neutral must be followed by neutral. If neutral pleasurable, there would be no relationship as repetition. So in this fourth jh?na ¡§pleasant f condition, as repetition condition, for neither-pain-nor-pleasant feeling, and [the preliminary v aroused in the case of the fourth jh?na with neither-pain-nor-pleasant feeling, consequently [consciousnesses of the preliminary-work] are associated with neither-painful-nor-pleasant f happiness vanishes simply owing to their association with equanimity.¡¨

What is that? What the Commentator is saying is the pleasurable feeling cannot be a repe for neutral feeling. In the fourth jh?na there is neutral feeling and not pleasurable feeling. If y the thought process, the jh?na consciousness is preceded by four or three sense-sphere jav Since in the first thought process the fifth moment, the jh?na moment, is accompanied by ne others also must be accompanied by neutral feeling. That is what the Commentator is sayin second and third jh?nas the javanas are accompanied by pleasurable feeling. That is the dif thought process for fourth jh?na, since fourth jh?na must be accompanied by neutral feeling k?m?vacara javanas must also be accompanied by neutral feeling. That is the only differenc Commentator is saying.

Here in the translation there is some error. I will read it. ¡§But there is this difference: bliss (pleasant) feeling is not a condition, as repetition condition, for neither-painful-nor-pleasant f [the preliminary-work] must be aroused in the case of the fourth jh?na with neither-painful-n feeling.¡¨ Actually it should say: ¡§In the fourth jh?na neither-painful-nor-pleasant must arise in the preliminary-work but it is in the fourth jh?na that neutral feeling must arise. Neutral fee there.

¡§Therefore these [consciousnesses of the preliminary-work] (That means the k?m?vacara the r|p?vacara javanas.) must be accompanied by neither-painful-nor-pleasant feeling, and vanishes simply owing to their association with equanimity.¡¨ ¡¥Equanimity¡¦ here means neu Neutral feeling is feeling and sukha or happiness is feeling. If it is neutral it cannot be happi it is happiness it cannot be neutral. Since the fourth jh?na is accompanied by neutral feeling no sukha feeling there. There can be no pleasant feeling.

¡§Here happiness vanishes simply owing to their association with equanimity.¡¨ It may be many people because if happiness vanishes, what are we to do? Happiness is pleasurable feeling is said to be higher than pleasurable feeling. So in this fourth jh?na pleasurable feeli and in its place neutral feeling arises. This neutral feeling is so refined that it is almost a kin Although it is not technically sukha, it is the kind of ¡¥sukha¡¦ that such people enjoy.

The fourth jh?na - ¡§With the abandoning of sukha and dukkha and with the previous disa somanassa and domanassa, he enters upon and dwells in the fourth jh?na, which has neith and which has purity of mindfulness caused by equanimity.¡¨

You know there are five kinds of feelings - sukha feeling, dukkha feeling, somanassa feeli feeling, and upekkh? feeling. Sukha feeling and dukkha feeling are connected with the body in the mind, but it depends upon the physical thing or the body. These bodily feelings are ca dukkha. Somanassa and domanassa are mental feelings, the feeling of pleasure in the min anguish in the mind.

When you hit your finger with something, there is pain there. You have the experience or f pain in your mind, the dukkha feeling. When you think of something and you are sad, that is Or when you are angry, that is domanassa feeling that you get with your anger. It is like that

¡§with the abandoning of sukha and dukkha and with the previous disappearance of soma
- when we read this it would lead us to believe that sukha, dukkha, somanassa, and domana close to the moment of fourth jh?na. The abandonment of these four (sukha, dukkha, soman occurs during the preliminary stage of the fourth jh?na it would seem. During the preliminary fourth jh?na somanassa is abandoned. During the preliminary stage of the first jh?na dukkha the preliminary stage of the second jh?na domanassa is abandoned. At the preliminary stag p?ti is abandoned. They are all abandoned at the preliminary stages of these four jh?nas. Th ¡§with the previous disappearance of somanassa and domanassa.¡¨ Sukha, dukkha, soman abandoned or eliminated before the moment of fourth jh?na. Before reaching the fourth jh?n preliminary stages. During these preliminary stages, that is the preliminary stages of first, se and fourth jh?nas, these feelings are abandoned.

There is one passage in the Suttas where it is said that they are abandoned during the jh?
Commentator points to that passage and tries to explain it. It is true that they are abandoned preliminary stages. But their abandonment there is not intensive. Their cessation in the preli not strong or reinforced. But at the moment of jh?na there is reinforced cessation or reinforc of these things, these feelings. In the Sutta passage pointed out by the Commentator only th cessation is meant and not just cessation. That is why these are said to be abandoned at the the Sutta. Therefore these two statements do not contradict one another.

In paragraph 187 ¡§For accordingly, during the first jh?na access, which has multiple adve don¡¦t like the word ¡¥multiple¡¦. Actually it is ¡¥different adverting¡¦, not multiple. In a though there is only one adverting, either five-sense-door adverting or mind-door adverting. There c adverting. So here ¡¥jh?na access which has different adverting¡¦ means the preliminary sta the jhana thought process. When a person tries to get jh?na he practices meditation. He gai preliminary concentration and then access concentration. During the stage of access concen moments of this preliminary work. These moments consist of a series of thought processes process there is only one adverting. ¡¥First jh?na access which has different adverting¡¦ mea is trying to attain the first jh?na, but who has not yet reached the first jh?na thought process, stages are called the jh?na access with different adverting. If it is said with the ¡¥same adve would mean the first jh?na thought process itself. Jh?na thought process is not meant , but before the jh?na thought process. Each of those thought processes has one adverting, but t thought processes. There can be many thought processes of access concentration before th process. The P??i word ¡¥n?n?¡¦ can mean many or different. Here it means different. So ¡¥ adverting¡¦ is what is meant here.

¡§There could be rearising of [bodily] pain faculty (¡¥Bodily pain faculty¡¦ simply means bod to contact with gadflies, flies etc.¡¨ In paragraph 188 ¡¥multiple¡¦ should be replaced with ¡¥d adverting¡¦.

If these feelings are abandoned in the preliminary stages, why are they mentioned here? A are mentioned in this passage describing the fourth jh?na. The Commentator explains that it they can be easily understood or easily grasped. In paragraph 190 ¡§It is done so that they c grasped.¡¨ ¡¥Readily grasped¡¦ means easily understood.

¡§For neither-painful-nor- pleasant feeling described here by the words ¡¥which has neither-pain-nor-pleasure¡¦ is subtle, hard to recognize and not readily grasped (not readily u Among the feelings the neutral feeling is the most difficult to see or to understand. Pain is ob or good feeling is also obvious. But the neutral feeling is difficult to see. Although one experi feeling, one is not aware that that is neutral feeling. It is so difficult to understand, so subtle.

Here the Buddha wants us to understand neutral feeling in comparison with other feelings the feelings here and explains that this feeling is the most difficult to understand.

¡§Just as, when a cattle-herd wants to catch a refractory ox that cannot be caught at all by it, he collects all the cattle into one pen and lets them out one by one and then (I would say saying ¡¥That is it; catch it¡¦ - I would strike out ¡¥and so¡¦. It is not ¡¥it gets caught¡¦ but ¡¥ge caught¡¦. - gets it caught.¡¨ That means let other people catch the ox. This is the one I want t it. So the other people catch it. The sentence should run like this: ¡§He lets them out one by saying ¡¥that is it; catch it; gets it caught as well, so too the Blessed One has collected all th kinds of feeling] together so that they can be readily grasped; for when they are shown colle this way, then what is not [bodily] pleasure (bliss) or [bodily] or [mental] joy or [mental] grief be grasped in this way.¡¨ What is not sukha, dukkha, somanassa, domanassa is upekkh?. T accompanied by neither pain nor pleasure but neutral feeling.

¡§It has the purity of mindfulness caused by equanimity.¡¨ That is specific neutrality. Actua mindfulness but all mental concomitants, all mental factors are purified in this jh?na. So it is teaching is given under the heading of mindfulness.¡¨ Only mindfulness is mentioned, but we that all the others are meant headed by mindfulness.

Is there an expression for that? Do you know what I mean? Sometimes we do not say all say. But we let people know by saying something different from what we really want to say. understand that sati (mindfulness) and others are purified by equanimity. But all that I say is mindfulness is purified by equanimity. I name mindfulness only, but I mean mindfulness and say that in English? Is there a way of expressing that in English? Is there a figure of speech Student: Maybe ¡¥and so on¡¦.
Teacher: But I just say ¡¥mindfulness¡¦, but you must understand mindfulness and others. S ¡§The president comes.¡¨ In reality he does not come alone, but we do not mention the othe like that.
Student: Sometimes we say ¡¥shorthand¡¦. We just say a little bit and the rest is understood.
Teacher: In that way we should understand that ¡¥purity of mindfulness¡¦ is not purity of min is purity of mindfulness and other concomitants.

So whenever you find in this translation the expression ¡¥under the heading of¡¦ it means t the heading of mindfulness¡¦ means taking mindfulness as the head of something, but you h mindfulness and others as well.

This is the fourth jh?na. How many jh?na factors are there in fourth jh?na? Two factors be sukha there is upekkh?. The two factors are upekkh? and ekaggat? (unification of mind). Th two jh?na factors and the fourth jh?na also has two jh?na factors.

This is the fourfold method. There are four jh?nas according to this method. But if you war five jh?nas, you eliminate vitakka and vic?ra separately. First you try to eliminate vitakka and the second jh?na. The you try to eliminate vic?ra. Then you get the third jh?na and so on. In are five jh?nas, not four. But actually they are the same depending upon whether a person e and vic?ra at the same time or whether a person eliminates them one at a time.

Let us say there are four jh?nas on the left hand side and five jh?nas on the right hand sid the fourfold method is the same as the first in the fivefold method. The second in the fivefold alone because it has eliminated vitakka so it is unlike the first jh?na in either method. It is al the second jh?na in the fourfold method which has eliminated vic?ra. The second jh?na of th still has the mental factor vic?ra. The third in the fivefold method is the same as the second method. The fourth in the fivefold method is the same as the third in the fourfold method. Th fivefold method is the same as the fourth in the fourfold method.

You will find four jh?nas mostly in the Suttas. Very rarely will you find five jh?nas mentione Suttas. Only four jh?nas are mentioned in many, many Suttas. But in Abhidhamma the fourf the fivefold method is mentioned. That is the end of chapter 4.

S?dhu! S?dhu! S?dhu!

Chapter 5
(Tape 12)

Today we will do two chapters, chapter five and chapter six because both chapters are sm like the fourth chapter. The fourth chapter is a long chapter. Up to the end of the fourth chap studied how a person practices the first of the kasi?a meditation subjects. That is the earth k meditation up to the attainment of jh?nas. Then we will look at the person who makes the jh vipassan? and practices vipassan? meditation on them and becomes an Arahant. Only the j here, not vipassan? in this chapter.

The four jh?nas - first, second, third, fourth - are explained in detail in the fourth chapter. T four jh?nas or five jh?nas that are attained through the practice of earth kasi?a meditation ar

You may remember that there are ten kasi?a objects for meditation mentioned earlier at th chapter four. Chapter five deals with the remaining kasi?a objects of meditation. We have th chapter four. In chapter five we will have the remaining nine kasi?as.

The next kasi?a is the water kasi?a. The word ¡¥kasi?a¡¦ cannot be translated into English difficult. For the sake of convenience we translate it as disk meditation. Not all the kasi?a ob disks however. So we will just leave it untranslated and use the word ¡¥kasi?a¡¦. ¡¥Kasi?a¡¦ r orb. When you practice with the kasi?a, you take the whole of the object, not just part of the why it is called ¡¥kasi?a¡¦. In P??i ¡¥kasi?a¡¦ means whole or orb.

Now we want to practice water kasi?a. What should we do? ¡§One who wants to develop t should, as in the case of the earth kasi?a, seat himself comfortably and apprehend the sign ¡¥either made up or not made up¡¦.¡¨ Water kasi?a can be practiced without a made up kasi at water and practice water kasi?a meditation on it. That is for those who had experience in especially in past lives. For those who have not had previous experience, they will have to m kasi?a.

¡§Someone with no such previous practice should guard against the four faults of a kasi?a water should be clear water or colorless. It should not be red or yellow, but it should be clear four faults of a kasi?a¡¦ means it should not be mixed with color. If it is mixed with color, it wi color kasi?a and not water kasi?a. The water has to be pure and clean.

¡§He should fill a bowl or a four-footed water pot (something like a kettle) to the brim with w uncontaminated by soil, taken in the open through a clean cloth [strainer], or with any other c water. He should put it in a screened place on the outskirts of the monastery as already des himself comfortably. He should neither review its color nor bring its characteristic to mind.¡¨ T should not reflect on its color because it will be color kasi?a and not water kasi?a. You shou on the characteristic of water. Water has the characteristic of cohesion. Here you are to take concept, not as a reality.

¡§He should neither review its color nor bring its characteristic to mind, apprehending the c belonging to its physical support.¡¨ Clear is a kind of color. One should not pay attention to it may be seeing it. It is like the earth kasi?a. You may be seeing the earth or the color of the e do not reflect on it. You do not keep your mind on the color of the earth but on the earth itsel way here even though there may be some color in the water, you do not pay attention to col attention to the substance called ¡¥water¡¦.

¡§He should set his mind on the [name] concept as the most outstanding mental datum, ar the [various] names for water (?po) such as rain (ambu), liquid (udaka), dew (v?ri), fluid (sali develop [the kasi?a] by using [preferably] the obvious ¡¥water, water¡¦.¡¨ Then the footnote s cannot really furnish five words for water.¡¨ In P??i there are many synonyms for water. The you can say any of the words.

Student: You shouldn¡¦t switch words. You should just focus on one word.

Teacher: that¡¦s right.

Student: The water should be very still?

Teacher: Yes.

In English we just say ¡¥water, water¡¦ or you could say ¡¥liquid, liquid¡¦ or you could say s thing. ¡¥Water¡¦ is the word that comes to us naturally when we see the substance.

Student: so this is similar to mantra practice.

Teacher: It is something like that, but the meditator does not concentrate on the sound ¡¥wa concentrates on the substance, on the concept. That is the difference.

Then he develops the kasi?a looking at the water and then closing his eyes trying to visua he looks at the water again like the meditator did with the earth kasi?a. Then he gets first jh? jh?na and so on as with the earth kasi?a.

Here the learning sign and the counterpart sign - ¡§If the water has bubbles of froth mixed learning sign has the same appearance.¡¨ If there are bubbles of water, or froth, or whatever sign is the same as that because the learning sign is the exact image of the real thing. After learning sign or the grasped sign, you may go to any place and sit down and concentrate on memorized image. Then the faults in the learning sign will gradually disappear and it will bec

¡§The learning sign has the same appearance, and it is evident as a fault in the kasi?a. Bu counterpart sign appears inactive (That means still.), like a crystal fan set in space, like the c looking-glass made of crystal. With the appearance of that sign he reaches access jh?na (Th jh?na.) and the jh?na tetrad and pentad in the way already described.¡¨ He dwells upon the again and again and gets jh?na - first jh?na, second jh?na, third jh?na, fourth jh?na, or five j means if he eliminates vitakka and vic?ra at the same time, there are four jh?nas. If he elimi factors one at a time, then there are five jh?nas.

The remaining kasi?as are pretty much the same. With fire kasi?a you look at some fire. ¡§ someone with merit, having had previous practice, is apprehending the sign, it arises in him fire, not made up, as he looks at the fiery combustion in a lamp¡¦s flame or in a furnace, or in baking bowls, or in a forest conflageration, as in the Elder Cittagutta¡¦s case.¡¨

¡§The sign arose as he was looking at a lamp¡¦s flame while he was in the Uposatha hous preaching the Dhamma. Anyone else should make one up.¡¨ If a person has no practice pre to make a fire kasi?a.

One should build a fire. ¡§He should make a hole a span and four fingers wide in a rush m leather or a cloth.¡¨ You make a hole. It may be about ten inches in diameter. Then you look through that hole. You say ¡¥fire, fire, fire¡¦. There are different synonyms for fire. You may t those. In the same way the learning sign and the counterpart sign will appear to you. You dv counterpart sign and jh?na will arise. Then first, second, third and fourth jh?na will come.

Then there is the air kasi?a. How do we practice the air kasi?a? A yogi should practice air looking at something or by feeling. When you look at a tree shaking in the wind, you see tha That is air. Or as it is said in this book you may sit near a window and feel the wind touching may concentrate on that feeling of air touching your body or the movement of air in the treet two ways that you can practice air kasi?a meditation. Then you can say any one of the syno air. In English it is just air.

¡§Here the learning sign appears to move like the swirl of hot [steam] on rice gruel just wit oven. The counterpart sign is quiet and motionless.¡¨ The counterpart sign is always like tha refined, smoother, and maybe more brilliant, but the learning sign is just the exact image of t

Next is the blue kasi?a. The P??i word for blue is n?la. This word means more than just bl it can mean black. Hair is said to be n?la in color. Maybe not the color of the hair of Western many hair colors here. It is like the hair of Eastern people, black. In Burma we translate n?la but as brown. Between brown and black we translate as n?la. A lotus which is called ¡¥blue we call it ¡¥brown lotus¡¦ although it is blue.

Student: Could it be green?

Teacher: Yes, if it is very dark. So here we have any color bordering on blue - blue, or mayb something like black.

¡§One who is learning the blue kasi?a apprehends the sign in blue, whether in a flower, or in a color element.¡¨ ¡¥Color element¡¦ simply means paint. You may paint on a board blue c on it.

¡§One should take flowers such as blue lotuses, girika??ik? (morning glory) flowers, etc., a out to fill a tray or a flat basket completely so that no stamen or stalk shows, or with only the he can fill it with blue cloth bunched up together; or he can fasten the cloth over the rim of th basket like the covering of a drum. Or he can make a kasi?a disk, either portable as describ kasi?a or on a wall, with one of the color elements such as bronze-green, leaf-green, anjana Anjana-ointment is the cosmetic women use to decorate their eyes. What do you call that?

Students: Eye shadow. Mascara.

Teacher: Yes, mascara. It can be any color?

Student: It¡¦s usually dark.

Teacher: Yes, it must be dark. So any one of these colors will do. He surrounds it with a diffe us say you want to make a blue kasi?a. The circle should be blue and the bordering color sh yellow or white, but some other color. There should be no confusion with the colors of the ot ¡§After that he should bring it to mind as ¡¥blue, blue¡¦.¡¨ He looks at it and says ¡¥blue, blue is similar to the preceding kasi?a objects.

With the yellow kasi?a one uses a yellow cloth, yellow flowers or yellow paint. The only dif color.

With the red kasi?a you use red color - red flowers, red cloth or red paint. With white kasi?
white flowers, white cloth or white paint.

Next is the light kasi?a. ¡§One who is learning the light kasi?a apprehends the sign in light a wall, or in a keyhole, or in a window opening.¡¨ So it is light coming through a hole.

¡§So firstly, when someone has merit, having had previous practice, the sign arises in him circle thrown on a wall or a floor by sunlight or moonlight entering through a hole in the wall, he sees a circle thrown on the ground by sunlight or moonlight coming through a gap in the dense-leafed tree or through a gap in a hut made of closely packed branches. Anyone else kind of circle of luminosity just described, developing it as ¡¥luminosity, luminosity, or ¡¥light
If he cannot do so, he can light a lamp inside a pot, close the pot¡¦s mouth, make a hole in it with the hole facing a wall. The lamplight coming out of the hole throws a circle on the wall.¡ that circle and says ¡¥light, light¡¦.

¡§This lasts longer than the other kinds.¡¨ That means that sunlight or moonlight may chan last long, but this light which is put in a pot and that falls on the wall will last longer.

¡§The learning sign is like the circle thrown on the wall or the ground. The counterpart sign compact bright cluster of lights. The rest is as before.¡¨

The last one is the limited space kasi?a. Here ¡¥limited space¡¦ is said to differentiate it fro ¡¥infinite space¡¦ which is the object of the first formless (ar|p?vacara) jh?na. After getting th the fourth jh?na, if a person wants to attain ar|p?vacara jh?na, first he has to practice the ka meditation. Then he makes the sign disappear and he dwells on the space that was taken b expands this sign until the end of the world or the end of the universe.

But here the yogi takes the space which is limited. It is like looking at a round hole or some that. ¡§One who is learning the space kasi?a apprehends the sign in a hole in a wall, or in a window opening, and so firstly, when someone has merit, having had previous practice, the when he sees any [such gap as a] hole in a wall. Anyone else should make hole a span and a well thatched hut, or in a piece of leather, or in a rush mat, and so on. He should develop a hole such as a hole in a wall, as ¡¥space, space¡¦.¡¨ So he looks at the hole and says ¡¥sp ¡§Here the learning sign resembles the hole together with the wall.¡¨ So there is a limit. Th boundary. That is why in that state attempts to expand it fail. You cannot expand that in the has a limited boundary.

¡§The counterpart sign appears only as a circle of space.¡¨ Here there is no boundary, just space, and so attempts to extend it succeed. ¡§The rest should be understood as described kasi?a.¡¨

These are the ten ksi?as. All of the ten kasi?as lead a yogi to attain all four jh?nas or all fiv

The following is general but I think it is the interesting part of this chapter. We will learn wh we can get from the jh?nas based on the practice of kasi?a meditation.

You know in the book many miracles are stated like flying through the air, going into the ea storms or fire. They may be called ¡¥psychic powers¡¦ now. In order to get those powers first attain all eight or nine jh?nas, not only r|p?vacara jh?nas but also ar|p?vacara jh?nas also. T back to the fourth or the fifth jh?na and practices in a special way so that the supernormal po knowledge¡¦ as it is called in this book arises in that person. When the direct knowledge aris person wishes, he is able to see things far away, he is able to hear sounds far away and so monks who show their psychic power.

Suppose you want to shake this whole building. What must you do? Suppose you have po in the wrong way, you will not be able to do that. In order to shake this building you must pra taking water kasi?a as an object. If you develop jh?na on earth kasi?a, it will become strong not be able to shake it. In order to shake this building you have to practice jh?na on water ka fluid. If you develop direct knowledge, you will be able to do that. Things like this are mentio following paragraphs. They are interesting.

Student: In order to get those psychic powers one has to attain all eight jh?nas?

Teacher: Yes.

Student: Then one comes back to the fourth jh?na and concentrates on that in a special way

Teacher: Yes. This will be explained later in chapter 13.

Student: You want to shake this building?

Teacher: It is interesting. There is a story of a novice. It is said that he had psychic powers. the world of the gods and he said: ¡§I will show my power to you. I will shake your buildings, so that you will become afraid.¡¨ He tried to do that, but he was not successful. He couldn¡¦t all. The celestial nymphs teased him and he went back ashamed. Then he returned to his te that he tried to shake the celestial mansion and he was unable to do that. His teacher said to into the wrong jh?na meditation. He had practiced jh?na on the earth kasi?a. So he could no mansion. Then he went up again. Once again the nymphs teased him. But this time their kin tease him. Now he has instructions from his teacher.¡¨ So that time he was able to shake the mansion.

These supernormal powers are mentioned in the following paragraphs. The first is the resu kasi?a. ¡§The earth kasi?a is the basis for such powers as the state described as ¡¥having b becomes many¡¦ (That means you make multiple images of yourself.), etc.¡¨ Let me read ab he becomes many, or having become many he becomes one again. He becomes visible or no obstruction through the further side of a wall, or a rampart, or a hill as if through air. He p and down through the solid ground as if through water. He walks on water without breaking solid ground. He travels cross-legged in the sky like the birds on wing. Even the moon and th so mighty though they be, does he touch and feel with his hand. He reaches in the body eve of Brahma.¡¨ Such things can be done through direct knowledge.

¡§Stepping or standing or sitting on space or on water by creating earth, and the acquisitio of mastery (Those are the jh?nas again, the developed jh?nas.) by the limited and measurel

¡§The water kasi?a is the basis for such powers as diving in and out of the earth.¡¨ So if yo into the earth, first you enter into water kasi?a and something like create water in your mind get into the earth. ¡§Causing rain storms, creating rivers and seas, making the earth, and roc quake¡¨ - if you want to read the references I can give you the page numbers. For D.1,78 the translation is Dialogues of the Buddha, volume 1, page 88. For M.2,13 the English translatio Sayings, volume 2, page 213.

Student: The footnote says ¡§Sense desires are not called empty (ritta) in the sense that spa entirely devoid of individual essence, is called empty.¡¨ So sense desires are not empty?

Teacher: Right. Emptiness in Therav?da teaching is different. Whenever we say ¡¥empty¡¦, or devoid of permanency, devoid of happiness, devoid of self. It is not that they do not have their own because desire is a reality (paramattha). It is an ultimate reality. Desire is a menta it has its own existence or entity. But it is free or void of permanency. It is void of happiness is void of self or ego. So it is called void or su??a. It is different.

Student: It is empty in that it is going to change, in that it is not permanent. It is empty in that

Teacher: yes.

Student: It is not empty in that it has momentary existence.

Teacher: Yes. It has momentary existence.

Student: Space does not even have momentary existence.

Teacher: Space is not included in the realities. Space is considered to be a concept, space a Student: Is your description of sense desire different from Mah?yana?

Teacher: I don¡¦t know what ¡¥su??a¡¦ means in Mah?yana. If it means that sense desire ha all, that it is something like a concept, then it is different. What we understand by su??a is th devoid of permanency and so on. But it has its own existence, momentary existence. It arise During that moment it is real. So it is called reality, but this reality has no quality of permane on, no substance.

¡§The fire kasi?a is the basis for such powers as smoking, flaming, causing showers of sp fire with fire, ability to burn only what one wants to burn, causing light for the purpose of see objects with the divine eye, burning up the body by means of the fire element at the time of a Nibb?na.¡¨

The ability to burn only what one wants to burn is to be found in the Sa?yutta Nik?ya. In th it is to be found in Kindred Sayings, volume 4, page 196. (In Bhikkhu Bodhi¡¦s more recent tr in The Connected Discourses of the Buddha, volume 2, pages 1319 & 1320.) There a monk

¡§The Venerable Mahaka went to his lodging and shut the bolt of the door, performed such power such that a flame came through the keyhole and the parts about and the parts about the grass on fire, but not the cloak. Citta the householder in alarm with hair on end shook ou stood aside.¡¨ So here the venerable showed his psychic power. The cloak did not burn but That is what is said here. This is the ability to burn only what one wants to burn.

This fire kasi?a is very useful in trying to see things with the divine eye. The divine eye is c direct knowledge. In order to see far away things or to see things in the dark one needs som he practices jh?na based on the fire kasi?a. Then he goes to the fifth jh?na and so on.

¡¥Burning up the body by means of the fire element at the time of Nibb?na¡¦ - that means dies if he has this power, he could will that the body be consumed by fire when he dies. Nob care of burning his body. It will burn by itself. In order to do that before his death he enters in the basis of fire kasi?a. Then he wills ¡§May my body burn at death.¡¨

That was done by one of the disciples of the Buddha. His name was Venerable Bakkula. H those that are free from disease. He was endowed with perfect health. Before he died he tho given any duty or any burden to anybody in my life. So when I die, I will not give them this bu cremating my body. Let my body cremate itself.¡¨ So he willed that way and then he died. As the body was consumed by fire. The moment he died the body was burned.

¡§The air kasi?a is the basis for such powers as going with the speed of the wind, causing blue kasi?a is the basis for such powers as creating black forms, causing darkness, acquisit of mastery by the method of fairness and ugliness, and attainment of the liberation by the be yellow kasi?a is the basis for such powers as creating yellow forms, resolving that somethin
You may resolve that something will be gold and then it may turn into gold or look like gold.
Kindred Sayings, volume 1, page 145.

¡§The red kasi?a is the basis for such powers as creating red forms, acquisition of the bas the way stated and attainment of the liberation by the beautiful. The white kasi?a is the basis powers as creating white forms, banishing stiffness and torpor (That is banishing sleepiness darkness, causing light for the purpose of seeing visible objects with the divine eye. The ligh basis for such powers as creating luminous forms, banishing stiffness and torpor, dispelling light for the purpose of seeing visible objects with the divine eye.¡¨ The white kasi?a and the are almost the same.

¡§The space kasi?a is the basis for such powers as revealing the hidden, maintaining post earth and rocks by creating space inside them, traveling unobstructed through walls and so

¡§The classification ¡¥above, below, around, exclusive, measureless¡¦ applies to all kasi?a the different aspects of the kasi?as.

¡§No kasi?a can be developed by any living being described as follows: ¡¥Beings hindered defilement, or by kamma-result, who lack faith, zeal, and understanding, will be incapable of the certainty of rightness in profitable states.¡¨ ¡§Hindered by bad kamma refers to those who possess bad kamma entailing immediate e given in the footnote that it is the five kinds of grievous kamma - killing one¡¦s mother, killing father, killing an Arahant, causing blood to congeal in the body of the Buddha, and causing s Community, in the Sa~gha. These are said to be very grievous offenses. A person who has cannot escape rebirth in hell in the next existence. It is said here that if anyone has done an will not be able to develop jh?na.

The fourth one is important. Here it say ¡¥intentional shedding of a Buddha¡¦s blood¡¦. It is the Therav?da tradition that we cannot wound a Buddha. We cannot injure a Buddha. The m him and have the blood congeal under the skin. Sometimes you hit yourself and there is a b comes out. What is that?

Student: A contusion.

Teacher: That is what is meant by the P??i word ¡¥lohitupp?da¡¦, not injuring him, not shedd blood. Buddha will not bleed.

Then by defilement - that means those who have fixed wrong view or who are hermaphrod people cannot attain jh?na even though they practice meditation. ¡¥Wrong view¡¦ means no inefficacy of action, and nihilist view. ¡¥No cause view¡¦ means there is no cause for someth Anything can happen without a cause. That is called ¡¥no cause view¡¦. If you deny the caus effect. In reality these three kinds of wrong view are the same.

The others deny the effect. If you deny the effect, you also deny the cause. Then third one view. There is nothing. Whatever you do will not constitute a kamma. The second one is mo action and the third one is nihilist view - no cause, no doing. There is no result from the prac giving; there is nothing like respect to the Elders, to parents and so on. You don¡¦t have to p your elders, something like that. There is no this world, no other world; there are no holy me practiced and attained to the spiritual attainments and so on. That is what is called the ¡¥nih here. If a person has one of these wrong views or he is a hermaphrodite or a eunuch, he wil attain jh?na.

¡§By kamma result: who have had a rebirth-linking with no [profitable] root-cause or with o [profitable] root-causes.¡¨ That means when a person takes rebirth, there is a type of consci arises. With that consciousness roots may arise. There are six roots - three good roots and The roots of evil are attachment, hatred and delusion. The roots of good are the opposites o When a person takes rebirth, his rebirth consciousness may not be accompanied by any of it may be accompanied by two or three of the good roots. There is no rebirth consciousness accompanied by any of the evil roots. If a person¡¦s rebirth consciousness is not accompani roots, then he cannot attain jh?na in that life. ¡¥Two roots¡¦ means non-greed and non-hatre or understanding (???a). So our rebirth consciousness must be accompanied by pa??? in o jh?na in this life or enlightenment in this life. Otherwise it is impossible for us to attain jh?na enlightenment. This is called ¡¥by kamma-result¡¦.

¡§Lack faith: are destitute of faith in the Buddha, Dhamma and Sa~gha.¡¨ (Maybe in the pr

¡§Zeal: are destitute of zeal for the Unopposed Way. Understanding: are destitute of mund supramundane right view.¡¨ ¡¥Right view¡¦ means understanding of kamma and its results. T view¡¦.

¡§ ¡¥Will be incapable of entering into the certainty of rightness in profitable states¡¦ means are incapable of entering into the Noble Path called ¡¥certainty¡¦ and ¡¥rightness in profitable That simply means such people are incapable of attaining enlightenment, attaining jh?nas.

¡§And this does not apply only to kasi?as; for none of them will succeed in developing any subject at all. So the task of devotion to a meditation subject must be undertaken by a clans hindrances by kamma-result, who shuns hindrance by kamma and by defilement, and who f understanding by listening to the Dhamma, frequenting good men, and so on.¡¨ So in order t successfully you should be free from these defects. This is the fifth chapter.

Chapter 6
(Tape 12)

The next chapter is an unpleasant chapter. It is the chapter on what is foul, what is loathso dead body. It is also about applying the state of a dead body to our living body. This is the fo body meditation or the loathsomeness of the body meditation. Most people in the West I thin this meditation.

A man asked me: ¡§Do I have to tell my wife that I imagine her to be a corpse when I go b practice this kind of meditation, you have to do it. Whether you tell your wife this, that is anot You may or may not do so. But if you are going to be practicing this, then you have to see no but anybody including yourself as loathsome, as foul. If you don¡¦t like it, don¡¦t practice it. It¡

This meditation is very powerful and effective in removing attachment to bodies, to self. Or various conditions of a dead body, you become less interested in your body or in the body o

Just today I was talking with a monk in Los Angeles. He lived in villages for some time. So had chance to cremate a dead person, a dead monk. After doing this two or three times, he his body too.

Student: This type of meditation is particularly recommended or useful for people of greedy c Teacher: Yes, for those who are attached to their bodies or the bodies of others.
Student: It is discouraged for those of hateful or angry character.
Teacher: Discouraged, no. But it is recommended for those who have strong attachment to t lives.

You have read all this, so you know what these subjects of meditation are. These are the c of decomposition in a corpse. After two or three days it becomes bloated. Then it deteriorate becoming livid, festering, cut up and so on.

I want to talk about the first one, the bloated corpse. ¡§The bloated: it is bloated (uddhum? bloated by gradual dilation and swelling after (uddha?) the close of life, as a bellows is with w bloated (uddhum?ta) is the same as ¡¥the bloated¡¦(uddhum?taka).¡¨ Do you understand tha is the same as ¡¥the bloated¡¦.¡¨

Please look at the P??i words. The first is uddhum?ta. The second one is uddhum?taka. S the word. What the Commentary wants us to understand is that ¡¥ka¡¦ denotes disgust. If yo is bloated. If you say uddhum?taka, then it is a bloated body which is disgusting. The particle added to show that it is disgusting. That is what we should understand. It is very difficult to c meaning in a translation. You have to put in a footnote. All these ten kinds of meditation hav ¡¥ka¡¦ to the description of the corpse. The first one is uddhum?taka, the second one is vin? one is vipubbaka and so on.

In order to practice this you have to do a lot of preparation. Everything is explained in deta book. For example you are not to go to the corpse as soon as you hear that there is a corps a place. You are not to go there directly. It is said that sometimes there may be wild animals corpse or there may be ghosts around the corpse. Your life may be in danger.

You must not go directly to the place. You have to study the road to and from it. You must along the road. Everything is to be noticed - stones are here, in this place the road goes off here at another place the road goes off to the right. You have to take note of everything on t place.

You know this meditation is a very frightening meditation. You have to go alone. It says tw in this book ¡§no companion,, no companion¡¨. So you have to do it alone. Sometimes when are frightened. Even when a dead branch drops, you may be frightened. You may think it is something. So you have to be very careful.

You must inform at least the head of the monastery where you live that you are going ther cemeteries are not like here. In this country they are beautiful places. In the East sometimes robbers may frequent a cemetery. It is a place not many people go to. It is secluded for them robbers may go to that place followed by some people. Then they may drop something that the monk. Those who follow them may see their property close to a monk and take the mon a thief. In that case if he has informed the head monk of the monastery, he can explain to pe to do a lot of preparation if you want to do this meditation.

It is impossible even in our countries to do this meditation. Dead bodies are not left on the are either cremated or buried. It is almost impossible to see a bloated corpse or whatever.

Let us say it is possible. You are not to sit too near the corpse or too far away from the cor not sit downwind. You must sit in the other direction. If you sit downwind, you will be offende So there are many things in detail which you have to take care of before you go and practice

Student: Did you have the opportunity to do that?

Teacher: No. You know it is a very frightening meditation. Not many people would do this. Y some kind of courage.

One thing in our countries is that parents used to try to scare their children by saying, ¡§Th ghost here, there is a ghost there.¡¨ So we are afraid of ghosts. Even though we have grown kind of residue of it in our minds. We cannot shake it all together from our self. It is not like p this country. People in this country are not afraid of ghosts. They may even talk with ghosts. adopt ghosts or something like that.

Student: Some people!

Teacher: One thing is that when you are invited to a funeral service, then as a monk you hav cemetery. And a cemetery is not a good place like here. It is frightening. It is dirty. And it is s don¡¦t have embalming. Most people don¡¦t have that. So when the corpse is carried to the c have decomposed. There is that smell.

I had that experience. Once I was invited and I went to the cemetery. Then the body was p about one and a half feet from me. Then there was the smell and the impurities dripping fron is always a not good smell at a cemetery. There are monks who live very close to or in the c build small huts or kutis and practice this kind of meditation.

The body should not be of the opposite sex. That is mentioned here two or three times. A the corpse of a man. A woman must look at the corpse of a woman. This is because even a some mental excitement if it is not yet dead long enough or has not yet decomposed. Some thoughts of lust even looking at a corpse. It is not recommended for a monk to look at the co

The last one is a skeleton. You can practice looking at a whole skeleton or you can practic only one bone.

In paragraph 85 ¡§And individually the bloated suits one who is greedy about shape since the disfigurement of the body¡¦s shape. The livid suits one who is greedy about the body¡¦s c makes evident the disfigurement of the skin¡¦s color. The festering suits one who is greedy a the body aroused by scents, perfumes etc., since it makes evident the evil smells connected the body. The cut up suits one who is greedy about the compactness in the body, since it ma hollowness inside it. The gnawed suits one who is greedy about accumulation of flesh in suc as the breasts since it makes it evident how a fine accumulation of flesh comes to nothing. T suits one who is greedy about the grace of the limbs since it makes it evident how limbs can hacked and scattered suits one who is greedy about a fine body as a whole since it makes e disintegration and alteration of the body as a whole. The bleeding suits one who is greedy a produced by ornaments since it makes evident its repulsiveness when smeared with blood. suits one who is greedy about ownership of the body since it makes it evident how the body families of worms. A skeleton suits one who is greedy about fine teeth since it makes it evide repulsiveness of the bones in the body. This, it should be understood, is how the classificati comes to be tenfold according to the subdivisions of the greedy temperament.¡¨

When a person practices the foulness meditation, any one of them, he can only get first jh other jh?nas. It is explained here with a simile.

¡§But as regards the tenfold foulness, just as it is only by virtue of its rudder¡¨ - I don¡¦t thin ¡¥rudder¡¦. What is ¡¥rudder¡¦?

Student: A steering mechanism.

Teacher: Yes. In P??i the word is pole. We use a pole to push the boat in a strong stream. ¡ only by virtue of a pole that a boat keeps steady in a river with turbulent waters and rapid cu cannot be steadied without a pole, so too [here], owing to the weak hold on the object, cons unified only keeps steady by virtue of vitakka (applied thought), and it cannot be steadied wi (applied thought), which is why there is only the first jh?na here, not second and the rest.¡¨ Y get first jh?na if you practice foulness of the body meditation. This is because you need vitak application of the mind) for your mind to be on the object. The object is coarse or gross and vitakka to keep your mind there. Vitakka is only present in the first jh?na. It is not with secon third jh?na and so on. So you can only get first jh?na by this kind of meditation.

Now paragraph 88 ¡§This foulness, while of ten kinds, has only one characteristic. For tho kinds, nevertheless its characteristic is only its impure, stinking, disgusting and repulsive sta foulness appears with this characteristic not only in a dead body but also in a living one (Tha here.), as it did to the Elder Mah?-Tissa who lived at Cetiyapabbata, and to the novice to the Sa~gharakkhita while he was watching the king riding an elephant. For a living body is just a one, only the characteristic of foulness is not evident in a living body, being hidden by adver embellishments.¡¨ We wash ourselves. We clean ourselves every day. Some people use cos on. Therefore the characteristic of foulness is not evident in a living person, in a living body.

dead the characteristic of foulness becomes evident.

If you want to attain jh?na through this practice, you really have to go to a cemetery and lo and practice meditation on it. But if you just want to practice it as a mindfulness of the body you don¡¦t have to go to a cemetery. You may imagine a corpse in your mind and apply the to your own body. ¡§As this body is bloated, my body also will not escape this state.¡¨ You a of the dead body to your living body. In that way you can practice Satipa??h?na mindfulness that case you don¡¦t have to look for a corpse or whatever. But if you want to practice this sa meditation in order to get jh?na, you have to find a corpse somewhere.

It is almost impossible in this country. But if you go to some medical college, you may be a corpses there. Outsiders are not allowed there. If you are a special guest, they may allow yo corpses. Otherwise they will not allow you to see. So it is almost impossible nowadays even to practice this kind of meditation.

Student: We can see these stages in animals.

Teacher: Even that is not so common because of health standards. They won¡¦t let a corpse One can take pictures of corpses, but it is difficult even to take pictures. You may look at the develop meditation on it.

This is the foulness of the body meditation. In our countries when a person dies, they send
In the invitation it says please come to such and such a place to practice asubha meditation invited to come to a funeral service or to go along with the dead body to the burial place. The to practice foulness of the body meditation along with us.

I went to Los Angeles this time to conduct a funeral service. One of my devotees died. I sa invited here not just to say ¡¥Oh, poor lady¡¦ or whatever, but you are to look at her and prac meditation and the other kind of meditation, the recollection of death.¡¨ At least these two ki meditation people should practice when they go to a funeral. That is the way to attend a fune don¡¦t say that we are assembled to pay last respects to the person, but we come to practice and to apply this nature of this person to ourselves in order to reduce attachment to ourselve

Then there is one other thing. That is to share merit with the dead person. That is the purp go to a funeral service. Most people actually don¡¦t know what to do and why they are invited the real followers of the Buddha then we ought to do this. One should go to a funeral and me and then share merits with the dead person.

Student: What do you mean by ¡¥sharing merit¡¦?

Teacher: That means that I tell that person ¡§I share my merits with you.¡¨ You tell that perso understanding that he may be somewhere around as a ghost or a lower celestial being.

Student: Is it like a blessing?

Teacher: Not a blessing. Can we call it a blessing? No. It is helping him in the present life. A reborn as any being according to the teachings of the Buddha. Although a person may be a the whole life, if he has bad thoughts at the moment of death, then he could be reborn in a lo those who are reborn as ghosts, hungry ghosts, and lower celestial beings can be helped by That is the basis of a funeral service in Therav?da Buddhism. When we share merits with th person rejoices at the merit. Then he gets merit himself by rejoicing. That merit of his actuall his life. It is not the merit of people here directly giving him results. The teaching in Buddhism have to do it yourself to get results. Nobody can give you their results. The merit of those wh the basis for the merit of those who accept. So it is important when we go to a funeral to pra of the body meditation and the recollection on death.

OK. Thank you.

S?dhu! S?dhu! S?dhu!

Chapter 7
(Tape 13 / 1-44)

It may be a relief to leave the foulness meditation behind and to come to the recollection m six kinds of recollection meditations mentioned in this chapter are something like devotional They are not like the other kinds of meditation. They are unlike the kasi?a meditation, foulne vipassan? meditation. In these meditations you do a lot of reflection. You do a lot of thinking practice this kind of meditation.

There are ten recollections. They are divided into two chapters. Six are treated in this chap remaining ones will be treated in the next chapter.

The P??i word for recollection is anussati. When you read the Visuddhi Magga or other tra sometimes you may find the language odd and not adding much to any new understanding. explaining the P??i word. Here the P??i words are ¡¥anu¡¦ and ¡¥sati¡¦. You already know sa mindfulness or remembering. Anu is a prefix. So it has more than one meaning. Here I think given. ¡§Because it arises again and again¡¨ - that is one meaning of anu. Anu can mean ag alternatively, the mindfulness (sati) that is proper¡¨ - anu can also mean proper. ¡§It is the pr mindfulness for a clansman who has gone forth out of faith, since it occurs only in those inst should occur.¡¨ So anussati is defined as mindfulness which arises again and again or which mindfulness for those who have gone forth. Actually it is for any person.

Student: A clansman is a monk or a member of the Sa~gha?

Teacher: A clansman in this book would mean a monk. But the P??i word ¡¥kulaputta¡¦ mea or a layman.

The first one is the recollection of the Buddha. Actually it is the recollection of the attribute qualities of the Buddha, not the recollection of the Buddha himself. The word literally howeve recollection of the Buddha. ¡§This is a term for mindfulness with the Enlightened One¡¦s spe object.¡¨ When you practice this meditation, you concentrate or you reflect upon the attribute qualities of the Buddha. The object of this reflection meditation is the attributes of the Buddh

The next one is the recollection of the Dhamma. Here also it is the recollection of the quali Dhamma. They will be treated in detail a little later.

¡§This is a term for mindfulness with the special qualities of the Law¡¦s being well proclaim its object.¡¨ Dhamma is translated as law. It will be explained in its proper place. ¡¥Dhamma Paths, the Four Fruitions, Nibb?na and also the teachings or the scriptures. There are ten ki Four Paths, Four Fruitions, Nibb?na, and the teachings. Some attributes have to do with all not have to do with all ten. They will be explained later.

The third is the recollection of the Sa~gha. ¡¥Sa~gha¡¦ here means the community of mon Buddha¡¦s advice and have attained enlightenment.

¡§This is the term for mindfulness with the Community¡¦s special qualities of being entered way, etc., as its object.¡¦ When you practice this meditation, you concentrate on the qualities

The Sa~gha is well-behaved and so on.

The next one is the recollection of virtue, recollection of one¡¦s pure moral conduct. ¡§This mindfulness with the special qualities of virtue¡¦s untorness, unblotched, etc., as its object.¡¨

The next one is recollection of generosity. It is reflecting on one¡¦s own generosity and get happiness. ¡§this is a term for mindfulness with generosity¡¦s special qualities of free genero its object.¡¨ What is ¡¥free generosity¡¦? ¡¥Free generosity¡¦ means giving without any expec expecting anything in return. That is called ¡¥free generosity¡¦ in P??i. The P??i word is mutt ¡¥C?ga¡¦ means giving and ¡¥mutta¡¦ means free. When you give, you just give. You don¡¦t e from this act of giving.

Student: How is that different from just generosity?

Teacher: I don¡¦t know what generosity means in English. Is it just giving or may you expect from this giving, perhaps a good name or something in the future? Here you just give becau thing to do. You do not expect anything from this giving.

The next one is recollection of the deities. That means recollection of the qualities of the d Before they were reborn as deities they were human beings. They had qualities of morality, on. One reflects that these qualities are in me. So I am as good as they are. Comparing or ta witness one reflects on one¡¦s own good qualities. This is not to be proud of one¡¦s self but t one¡¦s being generous, in one¡¦s moral conduct and so on.

The next one is recollection of death. ¡§This is a term for mindfulness with the termination faculty as its object.¡¨ It simply means death. ¡¥Termination of the life faculty¡¦ is a technical really means death.

Mindfulness occupied with the body - you have to understand the P??i word here. The P?? k?yagatasati. Actually there are three words. The three words are joined or compounded tog become one word. Among these three words is the word ¡¥gata¡¦. ¡¥Gata¡¦ means gone or ¡ somewhere. So in P??i there is a difference between saying ¡¥gone to the material body¡¦ o material body¡¦. So it is explained in two ways. ¡§It is gone to the material body that is analyz head-hairs etc.¡¨ ¡§Or it is gone into the body¡¨ - I don¡¦t like this. I just want to say ¡§It is on body.¡¨ That means your mind is on the different parts of the body when you practice this me Etymologically the word ¡¥gata¡¦ means gone to something. It has another meaning which is mindfulness gone to the parts of the body or mindfulness which is on the parts of the body. T thing.

Student: So ¡¥gata¡¦ is the same as that which is in Tath?gata?

Teacher: Yes. That¡¦s right.

Student: So it could be ¡¥well-gone¡¦?

Teacher: Here it is gone to. The word is ¡¥k?yagatasati¡¦, sati which is gone to k?ya (the bod is on the body (k?ya).

Student: What does ¡¥Tath?gata¡¦ mean?

Teacher: ¡¥Tath?¡¦ means thus, in that way. ¡¥Gata¡¦ means come or be.

Student: So it could be thus come or thus gone?
Teacher: Yes. You know with these words the Commentators are very fanciful. They give m word. You will find this today. Sometimes people say that the Commentator is not sure which meaning of the word because he gives seven or eight meanings for just one word. This is th divide words into different parts and explain them. They may not be natural, but still they are this especially when it comes to finding or explaining names for the Buddha or words which Buddha.

A little further down ¡§But instead of shortening [the vowel] thus in the usual way, ¡¥body-g mindfulness¡¦(k?yagat? sati)¡¨ - that means according to P??i grammar the vowel in the mid can be shortened. If it is shortened, it will be k?yagatasati and not k?yagat?sati. The Comme explaining this. Here the long vowel is not shortened. So it is k?yagat?sati and not k?yagata

The next one is mindfulness of breathing. This is plain.

The last one is ¡§the recollection arisen inspired by peace is the recollection of peace.¡¨ Th means the recollection of the attributes of Nibb?na. It is not taking Nibb?na as the direct obje dwelling on the attributes of Nibb?na.

There are six recollections that will be treated in this chapter. Before going to the first one, understand the formula or the words descriptive of the Buddha.

Just recently Michael showed me the Lotus Sutra. Actually the Mah?yana Sutras are fashi Suttas. There are many similarities in the style of the language although Mah?yana Buddhis uses Sanskrit language. P??i and Sanskrit are very close to each other. This set of names o Buddha are found both in Therav?da and Mah?yana. This set of attributes is very popular w Buddhists. I hope it is also with Mah?yana Buddhists. On the devotional side we want to con Buddha and dwell on his attributes. It is like Christians praying to God or thinking God. It is s that. This set of attributes is well-known to almost every Buddhist.

The P??i is ¡§Itipi so Bhagav?¡¨ and so on. It is given in paragraph 2, the second paragrap Blessed One is such since he is accomplished¡¨ and so on. But the translation should not ru Blessed One is accomplished¡¨ for such and such a reason. There are nine or ten attributes here. Buddha is accomplished for such and such a reason. Buddha is enlightened for such a so on. The reasons will be explained in detail. Although ¡¥for such and such a reason¡¦ is no in the formula, when you practice this meditation, you have to say this because sometimes y concentrate on all nine or ten attributes. You pick up only one which you like best. Then you that one attribute and say it again and again in your mind. So Buddha is accomplished for su reason and so on. Such and such a reason will be given in the exposition.

In paragraph 3 also it should say ¡§That Blessed One is accomplished for such and such a fully enlightened for such and such a reason. He is blessed for such and such a reason.¡¨ It this.

For the first one you have to understand the P??i word. The P??i word is araha or arahant divided in different ways and then explained. The meaning of this word is given in five ways.

are given for this one word. Now let us look at how this word is cut up.

The first word is just araha. We don¡¦t have to look to etymology for this meaning. This wo far away or remote. So according to this meaning Buddha is called araha because he is far a of mental defilements. ¡§He stands utterly remote and far away from all defilement because defilements.¡¨

Student: It is called ¡¥?raka¡¦ here in the book. Is that a mistake?

Teacher: No. Originally it was ?raka. It was changed to araha. Sometimes people pronounc not according to etymology. So the pronunciation may change and it becomes araha. Some has the same meaning as the word ¡¥?raka¡¦. ¡¥?raka¡¦ means to be far away. It is very cont mean to be close to. It is not given here fortunately. But in the Sub-Commentary it is given. S is to be far away from, to be remote. That means the Buddha is remote from the mental defi

And here it is from all trace of mental defilements. ¡¥All trace¡¦ is important. When Buddha mental defilements, all trace of them is abandoned. There is not even a trace of mental defil minds of the Buddhas.

Arahants are different. Arahants also eradicate mental defilements, but they do not or can traces of mental defilements. Although they are not the mental defilements themselves, they of mental defilements, like a bad habit.

There was an Arahant who addressed any person, anybody he met as ¡¥wicked person¡¦ He was reborn as a high caste brahmin for 500 consecutive lives. So he would say ¡§Oh wic you going?¡¨ or something like that. He was an Arahant. He had no mental defilements, no c Still he could not give up this habit.

Buddhas are different. When Buddhas eradicate mental defilements, they eradicate with a a little trace remains with a Buddha. That is what makes Buddhas different from Arahants. B eradicate all mental defilements. Buddhas eradicate with all traces. The Arahants do not. Th of traces of mental defilements remaining with them.

According to the second meaning the division of the word is ¡¥ari¡¦ and ¡¥ha¡¦. ¡¥hata¡¦ me killed. ¡¥Ha¡¦ also means that. ¡¥Ari¡¦ means enemies and ¡¥ha¡¦ means kill. So one who has is called ¡¥araha¡¦. It could be called ¡¥ariha¡¦, but the ¡¥i¡¦ is changed to ¡¥a¡¦ and so it beco That is how the formation of the word is explained. ¡¥Ari¡¦ means enemies which again are t defilements. So one who has eradicated mental defilements is called an Arahant.

The third meaning is ¡¥ara¡¦ and ¡¥ha¡¦. ¡¥Ara¡¦ here means spokes and ¡¥ha¡¦ means to d has destroyed the spokes is called an araha.

¡§This wheel of the round of rebirths with its hub made of ignorance and craving, with its s consisting of formations of merit and the rest, with its rim of aging and death, which is joined chariot of the triple becoming by piercing it with the axle made of the origin of cankers.¡¨ ¡¥T cankers¡¦ means cankers which are the origin, not necessarily the origin of cankers. Canker origin. They are origin for some other mental defilements.

¡§...has been revolving throughout time that has no beginning. All this wheel¡¦s spokes (ar destroyed (hata) by him at the place of Enlightenment (That is under the Bodhi Tree.) as he the feet of energy on the ground of virtue, wielding with the hand of faith the ax of knowledg kamma - because the spokes are thus destroyed he is accomplished also.¡¨ In order to unde you have to look at the chart here because it refers to the Dependent Origination. It is said h a hub made up of ignorance and craving. The whole Pa?icca Samupp?da is viewed as a wh hub is ignorance and craving - number one is ignorance and number eight is craving. They a hub of a wheel.

¡§With its spokes consisting of formations of merit and the rest¡¨ - that means numbers tw five and so on. They are compared to spokes. If there is someone who can draw, I want him

¡§With its rim of aging and death¡¨ so aging and death are compared to the rim because th Aging and death are number twelve. ¡§Which is joined to the chariot of the triple becoming¡¨ existence - existence in the sense-sphere, existence in the form-sphere, existence in the for ¡§Piercing it with the axle made of the origin of cankers¡¨ - so the cankers are compared to we have the hub, the spokes, the rim, the axle, and above the wheel is the chariot. When th destroyed, then the whole thing is destroyed. So Buddha was called ¡¥araha¡¦, one who des because he destroyed the wheel of existence, the wheel of Dependent origination.

¡§Or alternatively, it is the beginningless round of rebirths that is called the ¡¥Wheel of the Rebirths¡¦.¡¨ The explanation here also has to do with Dependent Origination. In Dependent are what we call twelve links, twelve factors. Number one is condition for number two, numb for number three and so on. I say ¡¥condition¡¦ not the cause because sometimes they are t sometimes they are not, but they are all conditions. One is condition for two, two is condition three is condition for four and so on. If you have this in mind, you understand the following p you don¡¦t understand, you have to go to Abhidhamma and read about Dependent Originatio

Paragraph 16 explains how clinging is condition for kamma-becoming process and rebirth that is interesting. ¡§ ¡¥I shall enjoy sense desires¡¦, and with sense-desire clinging as condi misconducts himself in body, speech, and mind.¡¨ Clinging is a condition for good or bad kar to enjoy sense desires let us say in a better existence (I want to be reborn in a better existen be reborn as a cerlestial being.) I will do something so that I will be reborn there. Sometimes something that is wrong in body, speech, or mind. Perhaps we meet with bad teachers. May sacrifice a human being, you will be reborn as a deva or something like that. Because of tha good or bad deeds. Here he misconducts himself in body, speech, or mind.

¡§Owing to the fulfillment of his misconduct he reappears in a state of loss.¡¨ That means h the four woeful states - as an animal, or in hell, or as a ghost and so on.

¡§The kamma that is the cause of his reappearance there is kamma-process becoming.¡¨ number ten in the links.

¡§The aggregate generated by the kamma are rebirth-process becoming.¡¨ That also is nu two kinds of number ten. One is action and the other is becoming. ¡¥Action¡¦ really means g ¡¥Becoming¡¦ means the result of good or bad kamma. Actually becoming in number ten and same.

¡§The generating of the aggregates is birth.¡¨ That means coming into being of the aggreg of conception or at the moment of rebirth. ¡§Their maturing is aging, their dissolution is deat is clinging. Clinging is a condition for action or becoming. Becoming is a condition for birth, c death.

¡§ ¡¥I shall enjoy the delights of heaven¡¦, and in the parallel manner he conducts himself v does the right thing. ¡§Owing to the fulfillment of his good conduct he reappears in a [sensua heaven. The kamma that is the cause of his reappearance there is kamma-process becomin before.¡¨ That means the aggregates generated by the kamma are rebirth-process becoming aggregates is birth, their maturing is aging, their dissolution is death. You have to understan

Sometimes you want to be reborn as a Brahm?, a higher celestial being. Then you do som the fulfillment of the meditative development he is reborn in the Brahm? World.¡¨

Paragraph 20 ¡§So, ¡¥Understanding of discernment conditions thus: Ignorance is a cause causally arisen, and both these states are causally arisen¡¦.¡¨ Ignorance is a cause but it is a upon a condition. So ignorance as well as formations are causally arisen. Both are causally the knowledge of the causal relationship of states. Understanding of discernment of conditio past and in the future ignorance is a cause, formations are causally arisen, and both these s causally arisen¡¦.¡¨

¡§Herein, ignorance and formations are one summarization.¡¨ In Burmese we translate it a layers, three layers and so on. The P??i word is sa~khepa. ¡¥Sa~khepa¡¦ really means in sh summarization. In Burmese we translate it as layer. There are four layers. ¡§Ignorance and f summarization¡¨ So in this chart number one and number two. ¡§Consciousness, mentality-n sixfold base, contact and feeling are another.¡¨ That means three, four, five, six, seven. They or summarization. ¡§Craving, clinging,and becoming are another.¡¨ That is eight, nine and te and aging and death are another.¡¨ That is eleven and twelve. So there are four summarizat

The first summarization is past. So one and two belong to past time. The two middle ones means three, four, five, six, seven, eight, and nine. These are present. Then birth, aging and future. That is why we say Dependent Origination covers three lives - the past life, the prese future life.

¡§When ignorance and formations are mentioned, then also craving, clinging and becomin so these five states are the round of kamma in the past.¡¨ Now in the past there are only two one and number two. When you mention number one, you virtually mention number eight an they belong to the kilesa round. So when we say one, we mean one, eight and nine. When w mean both number two and number ten. So when we say number one and number two, we eight, nine and ten. That is why there are five in the first layer, in the first summarization. Act are five although only two are mentioned.

The second is all right. In the third summarization when we say eight and nine, then we als one. This is the reverse. And when we say number ten, we also mean number two. So when nine and ten, we virtually mean one, two, eight, nine and ten.

We get twenty conditions. ¡§And because [the five] beginning with consciousness, are des heading of birth, aging and death these five states are the round of kamma-result in the futu twenty aspects in this way.¡¨ These are called ¡¥aspects¡¦.

There is one link between formations and consciousness. There are three links all togethe is between two and three. The second link is between seven and eight. The third link is betw eleven.

The Buddha know all this so he is called ¡¥araha¡¦.

In paragraph 22 ¡§Knowledge is in the sense of that being known.¡¨ Actually it should be ¡ that which knows.¡¨ It looks like ¡¥being known¡¦ in P??i, but the Sub-Commentary explains ¡¥that which knows¡¦ and not ¡¥that which is known¡¦. So ¡¥being known¡¦ shoud be changed
In order to fully understand it, you should have a knowledge of Dependent Origination.

The next one is araha. ¡¥Araha¡¦ means worthy. Buddha is worthy of accepting offerings a ¡¥araha¡¦. ¡§He is worthy (arahati) of the requisites of robes etc., and of the distinction of bei homage.¡¨ Actually it just means special honor. Buddha is worthy of the requisites of robes a is worthy of special honor offered to him by other beings.

This paragraph explains that he was honored when he was alive. Even when he was deac honor him by spending a lot of money and by building monasteries and so on. ¡§And after th finally attained Nibb?na King Asoka renounced wealth to the amount of 96 million for his sak 84,000 monasteries.¡¨ That means the renouncing of 06 million and the founding of 84,000 r same. That means he spent much money to build 84,000 monasteries. That was just to ded the Buddha.

In paragraph 24 it says ¡¥vaunt their cleverness¡¦. What is ¡¥vaunt their cleverness¡¦?

Students: To show off.

Teacher: The P??i word means ¡¥those who think they are wise although they are not really convey the same meaning?

Students: It is similar.

Teacher: So there are people who think they are clever, but they do evil in secret. Buddha is Buddha has no secrets. Here the division of the word is ¡¥a¡¦ plus ¡¥rah?¡¦. ¡¥A¡¦ means no a secret. Buddha has no secrets. Buddha did not do any wrong-doing secretly.

So the word araha can be divided as ara and ha, or as ari and ha, or as a and rah?. So it i words.

Student: You skipped over ¡¥the knowledge that destroys kamma¡¦.

Teacher: The knowledge of the fourth stage of enlightenment destroys kamma. When a pers stage of enlightenment, he no longer accumulates any kamma, good or bad kamma. That is extinguisher of kamma.

You know when a person becomes an Arahant, even though he may do good things, he d
This is because he does not have kusala consciousness at that time. His consciousness is f

That is what is meant here.
Student: Where is that?
Teacher: It is in paragraph 7. ¡§Wielding with the hand of faith the ax of knowledge that dest that means when you get this knowledge (That means when you become an Arahant.), you You may do meritorious deeds still, but they are not called ¡¥kusala¡¦. They become kiriya (f Buddhas and Arahants are said to have no kusala and akusala. They have neither wholeso actions. Arahants may not do any unwholesome acts. They may do wholesome acts, but the considered kusala (wholesome), but they are functional (kiriya) because they do not give an So here ¡¥the knowledge that destroys kamma¡¦ means the fourth stage of enlightenment.
the fourth Magga knowledge which accompanies or arises with the fourth Magga consciousn Student: We have teachers here in America who say that they do not create kamma. They a are Arahants.
Teacher: If they are, they do not create fresh kamma. The Arahants do not accumulate eithe or akusala kamma because their actions are all fruitless, not producing any fruit, not produci You know in Buddhism the keeping of s?la, the purity of virtue is very important. It is said h firm ground of virtue¡¨. S?la is compared to the ground. Energy is compared to the feet. Faith is compared to the hand. This is because if you have a hand, you can pick up things, but if y hand, you cannot pick up things. If you do not have confidence, you cannot pick up kusala o confidence or faith is compared to a hand. And the fourth Magga is compared to an ax which the mental defilements.
Student: So if your conduct is not clearly virtuous, there is no way that you are going to be in not creating kamma.
Teacher: Yes. That¡¦s right.
Student: What is an example of ¡¥functional¡¦?
Teacher: ¡¥Functional¡¦ is something like a tree that does not bear fruit. It is still living. It still branches and leaves, but it does not bear fruit. It is something like that. People after becomi still do good things - still teach people, still practice meditation, still help others. All their actio not constitute kamma because they have eradicated the roots of existence, that is craving a actions are just actions. Their actions do not bring results.
In Burma at the New Year ceremony the cannons are fired. When something is just noise we say this is a New Year cannon. Functional is something like that or the trees bearing no f Samm?sambuddha - we use the word ¡¥Buddha¡¦ to refer to him, but his full epithet is Sam ¡¥Samm?¡¦ is one prefix and ¡¥sam¡¦ is another prefix. There are two prefixes here and Bud means rightly and ¡¥sam¡¦ means by himself. ¡¥Buddha¡¦ means to know. He knows or disco Truths rightly and without assistance from any person, by himself. We emphasize this when Buddha. Buddhas are those persons who do not need any teachers.
The Bodhisatta went to two teachers before he became the Buddha. He did not follow thei attainment of Buddhahood. He discarded their practice and went to a place and practiced by that the Buddha has no teachers. This is emphasized by this ¡¥Sambuddha¡¦. ¡¥Sambuddha self-enlightened. ¡¥Samm?buddha¡¦ means rightly enlightened. So ¡¥Samm?sambuddha¡¦ m self-enlightened. Here ¡¥to know¡¦ means to know the Four Noble Truths.

In paragraph 28 the author gives the things which the Buddha knew. They are six bases, s consciousness, and so on. These are topics taught in Abhidhamma. Actually they are found but their treatment in full can be found in Abhidhamma.

Sometimes people take Abhidhamma to be a separate thing, not connected with the Sutta things found in Abhidhamma, most of them, are found in Sutta Pi?aka. That is why we need Abhidhamma to understand the Suttas. We should not treat them as separate things. We ca without a knowledge of Abhidhamma if we are to understand fully and correctly. So these ar Abhidhamma Pi?aka and Sutta Pi?aka also.

Buddha¡¦s penetration into the Four Noble Truths or his discovery of the Four Noble Truths second attribute Samm?sambuddha.

Student: An Arahant is enlightened by himself or a Pacceka -

Teacher: A Pacceka Buddha is enlightened by himself.

Student: That¡¦s usually distinguished from a Buddha that is totally enlightened by himself.

Teacher: The Pacceka Buddhas are not called ¡¥Samm?sambuddha¡¦. They are just called ¡¥Pacceka Buddha¡¦, but not ¡¥Samm?sambuddha¡¦.

Student: And ¡¥rightly¡¦?

Teacher: ¡¥Rightly¡¦ means in all aspects they understand the Dhamma. The Pacceka Budd persons, but their knowledge may not be as wide or comprehensive as that of the Buddhas are called ¡¥silent Buddhas¡¦. That comes from the fact that they do not teach much. Althoug teach, but mostly they seldom teach. They want to be away from people and live in the fores called ¡¥silent Buddhas¡¦.

Student: Perhaps because they were not taught it is hard for them to teach. That is in contra the Buddha.

Teacher: Also they appear only when there are no Buddhas. They appear between periods

I hope you have read the footnotes. The footnotes are very good.

We will go next to the third one. ¡§He is endowed with [clear] vision and [virtuous] conduct two words here - vijj? and cara?a. ¡¥Vijj?¡¦ means understanding or vision and ¡¥cara?a¡¦ m Buddha is endowed both with clear vision and conduct.

There are three kinds of clear vision. That means remembering past lives, the divine eye, of defilements. They are called ¡¥three clear visions¡¦. Whenever three is mentioned, these a remembering past lives, divine eye, and destruction of defilements.

Sometimes eight kinds of clear vision are mentioned. ¡§The eight kinds as stated in the An there eight kinds of clear vision are stated, made up of the six kinds of direct knowledge toge insight and the supernormal power of the mind-made [body].¡¨ There are eight kinds of clear in that Sutta.

However if you go to that Sutta, you will not find them clearly stated because in P??i when want to repeat, they just put a sign there. It is like using three or four dots in English. In P??i the letters ¡¥PA¡¦ or sometimes ¡¥LA¡¦. When you see this, you understand there are some not want to repeat. So you have to know where they first occur. If you do not know where to lost. Today I looked up this reference (D,1,100) and they were not printed in the book becau mentioned in the third Amba??ha Sutta.

This is one problem with us modern people. These books are meant to be read from the b end, not just to pick up a Sutta in the middle and read it. So they are meant to be studied fro beginning. I can give you the page numbers of the English translation.

The eight are the six kinds of direct knowledge. That means performing miracles, divine ea people¡¦s minds, remembering past lives, divine eye, and destruction of mental defilements. here - vipassan? insight and supernormal power of the mind-made body. That means you pr are able to multiply yourself. These are the eight kinds of clear vision stated in that Sutta.

By conduct 15 things are meant here: restraint by virtue, guarding the doors of the sense f knowledge of the right amount in eating, devotion to wakefulness, the seven good states (Th footnote), and the four jh?nas of the fine-material sphere. ¡§For it is precisely by means of th that a noble disciple conducts himself, so that he goes towards the deathless. That is why it ¡¥[virtuous] conduct¡¦, according as it is said.¡¨

You have to understand the P??i word ¡¥cara?a¡¦ to understand this explanation. Cara?a ¡¥cara¡¦. ¡¥Cara¡¦ means to walk. to go. So ¡¥cara?a¡¦ means some means of going. These going in the direction of Nibb?na. That is why it says here: ¡§It is precisely by means of thes that a noble disciple conducts himself, that he goes towards the deathless.¡¨ That is why it is ¡¥cara?a¡¦.

Let us go to the next one in paragraph 33. Please remember here the P??i word ¡¥sugata translation ¡¥sublime¡¦ may not make much sense here. The first meaning of ¡¥su¡¦ is good. and ¡¥gata¡¦ means going. ¡¥Sugata¡¦ means good going. Buddha has good going. That is w ¡¥sugata¡¦ because his going is purified and blameless. What is the good going? That is the Noble Eightfold Path is called ¡¥good going¡¦. That is the first meaning of sugata.

The second meaning is gone to an excellent place. Here ¡¥gata¡¦ means gone, but not like meaning. In the first meaning ¡¥gata¡¦ means going. In the second meaning ¡¥gata¡¦ means an excellent place. So one who has gone to an excellent place is called ¡¥sugata¡¦. Here the is Nibb?na.

The third meaning is of having gone rightly. ¡¥Su¡¦ can also mean rightly. One who has go called ¡¥sugata¡¦. ¡¥Rightly¡¦ here means not approaching the extremes, but following the Mi

The fourth meaning is because of enunciating rightly. Here the original word is ¡¥sugada¡¦ changed to ¡¥T¡¦. This is the P??i grammatical explanation. ¡¥Gada¡¦ means speaking or say rightly. One who speaks rightly is called ¡¥sugada¡¦. So there are four meanings with regard

With regard to the fourth meaning a Sutta is quoted here in paragraph 35. ¡§Such speech knows to be untrue and incorrect, conducive to harm, and displeasing and unwelcome to oth speak.¡¨ and so on. According to this Sutta there are six kinds of speech. Only two of these speech do Buddhas use. Those six are mentioned here in the translation of the Sutta.

In brief they are the following. The first is speech which is untrue, harmful and displeasing. not use such speech. The second is speech which is true, but harmful and displeasing to the do not use such speech. The third kind of speech is true, beneficial or not harmful, but displ listeners. The Buddhas use such speech. Here in the translation it says, ¡§The Perfect One expound.¡¨ That means if it is time to say such speech, the Buddha will use such speech. It pleasing to the listener, but if it is beneficial and it is true, and it is timely, the Buddha will say Student: What is the meaning of ¡¥harmful¡¦ and ¡¥not harmful¡¦?
Teacher: That means if you follow his words you will get benefits. If you do not follow his wo come to failure. Sometimes people talk to other people, give advice to other people. Sometim not be conducive to success.

So that which is true, beneficial and displeasing such speech Buddhas use. Then the fourt that is untrue, harmful, but pleasing to other people. Buddha never uses this kind of speech. one is speech that is true, harmful and pleasing. Buddha never uses this speech. The last o is true, beneficial and pleasing to the listeners. The Buddha uses this kind of speech. So Bu two kinds of speech, that which is true, beneficial and displeasing or that which is true, bene pleasing. The others the Buddha did not use. That is why Buddha is described as ¡¥sugata¡ rightly.

Then the Buddha is the knower of the worlds, lokavid|. You may have read this. It is some Commentary like Buddhist cosmology. Not all of them can actually be found in the Suttas. S others may have been developed later after the death of the Buddha. If we look at the world knowledge of modern science, then these accounts are very different.

There are three kinds of worlds mentioned here - the world of formations, the world of bein of location. You will find that in paragraph 37. ¡¥The world of formations¡¦ really means the w animate and inanimate things, both beings and inanimate things. ¡¥The world of beings¡¦ me ¡¥The world of location¡¦ means the outside world.
Student: Outside world?
Teacher: That is the inanimate world like the earth, the rivers, the mountains and so on. If yo diagram of what is mentioned here, you can get a rough picture of the Buddhist conception o sun, the moon, the universe.

In paragraph 38 I think the word ¡¥likewise¡¦ should go. It should be ¡¥for¡¦ or maybe ¡¥in c because paragraph 38 and the following paragraphs are the detailed description of how the world.

In paragraph 39 ¡§But he knows all beings¡¦ habits.¡¨ This is important. ¡§But he knows all habits, knows their inherent tendencies, knows their temperaments, knows their bents, know little dust on their eyes and with much dust on their eyes, with keen faculties and with dull fa good behaviour and with bad behaviour, easy to teach and hard to teach, capable and incap achievement], therefore this world of beings was known to him in all ways.¡¨ Only Buddhas h knowing exactly beings¡¦ habits, inherent tendencies and so on. Even the Arahants do not p

Then there is the Buddha¡¦s understanding of the physical world. There are some stateme physical world and then they are developed later on. This is the description of the world acc Buddhists.

Also the footnote is very helpful and informative. You will get a view of the Buddhist univer the Buddhist universe is a round thing, not like a globe, but it is round and it is surrounded b the ¡¥world-cycle mountains¡¦. So there are mountains around it. In this circle there is water great islands. We call them four great islands, maybe the continents. It is said in the books, not, that each island has 500 small islands. In the middle of the universe there is Mount Sine Meru. It is not visible to human beings. Surrounding Mount Meru there are seven sets of cor lower mountains. In between these there is water. These are called ¡¥inner oceans¡¦. There and these seven inner oceans. Mount Meru is said to be 4000 leagues high. The first surrou mountains is 2000 leagues high. The next one is half of that and so on.

If you make a drawing to scale it is very difficult. I have tried it but I cannot. You have to m drawing, not on small paper because it is half the height, half the height and so on.

That is called one universe. The sun and moon are said to go around the middle mountain
The sun and moon are only 42,000 leagues from the earth. The size of the sun is 50 league moon is 49 leagues. There is only one league difference between the size of the moon and
And then the stars and planets go round them.

It is said that when the sun goes round Mount Meru it throws a shadow. When three contin continent is dark. That is night. The others are day. So only one quarter of the universe is da other three parts are light at one time.

There are four great islands. The southern island is called ¡¥Jambud?pa¡¦. It is the place w all wise men and pure people are born. That land is described as wide at one end and beco other end. That fits with India. So India is Jambud?pa, the southern island. If India is the sou then Europe should be the western island, China and Japan should be the eastern island. A should be the northern island because when it is day in Asia, it is night here. America could great island which is called ¡¥Uttarakuru¡¦. This is the cosmology of Buddhism.

In paragraph 43 the first five lines are misplaced. ¡§The World-Sphere Mountains line of su down into the sea just two and eighty thousand leagues, and towers up in like degree, enrin world-element all around in its entirety.¡¨ These lines should be just above paragraph 44. I d he put these here. Perhaps it was a mistake. So these lines should be next to paragraph 44

¡§Herein the moon¡¦s disk is 49 leagues [across] and the sun¡¦s disk is 50 leagues.¡¨

¡§Therefore this world of location was known to him in all ways too. So he is ¡¥Knower of he has seen the world in all ways.¡¦ Buddha is called a ¡¥lokavid|¡¦, knower of the worlds, kn world of beings and the physical world, and knower of the world of formations or the world o things. That is why Buddha is called ¡¥Knower of the worlds¡¦.

When we read the Sub-Commentaries, we find more of these descriptions. I don¡¦t know w Actually they don¡¦t come from the Suttas. They may have gotten them from some writings o there are such books in Hinduism. They may have gotten them from there. They are not imp

In this book they say that the Himalayas are 500 leagues high. One league is about eight r about 4000 miles high. Sometimes they measure not by height but by path. Perhaps to reac to climb a number of miles. So Mount Tamalpais is one or two miles high, not measuring fro path.

Student: We say ¡¥as the crow flies¡¦ for direct. This is not ¡¥as the crow flies¡¦.

Teacher: No. Maybe that is why it is said that the Himalayas are 500 leagues high and so on about five miles high, right?

Student: Right. Since Mount Meru cannot be seen by human beings, perhaps this is some k Teacher: You know one statement contradicts another. It is said that when three islands are is dark. Following this, this world is what is meant by loka in our books because one part of t dark when the others are light. It is not exactly one quarter, but it is something like that. May knowledge of geography was very limited in those days. There may have been sages who c talked about these things and then they came to be accepted. Nobody seemed to bother ab height of the Himalayas or Mount Everest. They had no means of measuring the height of m days. So they may be measuring by path. They are not really important things.

OK. Next time read about another twenty pages.

S?dhu! S?dhu! S?dhu!

(Tape 14 / 45 - 100)

Today I want you to go back to the second paragraph of paragraph 2. In that paragraph th Buddha are given. How many qualities are there? Accomplished is the first quality. Fully enli second quality. Endowed with clear vision and virtuous conduct, that is the third. Sublime is Knower of the worlds is the fifth. We have gone through these five qualities.

The next one is the incomparable leader of men to be tamed. The Commentator breaks th
The first is just incomparable one and the second is the leader of men to be tamed. So this c only one quality - incomparable leader of men to be tamed - or as two qualities - as incompa leader of men to be tamed. So according to this division the Commentator is going to give us

Let us go to paragraph 46. ¡§In the absence of anyone more distinguished for special qual there is no one to compare with him, thus he is incomparable.¡¨ So incomparable is taken as

¡§For in this way he surpasses the whole world in the special quality of virtue, andd also in qualities of concentration, understanding, deliverance and knowledgee and vision of deliver ¡¥Knowledge and vision of deliverance¡¦ means the reflection after enlightenment. When a p enlightenment, first there is the Path moment, the realization moment. Then follows the Frui three moments of Fruit or Fruition consciousness. Then after that there are some bhava~ga reflection - reflection on the Path, reflection on Fruition, reflection on Nibb?na, reflection on eradicated, and reflection on defilements remaining. These are called ¡¥the five reflections¡¦ the first three are always done by a person who has gained enlightenment. The last two may by the enlightened person. These are called here ¡¥knowledge and vision of deliverance¡¦.

Buddha is the best of all beings, not only the best of human beings, but the best of all bein deities, M?ras, Brahmas and all. When the Buddha looked at the world, he did not see any virtuee than himself.

The next part of this quality is ¡¥tamer of men who are to be tamed¡¦ or ¡¥leader of men wh tamed¡¦. Paragraph 47 ¡§He guides (s?reti) men to be tamed (purisa-damme) thus he is lead (purisadammas?rathi); he tames, he disciplines, is what is meant. Herein, animal males (pur males and non-human males that are not tamed but fit to be tamed (dametum yutt?) are ¡¥m (purisadamm?)¡¦.¡¨ That is the definition of ¡¥men to be tamed¡¦.

¡§For the animal males, namely, the Royal N?ga (Serpent) Apal?la, C|?odara¡¨ and all the references are given in the footnote. There are too many. If you try to find out the story of ea have to go to many books and you have to read a lot. These are the instances where the Bu them, or in some cases defeated them and made them see the truth. He made them becom

¡§The Royal N?ga Apal?la, C|?odara, Mahodara (They are the names of serpents.), Aggis Royal N?ga ?rav?la, the elephant Dhanap?laka (That was the elephant set by Aj?tasattu to and so on, were tamed by the Blessed One, freed from the poison [of defilement] and establ and the precepts of virtue.¡¨

¡§And also the human males, namely Saccaka the Niganthas¡¦ son¡¨ - he was a Jain. The contemporary with the Buddha or maybe a little older. Mah?vira was their leader. Mah?vira is to Buddhists for the Jains. They are called ¡¥Niganthas¡¦ in the P??i Texts.

¡§The brahmin student Amba??ha¡¨ - he was a proud man. He went to the Buddha arroga tamed him. ¡§Pokkharas?ti (That was Amba??ha¡¦s teacher.), So?ada??a (a brahmin), K|?a so on, and also the non-human males, namely the spirits (¡¥Spirits¡¦ here means giants. It is ogre.) ?lavaka, S|ciloma and Kharaloma, Sakka Ruler of the Gods, etc., were tamed and dis means.¡¨ Buddha tamed all these. And so the Buddha came to be known as ¡¥leader of men ¡¥tamer of men to be tamed¡¦.

Then the Commentator gives us a reference or a quotation from the Suttas about Kesi, the
That Sutta is a very good one. Let me read from the Sutta. ¡§Now Kesi, the horse-trainer, ca Exalted One and on coming to him saluted the Exalted One and sat down to one side . As h Exalted One said to Kesi, the horse-trainer: ¡¥You yourself, kesi, are a trained man, aa train driving. Now, Kesi, pray how do you train a tamable horse¡¦?¡¨ How do you train a horse?

Then he said: ¡§As for me, your honor, I train a horse by mildness, also by harshness, also mildness and harshness.¡¨ In three ways he tamed horses.

¡§But suppose, Kesi, that a tamable horse does not submit to your training by mildness, no by harshness, not to the training by both methods, what do you do?¡¨ If a horse cannot be ta these means, what do you do?

¡§In such a case, your honor, I destroy him.¡¨ He just kills him.

¡§Why so?¡¨

¡§With the idea: Let him not be a discredit to my teacher¡¦s clan.¡¨ If I cannot tame this hor discredited. Instead of getting discredited, I will kill the horse. ¡§In such a case I destroy it wi idea: Let him not be a discredit to my teacher¡¦s clan.¡¨

¡§However, your honor, the Exalted One is unsurpassed as a trainer of men for driving. Ho does the Exalted One train a tamable man?¡¨ He asks the Buddha the same question.

The Buddha said: ¡§For my part, Kesi, I do train a tamable man by mildness, also by harsh together. Kesi, this is the way by mildness: This is good conduct in body, thus is the result o in body; this is good conduct in speech, thus is the result of good conduct in speech; this is g thought, thus is the result of good conduct in thought. Thus are devas. Thus are men.¡¨ That he shows them the benefits of keeping the precepts. By show ing the benefits of having goo is said to be taming by mildness, making the people want to practice.

¡§And Kesi, this is the way by harshness: This is bad conduct in body, thus is the result of body; this is bad conduct in speech, thus is the result of bad conduct in speech. This is bad thought, thus is the result of bad conduct in thought.¡¨ This is showing them the bad results o
This is taming by harshness according to the Buddha.

¡§And Kesi, this is the way by both mildness and harshness: Good conduct in body, speec this, and its results like this; bad conduct in body, speech and mind is like this, and its results this.¡¨ In this case the Buddha shows both the benefits of good conduct and the disadvantag That is Buddha¡¦s way of taming people by both mildness and harshness.

¡§But, your honor, if the man for training won¡¦t submit to training by mildness, nor by hars the two together, pray what does the Exalted One do?¡¨

¡§In such case, Kesi, I destroy him.¡¨ That is the Buddha¡¦s reply.

¡§But surely, the Exalted One does not take life! And yet the Exalted One spoke thus: ¡¥I d Kesi¡¦.¡¨

¡§True, Kesi, taking life does not become a Tath?gata. (¡¥Tath?gata¡¦ means the Buddha.) be trained does not submit to the training by mildness, by harshness, or by both together, th thinks it is not worthwhile to admonish that man, nor do his wise fellows in the pure life think to admonish that man.¡¨ That means we just leave him alone. I don¡¦t give admonishment to anything to him. ¡§This, Kesi, is destruction for a man in the discipline of the Ariyan when bo Tath?gata and his fellows in the holy life think it not worthwhile to admonish him.¡¨

Then Kesi said: ¡§Destroyed indeed, your honor, is a man¡¦s welfare when both the Tath?g fellows in the holy life think it not worthwhile to admonish him. It is wonderful your honor. It is May the Exalted One accept me as a follower from this time forth, for as long as life lasts, as taken refuge with him.¡¨

So Buddha¡¦s way of taming people is by mildness, by harshness, or by both together. If a tamed by any of these, he just leaves them alone. This is his way of destroying. You can find The Gradual Sayings, volume 2, page 116.

¡§Then the Blessed One moreover further tames those already tamed (He tamed not only untamed, but he also tamed those who were already tamed.), doing so by announcing the fi respectively to those whose virtue is purified, etc., and also the way to the higher path to Str and so on.¡¨ He tamed or taught people who were already good, who hd already kept their p instructed them to practice meditation and get jh?nas and also attainments. This is his way o ¡§Or alternatively the words ¡¥incomparablee leader of men to be tamed¡¦ can be taken to clause.¡¨ Here it is only one quality of the Buddha.

¡§For the Blessed One so guides men to be tamed that in a single session they may go in directions (That means the eight jh?nas.) [by the eight liberations] without hesitation. Thus h ¡¥the incomparable leader of men to be tamed¡¦.¡¨ So this quality can be two or one as you w

Traditionally in our countries the qualities of the Buddha are taken to be nine. Therefore th taken as one when we practice recollection of the Buddha meditation. When we practice this beads, counting beads. There are 108 beads. So that means you get twelve times in one rou of the Buddha. That gives you one round. It is something like a timing device. So when we u (mala), we take ¡¥the incomparable leader of men to be tamed¡¦ as only one attribute. Mayb number nine. It is supposed to be a lucky number.

The next one is ¡¥teacher of gods and men¡¦. ¡§He teaches by means of the here and now come, and of the ultimate goal.¡¨ Actually we should insert one word. ¡§He teaches by mean here and now.¡¨ That means he shows us the benefits here and now. He shows us the bene come, in the next life. He shows us the benefits of the ultimate goal. That means Nibb?na.

¡§According as befits the case, thus he is the Teacher (satthar).¡¨ The P??i word ¡¥satthar explaining such words, such things, the Commentators make recourse to play of words whe not identical words. The word ¡¥satthar¡¦ comes from one root. Then there is another word ¡¥ leader of a caravan. In the next paragraph that meaning is taken. ¡§So too the Blessed One leader, who brings home the caravans, he gets them across a wilderness, gets them across birth.¡¨ You may add any more meanings to this if you can think of some. They may be fanci devotees it is a way of making their mind calm and happy.

Paragraph 50 ¡§Of gods and men: This is said in order to denote those who are the best a those persons capable of progress.¡¨ In this attribute it is said ¡¥teacher of gods and men¡¦. W animals? Was he not the leader of animals also? It says here just deva (gods) and manusa are the bestof the beings and also to denote those capable of progress. That means those c enlightenment. Only human beings and deities are capable of attaining enlightenment, but n may be capable of being reborn as a human being or being reborn as a deva. However in th they cannot get attainment. Here the Commentator mentions only those capable of attaining enlightenment. That is why only deva and men) are mentioned. We must take it that the Buddha is also the teacher of animals. ¡§I as a teacher bestowed his teaching upon animals as well. For even animals can, through lis Blessed One¡¦s Law (That means preaching), acquire the benefit of a [suitable rebirth as] s progress].¡¨ That means that animals will not get enlightenmentt even though they listen to t However this meritorious deed of listening nto the Dhamma will help them to be reborn as devas. As human beings or as devas they are capable of getting attainment.

The story of a frog is given. ¡§Ma??|ka the deity¡¦s son¡¨ - actually it is just a deity, not a de son, although in P??i it is called Devaputta. That just means a deity. Every deity is a deity¡¦s ¡¥Ma??|ka¡¦ is the P??i word for frog. The frog was listening to the Buddha, but he did not u Buddha was saying. He may have thought this some kind of sound to be listened to. He was Buddha when a cowherd came and accidentally killed him. Because he was killed when he Buddha preaching, he was reborn as a deity.

¡§He found himself there, as if waking up nfrom sleep, amidst a host of celestial nymphs, a ¡¥So I have actually been reborn here. What deed did I do?¡¦ When he sought for the reason none other than his apprehension of the sign in the Blessed One¡¦s voice.¡¨

Student: What does ¡¥apprehension of the sign¡¦ mean?

Teacher: It just means that he took the voice to be a good thing to listen to. It may not even a Dhamma talk. He paid attention to the sound, so his mind became calm. As a result he wa That story is given in Vim?na-vatthu, the Book of Mansions.

The next one is the P??i word ¡¥buddha¡¦ (enlightened). ¡§He is enlightened (buddha) with that belongs to the fruit of liberation, since everything that can be known has been discovere is the meaning of the word ¡¥buddha¡¦?

Student: To wake up.

Teacher: There are at least two meanings. There are actually three meanings for the root he ¡¥budh¡¦. It means to know or it means to wake up. It also means to bloom or open up like a meaning ¡¥to know¡¦ is taken. ¡§Since everything that can be known has been discovered (T
him.¡¨

¡¥With the knowledge that belongs to the fruit of liberation¡¦ - what does that mean? ¡¥Tha really means that he attained after liberation. You know immediately after becoming the Bud simultaneously he gained omniscience. Here that gaining of omniscience is meant by ¡¥the belongs to the fruit of liberation¡¦.

You know at the moment of liberation there is Path consciousness. Immediately following consciousness. Here ¡¥the fruit of liberation¡¦ means Fruit consciousness. After that comes t wisdom, omniscience. Since he possessed omniscience (That means since everything that discovered by him or has been known by him.), he was called ¡¥the Buddha¡¦.

¡§or alternatively, he discovered the Four Truths by himself and awakened others to them. causative meaning is put into the word. Normally the word ¡¥buddha¡¦ means one who know mean one who makes others know. The causitive meaning is inherent in that. Buddha is the makes others know. So here ¡§He discovered the Four Truths by himself and awakened oth others discover the Four Noble Truths.

¡§And for other such reasons he is enlightened. And in order to explain this meaning the w the Niddesa (Mah? Niddesa is another book.) beginning thus ¡¥He is discoverer of the Truth
This is quoted. So Buddha is the one who knows the Four Noble Truths and who makes oth Truths. He is the discoverer and aalso makes others discover them. Here actually it is not on Truths, but anything that can be known or everything that is to be known is known by him.

What is the second quality of the Buddha? What is the difference between the second qua quality? The second quality is ¡¥fully enlightened¡¦ and this quality is ¡¥enlightened¡¦. The se just means he is the discoverer or he knows everything there is to know. His power of penet of knowledge is emphasized. In this quality not only his power of penetration but his power o penetrate is emphasized. Not only his knowledge, but his ability to make that knowledge atta is stressed. This is the difference beetween the second quality and this eighth quality.

The next one is the last one. The P??i word is ¡¥bhagav?¡¦. Here there is a lot of word play (bhagavant) is a term signifying the respect and veneration accorded to him as the highest o distinguished by his special qualities.¡¨ I would say here ¡§It is a term or a designation given to the one who is respected and who is distinguished by his special qualities and so is the hi beings.¡¨ He is distinguished by special qualities and so he is the highest of all beings, that is The name bhagav? or bhagavant is given to him with respect or to show him respect. There name ¡¥bhagavant¡¦. It is translated as blessed.

Paragraph 54 ¡§Or alternatively, names (or nouns) are of four kinds: denoting a period of l names given with reference to a period in one¡¦s life.) , describing a particular mark (That me reference to a particular mark.), signifying a particular acquirement (That means names give to some reason or some cause, here attainment or something.), and fortuitously arisen (Tha name. It may not accord with the real meaning.).¡¨ There are four kinds of nouns or four kind mentioned here.

¡§ Which last in the current usage of the world is called ¡¥capricious¡¦.¡¨ I don¡¦t knoww wh
- capricious. We will understand later.

Student: It means the same thing as ¡¥fortuitously arisen¡¦.

Teacher: it may be the same.

¡§Herein, names denoting a period of life are those such as ¡¥yearling calf (vaccha)¡¦, ¡¥st trained (damma)¡¦, ¡¥yoke ox (balivaddha)¡¦ and the like.¡¨ One and the same animal is calle when he is young. Then when he is a little older, he is called ¡¥damma¡¦, that is fit to be tam he has grown up, he is called a ¡¥yoke ox (balivaddha)¡¦. One and the same animal is called in different periods of life. The same is true for human beings - baby, child, boy, man, old ma names noting a period of life.

¡§Names describing a particular mark are those such as ¡¥staff-bearer (da??in)¡¦.¡¨ Since a staff, he is called ¡¥staff-bearer¡¦. The staff is a sign or mark by which we recognize him. T

¡¥a name denoting a particular mark¡¦. Other names denoting a particular mark are umbrella carries an umbrella. And then there is topknot-wearer. You can see topknots of hair on Burm Eastern ladies. One does not see topknots much on American ladies. Since he or she has a is called ¡¥topknot-wearer¡¦. Then there is hand-possessor. An elephant is called ¡¥hand-po it has a hand, the trunk. The trunk is like a hand to the elephant. It is called in P??i ¡¥karin¡¦, here the trunk.

¡§Names signifying a particular acquirement¡¨ - that means actually just the name given w the cause or reason of that name. For example ¡¥possessor of the three clear visions¡¦ is su person who really has the three clear visions is called in P??i ¡¥tevijja¡¦. The three clear visio reason or cause which causes this man to be called ¡¥possessor of the three clear visions¡¦. is given - ¡¥the possessor of the six direct knowledges (cha?abhi??a). It is the same thing. It have here now with BA, MA, PhD. These are names denoting the acquirement.

The last one is just a name that is given to a person, regardless of whether it meets the me word. ¡¥Siriva??haka¡¦ means augmenter of luster. So a beggar may be called ¡¥Siriva??ha name. Or a poor man may be called ¡¥Dhanava??haka¡¦. Such a name is called a ¡¥fortuito reference to the word¡¦s meaning.

In P??i most names have meanings. I don¡¦t know whether English names have meanings Student: Some do. I know when I had to name my child, I saw a book with the meaning of na commonly known.

Teacher: Most P??i names have meanings. For example my name ¡¥S?l?nanda¡¦ means on fond of s?la. There are four kinds of names given here. The name ¡¥Bhagav?¡¦ given to the of these four, that is name given with reference to the acquirement of the Buddha.

¡§The name, Blessed, is one signifying a particular acquirement; it is not made by Mah?-M mother),or by king Suddhodhana (his father), or by the 80,000 kinsmen,¡¨ and so on. Actuall given to him by his mother, or his father, or any of his relatives, or the king of gods, or whate called ¡¥Bhagav?¡¦ because he has these attributes.

¡§And this is said by the General of the Law¡¨ - ¡¥General of the law¡¦ means Venerable S?
Venerable S?riputta was called ¡¥General of the Law¡¦. Venerable ?nanda was called ¡¥Cus
That is because Venerable ?nanda had learned all of his teachings.

Student: Who is Venerable S?riputta?

Teacher: Venerable S?riputta is Buddha¡¦s cief disciple. He was chief among those who hav two chief disciples of the Buddha, Venerable S?riputta and Venerable Moggall?na. Venerab among those with wisdom. Venerable Moggall?na was chief among those with psychicc pow occasion to tame someone by psychic power the Buddha allowed Venerable Moggall?na to Student: Venerable S?riputta was in charge of Abhidhamma?

Teacher: Yes. He was the human pioneer of Abhidhamma. It was he who taught 500 of his c Abhidhamma. His version of Abhidhamma is what we have now. The version of Abhidhamm devas was too large, too long and the version that Buddha taught to Venerable S?riputta wa

Venerable S?riputta taught just enough for a human mind to accept.

¡§Now in order to explain also the special qualities signified by this name they cite the follo stanzas.¡¨ These are just play upon the words. ¡§Bhag? bhaj? bh?g? vibhattav?¡¨ and so on P??i, they may not be interesting. The first one is bhag?. ¡¥Bhag?¡¦ is changed to bhagav?. changed to bhagav?. This is the explanation that the ancient Commentators give. ¡§The me should be understood according to the method of explanation given in the Niddesa.¡¨ That is Mah? Niddesa. The commentator does not give us any more details about the explanation a Mah? Niddesa. However they are given in the footnote.

The next may be his own explanation. Paragraph 57 ¡§There is the other way: ¡¥Bh?gyav bhagehi ca vibhattav?. Bhattav? vanta-gamano bhavesu: bhagav? tato.¡¦ (He is fortunate, po abolishment, associated with blessings, and as possessor of what has been analyzed. He h has rejected going in the kinds of becoming.)¡¨ ¡§Herein, by using the Characteristic of Language beginning with Vowel augmentation of s using the Characteristic of Insertion beginning with [the example] Pisodara, etc., (see Pa?ini may be known that he [can also] be called Blessed (Bhagav?).¡¨ And so on. What do you un

What is ¡¥the Characterisitc of Language¡¦? Here the word ¡¥lakkha?a¡¦ is used. The usua lakkha?a is characteristic. In such cases as when referring to grammatical things the word ¡¥ a rule in grammar or an aphorism. So here ¡¥Characteristic of Language¡¦ means a rule of g

Ancient grammarians have made these rules. They are called ¡¥rules¡¦. They are short sen Actually these short aphorisms were learned by heart. The teacher would say it aloud and th repeat it. So they learned it by heart. Then the teacher would give explanations and example

When we study P??i grammar, we can memorize only the aphorisms, or we can memorize explanations of the aphorisms and the examples. If you have the ability to memorize much, all. If you don¡¦t want to memorize all, at least you have to memorize the aphorisms. These a called ¡¥laksuttas¡¦. In some places they are described as lakkha?a in P??i. Lakkha?a and S synonymous. Here ¡¥Characteristic of Language¡¦ just means a grammatical rule.

¡§By using a certain grammatical rule or a set of grammatical rules beginning with vowel a syllable¡¨ - this is not vowel augmentation of syllable, but just augmentation of syllable. That inserting a syllable, a consonent, or maybe sometimes inserting a vowel. Mostly a consonen insertion of consonents here is not according to the usual grammatical rules. This is a specia rule.

By such grammatical rules bh?gyav? can become bhaggav?. Bhaggav? can become bhag that.

¡¥Elision of syllable¡¦ - what is that?

Student: Sliding together. It is where one word joins another. It¡¦s where you make two syllal Teacher: That is not what is meant. What is meant is transposition of consonents. It is transp syllables or letters, mostly consonents.

A Noble Person is called ¡¥Ariya¡¦. A non-noble person is called ¡¥an?riya¡¦. The word ¡¥a combination of ¡¥na¡¦ and ¡¥ariya¡¦. In the word ¡¥an?riya¡¦ the letters ¡¥A¡¦ and ¡¥N¡¦ are tra Instead of calling a non-noble person ¡¥n?riya¡¦, such a person is called ¡¥an?riya¡¦. That is

It is something like that which is meant here. I don¡¦t know if the word ¡¥elision¡¦ means that.

There are other rules. ¡§Or by using the Characteristic of Insertion beginning with [the exa Pisodara¡¨ that is another kind of rule. I don¡¦t think ¡¥insertion¡¦ is a good word here. I woul ¡§including in the group of words beginning with Pisodara.¡¨ These words are not formed ac grammatical rules. They are specially formed words. We cannot explain explain them accor grammatical rules, the ordinary grammatical rules. They are special words. Following these anything. Bh?gyav? can become bhagav?. The last one is very funny. Bhavesu vanta-gama

The refeerences are given. The first one, Kasik?, is a Sanskrit grammar. It is difficult to ge in this country. The next one, Pa?ini Ga?apatha is a very famous Sanskrit grammar written of the Christian era. This is the standard Sanskrit grammar. Later on people wrote comment the commentaries is Kasik?. They are written in Sanskrit. Pa?ini is very much respected by Sanskrit grammars were written later by other grammarians or authors, but nonee of them is that written by Pa?ini.

¡§It may be known that he [can also] be called ¡¥Blessed (Bhagav?)¡¦ when he can be call (bh?gyav?)¡¦.¡¨ So bh?gyav? becomes bhagav?. You don¡¦t have to explain in the usual way arbitrary.

¡§Owing to the fortunateness (bh?gya) to have reached the further shore [of the ocean of giving, virtue, etc., which produce mundane and supramundane bliss. Similarly he [can also] ¡¥blessed (bhagav?)¡¦ when he can be called ¡¥bhaggav? (¡¥Bhaggav?¡¦ means one who ha possessed of abolishment¡¦ owing to the following menaces having been abolished.¡¨ So you

In paragraph 60 ¡§And by his fortunateness (bhagyavat?) is indicated the excellence of his which bears a hundred characteristics of merit.¡¨ Actually it means ¡§which bears characteris hundreds of merits. Buddha possessed different characteristics not shared by other human produced by lots of meritorious deeds that he did as a Bodhisatta. So it should say ¡§body w characteristics produced by hundreds of merits.¡¨

¡§Likewise [by his fortunateness is indicated] the esteem of worldly [people (That means o and by his having abolished defects (kilesas), the esteem of] those who resemble him.¡¨ Wh was incomparable. Nobody resembles the Buddha.

Sometimes the scribes, the people who wrote the Suttas on palm-leaves, made mistakes some scripts certain letters are similar to one another. So instead of writing one letter, they letter. Here is such a case. The P??i word here is ¡¥sarika¡¦, ¡¥SA¡¦. It should be the word ¡¥ ¡¥sarika¡¦. ¡¥Sarika¡¦ means resembling. ¡¥Parika¡¦ means discriminating or critical-minded. should not be ¡¥sarika¡¦, but it is ¡¥parika¡¦. ¡¥S¡¦ and ¡¥P¡¦ are similar in some of the ancient

In paragraph 72 ¡§ It is ¡¥with meaning¡¦ since it inspires confidence in persons of discretio the word ¡¥parika¡¦ (where it was written correctly). So here in paragraph 60 we may also sa discriminating or who are critical-minded. It is contrasted with the worldly, ordinary people w much wisdom and who just accept things. Here ¡¥who resemble¡¦ should go. ¡¥Who have di something like that.

Bhagehi yuttatt?/bhagav? is according to the ordinary rules of grammar. A little further in p there is mention of iddhi (psychic powers). It says ¡¥minuteness, lightness, etc.¡¦ and then th 27. In that footnote other psychic powers are mentioned. Those are found in Yogabh?sya. S practice of samatha meditation, the jh?nas, and the psychic powers are not the sole property are shared by people of other religions too, especially Hindu yogis. So ¡¥minuteness¡¦, ¡¥ligh on are found in the book called ¡¥Yoga Sutra¡¦. They are explained in the Yogabh?sya. ¡¥Bh commentary. It is a commentary on the Yoga Sutra. If you have the book, you may read it.

¡§He has supreme lordship over his own mind either of the kind reckoned as mundane and minuteness, lightness, etc., or that complete in all aspects, and likewise the supramundane are the reasons the Buddha was called ¡¥bhagav?¡¦. He had the blessed qualities - dhamma and endeavor.

Then in paragraph 62 ¡§[He can also] be called ¡¥blessed (bhagav?)¡¦ when he can be cal what has been analyzed (vibhattav?)¡¦.¡¨ Instead of saying vibhattav?, we just say bhagav?.
¡¥vi¡¦ and then change ¡¥tta¡¦ to ¡¥ga¡¦ and so on.We may do anything we like if we have rec special grammatical rules.That is the way the Commentators explain if they want to play with know the legitimate grammatical rules.

He can also be called ¡¥bhagav?¡¦ because he is bhattav?. It is the same thing here.

The last one in paragraph 64 is very unusual. ¡§He [can also] be called ¡¥blessed (bhagav be called one who ¡¥has rejected going in the kinds of becoming (vantagamano bhavesu)¡¦.
¡¥bhavesu¡¦, ¡¥vanta¡¦, and ¡¥gamana¡¦. ¡§Because in the three kinds of becoming (That me kinds of existences) [bhava], the going [gamana] (In other words craving, it really means cra words, craving, has been rejected [vanta] by him.¡¨ ¡¥Vanta¡¦ really means vomitted. Buddha Buddha has vomitted craving for the three existences. That¡¦s why he is not going to be rebo

From these words some syllables are taken to form the word ¡¥bhagav?¡¦. Please look at From bhavesu we take only ¡¥bha¡¦. ¡¥Ga¡¦ comes from gamana and ¡¥va¡¦ from vanta. The letter ¡¥A¡¦ is made long, so that we do not have bhagava but bhagav?.

Then the Commentator shows us another word which is ¡¥known in the world¡¦. ¡§Make th just as is done in the world.¡¨ - that means as is done in the grammatical books with the wor ¡§Since ¡¥MEhanassa KHAssa m?L?¡¦ can be said¡¨ - mekhal? comes from mehanassa, kha mehanassa we take ¡¥me¡¦, and from khassa we take ¡¥kha¡¦ and from m?l? we take ¡¥l?¡¦.
is very strange. ¡¥Mekhal?¡¦ means a girdle or a belt.

It says in the footnote that ¡¥Mehana¡¦ is not in P.T.S. dictionary. The literal meaning of me private part, private organ. ¡¥Kha¡¦ means a place. ¡¥M?l?¡¦ means a garland. I think it is to private parts that they use the girdle. So it is called ¡¥mekhal?¡¦ in P??i or in Sanskrit. This w derived from mehanassa khassa m?l?. You just take one syllable from each word and form have mekhal?.

Now let us look at the enefits of the recollection of the attributes of the Buddha. ¡§As long meditator] recollects the special qualities of the Buddha in this way ¡¥For this reason the Ble accomplished..for this and this reason he is blessed¡¦, then on that occasion his mind is not greed, or obsessed by hatred, or obsessed by delusion.¡¨ When he is contemplating on the Buddha, there is no greed in his mind, there is no anger in his mind, there is no delusion in h mind has rectitude (That means his mind is straight.) on that occasion, being inspired by the ¡§So when he has supressed the hindrances by preventing obsession by greed, etc., and meditation subject with rectitude, then his applied thought (vitakka) and sustained thought (v with a tendency towards the Enlightened One¡¦s special qualities.¡¨ Vitakka takes the mind t qualities of the Enlightened One and so on.
This meditation cannot help us to get jh?na. You will not get jh?na by practicing this medita middle of paragraph 66 ¡§When he is blissful, his mind, with the Enlightened One¡¦s special object becomes concentrated.¡¨ So he gets good concentration dwelling on the attributes of ¡§And so the jh?na factors eventually arise in a single moment.¡¨ ¡¥Jh?na factors¡¦ really n vic?ra and so on, but they do not reach the stage of jh?na or they do not reach the stage of They reach the stage of neighborhood jh?na. There are two kinds of jh?nas or two kinds of neighborhood concentration and jh?na concentration.
Student: This sentence, ¡§But owing to the profundity of the Enlightened One¡¦s qualities, or his being occupied in recollecting special qualities¡¨ and so on - the one seems to say it may than jh?na and the other seems to say it is not as good as jh?na. Is that just the grasping mi measure? Is it just different?
Teacher: You know Buddha¡¦s qualities are profound. Buddha has many qualities. Even one to perceive, difficult to understand. When mind has to be occupied with such profound things strong enough concentration to get jh?na. Also there are many qualities. You have to go fro another. You have to take many objects as the object of meditation. There is not only one ob sort of distracted. Therefore you cannot get strong concentration to reach the jh?na stage.
Student: The first one seems a good reason to do it and the second one seems a hindrance seems you are distracted and in the first one it seems like it is even better than jh?na.
Teacher: That¡¦s right. It is better to be dwelling on the attributes of the Buddha than getting the first part - it is something like that. The second part says that if you have to take many qu don¡¦t get good concentration.
¡§When a bhikkhu is devoted to this recollection of the Buddha, he is respectful and defere the Master. He attains fullness of faith, mindfulness, understanding and merit. He has much gladness. He conquers fear and dread. He is able to endure pain. He comes to feel as if he Master¡¦s presence. And his body, when the recollection of the Buddha¡¦s special qualities d becomes as worthy of veneration as a shrine room.¡¨ I like that very much. So whenever peo me, I always think of the Buddha so that I become a shrine room or something like that. Whe Buddha, that means the Buddha dwells in your heart. So you are like a shrine room, you are is what I always do because if I am thinking of some other thing and people are paying resp bad thing for me. I am not worthy of accepting their respect if I am thinking of some other thi akusala. So I try to recollect the Buddha whenever people pay respect to me. That way my c I am sort of worthy of their respect because I am like a house where the Buddha dwells.

¡§His mind tends towards the plane of the Buddhas. When he encounters - Student: What does the ¡¥plane of the Buddhas¡¦ mean?

Teacher: It is just towards the Buddha. Sometimes the Commentators say Buddha bh|mi. Bh Actually that just means Buddha¡¦s attributes. His mind is inclined towards the Buddha and h Since he practices this meditation, his mind is naturally inclined towards these attributes.

¡§When he encounters an opportunity for transgression, he has awareness of conscience though he were face to face with the Master.¡¨ When such occasion arises, he would be ash because he always has the Buddha in mind, so he is as good as face to face with the Buddh

¡§And if he penetrates no higher (if he does not get any attainment), he is at least headed destiny.¡¨ That means he will be reborn in a happy rebirth as a human being or as a deva.

¡§Now when a man is truly wise,
His constant task will surely be
This recollection of the Buddha Blessed with such mighty potency.

This, firstly, is the section dealing with the Recollection of the Enlightened One in the detai explanation.¡¨ These are the nine or ten attributes or qualities of the Buddha.

The next ones are Recollection of the Dhamma and Recollection of the Sa~gha. I think tha very fast. There are six qualities of the Dhamma. The first one is ¡¥well-proclaimed¡¦.

In paragraph 70 I want to make some alteration. ¡§Also the entire Dhamma of the Dispens the scriptures here. ¡¥Dhamma of the Dispensation¡¦ is the scriptures.) is good in the beginn as one¡¦s own well-being.¡¨ It should be ¡§with virtue as its meaning¡¨.

Student: This passage is very famous.

Teacher: yes.

Student: Did it originate here or are they quoting from somewhere else?

Teacher: It is in the Suttas. References are given in paragraph 68 - Majjhima Nik?ya,1, 37, a Nik?ya, 3, 285. And there are many more places where you can find this.

¡§It is good in the middle with serenity and insight and with Path and Fruition. It is good in t Nibb?na.¡¨ and so on.

In paragraph 72 about the fifth line ¡¥with detail¡¦ is not correct. Here what the Commentat explaining is that the Buddha¡¦s teaching is with meaning (That means meaningful.) and also wording. It should not be ¡¥with detail¡¦. So Buddha¡¦s teachings, Buddha¡¦s utterances are b as well as in meaning.

I think he is confused with the word ¡¥anubya?jana¡¦ when Buddha said ¡§When you see s the sign of it, do not take the particulars, do not take the details.¡¨ For example when a monk especially a woman, he must not take the particulars.

Student: We might say ¡¥in meaning and presentation¡¦.
Teacher: That¡¦s good. I.B. Horner translates this as ¡¥spirit and letter¡¦. The meaning of spi different. When you say you follow the spirit of this rule, that is one thing. But here it just mea meaning, not necessarily the spirit. The meaning and the presentation of the words are wha Student: The style or how it is said.
Teacher: That¡¦s right. So all ¡¥with detail¡¦ needs to be changed to ¡¥with words¡¦ or ¡¥prese something. Buddha¡¦s teachings are with meaning and - Student: Elegance.
Teacher: Something like that. There are many ¡¥with details¡¦ in this paragraph.

Paragraph 76 ¡§Visible here and now¡¦ - did you really find that meaning in the explanatio ¡§Firstly the Noble Path is ¡¥visible here and now¡¦ since it can be seen by a Noble Person h has done away with greed, etc., in his own continuity according as it is said.¡¨ That means w Noble Person himself, seen by himself. Right? The P??i word means seen by himself, seen

Now the next meaning in paragraph 77. ¡§Furthermore, the ninefold supramundane Dham and now, since when any one has attained it, it is visible to him through reviewing knowledg having to rely on faith in another.¡¨ That also means seeing by himself. So there is no ¡¥visib now¡¦. The first meaning is what? Seeing by himself. And the second meaning is seeing by h explanation is just a little different.

Let us see the third meaning. ¡§Or alternatively, the view that is recommended is ¡¥proper conquers by means of proper view, thus it has proper view (in P??i sandi??hika).¡¨ We don¡ here and now¡¦, right? The third explanation is that Dhamma is called ¡¥sandi??hika¡¦ becau means of proper view.

What about the fourth one? Paragraph 79 ¡§Or alternatively, it is seeing (dassana) that is (di??ha); then di??ha and sandi??ha are identical in meaning as ¡¥seeing¡¦. It is worthy of b (di??ha), thus it is ¡¥sandi??hika¡¦.¡¨ Here also we actually do not have ¡¥here and now¡¦ in Visuddhi Magga. So I think it is confusing when you say ¡¥visible here and now¡¦. Four expla here, but in none of these do we find ¡¥visible here and now¡¦. We can take any one of thes cannot give all four at a time.

The next one is ¡¥not delayed¡¦. ¡§It has no delay in the matter of giving its own fruit, thus ¡¥without delay¡¦. ¡¥Without delay¡¦ is thesame as ¡¥not delayed¡¦. What is meant is that inst its fruit after creating a delay (using up time), say, five days, seven days, it gives its fruit imm next to its own occurrence.¡¨ You have to understand the supramundane thought process. T consciousness immediately follows the Path moment. The moments of Fruition consciousne Path consciousness. Path gives its Fruit immediately, not after some moments, not after thre five days. The Fruition consciousness must follow immediately Path consciousness. That is consciousness is called ¡¥ak?lika¡¦ (no time). ¡¥Ak?lika¡¦ means no time. There is no delay i It gives results instantly.

Student: This only applies to supramundane consciousness, not any other types of consciou Teacher: That¡¦s right. It applies only to Path.
Student: When you are listening to the Dhamma, you don¡¦t get fruit? Do you understand wh Teacher: Other dhammas no. For example in k?m?vacara kusala you do meritorious deeds in the next life, or after some years, or some months. So there is a delay in giving results in Student: There is always delay?
Teacher: Almost always. Actually we can say always. If you look at the thought process, the moments of javana. They are followed by tad?ramma?a or bhava~ga. Only after that will fru to come that quickly. Even then there is some delay. Mundane wholesome kamma gives res the supramundane. This is because supramundane Path is immediately followed by its Fruit Student: But the delay may be less than a finger-snap?
Teacher: That¡¦s right. Here we are speaking in terms of microseconds.

The next one is ¡¥inviting of inspection¡¦. That is ¡¥come and see¡¦.

The next one in paragraph 83 is ¡¥onward leading¡¦. That means worthy of inducing in one in one¡¦s continuity. Here it is said ¡§This applies to the [above-mentioned eight] formed sup states.¡¨ ¡¥Formed¡¦ means conditioned.

Chapter 8
(Tape 15 / Ps: 1-35)

The next meditation is mindfulness of death. Death is defined as the interruption of the life included within the limits of a single becoming or a single existence. It is one life - a human l animal life or whatever.

¡¥Interruption¡¦ really means cessation or being cut off. So it is stoppage or cessation of th faculty. You are familiar with the life faculty. It is j?vita. It is something which keeps our bodie and also there is life faculty of mind. So there are two life faculties - physical and mental.

The first definition is what is meant here. There are other kinds of death. ¡§But death as te (cutting off), in other words, the Arahant¡¦s termination of the suffering of the round, is not int here.¡¨ When an Arahant dies, he dies and there is no more rebirth for him. That kind of dea here.

¡§Nor is momentary death¡¨ - that means at every moment there is death. There is one mo then it dies and then there is another moment of thought and so on. We are dying and being moment. That kind of death is called ¡¥momentary death¡¦.

¡§In other words, the momentary dissolution of formations, nor the ¡¥death¡¦ of convention usage in such expressions as ¡¥dead tree¡¦, ¡¥dead metal¡¦ and so on (is not meant here).¡¨ Magga it actually says ¡§the iron is dead¡¨, not metal. It should be dead iron.

There is alchemy in the East as well as in the West. These people tried to do something to beneficial for people. There is a saying in Burmese ¡§If you can kill the iron, you can feed th country.¡¨ I don¡¦t know what that means. There is another saying ¡§If you can kill the iron, y lead into gold.¡¨ It is also said that you can cure diseases. They tried to burn these metals ar into ashes. Then they would mix them with honey and so on and treat people. Many people treat many kinds of diseases. So when we say ¡¥The iron is dead; the copper is dead.¡¨, we conventional usage. That kind of death is not meant here. What is meant here is just the end

¡§As intended here it is of two kinds, that is to say, timely death and untimely death. Herein death comes about with the exhaustion of merit, or with the exhaustion of a life span, or with death comes about through kamma that interrupts [other, life-producing] kamma.¡¨

¡¥Death through the exhaustion of merit¡¦ - that means death through the exhaustion of the Let us suppose that the life span is now one hundred years. However a person whose kamm hundred years may die before he reaches that age. He may die at the age of fifty, forty, or e he dies in that way, he is said to die through the exhaustion of merit or through the exhaustio of kamma. That is why many people die now before reaching the end of the life span.

Sometimes people have very strong kamma. Their kamma could make them live for one th hundreds of years. If they live at a time when humans only live for one hundred years, then the end of that life span. They may have kamma which can make them live for more than on since they are reborn at a time when people live for only one hundred years, they have to di one hundred years. That is called ¡¥exhaustion of a life span¡¦.

The death through the exhaustion of both is when a person has a kamma which will cause hundred years, and he is reborn at a time when people live for one hundred years, and he d one hundred years. That is death through both.

The last one is untimely death. That is mostly tragic death. ¡§Untimely death is a term for t those whose continuity is interrupted by kamma capable of causing them to fall (c?vana) fro that very moment, as in the case of D|si-M?ra, Kal?bur?j?, etc., or for the death of those wh continuity is interrupted by assaults with weapons, etc., due to previous kamma.¡¨

Sometimes people do a very heinous offense or crime like killing an Arahant. Such people immediately. Here the example of D|si-M?ra is given. He tried to kill Venerable S?riputta. Or S?riputta shaved his head. So his head was very smooth and shining. D|si-M?ra wanted to k the head. Venerable S?riputta was in jh?na, in sam?patti. Nothing happened to Venerable S that kamma D|si-M?ra died immediately.

Kal?bur?j? was a king who killed a sage who practiced patience. There was a sage named very famous and once he came to the city and sat in the garden or pleasure grove of the kin asleep. So his queens and concubines went to the hermit in order to listen to the Dhamma. up, he did not see his wives. So he looked around. When he reached the hermit, he asked ¡ sage replied ¡§I am a hermit.¡¨ The king asked ¡§What do you practice?¡¨ The sage replied ¡ patience.¡¨ The king asked ¡§What is patience?¡¨ The hermit said that it was having forbeara whatever people may do to you. Then the king said ¡§Let us see your patience.¡¨ He called had them cut off the hands of that sage. Then he asked him ¡§Are you still patient?¡¨ The sa ¡§Patience does not lie in the hands.¡¨ Then the king had the feet of the sage cut off and que again. The sage said he was not angry with him and that he was not upset. He said that pati king kicked him and went away. When the king went away, a general heard about what hap sage and asked him to be angry with the king. He said ¡§Please be angry with the king beca with the king you will suffer less.¡¨ The sage said ¡§People like me do not get angry. Let him Because of that offense the king was swallowed by the earth. He was consumed by the eart called ¡¥untimely death¡¦. They have past kamma and they have life span, but their crime is have to die. Sometimes they die in accidents. These are called ¡¥untimely death¡¦.

Student: About not getting angry, how would his kamma be less because somebody got ang

Teacher: It is like with regard to wholesome acts sewing seeds in a field which is fertile and which is not fertile. The effect or result of killing differs with the being who is killed. If the bein is killed is virtuous, there is more akusala. If the being that is killed is larger, then there is mo akusala and so on. There are variations in degree of offense with regard to the virtue of the killed and also whether there is more effort needed to kill. Killing an ant and killing an elepha the same; they do not have the same degree of akusala or unwholesomeness. To kill an ele much effort. The more effort there is, the more akusala there is.

Student: So what you are saying is the general misunderstood about this thing.

Teacher: No. The general did not misunderstand. The general wanted to make the offense l king. If the hermit becomes angry, he will be less virtuous.
Student: This is a funny example. This is different from Mah?yana. The Mah?yana approach and help the king. The sage should get angry. That is in a sense a play for virtue. If he wants punishment not to be so bad, he might get ¡¥angry¡¦, but it would not be out of actual anger.
Teacher: But when he gets angry, it will amount to breaking some vows or something. He m ¡§I will be patient whatever people do to me.¡¨ So he kept it until his death.
Student: You mentioned that some people may have the kamma to live for one thousand ye is only a hundred years. With the nine hundred years remaining do you have some kind of c Teacher: I wish we could. No. In order for kamma to ripen and give results we need different time for the ripening of the kamma, the place for the ripening of the kamma, the condition of the kamma and so on. When kamma gives results, it depends on these conditions.

Mahasi Say?daw in one of hi talks said ¡§I am afraid that many Burmese people will be rel States. Why? Because they do a lot of meritorious deeds, especially d?na. These meritoriou them great results. Burma is a poor country. So when the kamma is able to make him a billio not have enough.¡¨ It was something like that. In order for the kamma to give full results, it n conditions - favorable effort made by the person, then time, many things.
Student: Is it possible when a person dies young, that it is ever taken as a sign of good kam a more favorable rebirth having died young.
Teacher: To die young is the result of not so good kamma.
Student: Let us say their life is miserable. They are born in the ghetto, have disease, never h with the Dharma, and they die young. Then they might have a better chance in another envi Teacher: People are reborn as human beings as the result of wholesome kamma. This whol different capabilities, different abilities, different power. Some wholesome kamma can only g Other wholesome kamma may give twenty years, thirty years and so on. Whenever a perso being, he is said to be reborn as the result of good kamma. But that good kamma varies. Th die as the result of bad kamma, but as the result of good kamma that is not strong enough to longer.
Student: In other words children that die young do not have as much good kamma as some eighty five or ninety?
Teacher: That¡¦s right. The recollection on death I think is not so difficult. The Visuddhi Magg to reflect on death in different ways.

In paragraph 7 ¡§When some exercise it merely in this way (That means death will take pla come, I will die one day.), their hindrances get suppressed, their mindfulness becomes estab as its object, and the meditation subject reaches access.¡¨ Those are gifted people.

¡§But one who finds that it does not get so far should do his recollecting of death in eight w to say: (1) as having the appearance of a murderer, (2) as the ruin of success¡¨ - not the ¡¥ru but success and failure - ¡§(3) by comparison, (4) as to sharing the body with many (That me share our body with worms, insects, germs and all these things.) (5) as to the frailty of life, (6 signless, (7) as to limitedness of the extent, (8) as to the shortness of the moment.¡¨ We can death in different ways.

Towards the end of the recollection of death there is a large footnote discussing pa??atti. V it next week.

There are many examples given and we cannot go to every reference. In footnote 6 many
- Mah?sammata, Mandh?tu, Mah?sudassana, Da?hanemi, Nimi, Jotika, Ja?ila, Ugga and so mentioned are found mostly in J?taka tales and also in the Suttas. Then in paragraph 19 V? and so on are mostly taken from Hindu books. There is some kind of relationship between H Buddhist stories. Some Hindu stories are told as Buddhist stories in the J?takas. V?sudeva, Bh?masena, Yuddhi??hila and C??ura are mentioned in the J?takas, but I think they origina sources.

The main point here is that persons who are of great merit, who are of great strength, who supernormal powers and even the Buddha had to die. There is no point in saying we will not ourselves with these persons, we reflect on death, that death will come to us one day.

This recollection has to be done with wisdom, has to be done with understanding. Paragra exercises his attention unwisely in recollecting the [possible] death of an agreeable person, as in a mother on recollecting the death of her beloved child she bore; and gladness arises i the death of a disagreeable person, as in enemies on recollecting the death of their enemies urgency arises on recollecting the death of a neutral person, as happens in a corpse-burner body; and anxiety arises on recollecting one¡¦s own death, as happens in a timid person on with a poised dagger.¡¨

¡§In all that there is neither mindfulness nor sense of urgency nor knowledge. So he shoul there at beings that have been killed or have died, and advert to the death of beings already formerly seen enjoying good things, doing so with mindfulness, with a sense of urgency and after which he can exercise his attention in the way beginning '¡¥Death will take place'.¡¨ So practice this kind of meditation, you have to be very careful.

It is amazing that thinking of death makes you less afraid of death. Also the recollection on reduce to a very great degree your pride or attachment.

You may have experienced being very sick or very ill. You may have thought that you were that case you don¡¦t have any attachment, or any anger or whatever. You do not have any p are very humble. You are like an Arahant at that time because you don¡¦t want anything. You to anything at that time. So recollection on death is a very good weapon in fighting against a hatred, pride and others.

And when death really comes, you will be able to face it with more calmness than those w this kind of meditation. That is why the Buddha said that monks must practice this meditation must practice recollection of the Buddha, loving-kindness meditation, foulness of the body m recollection of death.

One thing I want to say in paragraph 35 it says ¡§As to the limitedness of the extent: the ex life is short now. One who lives long lives a hundred years, more or less.¡¨ What the Buddha ¡§One who lives long lives a hundred years, or a little more.¡¨ It is not ¡¥more or less¡¦. That live to be 120 years, 150 years, 160 years, not ¡¥more or less¡¦. So ¡§One who lives long live years, or a little more.¡¨ There are two sentences like that.

We will discuss pa??atti next week and go into the section on mindfulness of the body - up many pages.

S?dhu! S?dhu! S?dhu!

(Tape 16 / Ps: 36 -60)

Last week we came to the end of the section on the recollection of death: There is a footn of purification giving information about concept or pa??atti. It is in connection with the verses 39. The last verse reads:

¡§ No [world is] born if[consciousness is] not Produced; when that is present, then it lives;
When consciousness dissolves, the world is dead:
The highest sense this concept will allow,¡¨

Actually the last line means that here concept is virtually reality in the ultimate sense or in highest sense. The P??i words for this line is pa??atti paramatthiy?. That means here pa??a That is because when we say someone lives or someone dies we really are talking about co and disappearing. When we talk about consciousness, we are talking about an ultimate real virtually ultimate reality.

In connection with that the translator gives information about pa??atti or concept. He too information from the commentary on the Puggalapa??atti one of the books in Abhidhamma.
Abhidhamma. This Puggalapa??atti is one of them. It is the one book in Abhidhamma that d Abhidhamma. It is in fact taken from Sutta Pi?aka because it describes different types of bei types of human beings. The book is called Puggalapa??atti (Concept of Persons).

The word ¡¥pa??atti in P??i has two meanings. The first meaning is that which makes kno designates. That which makes known or that which designates is called ¡¥n?ma pa??atti¡¦. V ¡¥name-concept¡¦. That means the words which denote the things. The words denoting the t give to different things are called ¡¥n?ma pa??atti¡¦. This is because they make things know ¡§table¡¨, you know the thing, a table. When I say ¡§man¡¨, you know the being, man. The na are called ¡¥pa??atti¡¦ here.

The second meaning is that which is made known, that which is designated. That is called pa??atti¡¦, thing concept. So there are two kinds of concepts - name-concept and thing-conc the name ¡¥man¡¦ is the name-concept. The person, the man himself, is thing-concept. The designated by or made known by the word or the name ¡¥man¡¦. We can think of many exar say ¡¥car¡¦, the word ¡¥car¡¦ is name-concept and the thing which we call a car is thing-conc we are going to learn about name-concepts. In that book of Abhidhamma first the six kinds c designations are given.

The notes I have given you are the same as the small print in this book. It is difficult to rea print in this book. In order to facilitate reading I made these notes. They are not new.

There are concept of aggregates, concept of bases, concept of elements, concept of truth faculties and concept of persons. These are the six kinds of concepts dealt with in that book Puggalapa??attii.

The examples for concept of aggregates would be aggregate of matter, or aggregate of fe perception and so on. Examples for concept of bases would be eye-base, ear-base and so c of elements are eye-element, ear-element and so on. Concept of Truth is Noble Truth of Suf of Origin of Suffering and so on. Concept of faculties are exemplified by eye faculty, ear facu For the concept of persons there are many kinds of persons mentioned in that book. One wh defilements at appropriate times¡¦ is only one of them. There are different kinds of persons n book of Abhidhamma. These are the concepts according to the Texts.

Apart from the concepts mentioned in the Texts there are other kinds of concepts mention Commentaries. They are ¡¥concept of the existent¡¦, ¡¥concept of the non-existent¡¦, ¡¥conc non-existent by the existent¡¦, ¡¥concept of the existent by the non-existent¡¦, ¡¥concept of th the existent¡¦ and ¡¥concept of the non-existent by the non-existent¡¦. These six are importa are also mentioned in The Manual of Abhidhamma. In the eighth chapter of The Manual of A are given.

Here ¡¥existent¡¦ means something which has three phases of existence - arising, continui disappearing or dissolution. These three phases or these three submoments are called the c characteristics of all conditioned phenomena. Anything that is conditioned must have these t characteristics - arising, continuing for some time, and then disappearing. Anything that has phases of existence is called ¡¥existent¡¦. Anything that does not have these three phases is ¡¥non-existent¡¦.

According to the teachings of Abhidhamma only those that are mentioned in Abhidhamma mental states, material properties and Nibb?na are existent. The others are non-existent. So actually non-existent. Only the ultimate truths are existent.

So the concept of the existent is the name of something which is said to be existent. Kusa these are the terms for wholesome or unwholesome conscioousness. These names are the

The concept of the non-existent means names given to things or beings that are non-exist

Abhidhamma. A man, a woman, a house, a table, or whatever is supposed to be non-existe ultimate sense. This is because there is no woman apart from the aggregates, no man apart no house apart from the different parts like roof, walls, doors and so on. Therefore they are ¡¥non-existent¡¦. The name ¡¥woman¡¦, or the name ¡¥man¡¦, or the name ¡¥house¡¦ are the beings or the name of a non-existent thing.

Sometimes we combine these two, existent and non-existent. Then we get four more of th

The third is ¡¥the concept of the non-existent by the existent¡¦, concept of the non-existent what is existent. ¡¥One with the three clear visions¡¦ is an example. You must understand th ¡¥tivijj?¡¦. Here ¡¥one¡¦ is non-existent. The person is non-existent. ¡¥The three clear visions knowledge, in P??i abhi???. The three clear visions are existent because they are ???a, on states. This is a concept or designation of the non-existent by the existent.

The next one is the designation of the existent by the non-existent. ¡¥Form of a female¡¦ is ¡¥Form¡¦ means r|pa here, not a shape or something. R|pa is existent because it has its own existence - arising, continuing and disappearing. ¡¥Female¡¦ or ¡¥woman¡¦ is non-existent. T a female¡¦, this name, this designation is a designation of the existent by the non-existent.

The next one is the concept of the existent by the existent. Both must be found in the Abhi Eye-contact is the example. ¡¥Eye¡¦ here means the eye sensitivity. It is among the 28 mate is existent. Contact (phassa) is one of the 52 mental states. So it is existent. Eye-contact is the existent by the existent.

The last one is the concept of the non-existent by the non-existent. Both must be non-exis ultimate reality. A banker¡¦s sone is the example. A son is non-existent and a banker is also This is the designation of the non-existent by the non-existent. These are the six kinds of co in the Commentaries.

You can give other examples following these. For the non-existent there are a car, a house kettle. For the non-existent by the existent there are one with clear vision, one with attachme anger. For the existent by the non-existent we have form of a female. The first must be exist non-existent.

Student: A cup of tea.

Teacher: No.

Student: A monk¡¦s kusala

Teacher: Right. A monk¡¦s kusala, a monk¡¦s akusala, a monk¡¦s voice you could say. Voice material properties. For the next one, eye-contact you can substitute some other thing like e Eye is existent and consciousness is also existent. The last one, banker¡¦s son is non-existe non-existent.

Student: (inaudible) Bumper-sticker.

Teacher: Right. This is the set of six concepts mentioned in the Commentaries. Other lists o also given. There are concepts according to teachers. They are not even found in the Comm are mentioned by teachers. There are two sets with six in each set.

One is derivative concept. That means depending upon something a name is given. For ex ¡¥being¡¦ is given depending upon the combination of five aggregates. The name ¡¥chariot¡¦ upon the combination of various parts. Such concepts are called derivative concepts.

The second one is appositional concept. It has sub-divisions. They are given at the end of will go to them later. ¡¥Second¡¦ and ¡¥third¡¦ are the examples. When we say that this is sec other is third. When we say that this other is third, then the next one is fourth and so on. Tha appositional concept.

Then we have collective concept. Examples are ¡¥eight-footed¡¦, ¡¥pile of riches¡¦. These a collective things.

The fourth one is additive concept. That means adding one more. The example ¡¥two, thre There should be no ¡¥one¡¦ in the footnote because there is nothing added there. From two adding, so two, three, four. In the Commentary also it is given as ¡¥two, three, four¡¦.

Then there is verisimilar concept. That means the names of those things that are taught in things as earth-element, water-element, consciousness, mental factors are all examples of t concept.

The sixth one is continuity concept. That is the name given depending upon the continuity Examples are octagenerarian and nonagenerarian (an eighty year old man, a ninety year old

There is another set of six according to teachers. There are two sets of concepts accordin

The first one of the second set is concept according to function. Examples of preacher and are given. They are names given depending upon the function done by that person.

The next one is concept according to shape or form. Such things as thin man, round man, are examples.

The next one is concept according to gender. A man, a woman are concepts according to

The fourth one is concept according to location. That is of sense-sphere. This citta belongs sense-sphere. This citta belongs to r|p?vacara sense-sphere. Or we have ¡¥Kosalan¡¦. Kosa Kosala. Kosala is the name of a place. So we can put here ¡¥American¡¦.

Then there is concept as Proper name. That is one¡¦s own name. The examples are all na N?ma, Sumana. So you can put any name you like, your own name there.

The last one is the concept of the unconditioned. That is the name of things that are not co Examples are cessation and Nibb?na.

The appositional concept is sub-divided into eight. Maybe we can add many more. The firs of reference. That is like with reference to the second the other is called the third. Then we h short. That means for example that one foot is long compared to six inches. One foot is shor feet and so on. This is called apposition of reference.

The second one is apposition of what is in the hand. If you have an umbrella in the hand, y the man with umbrella-in-hand¡¦. If you have a kettle in your hand, then you are ¡¥the perso kettle-in-your-hand¡¦ and so on.

Then there is apposition of association. The example is ¡¥earring-wearer¡¦ or jacket-weare anything.

Then there is apposition proximity with the example of ¡¥Indas?la Cave¡¦. ¡¥Indas?la is the So ¡¥Indas?la Cave¡¦ means a cave near that tree. A tree cannot be a cave and a cave cann ¡¥Indas?la Cave¡¦ means a cave close to the Indas?la tree. Here we might say ¡¥Redwood C

Next there is apposition of comparison. ¡¥Comparison¡¦ really means similarity here. The e colored¡¦. ¡¥Gold colored¡¦ means with color similar to that of gold.

Then there is apposition of majority. We have the example of lotus pond. There may be so the pond. Since most of them are lotus, we say lotus pond. We say ¡§the United States of A Asians now in this country, but we still call the country ¡¥America¡¦. In the books it is said ¡¥B Village¡¦, the village of brahmanas. In the village there are mostly brahmanas, but there are too.

Finally we have apposition of distinction. That means something special about that thing. F the example. In the book it says ¡§diamond ring¡¨, but the P??i word means bracelet, not a r bracelet¡¦ is correct.

In the notes in footnote 11 there is some problem with the translation. For apposition of ma example of Padumassara-Brahman Village is given. ¡¥Padumassara¡¦ is one word and ¡¥Bra
They are not one word. They are two words. ¡¥Padumassara¡¦ means lotus pond. ¡¥Brahma Village. There are two examples, not one. He misunderstands this.

These are the different kinds of concepts taught in the Texts, Commentaries and also taug teachers. According to the teachings of Abhidhamma concepts do not have the three phase cannot say that a concept has time. It has no existence or no reality. It exists only in our min

It might be similar to chemists saying that there is no such thing as water apart from the tw combined together. In the sense of chemistry there is no water but just oxygen and hydroge concept. Hydrogen and oxygen are ultimate realities according to chemistry. According to ch no existence of its own. It is just a combination of two elements. In the same way a man or a real existence. They exist only in the minds of people.

In footnote 12 it says ¡§A concept is a dhamma without individual essence.¡¨ We cannot sa has this individual essence, this characteristic, or that individual essence, that characteristic just concepts. They just exist in our minds. They are not ultimate reality. These are the conc

We have to understand two kinds of truths - conventional truth and the ultimate truth. On th level we use words denoting concepts like man, woman, table, house. On the ultimate level consciousness, contact, feeling and so on. There are these two kinds of truth, conventional truth. ¡¥Conventional truth¡¦ is called pa??atti in P??i. It has many divisions. Name-concept a thing-concept are the primary divisions. Everything we see around us, including ourselves, is things with which we and other things are composed, the things with which we are made, ar truths. The five aggregates are ultimate truth, but a man or a woman is not ultimate reality, b truth. These are the different kinds of concepts taught in Abhidhamma.

Student: How many more concepts of the unconditioned could there be? There aren¡¦t very Teacher: Cessation, Nibb?na, deathless - anything which denotes Nibb?na. We have to unc unconditioned and the supramundane are different. There are types of consciousness belon supramundane level such as Path consciousness and Fruition consciousness. Although the are still conditioned. They need conditions to arise. They are not unconditioned although the unconditioned as object, the unconditioned which is Nibb?na as object. So if we want to give examples, we have to find some more names for Nibb?na, things like extinction of suffering, cankers, things like that.

Now we go to the next section, mindfulness occupied with the body. It begins with a quota Suttas where Buddha praised the practice of mindfulness occupied with the body or mindful ¡§Bhikkhus, when one thing is developed and repeatedly practiced, it leads to a supreme se supreme benefit, to supreme surcease of bondage, to supreme mindfulness and full-awaren knowledge and vision, to a happy life here and now, to realization of the Fruit of clear vision deliverance. What is that one thing? It is mindfulness occupied with the body.¡¨

Then there is a quote from another Sutta. ¡§Bhikkhus, they savor the deathless who savor occupied with the body; they do not savor the deathless who do not savor mindfulness occu

What this actually means is that when people practice mindfulness occupied with the body at just mindfulness occupied with the body. After practicing mindfulness occupied with the b vipassan?. That is why they are said to savor the deathless or Nibb?na.

¡§They have savored the deathless who have savored mindfulness occupied with the body savored.. They have neglected.. They have not neglected.. They have missed.. They have f have found mindfulness occupied with the body. And it has been described in fourteen secti beginning ¡¥And how developed, bhikkhu, how repeatedly practiced is mindfulness occupied great fruit, of great benefit? Here, bhikkhus, a bhikkhu, gone to the forest¡¦..¡¨ and so on.

These are the utterances of the Buddha in praise of mindfulness of the body. We are not t only mindfulness of the body is the best. There are different kinds of meditation.We have co kinds of meditation. Any meditation if we practice properly will lead to the attainment of the c the attainment of Nibb?na.

If we pick up only this statement, we may want to say that only mindfulness of the body is practice, not other kinds of meditation because here the Buddha said that those that savor m body savor the deathless. In fact every kind of meditation, even samatha meditation when m vipassan?, can help people get enlightenment. Any kind of meditation is good for practice.

Mindfulness occupied with the body is described in fourteen sections in the Mah? Satipa? are four foundations of mindfulness. They are contemplation of the body, contemplation of fe contemplation of consciousness, and contemplation of dhamma objects.

Contemplation of the body is described in fourteen sections in the Mah? Satipa??h?na Su could be called mindfulness occupied with the body. Some sections or some meditationss h For example there is breathing meditation. This section of the Sutta is called ¡¥breathing me P??i ¡¥?n?p?nasati¡¦ meditation. We don¡¦t call it ¡¥k?yag?tasati¡¦ which is the original word occupied with the body. Mindfulness of the body covers all these fourteen sections - breathi the body, small activities of the body, 32 parts of the body (We are going to study them.), fou nine cemetery meditations. They are all described under the heading of mindfulness of the b

¡§And it has been described in fourteen sections in the passage beginning ¡¥And how dev repeatedly practiced is mindfulness occupied with the body of great fruit, of great benefit?¡¦¡¨ given is the Majjhima Nik?ya (Middle Length Sayings). The Mah? Satipa??h?na Sutta can b collections, in the Collection of Long Suttas and in the Collection of Middle Length Suttas. Th Discourse on the Foundations of Mindfulness appeared twice in the Tipi?aka.

There are ¡§that is to say, the sections on breathing, on postures, on the four kinds of full-a attention directed to repulsiveness (This is the 32 parts of the body.), on attention directed to (four great elements), and on the nine charnel-ground contemplations.¡¨

¡§Herein, the three, that is to say, the sections on postures, on the four kinds of full-awaren attention directed to elements, as they are stated [in that Sutta], deal with insight.¡¨ They dea vipassan? meditation, the section on postures, the section on four kinds of full-awareness, a attention to elements.

¡§Then the nine sections on that charnel-ground contemplations, as stated there, deal with phase of insight knowledge called Contemplation of Danger.¡¨ Actually I would say ¡§Conter Faults¡¨, not necessarily danger. When we practice the charnel-ground meditation, we find fa bodies. We might have thought of our bodies as beautiful, as pretty, as desirable. When we of meditation, we find fault with our bodies. The body is just a group of filthy things that have together. It is something like that. So it deals with insight knowledge. In the beginning it may meditation, but ultimately it becomes vipassan?.

¡§And any development of concentration in the bloated,etc., that might be implied there ha explained in the Description of Foulness(Ch.VI). So there are only the two that is, the section and on directing attention to repulsiveness, that, as stated there, deal with concentration (¡¥ here means samatha meditation.).¡¨ According to this the sections on breathing meditation a meditation are samatha meditation. They are treated as samatha meditation in the Visuddhi two, the section on breathing is a separate meditation subject, namely Mindfulness of Breath come later.

¡§What is intended here as Mindfulness Occupied with the Body is the 32 aspects.¡¨ Accor meditation there are 32 parts. We human beings are made up of 32 parts. When we practice try to see these 32 parts as repulsive and so on. That is to get rid of attachment to our bodie rid of attachment to the bodies of other people as well.

The 32 parts of the body are given here. ¡§Again, bhikkhus, a bhikkhu reviews this body, u of the feet and down from the top of the hair and contained in the skin as full of many kinds o
In this body there are head hairs, body hairs, nails, teeth, skin, flesh, sinews, bones, bone-m heart, liver, midriff, spleen, lights, bowels, entrails, gorge, dung, bile, phlegm, pus, blood, sw tears, grease, spittle, snot, oil of the joints, and urine, the brain being included in the bone-m this version [with a total of only 31 aspects].¡¨ In the Texts only 31 parts are mentioned, not 3 familiar with. The one which is missing in the Texts is mentioned in a book which is called Pa That book is said to have been preached by Venerable S?riputta, not by the Buddha. It was Venerable S?riputta.

In our countries they are included in our Canon. They are treated as the Texts themselves people, Western critics, wanted to keep those out of the P??i Canon - The Questions of Mil Pa?isambhid?magga and there is another book called Mah? Niddesa. They are called post-scriptures. But in our countries we just include them with the Texts because we believe they during the time of the Buddha and that Buddha accepted them as authentic. So they are as the Buddha. We just regard them as belonging to the category of Texts.

Student: There are also 32 marks of the Buddha?

Teacher: Yes.

Student: They are not at all comparable to these things?

Teacher: Oh, no. Those marks are the marks of an extraordinary man. By those marks the s conclusion that the child was going to be a Buddha or a universal monarch. It is said that the mentioned in the books long before the Buddha came into the world. So they appeared in th or even before that. They just took from the books and incorporated into the Texts.

These parts are for foulness meditation. They are different. So all the filthy parts of the bod here - head hairs, body hairs, and so on.

The brain is not mentioned by the Buddha among the parts of the body. However it is men Pa?isambhid?magga. The Commentaries and teachers of old include it in the parts of the bo brain after dung and before bile. They put the brain between dung and bile.

In some Suttas these 32 parts or 31 parts are treated as elements. The first 20 through du said to belong to earth element. They have more earth element than other elements. The re to belong to water element - bile, phlegm, pus and so on. If we practice as element meditatio at them as these belonging to earth element and those belonging to water element.

Student: What are ¡¥lights¡¦?

Teacher: It is difficult to say because these are something like anatomical terms. We will con don¡¦t know. We will find out later. Other authors will have a different translation of this. (Late determmined they were the lungs.) It is an internal part of the body. We take it as 32 parts o although only 31 are mentioned in the Suttas. So let us accept 32 parts of the body as a sta

Now let us look at the word commentary. ¡§This body: this filthy body constructed out of th elements. Up from the soles of the feet: from the soles of the feet upwards. Down from the t from the highest part of the hair downwards. Contained in the skin: terminated all round by t Reviews.. as full of many kinds of filth: he sees that this body is packed with the filth of vario beginning with head hairs. How? In this body there are head hairs¡¨ and so on. This kind of taught at every monastery. The novices are taught to recite these 32 parts again and again.

¡§Herein, there are means, there are found. In this: in this, which is expressed thus ¡¥Up f of the feet and down from the top of the hair and contained in the skin, as full of many kinds the carcass; for it is the carcass that is called ¡¥body (k?ya)¡¦ because it is a conglomeration because such vile (kucchita) things as the head hairs, etc., and the hundred diseases begin disease, have it as their origin (?ya).¡¨ ¡¥Carcass, is it a dead body?

Student: Usually, but not necessarily.
Teacher: Here it does not mean a dead body. It is just a body here, not necessarily a dead b Students: It is something that a vulture or a bird of prey would eat. It could be just a skeleton Teacher: Here it is just the body. Maybe English has no other word for the body. In P??i the and k?ya is defined by another word ¡¥sar?ra¡¦. Sar?ra is a synonym for k?ya in P??i. There word for body in English. Although the word ¡¥carcass¡¦ is used, we should understand that body. We try to see in our living body head hairs, body hairs and so on. We try to see the re these things because such vile things as the head hairs, the hundred diseases beginning wi it as their origin.

The word ¡¥k?ya¡¦ is explained as being a compound word, ¡¥ku¡¦ plus ¡¥?ya¡¦. ¡¥Ku¡¦ plus k?ya according to P??i grammar. ¡¥Ku¡¦ here means vile or despicable. ¡¥?ya¡¦ means place place of head hairs, the hundred diseases and so on. That is why the body is called ¡¥k?ya¡ the explanation of the word.

¡§No one who searches throughout the whole of this fathom-long carcass, starting upward the feet, starting downwards from the top of the head, and starting from the skin all around, the minutest atom at all beautiful in it, such as a pearl, or a gem, or beryl, or aloes, or saffron various malodorous, offensive, drab-looking sort of filth consisting of head hairs, body hairs

When you want to practice this kind of meditation, the first thing you have to do is recite. Y the sevenfold skill in learning the meditation subject. They are 1. Verbal recitation 2. Mental As to color 4. As to shape 5. As to direction 6. As to location 7. As to delimitation. You must these with respect to the 32 parts..

First you learn these words - head hairs, body hairs, nails, teeth, skin, sinews and so on b Student: I found the definition of carcass here. The first definition is the dead body of an ani second definition is the living body of a human being.
Teacher: That is what we mean here, the second meaning..

So the first thing we have to do is recite. ¡§Even if one is master of the Tipi?aka, the verba should still be done at the time of first giving it attention.¡¨ Even though you are well familiar three Pi?akas, you must do the recitation.

¡§For the meditation subject only becomes evident to some through recitation, as it did to who learned the meditation subject from the Elder Mah?deva of the Hill Country (Malaya). C the 32 aspects, saying, ¡¥Do only this recitation for four months¡¦.¡¨ You recite 32 parts for fo

¡§Although they were familiar respectively with two and three Pi?akas¡¨ - that means they and three Pi?akas. So they are learned persons. But this monk, this elder, is telling them to parts. Actually they must have already learned these 32 parts, but they accept his advice. ¡§ were familiar respectively with two and three Pi?akas, it was only at the end of four months r meditation subject that they became Stream Enterers.¡¨ Actually it means they became Stre reciting the 32 parts.

They became Stream Enterers not just by recitation. First they did the recitation. Then they part as foul or loathsome. Then they develop vipassan? on it. Without vipassan? there can b Although it would appear here that they just recite and become Sot?pannas, that is not the c months they recite this back and forth, back and forth. Then they got the counterpart sign an they became Sot?pannas after practicing vipassan? on it. Without vipassan? there can be n

¡§With right apprehension [of the text]¡¨ - that is not the translation of the P??i word. The P padakkhi?agg?hit?. That means ¡¥since they take advice with respect¡¦. ¡¥Padakkhi?agg?hi respect¡¦. These two were learned monks. But when the teacher told them ¡§You recite the 3 months.¡¨, they did not say that they had already learned it or that they did not need to recite too much respect for the teacher to refuse. So following with respect the advice of the teach for four months and during that time they became Stream Enterers.¡¨ ¡¥With right apprehens is not the right translation of the P??i word.

¡§Now when he does the recitation, he should divide it up into the ¡¥skin pentad¡¦, etc., an and backwards.¡¨ You may look at the notes. It took me one and a half hours to type these.

The first part is the 32 parts. Head hairs, body hairs, nails, teeth and skin are the skin pent they are the five ending with skin. The next one is flesh, sinews, bones, bone marrow and ki five ending with kidney. Then there are the five ending with lungs. After that there are the fiv the brain. And then there are six ending with fat. The last is six ending with urine. The 32 pa into groups of five, five, five, five, six and six. Recitation should be done this way.

There is another book, another Commentary written by the same author. It is the Commen book of Abhidhamma. In the second book of Abhidhamma there is mention of the four found These are mentioned there too.

The recitation I give on these notes are the combination of the statements found in two Co
The Path of Purification and the Sammohavinosan?. In The Path of Purification there is no m days you are to recite each group, not how to recite forward and backwards, and so on. The the method is given. So I combined these two into one.

It will take how many days? 165 days to recite. So you have to spend five and a half month verbally. This meditation will take a long time.

For the first one we say ¡§Head hairs, body hairs, nails, teeth, skin.¡¨ Forward this way you five days. ¡§Head hairs, body hairs, nails, teeth, skin¡¨ you say thousands and thousands of

Then the next five days you go backwards. You say ¡§Skin, teeth, nails, body hairs, head h teeth, nails, body hairs, head hairs.¡¨

Student: Just verbal recitation?

Teacher: Yes, just verbal recitation. But when you recite the verbal recitation, you also must meaning of the words. That meaning must soak into your mind. Next will come mental recita recitation alone will take 165 days.

Then you must go forward and backwards. That is you say ¡§Head hairs, body hairs, nails teeth, nails, body hairs, head hairs.¡¨ You go back and forth , back and forth for five days. Th will take 15 days.

Then the next pentad is the kidney pentad. Then you say ¡§Flesh, sinews, bones, bone ma forward for five days. However when you say backwards, you say not only these five, but the well. Backwards for the kidney pentad is ¡§Kidney, bone marrow, bones, sinews, flesh, skin, hairs, head hairs.¡¨ If you look at the notes, I put numbers because it is very boring to type th again and again, even the numbers. The kidney pentad for the last five days is ¡§6,7,8,9,10, 5, 4, 3, 2, 1.¡¨

Then after these two pentads you combine the two pentads and recite them for 15 days. F days you recite 1,2,3,4,5,6,7,8,,9,10. That is forward. For the second five days you recite ba 10,9,8,7,6,,4,3,2,1. For the last five days you recite forward and backward 1,2,3,4,5,6,7,8,9, 10,9,8,7,6,5,4,3,2,1. That is 15 days.

Then the next pentad you recite 11,12,13,14,15 for the first five days. Then backward you one. So for five days you recite 15.14,13,12,11,10, 9,8,7,6,5,4,3,2,1. For the third five days y forward and backward.

After each pentad you combine with the previous pentads. So you combine two pentads, t pentads, five groups together, and six groups together. If you do it this way, it will take 165 d Student: You do this the whole day?

Teacher: That is a good question. Most of the day. If you are a monk, you have to go out for can do mental recitation. Monks are taught or instructed to go with meditation when they go village or in the city. If a monk goes without meditation, he is not supposed to be a practicing to the village or the city with some kind of meditation. Sometimes you may be practicing min sometimes this kind of meditation. So you practice almost the whole day because this is inte is not just saying for a few minutes and then giving up.

This is how to do verbal recitation. ¡§The recitation should be done verbally in this way a h a thousand times, even a hundred thousand times. For it is through verbal recitation that the subject becomes familiar (If you spend 165 days, it cannot but become familiar.), and the mi prevented from runnign here and there , the parts become evident and seem like [the finger clasped hands, like a row of fence posts.¡¨

¡§The mental recitation should be done just as it is done verbally. For the verbal recitation condition for the mental recitation, and the mental recitation is a condition for the penetration characteristic [of foulness].¡¨ When you recite it again and again, the sign of foulness will be your mind.

Thenou have to review them as to color. ¡§The color of the head hairs, etc., should be defi black or in this country blond, brunette, and red also.

Student: And lately green.

Teacher: Yes, now you can get any color.

Then ¡§As to shape: their shape should be defined too.¡¨ They will be explained later in de

¡§As to direction: in this body, upwards from the navel is the upward direction (upper part o and downwards from it is the downward direction (lower part of the body).¡¨ The navel is sup middle of the body. ¡§So the direction should be defined thus: This part is in this direction.¡¨

¡§As to location (That is their place.): the location of this or that part should be defined thus part is establishedin this location.¡¨

¡§As to delimitation: there are two kinds of delimitation, that is, delimitation of the similar an delimitation of the dissimilar. Herein, delimitation of the similar should be understood in this w part is delimited above and below and around by this.¡¨ This is called ¡¥delimitation of the sim like saying this cup is delimited by the kettle on this side and it is delimited on the other side microphone. It is something like that. That is called ¡¥delimitation of the similar¡¦. Delimitation dissimilar is as an example : This is head hair and not body hair. And when you come to bod body hair, not head hair. Delimiting in that way is called ¡¥delimitation of the dissimilar¡¦.

¡¥Dissimilar¡¦ here just means ¡¥not similar¡¦. It does not mean opposite. ¡§Delimitation of should be understood as non-intermixed-ness in this way: Head hairs are not body hairs, an head hairs.¡¨

¡§When the teacher tells the skill in learning in seven ways thus, he should do so knowing Suttas this meditation subject is expounded from the point of view of repusiveness and in ce the point of view of elements. For in the Mah? Satipa??h?na Sutta it is expounded only as re These 32 parts of the body meditation are given there to develop the sense of repulsiveness

¡§In the Mah? Hatthipadopama Sutta (M.Sutta 28), in the Mah? R?hulov?da Sutta (M.Sutt Dh?tuvibha~ga (M.Sutta, also Vbh.82) it is expounded as elements.¡¨ They are divided into actually. The first twenty belong to the earth element and the remaining ones belong to the w With regard to elements they are mentioned there.

¡§in the K?yagat?sati Sutta (M.Sutta 119), however, four jh?nas are expounded with refere it has appeared as a color [kasi?a].¡¨ Now when you practice the 32 parts of the body medita get second jh?na and so on. You can get only first jh?na. But in the Sutta four jh?nas are me jh?nas are mentioned because for that monk these parts appear as color, not as parts of the appear to him as color, he picks up the color kasi?a meditation. Color kasi?a meditation can or five jh?nas. That is why it is said here ¡§four jh?nas are expounded with reference to one appeared as a color [kasi?a].¡¨

In some of the meditations it says you are not to pay attention to color, right? If you pay att color, it becomes color kasi?a meditation.

¡§Herein, it is an insight meditation subject that is expounded as elements and a serenity m subject that is expounded as repulsiveness.¡¨ It is an insight meditation subject that is expou elements; if we divide them into two kinds of elements and we try to contemplate on those e insight meditation. It is a serenity meditation that is expounded as repulsiveness. When you repulsiveness of these things, it is samatha meditation.

¡§Consequently it is only the serenity meditation subject [that is relevent] here.¡¨ In this pa book only samatha meditation is mentioned. We should understand the meditation here as s meditation.

Next we have the tenfold skill in giving attention. I think we will do it next week. We will go mindfulness of breathing.

Student: In the Chinese tradition there are these gems that are found with the bodies that ha Is there anything like that in Therav?da? They are often considered like relics or jewels. I do about it.

Teacher: In Burma the ashes are collected and put into a stupa or cetiya.

Student: Sometimes in the ashes there is a hard gem-like substance.

Teacher: In Therav?da only the Arahants when they are cremated may leave relics. They ar seeds. It is said that the relics of Arahants are bigger in size than the relics of the Buddha.Th the Buddha are in three sizes - like mustard seeds, like broken rice, and the size of peas. Th sizes of the relics of the Buddha. The relics of the Arahants are said to be larger in size than the Buddha.

S?dhu! S?dhu! S?dhu!

(Tape 17 / Ps: 61 - 144)

Today we begin with the tenfold skill in giving attention. The first set of instructions is recita First we are to do verbal recitation and then mental recitation. Then we are to view them as shape, as to direction, as to location, as to delimitation. These are called ¡¥the sevenfold ski learning¡¦. First we have to learn the meditation subject.

Now comes the tenfold skill in giving attention. The tenfold skill in giving attention is: 1. Fol order, 2. Not too quickly, 3. Not too slowly, 4. Warding off distraction, 5. Surmounting the co Successive learning, 7. Absorption, 8-10. The three Discourses or three Suttantas.

First following the order - ¡§From the time of beginning the recitation attention should be g the serial order without skipping.¡¨ You must go from 1 to 32 and then back from 32 to 1. Yo any one of them when you recite.

The second is that when you recite you are not to do too quickly. When you do it too quick remember them. ¡§For just as when a man sets out on a three-league journey, even if he ha journey out and back a hundred times rapidly without taking note of [turnings] to be taken ar he may finish his journey, he still has to ask how to get there.¡¨ We may go to a place many not know how to go there especially when we are not driving. So you are not to go too quick remember all of them.

The third is to recite not too slowly. If you do it too slowly, you will not come to the end of t recitation, just like a man ¡§who loiters along the way among trees, rocks, pools, etc., does n journey in a day. So too if the meditator gives his attention to the meditation subject too slow not get to the end and it does not get to the end and it does not become a condition for distin ¡¥Condition for distinction¡¦ means condition for progress. ¡¥Distinction¡¦ here means progres including the realization of truth.

The P??i word is ¡¥visesa¡¦. This word is used many times with regard to meditation. It me or something special. That means when we practice meditation, we discover one thing after discoveries are called ¡¥visesa¡¦ or special. Before we practiced meditation, we did not know or the parts of the body. After we practice meditation, we get sam?dhi or concentration. And see things differently from when we did not meditate. These things are called ¡¥distinctions¡¦ attainments¡¦. This word will appear again and again in this book. Here it is translated as dis

Then we have warding off distraction. ¡§He must ward off [temptation] to drop the meditati let his mind get distracted among the variety of external objects.¡¨ So he must pay attention the body and not let his mind be distracted to other objects. When the mind is often distracte will not get to the stage of realization. Here it is compared to a man going on a one-foot-wide must be very careful and he must not be distracted because if he is distracted, he will fall do cliff and he may die. ¡§So he should give his attention to warding off distraction.¡¨

¡§As to surmounting the concept: this [name] concept beginning with ¡¥head hairs, body h surmounted and consciousness established on [the aspect] ¡¥repulsive¡¦.¡¨ In the beginning concepts because we live in the conventional world. So we have to use conventional terms hair and so on. In the beginning we will be seeing the hair, nails, teeth, skin which are called But we have to surmount, we have to go beyond the convention, beyond the concepts. If we hairs, body hairs, nails, teeth, skin and so on, if we just see the picture or the appearance of we will not get the notion that the are repulsive. The purpose of this meditation is to arouse of these parts. So we have to go beyond the concept of head hairs, body hairs and so on. W to meditate and after some time gets enough concentration, he will be able to surmount the establish his mind on the repulsiveness of these parts. We have to arrive at the repulsivenes not just stopping at the parts. It is not merely learning these parts, but trying to see repulsive these parts. It is not like medical students.

Then the next one is successive leaving. ¡§In giving his attention he should eventually leav [parts] that do not appear to him.¡¨ That means that do not appear to his mind clearly, that w see clearly in his mind. Although the meditator tries to see all of them clearly, some parts ma to him or he may not see clearly some parts. In giving his attention he should eventually leav that do not appear to him clearly.

¡§For when a beginner gives his attention to head hairs, his attention then carries on until the last part.¡¨ Because he is familiar with these 32 parts (he recites and pays attention.), the goes to the end and then goes back and forth. But some parts may not appear to his mind c drop those which do not appear clearly in his mind. He must take only those that are clear to called ¡¥successive leaving¡¦. So he leaves one after the other until he arrives at the last one

¡§As he persists in giving attention thus, some parts appear to him and others do not. The on those that have appeared till one out of any two appears the clearer.¡¨ He drops them, or there are only two left which are the most clear for him. Then he tries to find out which is cle these two. He should arouse absorption by again and again giving attention to the one that thus.¡¨ Eventually he ends with one part which is the most clear for him.

Then a simile is given here with 32 palms, a monkey and so on. Also another simile is give 70. A monk goes on almsround where there are 32 families or 32 houses. ¡¥Alms-food-eate goes on almsround. Most monks in the olden days and even now go for alms every morning called ¡¥alms-food-eater¡¦. Actually whether a monk eats food brought by his devotees at the he goes to the village and collects alms, he eats alms-food. Every monk is an alms-food-eat ¡¥alms-food-eater¡¦ really means a monk who goes out for alms.

I do not want to use the word ¡¥beg¡¦ because monks do not beg. The P??i word ¡¥bhikkh begs. Here ¡¥begging¡¦ means going round the village silently. Whatever is given to the mon
He does not say ¡§Please give me food.¡¨ or something like that. Monks are not allowed to d ¡¥alms-food-eater¡¦ means a monk who goes for alms in the village every day.

So he might go to a village with 32 families. He might pick up two lots of alms at the first h will drop one house. If he gets three lots at one house, then he will drop two houses and so day he got his bowl full at the first house. Therefore he will not go any further. He will go to t hall and eat. That is the simile. In the same way the meditator must go through the 32 parts one the parts that are not clear to him.

In paragraph 71 we have the application of this simile. ¡§The 32 aspects are like the villag families. The meditator is like the alms-food-eater. The meditator¡¦s preliminary work is like t alms-food-eater¡¦s going to live near the village.¡¨ Actually it should be ¡§living near the villag ¡§living depending on the village.¡¨

How do you say that? I live in a monastery, but I depend on this village for my food. How d Student: Relying?
Teacher: Relying, yes. ¡§Relying on the village for support.¡¨

Then number 7 as to absorption. ¡¥Absorption¡¦ means jh?na. Absorption part by part, the Taking one part and practicing meditation on it, you can get jh?na. ¡§Then intention here is t be understood that absorption is brought about in each one of the parts.¡¨ So you can get 32 you take one part at a time. Let us say you take head hairs as the part. You practice on it an Then you can take body hairs as the object of meditation. Then you practice meditation on it jh?na. At the end of it we have the story of a monk who gained jh?na dwelling on all of the 3

And the three Suttantas - a yogi must study these three Suttas, these three Discourses. Th Sutta Pi?aka, namely those on higher consciousness (That is one Sutta.), on coolness (That and on skill in the Enlightenment Factors (That is still another Sutta.) which have as their pu energy with concentration.

The first Sutta says: ¡§Bhikkhus, there are three signs that should be given attention from a bhikkhu intent on higher consciousness.¡¨ ¡¥Higher consciousness¡¦ here means both sam monk who is intent who is intent on higher consciousness - that means a monk who is practi meditation or vipassan? meditation should give attention from time to time to the three signs

The first is the sign of concentration. ¡¥The sign of concentration¡¦ really means just conce the object of concentration. In the Sub-Commentary it says that ¡¥the sign of concentration¡¦ concentration, paying attention to concentration, or the object of concentration.

The same is true for the sign of exertion. It is energy or the sign of effort and should be giv from time to time.

The sign of equanimity is also the same. It is equanimity itself or the object of equanimity t given attention from time to time.

¡§If a bhikkhu intent on higher consciousness gives attention only to the sign of concentrat consciousness may conduce to idleness.¡¨ Too much concentration causes idleness, or leth sleepiness.

Student: Is that for both samatha and vipassan??

Teacher: Yes, it is for both samatha and vipassan?. Too much concentration can cause slee concentration¡¦ means concentration in excess of exertion or effort. When you get too much simply lose exertion or effort. Your exertion becomes less. In that case too much concentrat idleness, leads to sleepiness or something similar. You feel lethargic. Too much concentrati bad as too little concentration because as we have learned in the previous chapters, they m
The five faculties must be balanced when we practice meditation. And especially concentrat with effort.

Too much effort will cause what? Too much effort will cause agitation. If effort or exertion i of concentration, agitation will come in. When there is too much energy, too much viriya, the Student: So an example of this would be Venerable ?nanda near his enlightenment.

Teacher: Oh, yes. Venerable ?nanda was practicing meditation to become an Arahant. He w forth too much effort. He walked up and down practicing meditation in order to become an A achieve anything by that practice. Later when he stopped and reviewed his practice, he saw much effort. So he slowed down. Then he was able to attain Arahantship. Too much effort a

¡§If a bhikkhu intent on higher consciousness gives attention only to the sign of equanimity consciousness may not become rightly concentrated for the destruction of cankers.¡¨ It leads not knowing, to ignorance. This is so because equanimity is close to ignoring. When you ign become ignorant. But equanimity is not ignoring actually. Equanimity takes the object, the th attached to it nor is it repulsed by it. That is what is called ¡¥equanimity¡¦.

There is another thing which is wrongly called equanimity. Actually it is not. Sometimes wh something, you may say that you have equanimity about that thing. That is not equanimity. T ignoring. Too much equanimity can lead to ignoring. Then there can be no more destruction defilements. So a monk should pay attention from time to time to the sign of concentration, t exertion, and to the sign of equanimity.

Then there is the simile of a goldsmith. Let us look at the second Sutta in paragraph 77. "B bhikkhu possesses six things, he is able to realize the supreme coolness (coolness of mind) bhikkhus, when consciousness should be restrained, he restrains it.¡¨ There are times when restrain your mind. You are too elated or too happy with your practice. If you are too elated o you will lose concentration. At that time you must suppress or restrain your mind.

¡§When consciousness should be restrained, he restrains it; when consciousness should b it; when consciousness should be encouraged, he encourages it; when consciousness shou equanimity, he looks on at it with equanimity. He is resolute on the superior [state to be attai delights in Nibb?na. Possessing these six things a bhikkhu is able to realize the supreme co person must know when to encourage his mind, when to suppress his mind, when to exert h things.

Then the third Sutta is called The Skill in the Enlightenment Factors. It is already dealt with explanation of skill in absorption, in chapter 4, paragraphs 51 & 57. ¡§Bhikkhus, when the m is not the time for developing the tranquillity enlightenment factor.¡¨

¡§So the meditator should make sure that he has apprehended this sevenfold skill in learn properly defined this tenfold skill in giving attention, thus learning the meditation subject prop both kinds of skill.¡¨ Whenever something is described in this book, it is described in detail, i serious manner. Before you practice this meditation, first you have to learn the 32 parts by h recite. Then you have to learn these skills, skills in learning and skills in practice.

There is a footnote here - ¡§PM. Explains.¡¨ Pm. means the Sub-Commentary of the Visuc Paramattha-ma?j|s?. ¡§Paramattha-ma?j|s? explains ¡¥sati sati ?yatane¡¦ (rendered here by occasion¡¦) with ¡¥tasmi? tasmi? pubbahetu-?di-k?ra?e sati (when there is this or that reaso previous cause etc.).¡¨ Actually it should be ¡§When there is this or that cause accumulated lives.¡¨ It is something like a p?rami or p?ramit?.

Student: P?ramit??

Teacher: We call it p?ramit?, the accumulated experience through previous lives.

Student: Perfections?

Teacher: Right. Now we come to the real practice.

¡§If it is convenient for him to live in the same monastery as the teacher, then he need not explained in detail thus, but as he applies himself to the meditation subject after he has mad about it he can have each successive stage explained as he reaches each distinction.¡¨ As h stage, he may go to his teacher and ask about the other aspect.

¡§One who wants to live elsewhere, however, must get it explained to him in detail in the w given, and he must turn it over and over, getting all the difficulties solved. He should leave a unsuitable kind as described in the Description of the Earth Kasi?a, and go to live in a suitab should sever the minor impediments and set about the preliminary work for giving attention t So he should prepare properly for the practice of meditation. He should avoid the unsuitable live in a monastery that is suitable for meditation. He should sever minor impediments. If his he should cut his hair. If his nails are long, he should cut his nails. If his robes are soiled or d should wash them, clean them. There should not be even the lesser impediments to obstruc meditation.

¡§When he sets about it, he should first apprehend the [learning] sign in head hairs. How? description of the practice.) The color should be defined first by plucking out one or two head placing them on the palm of the hand. He can also look at them in the hair-cutting place (In t cut the hair of each other. The cut hair may still be at that place. So he may go there and pic two and look at it.) or in a bowl of water or rice gruel. (Sometimes there may be hair in the w gruel. He may look at it.) If the ones he sees are black when he sees them, they should be b ¡¥black¡¦; if white, as ¡¥white¡¦; if mixed, they should be brought to mind in accordance with t prevalent.¡¨ If there are more black, we say black. If there are more white, we say white.

¡§And as in the case of head hairs, so too the sign should be apprehended visually with th ¡¥skin pentad¡¦.¡¨ That is the first five parts of the body.

¡§Having apprehended the sign thus and [a] defined all the other parts of the body by colo direction, location, and delimitation, he should then [b] define repulsiveness in five ways, tha color, shape, odor, habitat, and location.¡¨

Now we come to the individual parts. The first is head hairs. In the description of these 32 are words which are very difficult. Here the Commentator describes each part comparing wit things for them in those days. Also there are names of trees and flowers which we don¡¦t kn

Let us look at head hairs. ¡§Firstly head hairs are black in their normal color.¡¨ So the norm black; maybe because the author was an Indian and most Eastern people have black hair, h color of head hairs is black. It may be different in the West. It is said that the hairs are ¡§the fresh ari??haka seeds.¡¨ Maybe we don¡¦t know the name of the tree called ¡¥ari??haka¡¦. W the seeds of this tree. They are black.

¡§As to shape, they are the shape of long round measuring rods. As to direction, they lie in direction¡¨ ¡¥Direction¡¦ means the part of the body. The navel is the middle of the body. So direction¡¦ means above the navel and ¡¥lower direction¡¦ means below the navel.

¡§As to location, their location is the wet inner skin that envelops the skull; it is bounded on by the roots of the ears, in front by the forehead, and behind by the nape of the neck. As to d they are bounded below by the surface of their own roots, which are fixed by entering to the of a rice grain (just a bit) into the inner skin that envelops the head. They are bounded above all round by each other. There are no two hairs together. This is the delimitation by the simila

Head hairs are not body hairs, and body hairs are not head hairs; being likewise not intern remaining 31 parts the head hairs are a separate part. This is their delimitation by the dissim are two kinds of delimitation, by similar and by dissimilar. By dissimilar here means that hea body hairs and body hairs are not head hairs. They are separate. They are different.

Then there is their definition as to repulsiveness in five ways. ¡§Head hairs are repulsive in well as in shape, odor, habitat and location.¡¨ What is ¡¥habitat¡¦? What is the difference betw and location?

Student: ¡¥Habitat¡¦ has to do with the inter-relationship of other factors within the same area does not have that quality of inter-relatedness with other factors within the same area.
Teacher: In the Sub-Commentary ¡¥habitat¡¦ or the P??i word ¡¥?saya¡¦ is explained as an o you grow some plants, the plants grow on the earth. They get nutrition from the earth. That i ¡¥?saya¡¦. We have to differentiate ?saya from location.

Let us read paragraph 85. ¡§For on seeing the color of a head hair in a bowl of inviting rice cooked rice people are disgusted and say ¡¥This has got hairs in it. Take it away.¡¦ So they a color. Also when people are eating at night, they are likewise disgusted by the mere sensati hair-shaped akka-bark or makaci-barkfiber. (They are the names of trees.) So they are repu the odor of head hairs, unless dressed with a smearing of oil, scented with flowers, etc., is m And it is still worse when they are put in the fire. Even if head hairs are not directly repulsive and shape, still their odor is directly repulsive. Just as a baby¡¦s excitement, as to color is th tumeric and, as to its shape, is the shape of a piece of tumeric root, and just as the bloated c black dog thrown on a rubbish heap, as to its color, is the color of ripe palmyra fruit, and, as is the shape of a [mandolin-shaped] drum left face down, and its fangs are like jasmine buds both these are not directly repulsive in color and shape, still the odor is directly repulsive.¡¨

Now instead of ¡¥but¡¦ we can say ¡¥and¡¦ or we can just delete ¡¥but¡¦. ¡§Just as pot herb village sewage in a filthy place (This is a description with regard to habitat.) are disgusting to people and unusable, so also head hairs are disgusting since they grow on the sewage of pu dung, bile, phlegm, and the like.¡¨ They grow out of them. ¡§This is the repulsive aspect of th

¡§And these head hairs grow on the heap of the [other] 31 parts as fungus do on a dung h the filthy place they grow in they are quite unappetizing as vegetables growing on a charnel midden etc., as lotuses or water lilies growing in drains and so on. This is the repulsive aspe location.¡¨ Their location is repulsive and also their habitat or origin is repulsive.

¡§And as in the case of head hairs, so also the repulsiveness of all the parts should be def same five ways by color, shape, odor, habitat, and location.¡¨

Here I want to leave out the word ¡¥however¡¦. We may say ¡¥moreover¡¦ or ¡¥and¡¦. ¡§All, defined individually by color, shape, direction, location and delimitation, as follows.¡¨

Next is body hairs. They are not difficult to understand. Nails are also easy to understand.

And then teeth - ¡§There are 32 teeth bones in one whose teeth are complete.¡¨ Is that rigl teeth?
Student: Yes.
Teacher: ¡§They too are white in color. As to shape, they are of various shapes.¡¨ Then it go them. These descriptions are like a textbook on anatomy.

The next one is skin. Here ¡¥skin¡¦ means the inner skin, not the outer skin. ¡§The inner s the whole body. Outside is what is called the outer cuticle, which is black, brown or yellow in when that from the whole of the body is compressed together, it amounts to only as much as kernel. (That is a small fruit.)¡¨ What is outermost is not called ¡¥skin¡¦. It is called ¡¥cuticle¡¦. that there is skin.

Sometimes we have a sore. Then that cuticle may be removed and then there is skin.

Student: It is like a pig. When a pig is killed, it is put into hot water. The outer cuticle is remo the skin is white.

Teacher: Oh, I see.

Student: They also say that another thing that is repulsive is that all the skin that we see is d said in another Commentary.

Teacher: ¡§But as to color, the skin itself is white; and its whiteness becomes evident when is destroyed by contact with the flame of a fire or the impact of a blow and so on.¡¨ When yo you may see the white color there.

In paragraph 94 about five lines down - ¡§The skin of the thighs is the shape of a long sac paddy.¡¨ ¡¥Paddy¡¦ really means uncooked rice without husks.

The next one is flesh. ¡§There are nine hundred pieces of flesh. As to color, it is all red, lik flowers. As to shape, the flesh of the calves is the shape of cooked rice in a palm-leaf bag.¡¨

Then we have sinews. ¡§There are nine hundred sinews.¡¨ I don¡¦t know how they count th not dissect bodies. They may have learned this from physicians.

About the middle of paragraph 99 there is the word ¡¥tendons¡¦. Are tendons large sinews here means the larger sinews. Sinews are small. The larger sinews in P??i are called ¡¥ka? tendons here. So tendons are bigger than sinews.

The next one is bones. ¡§Excepting the 32 teeth bones, these consist of the remaining (nu Did you add them up? I did. There are 300. It is correct. There are 64 hand bones, 64 foot b bones dependent on the flesh, 2 heel bones, then in each 2 ankle bones (So they become 4 1 knee bone (2), one thigh bone (2). Then 2 hip bones, 18 spine bones.¡¨ Are there 18 segm What do you call them?

Student: Vertebrae.

Teacher: Are there 18? I am asking him because he is a doctor.

Student: (Hard to understand the answer, seemed to partially agree.) The tips of the bones a together and they are regarded as only one bone.

Teacher: They may be included here. So there are 2 hip bones, 18 spine bones, 24 rib bone heart bone (sternum), 2 collar bones, 2 shoulder blade bones, 2 upper-arm bones, 2 pairs o neck bones, 2 jaw bones, 1 nose bone, 2 eye bones, 2 ear bones, 1 frontal bone, 1 occiput bones. ¡§So there are exactly 300 bones.¡¨ The P??i does not mean ¡¥exactly 300¡¦. It mean should say ¡§There are about 300 bones.¡¨ Please go back to paragraph 89 in chapter 6. ¡§ nature: it is a collection of over 300 bones.¡¨ So there are more than 300 bones. So here the mean ¡¥exactly¡¦ but ¡¥about¡¦ 300 bones. Some bones are not mentioned in the list. There bones in the body. The Commentary explains the bones in detail.

The next one is bone marrow. ¡§This is the marrow inside the various bones. As to color, i so on. It is not difficult to understand.

The next one is kidney. ¡§This is two pieces of flesh with a single ligature. As to color, it is the color of p?libhaddhaka seeds. As to shape, it is the shape of a pair of child¡¦s play balls; shape of mango fruits attached to a single stalk.¡¨ So it looks like kidneys. ¡§As to direction, the upper direction.¡¨ That is what is bothering me. ¡¥Upper direction¡¦ means above the na they located?

Student: Yes.

Teacher: Let us go on. ¡§As to location, it is to be found on either side of the heart flesh.¡¨ B is here and the kidneys are down there.

Student: Yes, but when you do an echogram or when you do a CAT scan, you can see its re raised at the back. The diaphragm is not flat. The diaphragm is of curved nature because of of the kidneys. The nature of the diaphragm is such that a very special x-ray technique used echogram. The kidneys are at the sides of the heart.

Teacher: Oh. ¡§As to location, it is to be found on either side of the heart flesh, being fasten sinew that starts out with one root from the neck and divides into two after going a short way translation ¡¥kidney¡¦ is acceptable?

Student: I think it is acceptable. The heart is not in a stationary position. The heart is pumpi is contracted, it is shortened. Then it is above the level of the kidney. When it is expanded re inflow of blood, then the heart is enlarged and pushed downwards. At that time the kidneys the heart. So it is dynamic.

Teacher: So this description is fairly scientific. I wonder how they knew this. If you cut a dea cannot see direct like this.

Student: No. When you cut a dead body, you cannot see direct like this. Only in living nature seen.

Teacher: Maybe they knew with supernormal knowledge, abhi???.

The next one is heart. In Buddhist Abhidhamma the heart is said to be the seat of many ty consciousness. About the middle of the paragraph it talks about this. ¡§Inside it there is a ho of a Poona seed¡¦s bed where half a pasta (¡¥Pasta¡¦ means a handful.) of blood is kept, wit support the mind element and mind consciousness element occur.¡¨ There are 89 types of c 89 ten have their own location or their own base for arising. For example the two types of se consciousness have the eyes as their base. Two types of hearing consciousness have the e so on for the five senses. Almost all of the other types of consciousness depend upon the he element¡¦ and ¡¥mind consciousness element¡¦ mean types of consciousness other than the hearing, 2 smelling, 2 tasting, and 2 touching. (The four ar|p?vacara vip?ka are also excepte actually the blood in the heart is the seat of consciousness according to Abhidhamma.

¡§That in one of greedy temperament is red; that in one of hating temperament is black; th deluded temperament is like water that meat has been washed in; that in one of speculative lentil soup in color; that in one of faithful temperament is the color of [yellow] kanik?ra flower one of understanding temperament is limpid, clear, unturbid, bright, pure, like a washed gem and it seems to shine.¡¨ This is the heart.

The next one is liver. About four lines down - ¡§In sluggish people it is single and large.¡¨ V ¡¥sluggish¡¦?

Students: Lazy, torpid, slow.

Teacher: Slow in understanding or slow in physical movement? If it means slow in understan Here it is mentioned in contrast with those possessed of understanding. So it is contrasting t intelligent and those who are intelligent. ¡¥Sluggish¡¦ here means those who are not intellige maybe dull-witted. That is liver.

The next one we have difficulty. What is ¡¥midriff¡¦? I look it up in the dictionary. Midriff is c a part of the body, the diaphragm. I think that will do. The other meaning is that it is the midd portion of the front of the human body extending roughly from just below the breast to the wa just outer. In Burmese it is translated as ¡¥membrane¡¦.

¡§This is the covering of the flesh, which is of two kinds, namely, the concealed and the un to color, both kinds are white, the color of duk|la (muslim) rags. As to shape, it is the shape o location. As to direction, the concealed midriff lies in the upper direction, the other in both dir to location the concealed midriff is to be found concealing the heart and kidney.¡¨ So it looks diaphragm, right?

Student: Yes.

Teacher: ¡§The unconcealed is to be found covering the flesh under the inner skin througho Between the flesh and the skin this thing is located.

Student: The unconcealed is not the diaphragm. (Suggested something in Burmese that was Teacher: Venerable ???aponika translates this as pleura.

Student: Pleura is the covering of the lungs.

Teacher: ¡§It is either of the two membranous sets each of which lines one side of the thorac envelops the contiguous lungs reducing the friction of respiratory movements.¡¨ So it also m part of the body. The concealed midriff could be the diaphragm. The unconcealed must have

The next one is the spleen. ¡§This is the flesh of the belly¡¦s ¡¥tongue¡¦. As to color, it is blu color of niggu??i flowers.¡¨ and so on.

The next one is lights. Now lights are defined as lungs especially of an animal used for foo is better to translate it as lungs. ¡¥Lights¡¦ is an obscure word. I did not know that it meant lu

¡§The flesh of the lights (lungs) is divided up into two or three pieces of flesh. As to color, i red,¡¨ and so on.

The next one is bowel. ¡§This is the bowel tube; it is looped in 21 places, and in a man it is long, and in a woman, 28 hands.¡¨ How long is the intestine?

Student: In feet it is 32 feet.

Teacher: 32 feet? It may mean feet. I don¡¦t know. Is there a difference between the length o intestine and the length of a woman¡¦s intestine?

Student: I don¡¦t know.
Teacher: There is a saying in Burmese. Please excuse me ladies. Since the intestine of wor are more jealous. It may not be true, but that is the saying. According to this women have sh than men. It may not be true.

The next one is entrails or mesentery. ¡§This is the fastening in the places where the bowe to color, it is white, the color of dakas?talika (white edible water lily) roots. As to shape, it is t of those roots too. As to direction, it lies in the two directions. As to location, it is found inside coils of the bowel, like the string to be found inside rope-rings for wiping the feet on, sewing together, and it fastens the bowels coils together so that they do not slip down in those work axes, etc., as the marionette-strings do the marionette¡¦s wooden [limbs] at the time of the m being pulled along.¡¨

¡¥Bowel¡¦ means both large and small intestines, right?
Student: Yes.
Teacher: For this one which is better ¡¥entrails¡¦ or ¡¥mesentery¡¦?
Student: ¡¥Mesentery¡¦ is better.
Teacher: I will read the description of the entrails. ¡§The entrails are the internal organs espe intestines.¡¨ Mesentery is defined as ¡§any of several folds that connect the intestines to the abdominal wall.¡¨ So ¡¥mesentery¡¦ is better.

Then we have gorge. That is food which has been eaten which is in the stomach. ¡§This is eaten, drunk, chewed and tasted, and is present in the stomach.¡¨

Next there is a description of the stomach. ¡§What is called the ¡¥stomach¡¦ is [a part of] th bowel-membrane, which is like the swelling [of air] produced in the middle of a length of wet being [twisted and] wrung out from two ends. It is smooth outside. Inside, it is like a balloon soiled by wrapping up meat refuse.¡¨

Now here in Burmese it is not translated as ¡¥like a balloon of cloth¡¦ but like ¡¥a tassel of inside of the stomach is something like the surface of a towel. It is a little rough and then the something hanging down. The inside of the stomach is something like a tassel, not a balloon Venerable ???amoli took the P??i word ¡¥pupphaka¡¦ to mean balloon. ¡¥Puppukhaka¡¦ real resembles a flower. Towels have these things. I don¡¦t know the names of these things. So I and she said they could be called tassels. I looked it up in the dictionary and I think that is co

You know in Myanmar people eat meat and the stomach is also eaten. The stomach when in Myanmar is called ¡¥rough cloth¡¦. In Burmese it is called rough cloth. It is rough inside. If seen some of these things, you know that.

The next one is dung. That is excrement. It is one of the parts of the body, but actually it is the body. It is the refuse of the body.

The next one is the brain. Brain is not supposed to be the seat of consciousness. The des brain is very short here. ¡§As to location it is to be found inside the skull, like four lumps of d together to correspond with the [skull¡¦s] four sutured sections.¡¨

Then we have bile. ¡§There are two kinds of bile: local (stationary) bile and free (mobile) b as to color, the local bile is the color of thick madhuka oil; the free bile is the color of faded ? flowers,¡¨ and so on. There are two kinds of bile. ¡§As to location, the free bile spreads, like on water all over the body except for the fleshless parts of the head hairs, body hairs, teeth, hard dry skin. When it is disturbed, the eyes become yellow and twitch, and there is shiverin the body. (That is when the free bile is disturbed, when the free bile is not in good order.) Th (That is the real bile.) is situated near the flesh of the liver between the heart and the lights ( is found in the bile container (gall bladder), which is like a large kos?tak? (loofah) ground pip disturbed, beings go crazy and demented, they throw off conscience and shame and do the unspeakable, and think the unthinkable.¡¨ When people go mad, we say his bile is disturbed that.

The next one is phlegm. It is described as something located in the stomach over what we

Then we have pus. ¡§Pus is produced by decaying blood.¡¨ That is not difficult to understa

Then there is blood. ¡§There are two kinds of blood: stored blood and mobile blood. Herein stored blood is the color of cooked and thickened lac solution; mobile blood is the color of cl solution.¡¨

Some lines down - ¡§The mobile blood permeates the whole of the clung-to (kammically-a is the direct translation of the P??i word ¡¥up?di??aka¡¦. It simply means the living body. ¡¥C kammically-acquired body¡¦ simply means the living body.

Student: ¡¥Clung to¡¦ means grasped?

Teacher: ¡¥Clung-to¡¦ really means the result of kamma here. You know the literal meaning ¡¥up?di??a¡¦ is clung-to. It is clung to by kamma. That means the result of kamma. There ar material properties - those caused by kamma, those caused by consciousness, those cause by temperature or climate. It simply means here a living body, not a dead body, or things like and others.

Then there is sweat. Sweat is not difficult to understand.

The next one is fat. ¡¥Fat¡¦ here means solid fat. There are two kinds of fat. This one is sol unguent.

The next one is tears. Their location is in the eyes.

Next there is grease. That is melted unguent. In Burmese we say clear oil. The other one, oil, thick unguent. This one is thin oil. ¡§As to location, it is to be found mostly on the palms o hands, backs of the hands, soles of the feet, backs of the feet, tip of the nose, forehead, and shoulders.¡¨ It is something like sweat, but it is not sweat. Sometimes your hands are wet. T called ¡¥grease¡¦ here. When you put on shoes, you have that kind of grease there.

Then there is spittle or saliva. The next one is snot. Does mucus in the nose come from th not be. Here it says ¡§This is impurity that trickles out from the brain.¡¨

Student There is a long explanation of this, but it is true. The brain has its own fluid. It has sp
It has its own canals. The formations of these brain fluids are somewhat screened and filtere kidneys filter and screen our blood to form urine. The mucus is the screened product of the l the screened product of the kidneys.

Teacher: So this is correct that it oozes or trickles out of the brain.
Student: It is somewhat correct.
Teacher: The next one is oil of the joints. It is oil that stays in the joints. It is translated by Ve ???aponika as synovial fluid. I looked that word up in the dictionary. It said synovia is a clea lubricating fluid secreted by membranes in joint cavities, sheets of tendons, and bursas. It is synovial fluid.
Student: Particularly in the knee joints when you get older, the fluid is somewhat reduced. W stand up, you can hear creaking.
Teacher: Yes. It is mentioned here. When a man gets up or sits down, moves forward or bac stretches, then his bones creak. When I walk there is a creak in the ankle.

The last one is urine. There is one thing. I am not happy with the description of the bladde five lines down it say ¡§While the urinary secretion from the body enters the bladder, its way evident.¡¨ There are two pipes going into the bladder from the kidneys, right?
Student: Yes.
Teacher: Here it says that its way of entry is not evident, but it is very clear that urine enters from the kidneys by way of these pipes.
Student: It may mean that its way of entry is not evident. Actually it is difficult to explain. It is evident. If it is evident there will be reflux. The nature is so arranged that the entry is not visi entry is not evident. If it were evident, the urine from the bladder can reflux back when it is fu mechanism is so arranged that it is not evident.
Teacher: So it is not like water dripping from a pipe?
Student: No. Because if the bladder is full the urine will be refluxed back to the kidney. It nev a normal person. Only when the entrance is ruined or damaged is there a reflux.
Teacher: There is something like a valve.
Student: Yes. There is something very, very complicated. It may mean that the entry is not e Teacher: We are fortunate today because we have a doctor here.

Then there is the arising of absorption. Only first jh?na can arise through the practice of th meditation, not the second, third and fourth jh?nas.

The learning and the counterpart signs are described in paragraph 141. ¡§Then, as he give them again and again as ¡¥repulsive, repulsive¡¦, emphasizing the process of ¡¥successive l eventually absorption arises in him. Herein, the appearance of head hairs, etc., as to color, s direction, location and delimitation, is the learning sign; their appearance as repulsive in all a the counterpart sign.¡¨ There are two kind of signs - learning sign and counterpart sign. He g first jh?na.

Then there is the very short story of the Elder Mallaka. ¡§That Elder, it seems, took the Eld
D?gha Reciter, by the hand, and after saying ¡¥Friend Abhaya, first learn this matter¡¦, he w

Elder Mallaka is an obtainer of 32 jh?nas in the 32 parts. If he enters upon one by night and goes on entering upon them for over a fortnight; but if he enters upon one each day, he goes them for over a month.¡¨

Then there are the benefits of this meditation. ¡§And the bhikkhu who is devoted to this mi occupied with the body is a conqueror of boredom and delight, and boredom does not conqu transcending boredom as it arises. He is a conqueror of fear and dread, and fear and dread he dwells transcending fear and dread as they arise. He is the one who bears cold and heat arisen bodily feelings that are menacing to life¡¨ and so on. This Sutta comes from the Majjh (Middle Length Sayings)

¡§He becomes an obtainer of the four jh?nas based on the color of the head hairs, etc.¡¨ A cannot get second, third and fourth jh?nas by practicing this kind of meditation, yet he can g jh?nas, if he concentrates on the color aspect of these parts, not on the repulsiveness. For e look at hair, you concentrate on the color of the hair as black, or dark, or something. In that get all four kinds of jh?nas. That is why it is mentioned here. ¡§He becomes an obtainer of th based on the color aspect of the head hairs, etc., and he comes to penetrate the six kinds o knowledge.¡¨ That is supernormal knowledge.

¡§So let a man, if he is wise, Untiringly devote his days
To mindfulness of body which Rewards him in so many ways.

This is the section dealing with mindfulness occupied with the body in the detailed treatise Student: So this treatise is saying that we have to go through the 32 parts in order to obtain jh?na.

Teacher: No. There are other subjects of meditation. If you practice this meditation, you will first jh?na. There are other kinds of meditation like kasi?a meditation by which you can get a This meditation can give you only the first jh?na because it is so gross. It is so gross that you application (vitakka) for your mind to be on the object, just as you need a pole to keep a boa current. That is why you cannot get second, third and fourth jh?nas with this meditation.

If you concentrate on the color aspect, you can get the other jh?nas. For example if you co blood, you don¡¦t say ¡¥blood, blood, blood¡¦, but you say ¡¥red, red, red.¡¦ That becomes co meditation. When it becomes color kasi?a meditation, then you can get the four jh?nas.

Next week we will study up to paragraph 185.

Student: The 32 parts of the body is very interesting with regard to the groupings 5,5,5,5,6,6 is the outgrowth from the same tissue. These five things emerge from the same tissue in the

S?dhu! S?dhu! S?dhu!

(Tape 18 / Ps: 145 -185)

Today¡¦s section on mindfulness of breathing is interesting. The mindfulness of breathing become very popular in Myanmar as well as in other countries. Those who practice vipassan begin with some kind of mindfulness on breathing meditation. One begins with keeping the r Or as a variation of keeping the mind on the breath one keeps the mind on the rising and fal the abdomen. That is also breathing meditation.

However in this book, The Path of Purification, mindfulness of the breath is treated as tran serenity meditation (samatha meditation) and not as vipassan? meditation. So the descriptio most of the description, is for tranquillity meditation.

The breathing meditation is taught in different Suttas in the Sutta Pi?aka or the Basket of D author took a passage from one of the Suttas and commented on it.

¡§Now comes the description of the development of mindfulness of breathing as a meditat been recommended by the Blessed One thus: ¡¥And, bhikkhus, this concentration through r breathing, when developed and practiced much, is both peaceful and sublime, it is an unadu abiding, and it banishes at once and stills evil unprofitable thoughts as soon as they arise¡¦.¡ one Sutta.

Now let us read the next one. ¡§It has been described by the Blessed One as having 16 ba methods mentioned in the Sutta): ¡¥And how developed, bhikkhus, how practiced much is co mindfulness of breathing both peaceful and sublime, an unadulterated blissful abiding, banis stilling evil unprofitable thoughts as soon as they arise¡¦?¡¨ We will examine the translation la ¡§Here, bhikkhus, a bhikkhu, gone to the forest or to the root of a tree or to an empty place having folded his legs crosswise, sets his body erect, established mindfulness in front of him ¡¥established mindfulness towards the meditation object¡¦.), ever mindful, he breathes in; mi out.¡¨ Here also we should say ¡¥ever¡¦ - ¡§ever mindful he breathes in; ever mindful he brea is the basic practice.

Then come the 16 methods. ¡§(1) Breathing in long, he knows, ¡¥I breathe in long¡¦; or bre he knows, ¡¥I breathe out long¡¦. (That is the first method.) (2) Breathing in short, he knows, in short¡¦; or breathing out short, he knows, ¡¥I breathe out short¡¦. (3) He trains thus ¡¥I shal experiencing the whole body¡¦; he trains thus ¡¥I shall breathe out experiencing the whole bo trains thus ¡¥I shall breathe in tranquilizing the bodily formation¡¦; he trains thus ¡¥I shall bre tranquilizing the bodily formation¡¦.¡¨ These are the four basic methods for mindfulness on br meditation.

There are three more sets with four methods in each set. They deal with the three remaini foundations of mindfulness. There are four foundations of mindfulness - contemplation on th contemplation on the feelings, contemplation on consciousness, contemplation on dhamma have to do with contemplation on the body. The second four deal with feelings. The third fou on consciousness and the fourth four is contemplation on dhamma objects. We will come to The first four methods are the most important for a beginner. For one who wants to practic meditation these four methods are treated or explained in detail in this book, The Visuddhi M in other Commentaries.

¡§The description [of development] is complete in all respects, however, only if it is given i after a commentary on the text. So it is given here introduced by a commentary on the [first text.¡¨ First the Commentary explains the words. It gives the meaning of the words and the e pertaining to the meanings. Later, not today, next week we will come to the method of devel

First the Commentator commented on the text itself and then described how to practice m breathing meditation as a tranquillity or serenity meditation. Now we will be doing the word c

¡§And how developed, bhikkhus, how practiced much, is concentration through mindfulnes in the first place ¡¥how¡¦ is a question showing desire to explain in detail the development of through mindfulness of breathing in its various forms. Developed, bhikkhus, .. is concentratio mindfulness of breathing: this shows the thing that is being asked about out of desire to expl various forms.¡¨ Buddha would put forth a question. This question is not expecting an answe listeners. He wanted to give the answer himself. So first he would ask the question and then answer.

¡§ ¡¥Developed¡¦ means aroused or increased.¡¨ That means practice, practice again and ¡§Concentration through mindfulness of breathing [literally, breathing-mindfulness concentra is ?n?p??asati sam?dhi. ¡¥?n?p??a¡¦ means breathing. ¡¥Sati¡¦ means mindfulness. And ¡¥s concentration.

¡§It is either concentration associated with mindfulness that discerns breathing, or it is con mindfulness of breathing.¡¨ Actually they mean the same thing.

Concentration is a mental factor or mental state. It is associated with another mental state mindfulness. So we have concentration, mindfulness and there is consciousness. When you and your meditation is good, your consciousness is accompanied by concentration and mind concentration on mindfulness of breathing.¡¨ That is the same thing.

¡§Practiced much: practiced again and again.¡¨ These are word explanations. Sometimes translation. The translator has to repeat the word because there is no word, no synonym for words. P??i is rich in synonyms in some respects. So one synonym after another is given wh explained. It is difficult to translate them into another language.

¡§Both peaceful and sublime (santo c¡¦eva pa??to ca)¡¨ - I think ¡¥both¡¦ is not correct here word ¡¥eva¡¦. ¡¥Eva¡¦ means only. He translated eva as ¡¥quite¡¦ in another place - ¡¥quite s sensual pleasures, quite secluded from sense objects¡¦ and so on. Here also we should say quite sublime¡¦. So it is ¡§peaceful only and sublime only¡¨; that is what is meant here. It is p not unpeaceful, sublime only, not unsublime. Sometimes the word ¡¥eva¡¦ is used just for em Student: Could it be ¡¥very peaceful¡¦ and ¡¥very sublime¡¦?
Teacher: ¡¥Very¡¦, no. You want to emphasize it. It is really peaceful and not unpeaceful. ¡§T should be understood as governed by the word ¡¥quite¡¦ (eva).¡¨ not ¡¥both¡¦.We should corr the word ¡¥quite¡¦ instead of ¡¥both¡¦. ¡¥Quite peaceful¡¦ and ¡¥quite sublime means peacefu only.

¡§What is meant? Unlike foulness which as a meditation subject is peaceful and sublime o penetration¡¨ - that means you practice foulness meditation and when you get jh?na or attain peaceful and sublime. At the attainment level it is peaceful and sublime. The object of the fo meditation is not peaceful nor sublime because it is a dead body or a corpse which is gross.

¡§Unlike foulness, which as a meditation subject is peaceful and sublime only by penetrati neither peaceful nor sublime in its object since its object [in the learning stage] is gross, and its object is repulsiveness - unlike that, this is not unpeaceful or unsublime in any way but or it is peaceful, stilled and quiet both on account of the peacefulness of its object and on acco peacefulness of that one of its factors called penetration.¡¨ That means the object itself is pe attainment also is peaceful. This is because it is the breath which is not gross. It is peaceful. itself is peaceful and sublime and when you get attainment, that also is peaceful and sublime

¡§And it is sublime, something one cannot have enough of.¡¨ That is the meaning of the P ¡¥pa??ta¡¦. You see the word ¡¥pa??to¡¦ above at the beginning of paragraph 148. The word translated as sublime, but the literal meaning is ¡¥something which we cannot have enough want to practice again and again and we are not satiated with it. That is what is meant here.

¡§It is an unadulterated blissful abiding: it has no adulteration, thus it is unadulterated. It is unalloyed, unmixed, particular, special. Here it is not a question of peacefulness to be reach preliminary work [as with the kasi?as] or through access [as with foulness, for instance].¡¨ To peacefulness with kasi?a meditation or foulness meditation you have to do some work befor peacefulness. With kasi?a meditation you have to prepare a kasi?a and then go to a place a With foulness meditation also you have to look at a corpse and so on. Only after that do you of mind and then you get peacefulness. Breathing meditation is not like that. ¡§It is peaceful its own individual essence too starting with the very first attention given to it.¡¨ The moment y and practice meditation on breathing, you are peaceful.

¡§But some say that it is ¡¥unadulterated¡¦ because it is unalloyed, possessed of nutritive v in its individual essence too. So it should be understood to be ¡¥unadulterated¡¦ and a ¡¥bliss since it leads to the obtaining of bodily and mental bliss (That means bodily and mental peac every moment of absorption.¡¨

There is a footnote. ¡§ ¡¥Some¡¦ is said with reference to the inmates of the Uttara (Northe [in Anur?dhapura].¡¨ Historically the Commentaries we now use were written at a monastery Monastery¡¦, in Anur?dhapura which is in Sri Lanka. At one time some monks went away fro which was the central place of learning for monks at that time. They divided themselves from Monastery. They founded two monasteries. One was to the north of The Great Monastery a the east of The Great Monastery. The large stupas can still be seen in Anur?dhapura. ¡¥Utta means the monastery called ¡¥Abhayagiri¡¦. It is not known as Northern Monastery actually. is not the name. Since that monastery is located to the north of The Great Monastery, it is re in the Sub-Commentary as the Northern Monastery. Actually it is Abhayagiri. They have diffe some teachings in some cases. They do not conform to the tradition handed down or accept Monastery. Those who lived in Abhayagiri or the Northern Monastery thought in this way, jus difference, not too much.

In paragraph 150 we have ¡§as soon as they arise.¡¨ The P??i word here is like saying ¡¥e that arises¡¦. In P??i the word is repeated. That means something that arises and arises. It is that. So here ¡§each and every thought that arises¡¨. Here ¡¥arise¡¦ does not mean that it rea it is in a latent state. There is a potential for these unwholesome or unprofitable thoughts to a it is explained by ¡§whenever they are not suppressed¡¨.

There are three kinds of abandonment of unwholesome mental states. The first one is by s means you substitute something wholesome for something unwholesome. When you have w not have unwholesome thoughts. That is abandoning by substitution. We say it is momentar one moment you may abandon the unwholesome thought. The next one is abandoning by s abandoning. In that case the abandoning lasts longer than in the first one. The last one is to total eradication. That is the last abandonment. So there are three kinds of abandoning. Her the second abandoning, abandoning by suppression. Here the meditation can abandon or b thoughts as they arise. That means not that they really arise, but that they have the potentia the practice of meditation their arising is blocked. They are not given chance to arise. That is here. When unwholesome thoughts have arisen in us, then it has arisen and we cannot do a Before arising we do not let it arise. That is what is meant here although the word ¡¥arise¡¦ is ¡§It banishes at once: it banishes, suppresses, at that very moment. Stills: it thoroughly ca when eventually brought to fulfillment by the Noble Path, it cuts off, because of partaking of tranquilizes, is what is meant.¡¨ This or else in the following mean the total cutting off or aban Here a person reaches the Noble Path. At the moment of Noble Path he is able to eradicate defilements or unprofitable thoughts all together. Here it is the total cutting off.

¡§In brief, however, the meaning due here is this: Bhikkhus in what way, in what manner, b concentration through mindfulness of breathing developed, in what way is it practiced much, as soon as they arise?¡¨ ¡§Herein, here bhikkhus, a bhikkhu means, bhikkhu, in this dispensation, a bhikkhu (a mon book, in The Path of Purification, the commentator did not say anything more about the word another Commentary, the Commentary to the Mah? Satipa??h?na Sutta (The Sutta on the F Mindfulness), it is stated that ¡¥bhikkhu¡¦ here does not necessarily mean an ordained monk practices mindfulness meditation, anybody who follows the advice of the Buddha, anybody w teachings of the Buddha can be called a ¡¥bhikkhu¡¦. So in that case a bhikkhu does not nec ordained monk. Anybody who practices meditation can be called a ¡¥bhikkhu¡¦. But since thi bhikkhus, for monks, the commentator does not say anything about this.

Nowadays when people read Suttas and the Buddha always addresses monks, they feel l satisfied with that. They do not like that. The Buddha speaks to monks and not to lay people know, the Buddha lived with monks. So when he talked, he talked mostly to monks. That do people are left out. ¡§Herein, here bhikkhus, a bhikkhu means, bhikkhus, in this dispensation here it is a monk, but anybody who practices meditation, who follows the teachings of the Bu called a monk.

¡§For this word ¡¥here¡¦ signifies the [Buddha¡¦s] dispensation as the prerequisite for a per concentration through mindfulness of breathing in all its modes¡¨ and so on. ¡¥Here¡¦ means that is in Buddhism. It is said that only in Buddhism can be found the four foundations of min also the four Persons who are enlightened.

¡§For this is said: ¡¥Bhikkhus, only here is there an ascetic, here a second ascetic, here a here a fourth ascetic.¡¨ They mean the Stream Winner, the Once-Returner, the Non-Returne

¡§Other dispensations are devoid of ascetics.¡¨ That means there are no enlightened perso dispensations. ¡§That is why it was said above ¡¥in this dispensation a bhikkhu¡¦.¡¨

¡§Gone to a forest or to an empty place¡¨ - this passage shows a suitable or an appropriate meditation.

Then a monk¡¦s mind is described as unruly and wild. A simile is given of a calf tied with a strong post. In the same way we tie our mind to the strong post of breathing with the rope of mindfulness is like a rope. Breathing in and out is like a post. Our mind is like the calf. We try mind on the object by mindfulness.

In paragraph 155 ¡§Or alternatively, the mindfulness of breathing as a meditation subject - foremost among the various meditation subjects of all Buddhas, [some] Pacceka Buddhas a disciples¡¨ - the word ¡¥some¡¦ in brackets is taken from the Sub-Commentary. It is said that practice mindfulness of breathing meditation. They all practice mindfulness of breathing and they change over to vipassan? after attaining jh?na. But for the Pacceka Buddhas and the o may not be breathing meditation. For some it may be breathing meditation, but for others it m breathing meditation. There are other kinds of meditation too. It is said in the books that all B practice breathing meditation.

If you read some Suttas in The Middle Length Sayings, you will find the Buddha relating hi prince. In that Sutta he said that first he practiced breathing meditation. Then he got first jh? jh?na, third jh?na, fourth jh?na. After that he got the supernormal knowledge of rememberin he saw people dying in one life and being reborn in another life. Only after that did he dwell Origination, practicing vipassan? on each of the twelve links. Then he gained enlightenment all Buddhas practice breathing meditation but not all Pacceka Buddhas or Buddhas¡¦ disciple

¡¥As a basis for attaining distinction¡¦ means enlightenment. ¡§It is not easy to develop wit the neighborhood of villages, which resound with the noises of women, men, elephants, hors to go to a place where we do not have such noises. ¡§Noise being a thorn to jh?na¡¨ - actual to first jh?na. ¡§Whereas in the forest away from a village a meditator can at his ease set ab this meditation subject.¡¨ A forest is a suitable place for meditation. This meditation is difficul practice and so we need quietness.

Then the author explains with a simile, ¡§For the Blessed One is like a master of the art of sites¡¨ and so on. These passages are not difficult to understand.

Paragraph 158 ¡§Herein, gone to the forest is gone to any kind of forest possessing the bl among the kind of forest characterized thus ¡¥Having gone out beyond the boundary post, a forest¡¦.¡¨ When we say ¡¥forest¡¦, there are at least two definitions, one given in Abhidhamm in Vinaya.

The first one is from Abhidhamma. In Abhidhamma it is said ¡§having gone out beyond the
There are gateposts outside the villages. That which is outside the gateposts is forest. It ma to the village. Still it is called a ¡¥forest¡¦.

There is another definition in Vinaya. ¡§A forest abode is five hundred bow lengths distant.
have ¡¥at least¡¦ there. He left out a word. ¡§A forest abode is at least five hundred bow leng

One bow length is said to be four cubits. That is about six feet. So five hundred multiplied three thousand. In order for a place to be called a ¡¥forest¡¦ it must be about three thousand human villages, towns or cities. So there is a difference between the forest explained in Abh Vinaya. We came across this in the second chapter.

Student: I was thinking about this. It is about ten football fields.

Teacher: Ten football fields! Oh.

¡§To the root of a tree: gone to the vicinity of a tree. To an empty place, gone to an ¡¥emp he has gone to any of the remaining seven kinds of abode (resting place)¡¨ - they are given i

Now the sitting position is dealt with. ¡§Then he sits down, etc., indicating a posture that is and tends neither to idleness nor to agitation.¡¨ So sitting position is the best for the practice meditation.

¡§Then he said having folded his legs crosswise, etc., to show firmness in the sitting posit occurrence of the in-breaths and out-breaths, and the means for discerning the object.¡¨ Wh is going smoothly, then you can concentrate on it easily.

¡§Herein, crosswise in the sitting position with the thighs fully locked¡¨ - it does not say in t position, but I think it means the lotus position because your ¡¥thighs fully locked¡¦ means th position. Most of the Buddha images that you see are in the full lotus position. It may mean t position here.

¡§Folded: having locked. Set his body erect: having placed the upper part of the body erec backbones resting end to end. (That means one over the other.) For when he is seated like flesh and sinews are not twisted, and so feelings (¡¥Feelings¡¦ means painful feelings.) that moment by moment if they were twisted do not arise. That being so, his mind becomes unifi Sitting position is recommended and said to be the best for meditation.

¡§Established mindfulness in front of him¡¨ - ¡¥in front of him¡¦ means towards the object, s ¡§established mindfulness towards the object.¡¨ It is not ¡¥in front of him¡¦ actually. So ¡§hav mindfulness towards the meditation subject¡¨ is correct.

¡§Or alternatively, the meaning can be treated here too according to the method of explan Pa?isambhid?.¡¨ This book, the Pa?isambhid?, will be quoted many times in the Visuddhi M said to have been preached by the Venerable S?riputta. It is included in the Sutta Pi?aka. A included as among the words of the Buddha, it actually was taught by Venerable S?riputta.

Student: So it is not in the Abhidhamma Pi?aka.
Teacher: Oh, no. It is included in Sutta Pi?aka. I just read about this today in one book, P??i Language. There the author said that it is more like Abhidhamma than Sutta. That is not quit like Sutta Pi?aka, but its language is different. The usage is a little different than in the Comm although it is treated as a Commentary on some of the Buddha¡¦s teachings. Venerable Bud of The Path of Purification, had great respect for this book. So he always quoted from this bo there is a quotation to be made.
Student: Is it translated into English?
Teacher: Yes. I think recently a translation has come out.

According to that book the phrase here means ¡¥making mindfulness thoroughly controlled of opposition¡¦. Here the translation says ¡¥outlet¡¦. What is ¡¥outlet¡¦? ¡¥Outlet¡¦ means som door you go through. Here it does not mean ¡¥outlet¡¦, but outgoing or getting out of. Mindful described here. Mindfulness must be well-controlled and it must be getting out of opposition here means forgetfulness. Mindfulness must be strong and it must get out of forgetfulness. S mindfulness thoroughly controlled and getting out of opposition¡¨ is what is meant here.

Then we have breathing in long and breathing out long. ¡§Word Commentary Continued - is the first set of the four methods of breathing meditation. Here breathing long and breathing understood by way of extent. Those who have long or big bodies, for such beings, the breath be long. For small animals or insects it may be very short. With regard to human beings we way of time. Sometimes our breathing is long and sometimes our breathing is short, long an because human beings are more or less of the same size. So we cannot say there is a differ of breathing in and out between human beings.

In paragraph 164 ¡§ ¡¥Ass?sa is the wind issuing out; pass?sa is the wind entering in¡¦ is s Vinaya Commentary. But in the Suttanta Commentaries it is given in the opposite sense¡¦.¡¨ Commentary ass?sa is out-breath and pass?sa is in-breath. But in Suttanta Commentaries a pass?sa is out-breath.

¡§Herein, when any infant comes out from the mother¡¦s womb, first the wind from within g subsequently the wind from without enters in with fine dust, strikes the palate and is extingui infant¡¦s sneezing].¡¨ Do infants sneeze after being born? I don¡¦t know. It¡¦s OK.

The Commentary continues without telling us which is to be preferred. Should we take ass or in-breath? There is what I call familiarity with the tradition or the manner of Commentators Commentator gives two or more opinions, the one he puts last is the one he preferred. We that. If he doesn¡¦t say anything, we must take it that he prefers the last one.

There is another proof of ass?sa being in-breath and pass?sa being out-breath. That we w paragraph 167. ¡§Now this bhikkhu knows ¡¥I breathe in, I breathe out, long while breathing out long in nine ways. And the development of the Foundations of Mindfulness consisting in the Body should be understood to be perfected in one aspect in him who knows thus, accord the Pa?isambhid?.¡¨

Whenever I see footnotes in small print, I am afraid because these are from the Sub-Com Sub-Commentaries are more difficult to understand. I was afraid that he might make some m translating and he did make mistakes. I cannot go into details about this. In footnote 46 abou from the bottom appears the phrase ¡¥but some say¡¦. That should be in front of ¡§The mind then ¡§the mind turns away from the breaths¡¨ and so on. ¡¥But some say¡¦ should be there. mind turns away from the breaths, which have reached the point at which their manifestation investigating owing to their gradually increasing subtlety.¡¨ That is what the other people say is ¡§when the in-breaths and out-breaths have reached a subtler state owing to the influence and the counterpart sign; for when that has arisen, the mind turns away from the normal bre know why he made that mistake. ¡¥But some say¡¦ should be in front. Then there is a long q Pa?isambhid?.

In paragraph 171 ¡§He trains thus ¡¥I shall breathe in..I shall breathe out experiencing the he trains thus, I shall breathe in making known, making plain, the beginning, middle and end in-breath body. I shall breathe out making known, making plain, the beginning, middle and th entire out-breath body, thus he trains. Making them known, making them plain, in this way h and breathes out with consciousness associated with knowledge (or understanding). That is trains thus ¡§I shall breathe in.. I shall breathe out..¡¨¡¦

The English translation is ¡¥experiencing the whole body¡¦ but the explanation given in the not experiencing but making clear¡¦, making known, making plain. That means trying to see The P??i word ¡¥pa?isa?vedeti¡¦ can mean to experience but here it is explained to make cl evident. So it should be ¡¥making clear or making plain the whole breath body¡¦.

Now we come to the ¡¥breath body¡¦. The P??i word is just ¡¥k?ya¡¦. ¡¥K?ya¡¦ just means b Commentary explains it as breath body. ¡¥Body¡¦ here does not mean the whole body but ju breath here is called ¡¥body¡¦. The P??i word ¡¥k?ya¡¦ means group. Our body is a group of The breath also is a group of particles, small particles of matter. So the breath is also called the word ¡¥k?ya¡¦ here means the breath body not the whole body. The Commentary explain Commentary is based on the Pa?isambhid?magga just mentioned. In the Pa?isambhid?mag meaning breath body.

Now there are people who say that it must mean the whole body. They sweep the body or body for sensations. Observing the sensations in the body is not against vipassan?, not aga of the Buddha. But if you say that observing sensations going all through the body is accord passage, then you are wrong. This passage has to do with breathing meditation. ¡¥Breathing meditation taking breathing as an object. If you look for sensations, if you observe sensation longer watching the breath. So it is no longer mindfulness of breathing meditation. It become contemplation on the body or it may be contemplation on feeling. So in practice you can do body if you have attained a certain degree of concentration. You can watch sensations in the against vipassan?, but it is not according to this passage. This passage is shown with regard meditation.

Student: This passage is for samatha meditation?
Teacher: Yes.
Student: I find it hard to think of breathing meditation as samatha and not vipassan? becaus changing.
Teacher: No. In breathing meditation as samatha meditation the object does not change. Yo the tip of the nose and the object of the meditation is the breath, the in-breath and out-breat pay attention to other objects. You try to keep your mind on the object. Next week we will se count in one, out one, in two, out two and so on (in order to keep the mind on the breath). S breath as object only. It is samatha meditation.
Student: If you are aware of the body at all, it would have to be vipassan?.
Teacher: That¡¦s right.
Student: When you divided it at the beginning as the four foundations of mindfulness, the fir and the second was feeling?
Teacher: Feeling, yes.
Student: So this has something to do with this passage when you talk about the body?
Teacher: Yes. When we talk about the body, we are talking about the breath body, not the w seeing or being aware of the beginning, middle and end of the breath, that means keeping y when it goes in and goes out past this point, you try to see this as the beginning, middle and breath. It is like that. We cannot say that his passage means the whole body, that in this pas means the whole body.

To one only the beginning may be clear. To another only the middle may be clear or the e yet another all stages may be clear. We should be like that last person. That is what is expla paragraph 172.

Now paragraph 173 ¡§herein, he trains: he strives, he endeavors in this way. Or else the r one such as this is training in the higher virtue, his concentration (not consciousness) is trai higher consciousness, his understanding is training in the higher understanding. So he train develops, repeatedly practices, these three kinds of training, on that object, by means of tha by means of that attention. This is how the meaning should be regarded here.¡¨

You know the three trainings. They are morality, concentration and wisdom. They are calle trainings¡¦. Here they are called ¡¥the three higher trainings¡¦. Here P?timokkha restraint is c restraint in higher virtue, the training in higher virtue. The jh?nas are called the training in hig consciousness. Enlightenment is called the training in higher understanding. So ¡¥training in consciousness¡¦ means attainment of jh?nas and other sam?pattis.

¡§Herein, in the first part of the system (#1 & #2) he should only breathe in and breathe ou anything else at all, and it is only afterwards that he should apply himself to the arousing of k so on. Consequently the present tense is used here in the text: He knows ¡¥I breathe in¡¦..he breathe out¡¦¡¨ He is just to know that he is breathing in and breathing out, breathing in and

Just that. But in this method he must apply himself or he must train himself. He must make e effort to make clear the beginning, middle and end of each in-breath and out-breath. That is tense is used - ¡§I shall breathe in, I shall breathe out.¡¨ That means there is some effort inv not just being mindful of in-breaths and out-breaths. In addition to being mindful of in-breaths out-breaths he has to know, to clearly see the beginning, middle and the end.

In paragraph 175 ¡§He trains thus ¡¥I shall breathe in.. shall breathe out tranquilizing the b formations¡¦.¡¨ ¡¥Tranquilizing the bodily formations¡¦ does not mean that you must deliberat breath subtle. Actually you cannot do that. What is meant is just to pay attention to the breat mind calms down, the breath will become more and more subtle. That is what is meant here subtle by breathing softly or something like that. That will come with practice. You don¡¦t hav

The word ¡¥bodily formation¡¦ is used here. Do you know what that means? What is ¡¥bod breath here is called ¡¥bodily formation¡¦. That is why it is difficult to correctly understand in places. The same word is used and has different meanings. The P??i word is ¡¥k?ya sa~kh familiar with the word ¡¥sa~kh?ra¡¦. ¡¥K?ya sa~kh?ra¡¦ is translated as bodily formation. I do ¡¥formation¡¦ means. Is it the act of forming or something which is formed? Or both?

Student: Something that is formed.

Teacher: Oh, something that is formed. Here it means something that is formed. ¡¥Bodily for bodily formed. That means the breath is said to be caused by mind. There are four causes c properties - kamma, mind, climate and food. So mind is one of the causes of material proper and breathing out is said to be caused by mind. Although breathing in and breathing out is c needs the physical body to arise. If there is no body, there can be no breathing at all. So it is formed by the body. That means formed with the help of the body.

So in the footnote ¡§ ¡¥Bodily formation¡¦: the in-breath and out-breath. For although it is consciousness-originated (although it is caused by consciousness, mind), it is nevertheless formation¡¦ since its existence is bound up with the kamma-born body.¡¨ It is not ¡¥kamma-b bound up with the physical body, not necessarily kamma-born. So ¡§with the physical body a that as the means.¡¨ If there is no physical body, there can be no breath at all. It is said to be or made by, or maybe conditioned by the physical body. So it is called ¡¥bodily formation¡¦.

Student: Is there any kind of body that is not kamma-born?

Teacher: There are material properties which are caused by kamma, for example the sensiti sensitivity in the ear. They are caused by kamma. Voice is caused by consciousness or min other causes. When a rock hits against something, there is also noise. That is not caused by speak, my voice is caused by mind. There are four causes of material properties. Since brea property, it must have a cause. According to Abhidhamma it is caused by consciousness or consciousness-originated. Although it is caused by consciousness, it is not called ¡¥conscio here, but it is called ¡¥bodily formation¡¦ because it has to depend upon the physical body fo
It is not necessarily kamma-born body, but it is physical body.

Before we practice meditation or if we do not practice meditation, our breathing is said to b when we sit down and practice meditation and try to discern the breathing, then it becomes subtle. It will become so subtle the meditator has to investigate whether it exists or not. Som are alarmed or afraid because they say they that have stopped breathing. They are not sure or living at all.

The breathing is different from the other objects of meditation like the kasi?as, the kasi?a bodies and so on. Other objects become clearer with the development of concentration. The concentration becomes the clearer these objects or the images of these objects become. It i the breath. The better your concentration, the more subtle the breath becomes and the more see. You have to apply effort and understanding so that you do not lose it. It will become so will wonder whether you are breathing at all or whether you have stopped breathing. It will re state.

¡§Why is that? Because previously at the time when he has still not discerned (That mean practice meditation.) there is no concern in him, no reaction (¡¥No reaction¡¦ means no adve of that.) , no attention, no reviewing, to the effect that ¡¥I am [progressively] tranquilizing eac bodily formation¡¦. But when he has discerned, there is. So his bodily formation at the time w discerned is subtle in comparison with that at the time when he has not.¡¨ So the breathing b more and more subtle with the growth of concentration. You do not have to make them subt cannot make them subtle, but you just keep your mind on the breath and try to discern it tho clearly the beginning, the middle and the end of it. When you reach the next stage, it will bec subtle. You do not make them subtle, but they will become subtle. So you have to train your breathe in tranquilizing the bodily formation¡¨, but not really tranquilizing. They just become t just become subtle.

In paragraph 179 the relative subtlety is given. ¡§In discerning [the meditation subject the f gross, and it is subtle [by comparison] in the first jh?na access.¡¨ That means when you first meditation, the breath is gross. When you reach to access concentration, it becomes subtle. it is gross at that stage of access concentration, but it is subtle at the stage of first jh?na. Th first jh?na and the second jh?na access it is gross and in the second jh?na it is subtle and s and subtlety are here compared with jh?na and neighborhood of jh?na and next jh?na. So in gross. When you reach the neighborhood concentration, it is subtle. Then at the neighborho is gross, and at the first jh?na it is subtle. Then at the first jh?na it is gross and it is subtle at neighborhood of second jh?na. Then it is subtler in the second jh?na and so on. Subtleness the development of meditation and concentration.

There are two pinions. The first one is the opinion of the D?gha and Sa?yutta reciters. The the opinion of the Majjhima reciters. There is just a little difference. You know there are Nik?
Collections - Collection of Long Suttas, Collection of Medium Suttas, Collection of Miscellan Suttas. There were monks who made special study of one Collection. They may have some different from those who specialize in another Collection. So there is difference between the these reciters. So D?gha and Sa?yutta reciters think this way and Majjhima reciters think the was in the case of Samatha meditation.

¡§But in the case of insight, the bodily formation occurring at the time of not discerning is g discerning the primary elements it is [by comparison] subtle;¡¨ and so on. This paragraph de development in vipassan? meditation. It is gross in the preceding states and subtle in the su

Then there is a long quotation from the Pa?isambhid?magga. We have come to the end o methods. Do you remember the first four methods? What is the first one? You know when y you breathe in long. You know when you breathe out long that you breathe out long. There a short breaths. Then what? Making clear the whole breath body. And then? Tranquilizing the four methods pertain to samatha samatha meditation. They will be explained later.

The other groups of four have to do with jh?nas and also with the other foundations of min will be explained later.

Student: The other three are still samatha meditation?

Teacher: They can be samatha and they can be vipassan? depending on how you practice. breath and you get jh?na. Then you dwell on happiness or p?ti there. If you observe p?ti as you practice vipassan?. It will be described later.

For the bodily formations meaning breathing in and breathing out, please see paragraph 1 from the Pa?isambhid?magga is quoted. In the text ¡§I shall breathe in.. shall breathe out tra bodily formations? What are the bodily formations? Long in-breaths..out-breaths [experienci belong to the body; these things being bound up with the body are bodily formations.¡¨ This explanation. They are called ¡¥bodily formations¡¦ because they are bound up with the body. body. Without a body they cannot arise. So ¡¥bodily formations¡¦ mean in-breaths and out-br

Did you read the footnotes? Some of them are difficult to understand. I cannot go through But in footnote 47 it says ¡§What is meant is this: the contemplation of the body as an in-breath-and-out-breath body¡¨ and so on. It is very difficult to understand that translation. I translation. I think it is a little better.

S?dhu! S?dhu! S?dhu!

We offer this transcription of a Dhamma class with Venerable U S?l?nanda with the hope th beneficial for your understanding of the Buddha¡¦s teachings. This transcription has not been the record of spontaneous exchanges between the teacher and students. Therefore it is pos some errors. We are certain that such errors are infrequent and minimal. Say?daw is a meti teacher and offers these teachings in this manner out of compassion for people interested in and practice of meditation and Buddhism.

(Tape 19 / 186 -230)

Now we come to the real practice of breathing meditation. Beginning with paragraph 186 w of development. Out of 16 methods 4 methods have been described in detail with regard to the explanations for real development.

¡§The first tetrad is set forth as a meditation subject for a beginner (That is a beginner in s meditation.); but the other three tetrads are [respectively] set forth, as the contemplation of f [the manner of] consciousness, and of mental objects, for one who has already attained jh?n So there are four sets of four methods each. The first set is for beginners in the practice of m breathing meditation as a tranquillity meditation or serenity meditation. The other three are c contemplation on feeling, contemplation on consciousness, and contemplation on mental ob are four foundations of mindfulness -contemplation on the body, contemplation on feeling, c consciousness, and contemplation on mental objects or I would prefer to call them ¡¥dhamm Student: Sometimes we talk about mind and objects of mind. Would ¡¥objects of mind¡¦ be c Teacher: I think that also is not so good, not correct because everything is the object of minc object of mind. Sound is object of mind. Sight, sound, smell, taste and touch are not called ¡ objects¡¦.

¡§If a clansman who is a beginner wants to develop this meditation subject, and through in the fourth jh?na produced in breathing, to reach Arahantship together with the discriminatior special achievements like psychic powers, reading other peoples¡¦ minds and so on.), he sh the work connected with the purification of virtue, etc., (That means before practicing medita purify one¡¦s virtue, one¡¦s moral conduct as described in the first chapter.), in the way alrea after which he should learn the meditation subject in five stages from a teacher of the kind a described.¡¨ He should go to a teacher and learn the meditation subject.

¡§Herein, the five stages: learning, questioning, establishing, absorption, characteristic.¡¨ A are called ¡¥stages¡¦, maybe they are not real stages. Perhaps points or five-membered-lear ¡§ ¡¥Learning¡¦ is learning the meditation subject. ¡¥Questioning¡¦ is questioning about the subject. ¡¥Establishing¡¦ is establishing the meditation subject.¡¨ Here ¡¥establishing¡¦ really appearance of signs after you have practiced this meditation for some time. We will come to signs later. Before practicing one must learn what kind of signs can appear.

¡§ ¡¥Absorption¡¦ is the absorption of the meditation subject.¡¨ That means getting jh?na th meditation. Sometimes the word ¡¥appan?¡¦ in P??i means something like finishing somethi something. The same word is used for jh?na and also attainment. In the Visuddhi Magga so in the sense of culmination.

Student: Appan? come s from the root ¡¥pa???¡¦?

Teacher: This word is derived from the word ¡¥ar¡¦. Then a suffix is put between the root and There are two kinds of suffixes. There is ¡¥ar¡¦ and there is ¡¥na¡¦. And then there is a suffix causal meaning, that is having someone make something. That suffix is put between the roo suffix. In Sanskrit it becomes ¡¥arpa?a¡¦. ¡¥R¡¦ is changed to ¡¥P¡¦ in P??i and so we have th ¡¥appan?¡¦.That is sending to the finish or bringing to the finish - appan?. So the word can m expected stage of jh?na. So ¡§ ¡¥absorption¡¦ is the absorption of the meditation subject¡¨ m the end of meditation, the attainment of jh?na. This meditation is described as a serenity me objective of which is the attainment of jh?na.

¡§ ¡¥Characteristic¡¦ is the characteristic of the meditation subject; what is meant is that it i ascertaining of the meditation subject¡¦s individual essence thus ¡¥This meditation subject h characteristic¡¦. Learning the meditation subject in the five stages in this way, he neither tires worries the teacher.¡¨

¡§So in giving this meditation subject consisting in mindfulness of breathing attention he ca with the teacher or elsewhere in an abode of the kind already described.¡¨ So he may live wi the same place in the same monastery or he may live away from his teacher.

¡§Learning the meditation subject in the five stages thus, getting a little expounded at a tim a long time over reciting it, he should sever the minor impediments. After finishing the work o the meal and getting rid of any dizziness due to the meal he should seat himself comfortably Myanmar most monks take rest after the meal just before noon. They take rest for about an older monks. That is to get rid of dizziness after the meal. When the stomach is full, you feel rid of sleepiness you rest for awhile. After resting awhile practice is resumed.

¡§Then, making sure he is not confused about even a single word of what he has learned should cheer his mind by recollecting the special qualities of the Three Jewels.¡¨ That is just go to the real practice of mindfulness of breathing.

Then there are seven stages described here in the practice of mindfulness of breathing me glance we might expect that these stages are practiced one after the other, but that is not so out about that later. There may be a little confusion here.

The first one is counting. When we first practice breathing meditation, the first thing we do
When you do counting, you should not stop short of five or go beyond ten, or make any brea Counting should be at least five and at most ten. There should be no break in the series.

¡§By stopping short of five his thoughts get excited in the cramped space, like a herd of ca cramped pen.¡¨ It is too little if you say ¡§in one, out one, in two, out two¡¨ and again ¡§in one in two, out two¡¨.

¡§By going beyond ten his thoughts take the number [rather than the breaths] for their sup means you are concerned about numbers - in one, out one..in one hundred, out one hundre object of meditation rather than the breaths.

¡§By making a break in the series he wonders if the meditation subject has reached compl
¡¥By making a break in the series¡¦ the Sub-Commentary explained that it is counting one, th and so on. It may be like counting in one, out one and then you do not count the second pai three and then you let go of the next pair. Then you count in five, out five and so on. That is in the series. So if you make a break in the series, you will wonder if the meditation has reac or not.

One teacher of old in Myanmar explained it in another way. You count for some time and t counting for some time. Then you pick it up again. Then you give it up again and so on. He s is meant by making a break in the series. You may count in one, out one, in two, out two, in in four, out four, in five, out five. Then you stop counting. Then again you begin counting in c in two, out two and so on. That will make you confused about the series of counting.

So counting should not be below five nor above ten and there should be no break in the m should do his counting without those faults.¡¨

¡§When counting, he should at first do it slowly, [that is late].¡¨ I don¡¦t know where he got late¡¦. It is put in the square brackets so it is supposed to be from the Sub-Commentary. May Venerable ???amoli¡¦s addition.

Student: Could it mean slowly or late in the sense that you are behind the count or you are s anticipating the count? Sometimes people do that, getting into the counting rather than the b Teacher: I think that just ¡¥slowly¡¦ makes sense here, rather than the word ¡¥late¡¦ because grain measurer¡¦s counting. When a grain measurer having filled his measure says ¡§one¡¨ a then refills it, he goes on saying ¡§one, one, one¡¨. And there may be some rubbish or some pick it up and throw it away, and while so doing, he may be saying ¡§one, one¡¨ until he reac one. The same is true for two and so on. He may have to do something and he may be sayi until he comes to the third.

¡§So taking the in-breath or the out-breath, whichever appears [most plainly], he should be ¡¥one,one¡¦ and count up to ¡¥ten,ten¡¦, noting each as it occurs.¡¨ So the counting should be out one, in two, out two, in three, out three and so on.

¡§As he does his counting in this way the in-breaths and out-breaths become evident to hi and issue out.¡¨ When they go in and come out, they become evident. They become clearer

¡§Then he can leave off counting slowly, like a grain measurer, and he can count quickly, a does. For a skilled cowherd takes pebbles his pocket and goes to the cow pen in the mornin and so on. What do you think of the counting of the cowherd here? I think that in the beginni only seems to be one. You say ¡§in, out, in, out.¡¨ There seems to be only one breath. But w practiced for some time, one breath may appear to you as a series of short breaths. That is is a combination of small breaths. There are many breaths in what is formerly known as one in-breath you may count one, two, three, four, five or something like that. I think that is what here. Otherwise the simile of the cowherd counting cows that go out of the pen at the gate in time, three at a time - he may say three - but breathing in and breathing out does not come i exactly the same way as the cows. What is meant here I think is that formerly it seemed one appears to you as many breaths. So you count in one, two, three, four, five and going out on four, five.

¡§So he counts quickly ¡¥three,four,five¡¦ and so up to ten. In this way the in-breaths, and o which has already become evident to him while he counted them in the former way, now kee quickly.¡¨ ¡¥In the former way¡¦ is explained in the Sub-Commentary as ¡¥in the quick way¡¦, correct. In another Commentary it is explained that ¡¥in the former way¡¦ means in the slow w former way¡¦ means in the slow way, counting like a grain measurer does.

¡§Then knowing that they keep moving along quickly, not apprehending them either inside body], but apprehending them just as they reach the [nostril] door,¡¨ - that is important.You c the body or outside the body with the breaths, but apprehend them just as they reach the no

¡§He can do his counting quickly: ¡¥one,two, three, four, five; one, two, three, four, five, six..seven;..eight..nine;..ten¡¦.¡¨ Here also one may think it means that you count one to five, six, then one to seven, but I do not think that is the case here. You may count one breath as four, five; or one, two, three, four, five, six; or one, two, three, four, five, six, seven; or as ma can be aware of.

¡§For as long as the meditation subject is connected with counting, it is with the help of tha counting that the mind becomes unified.¡¨ So counting is just to keep your mind on the breat one-pointed or unified - ¡§ just as a boat in a swift current is steadied with the help of a rudd the help of a pole).¡¨

¡§When he counts quickly, the meditation subject becomes apparent to him as an uninterr this stage the meditation has not reached the jh?na stage. Before reaching the jh?na stage t interruptions. Interruptions are unavoidable. In Abhidhamma we learn that one thought proce some moments of life-continuum (bhava~ga). Then there is another thought process. So tho and disappear in quick succession, but they are buffered by the arisings of bhava~ga or life cannot be called ¡¥uninterrupted¡¦. It can be uninterrupted only during the period of jh?na att should say that it appears to him as though it were an uninterrupted process. It is very close uninterrupted stage.

¡§Then, knowing that it is proceeding uninterruptedly, he can count quickly in the way just discerning the wind either inside or outside [the body]. For by bringing his consciousness in the incoming breath it seems as if it were buffeted by the wind inside or filled with fat.¡¦ That appears to be soiling or something like that.

¡§By taking his consciousness outside along with the outgoing breath it gets distracted by of objects outside.¡¨ That is why we have to keep the mind at the entrance of the nostrils and into the body or outside the body.

¡§However, his development is successful when he fixes his mindfulness on the place tou breaths] (That means the tip of the nose or the upper lip.). That is why it was said above ¡¥H quickly in the way just described, not discerning the wind either inside or outside¡¦.¡¨ Strictly in-breath and out-breath are said to be caused by mind. In-breath and out-breath are the air element is caused by kamma, caused by citta (mind), caused by climate (heat or cold), and breath is said to be caused by mind. It is mind-generated. Mind-generated material propertie found, only exist inside the body and not outside. Here is the breath. When you exhale, you air goes out of the nose outside the body. As soon as it reaches outside the body, it become climate and not generated by mind. In order to watch breathing in and breathing out closely here at the tip of the nose or at the entrance of the nostril where they are really mind-genera out-breath leaves the tip of the nose, then it becomes generated by climate or temperature. attention has to be at the tip of the nose.

¡§But how long is he to go on counting?¡¨ Let us say a monk is practicing counting - in on two, out two and so on. ¡§Until, without counting mindfulness remains settled on the in-brea out-breaths as its object.¡¨ So he is to count until he can concentrate on breathing only witho

¡§For counting is simply a device for settling mindfulness on the in-breaths and out-breath cutting off the external dissipation of applied thoughts.¡¨ That is vitakka. We call it ¡¥initial application¡¦. Initial application or applied thought has the tendency to take mind out. In orde distractions by applied thought one has to keep the mind on the breath, on the object. This i stage. In the first stage you do counting. You do this counting until you can concentrate fully without counting. It may take days, weeks, or maybe months.

Now the second one. It is called ¡¥connection¡¦, but I think ¡¥connection¡¦ is not so accurat following. The P??i word means following. That is also a little misleading because ¡¥followi mean to follow the breath into the body or outside the body, but just to be mindful of the brea called ¡¥following¡¦ in P??i.

¡§Connection (anugamana) is the uninterrupted following of the in-breaths and out-breaths after counting has been given up.¡¨ So when you can be on the breaths without counting, yo At that moment you begin the second stage, connection or following.

¡§And that is not following after the beginning, the middle and the end.¡¨ It is just repeated your attention or your mindfulness on the breaths at the entrance of the nostrils.

¡§The navel is the beginning of the wind issuing out, the heart is the middle, and the nose- end.¡¨ The beginning, the middle and the end of the out-breath and in-breath are described out-breath the navel is the beginning, the heart is the middle, and the tip of the nose is the e in-breath the tip of the nose is the beginning, the heart is its middle, and the navel is its end.

¡§And if he follows after that, his mind is distracted by disquiet and perturbation, according said.¡¨ This is a quotation from the Pa?isambhid?magga. This quotation is important becaus this quotation we decide which is meant by ass?sa and pass?sa in P??i. Last week we foun ¡¥ass?sa¡¦ and ¡¥pass?sa¡¦ are interpreted differently by different Commentators.

Here is the quotation from that book by the Venerable S?riputta. It is as authorative as the Buddha. "When he goes in with mindfulness after the beginning, middle and end of the in-br distracted internally¡¨ - this word ¡¥internally¡¦ shows that the word used here means in-brea out-breath. So it is correctly translated here. There is no problem here. But if you read the P may be doubtful as to whether the word ¡¥ass?sa¡¦ means the in-breath or the out-breath. W passage, you come to the conclusion that ¡¥ass?sa¡¦ must mean in-breath. It says after the and end of let us say ¡¥A¡¦, his mind being distracted internally - when you say the word ¡¥in ¡¥A¡¦ must mean in-breath. It cannot mean out-breath. This is the quotation.

Now it says 3-4. Actually it is not with 3-4. Here comes the overlapping or combination of t stages at the same moment. ¡§So when he gives attention to it by connection, he should do beginning, middle and end (That means not following after the beginning, middle and end) b touching and fixing.¡¨

¡§There is no attention to be given to it by touching separate from fixing as there is by cou from connection.¡¨ So when we do counting and connection, there are two separate (modes attention to counting and attention to the breath. But with regard to touching and fixing there separate (modes) of attention apart from counting and from connection.

¡§But when he is counting the breaths in the place touched by each, he is giving attention counting and touching.¡¨ When you are counting, you are doing two stages at the same time touching. ¡¥Touching¡¦ here means keeping your mind at the place where the breath touche breath.

¡§When he has given up counting and is connecting them by means of absorption, then he his attention to them by connection, touching and fixing.¡¨So you give up counting and are ju breaths as they come and go. At that moment there can be connection and touching. When neighborhood concentration and jh?na concentration, then you are doing three at the same touching and fixing. So these two stages are not to be separated from counting and connect

¡§And the meaning of this may be understood through the simile of the man who cannot w gate-keeper given in the Commentaries, and through the simile of the saw given in the Pa?i

¡§Here is the simile of the man who cannot walk: just as a man unable to walk, who is rock the amusement of his children and their mother, sits at the foot of the swing post and sees b middle of the swing plank successively coming and going yet does not move from his place ends and the middle, so too, when a bhikkhu places himself with mindfulness, as it were, at post for anchoring [mindfulness] and rocks the swing of the in-breaths and out-breaths; he s mindfulness on the sign at that same place, and follows with mindfulness the beginning, mid in-breaths and out-breaths at the place touched by them as they come and go; keeping his then sees them without moving from his place in order to see them. This is the simile of the walk.¡¨ He is aware of the beginning, middle and end of the in-breaths and out-breaths, but on the breaths and not the beginning, middle and end. He cannot help but be aware of the b end, but he does not pay attention to them.

The next simile is the same, the gate-keeper. The gate-keeper is only interested in people gate and not those who have gone inside the city or who have gone outside the city. He is in those people who are at the gate. ¡§So too, the incoming breaths that have gone inside and breaths that have gone outside are not this bhikkhu¡¦s concern, but they are his concern eac at the [nostril] gate itself.¡¨ So only when they reach the nostril gate, do they become the obj mindfulness. This is the simile of the gate-keeper.

Next is the simile of the saw. It is more evident in this simile that he pays attention to or ke attention at the entrance of the nostrils. He pays attention to the breaths only when they rea that entrance, not going with the breath inside the body or outside the body.

In paragraph 202 near the beginning of the second paragraph ¡§ The man¡¦s mindfulness saw¡¦s teeth where they touch the tree trunk without his giving attention to the saw¡¦s teeth a and recede.¡¨ Actually that means the saw¡¦s teeth that have come and have gone. The saw point where they touch the log. They have gone this way or that way. That is what is meant. they approach and recede¡¦, but it is the saw¡¦s teeth that are not at the point of touching the that have gone the other way. ¡§Though they are not unknown to him as they do so; and he carries out a task and achieves an effect.¡¨

¡§So too the bhikkhu sits, having established mindfulness at the nose tip or on the upper li giving attention to the in-breaths and out-breaths that have come and gone.¡¨ It is not ¡¥as th recede¡¦ because he must pay attention as they approach and recede, as they come and go attention to those that have gone into the body or to those that have gone out of the body. ¡§ not unknown to him as they do so¡¨ - that is he is not unaware of them as they do so.

¡§And he manifests effort, carries out a task and achieves an effect.¡¨ Then there is an exp effort and so on. They are used in a different sense here. ¡§ ¡¥Effort¡¦: what is effort? The bo one who is energetic becomes wieldy - this is effort.¡¨ The mind and body becoming wieldy i here.

¡§What is he task? Imperfections come to be abandoned in one who is energetic, and his stilled - this is the task. What is the effect? Fetters come to be abandoned in one who is ene inherent tendencies come to be done away with - this is the effect.¡¨

¡§So these three things are not the object of a single consciousness, and they are neverth unknown, and the mind does not become distracted, and he manifests effort, carries out a ta effect.¡¨ This is the simile of the saw.

When we practice vipassan? (mindfulness) meditation we use this method also. Even whe vipassan?, you try to keep the mind at the entrance of the nostrils and try to be mindful of th coming in and going out.

¡§After someone has given his attention to counting, then just as when a body that is distu on a bed or chair¡¨ and so on - at the beginning the body is not settled, is not cooled down. Y There is squeaking of the bed or chair and so on. But when your mind gets stilled, then your stilled and your breath becomes subtle. ¡§Both the body and the mind become light. The phy though it were ready to leap up into the air.¡¨ You feel lightness in the body and mind.

¡§When his gross in-breaths and out-breaths have ceased, his consciousness occurs with subtle in-breaths and out-breaths as its object.¡¨ The breaths become subtle. So they becom meditation. ¡§And when that has ceased, it goes on occurring with the successively subtler s object.¡¨ The breaths become more and more subtle as he makes progress in the mindfulne meditation.

The mindfulness of breathing meditation is different from the other objects of meditation. F objects of meditation, they become clearer at each higher stage. Let us suppose you practic meditation. The sign of the kasi?a becomes clearer and clearer as you make progress. But t less clear when you make progress. It becomes subtle and it is more difficult to see. Paragra becomes more subtle for him at each higher stage, and it even comes to the point at which i manifest.¡¨ The breath is there, but it is so subtle that you are not aware of the breath. You m that you have stopped breathing all together or that you may have died.

¡§However, when it becomes unmanifest in this way, the bhikkhu should not get up from h his leather mat, and go away.¡¨ He must not go away saying, ¡§I have lost my object of med

¡§What should be done? He should not get up with the idea ¡¥Shall I ask the teacher?¡¦ (T ask the teacher.) or ¡¥Is my meditation subject lost?¡¦; for by going away, and so disturbing h meditation subject has to be started anew.¡¨ By changing postures the meditation subject ha anew. That is why we try to instruct meditators to keep still as much as they can, not to mak or not to make movements too often. When you make movements, you have to be mindful o if it can be done with mindfulness, it is still a distraction from the main object. It is better to ke as much as and as long as you can.

¡§So he should go on sitting as he was and [temporarily] substitute the place.¡¨ That mean give up, but go on sitting keeping his mind at the place. Now at this moment the breath has l that he is not aware of the breath. Let us say that he has lost the breath. But he must catch t the place where he formerly caught the breaths. Instead of leaving the place, you stay stuck let the breaths become clear again. That is what is meant here.

¡§These are the means for doing it.¡¨ When you think you have lost the breaths there are s ¡§ ¡¥Where do these in-breaths and out-breaths exist? Where do they not? In whom do they Then, as he considers thus, he finds that they do not exist in one inside the mother¡¦s womb is believed in those days. There are seven kinds of people that do not breathe - the child in t womb, those drowned in water (those who have drowned), or likewise in unconscious being become unconscious), or it can mean those who are reborn as mindless beings (It is explain the Sub-Commentary.), in the dead (Dead people don¡¦t breathe.), or in those who attain to t a person attains the fourth jh?na, there is no breathing.) , or in those born into a fine materia immaterial existence (That is those reborn as brahmas. Brahmas do not breathe.) , or to tho cessation of perception and feeling. There is an attainment called ¡¥attainment of cessation¡ cessation of mind. During that attainment the mental activities are temporarily stopped or the as long the person wishes. It may be one day, two days, or at most seven days. So there are of beings who have no breath.

So he should review this ¡§So he should apostrophize himself thus: ¡¥You with all your wis not inside a mother¡¦s womb or drowned in water.¡¨ You are not any one of those seven pers breath. So you are not without breath. ¡§Those in-breaths and out-breaths are actually existe you are not able to discern them because your understanding is dull.¡¨ Actually your underst that time, but since you cannot be aware of the breath, your wisdom or pa??? is said to be d moment.

¡§Then, fixing his mind on the place normally touched [by the breaths], he should proceed attention to that.¡¨ When you have lost the breath, you go to the same place where you have and try to wait for it there.

¡§These in-breaths and out-breaths occur striking the tip of the nose in a long-nosed man. a long nose, they strike at the tip of the nose. If you have a short nose, the breath strikes at of a short-nosed man.

¡§So he should fix the sign thus: ¡¥This is the place where they strike¡¦. This was why the said: ¡¥Bhikkhus, I do not say of one who is forgetful, who is not fully aware, [that he practic development of mindfulness of breathing¡¦.¡¨ That means if you are forgetful, if you do not ha mindfulness, you cannot practice mindfulness of breathing meditation. Your understanding h the Buddha said if you are forgetful, if you are not fully aware, you cannot practice mindfulne mindfulness of breathing meditation.

But the Commentator said: ¡§Although any meditation subject, no matter what, is success is mindful and fully aware, yet any meditation subject other than this one gets more evident giving it his attention. But this mindfulness of breathing is difficult, difficult to develop, a field which only the minds of Buddhas, Pacceka Buddhas and Buddhas¡¦ sons are at home. It is can it be cultivated by trivial persons. In proportion as continued attention is given to it, it bec peaceful and subtle. So strong mindfulness and understanding are necessary here.¡¨ Strong understanding are needed in the practice of mindfulness of breathing meditation than in the kinds of meditation.

¡§Just as when doing needlework on a piece of fine cloth a fine needle is needed, and a s instrument for boring the needle¡¦s eye, so too, when developing this meditation subject, wh cloth, both mindfulness, which is the counterpart of the needle, and the understanding asso which is the counterpart of the instrument for boring the needle¡¦s eye, need to be strong. A have the necessary mindfulness and understanding and must look for the in-breaths and ou than the place normally touched by them.¡¨ By just keeping the mind at the place where they waits for the breathing to become evident again. Then there is a simile of a ploughman. Let Paragraph 214 ¡§When he does so in this way, the sign soon appears to him.¡¨ He persev mind at the tip of the nose, and so the breathing becomes evident to him again. Then he dw that breathing continuously, and so soon appears the sign of different kinds. ¡§But it is not th all.¡¨ The sign does not appear in the same way for all. For one person one kind of sign will the other person another sign will appear. There is not one sign, but many forms of the sign.

¡§But it is not the same for all; on the contrary, some say that when it appears it does so to people producing a light touch like cotton or silk-cotton or a draught. But this is the expositio the commentaries: it appears to some like a star or a cluster of gems or a cluster of pearls, t rough touch like that of silk-cotton seeds or a peg made of heartwood.¡¨ That is what some They feel like something is put in the nostrils. It may even feel difficult to breathe. ¡§To other like a long braid string or a wreath of flowers or a puff of smoke, to others like a stretched-ou film of cloud or a lotus flower or a chariot wheel or the moon¡¦s disk or the sun¡¦s disk.¡¨ Any can appear to a person. When my father practiced this meditation, he said the sign was like Any one of those mentioned here or those not mentioned here may appear to a meditator. A the sign of this meditation.

¡§In fact this resembles an occasion when a number of bhikkhus are sitting together recitin When a bhikkhu asks ¡¥What does this Sutta appear like to you?¡¦, one says ¡¥It appears to mountain torrent¡¦, another ¡¥To me it is like a line of forest trees¡¦.¡¨ and so on. Depending o persons there can be multiplicity or great variety of these signs.

¡§Similarly this single meditation subject appears differently because of difference in perce born of perception, its source is perception, it is produced by perception. Therefore it should that when it appears differently it is because of difference in perception.¡¨ People have differ or different notions, so the sign appears differently to different people.

¡§And here, the consciousness that has in-breath as its object is one, the consciousness t out-breath as its object is another, and the consciousness that has the sign as its object is a you know from Abhidhamma. Consciousness can only take one object at a time. Consciousn as object is one. And then consciousness that takes the out-breath is another. So they are d

¡§And the consciousness that has the sign as its object is another. For the meditation subj neither absorption nor even access in one who has not got these three things [clear] (who do the in-breath, the out-breath, and the sign). But it reaches access and also absorption in one these three things [clear].¡¨

When the sign appears in this way, what must the meditator do? ¡§The bhikkhu should go tell him ¡¥Venerable sir, such and such has appeared to me¡¦. But [say the D?gha Reciters] say neither ¡¥This is the sign¡¦ nor ¡¥This is not the sign¡¦; after saying ¡¥It happens like this, friend¡¦.¡¨ The teacher should just say that it happens like this. The teacher should not say th sign or that this is not the sign. That is what the D?gha Reciters think.

¡§He should tell him ¡¥Go on giving it attention again and again¡¦; for if he were told ¡§It is he might [become complacent and] stop short at that.¡¨ That means the sign is difficult to get says that he has the sign, the student might think ¡§Oh, I¡¦ve got what s difficult to get and so down a little. I can practice any time I like.¡¨ He may think something like that. ¡§And if he we is not the sign¡¦, he might get discouraged and give up; so he should encourage him to keep attention without saying either. So the D?gha Reciters say, firstly.¡¨

¡¥D?gha reciters¡¦ means the reciters of the Long Discourses. You know there are Collecti Discourses, Middle Length Discourses, Kindred Discourses and The Gradual Sayings. Ther special study of the Long Discourses. Other monks make special study of the Middle Length on. The D?gha Reciters say like this.

¡§But the Majjhima Reciters (those who make special study of The Middle Length Sayings be told ¡¥This is the sign, friend. Well done. Keep giving attention to it again and again¡¦.¡¨ T there is no reason for a meditator to be discouraged or to be complacent when he knows tha sign. He practices meditation just to attain to the jh?na stage and later on for the attainment enlightenment. When the teacher says ¡§It is the sign¡¨, then he must be encouraged. So it i to the Majjhima Reciters to tell the student that it is the sign.

Student: And it is also Venerable Buddhaghosa¡¦s opinion because it is the second one?
Teacher: That¡¦s right. You remembered. That¡¦s very good.

¡§Then he should fix his mind on the same sign; and so from now on, his development pro fixing.¡¨ We come now to the fourth stage, fixing.

¡§So as soon as the sign appears, his hindrances are suppressed, his defilements subside is established, and his consciousness is concentrated in access concentration.¡¨ Then after concentration comes jh?na concentration.

¡§Then he should not give attention to the sign as to its color, or review it as to its [specific characteristic.¡¨ This is because if he gives attention to its color, it will become a color medita not breathing meditation. If he reviews it as to its characteristic, it will become another kind o rather than mindfulness of breathing meditation. He should not pay attention to its color or its characteristic.

¡§He should guard it as carefully as a king¡¦s chief queen guards the child in her womb du Wheel-turning Monarch.¡¨ That means a Universal Monarch. He should guard it.

¡§Then guarding it thus, he should make it grow and improve with repeated attention.¡¨ He attention to it, dwell on it for a long time.

¡§And he should practice the tenfold skill in absorption (Ch.4,42) and bring about evennes
That means evenness or balance of energy and concentration.

¡§As he strives thus, fourfold and fivefold jh?na is achieved by him on that same sign in th described under the earth kasi?a.¡¨ So jh?na arises in him. Then from first jh?na he would g third, fourth and fifth jh?nas. During the moments of jh?na the mind is very fixed, very still. T fourth stage, fixing.

After fixing comes what? After fixing comes observing. What is observing? Observing is in explained there. So now he will change to vipassan? meditation. Until this point he practiced breathing meditation as a samatha meditation. He got to the jh?na stage. After that it will be meditation.

¡§However, when a bhikkhu has achieved the fourfold and fivefold jh?na and wants to rea developing the meditation subject through observing and through turning away, he should m familiar by attaining mastery in it in the five ways and then embark upon insight by defining mentality-materiality. How?¡¨

Since he has jh?na, he makes the jh?na the basis for his vipassan? meditation. He enters after emerging from jh?na, he concentrates on the jh?na. First he embarks on insight by def materiality - defining this is mind, this is matter.

¡§On emerging from the attainment, he sees that the in-breaths and out-breaths have the the mind as their origin (because they are caused by mind); and that just as, when a blacksm being blown, the wind moves owing to the bag and to the man¡¦s appropriate effort, so too, i out-breaths are due to the body and the mind.¡¨

¡§Next, he defines the in-breaths and out-breaths and the body as ¡¥materiality¡¦, and the
and the states associated with the consciousness as the ¡¥immaterial¡¦ [mind].¡¨ Do you kno here, why it is given here? Because real vipassan? begins with discerning mind and matter able to see, not just guess, to see clearly mind and matter through meditation. First we neec Then after concentration of mind comes the discerning of mind and matter. This is the actua vipassan? meditation.

¡§Having defined mentality-materiality in this way, he seeks its condition.¡¨ From the stage mentality and materiality he progresses to the stage of seeing their conditions, or seeing tha conditioned, seeing their causes.

¡§With search he finds it and so overcomes his doubts about the way of mentality-materiali in the three divisions of time.¡¨ That means the breath and the body are materiality, and min others are mentality. They are not uncaused or they are not unconditioned. The breath is co
The consciousness and mental factors are conditioned by each other and are also condition base and so on. The next stage is seeing the conditionality of things actually, seeing the cor and matter.

¡§His doubts being overcome, he attributes the three characteristics [beginning with that mentality and materiality], comprehending [them] by groups; he abandons the ten imperfecti beginning with illumination, which arise in the first stages of the Contemplation of Rise and F defines as ¡¥the path¡¦ the knowledge of the way that is free from these imperfections.¡¨ This description of the stages of vipassan? meditation. They will be treated in detail in succeedin

After discerning conditions he discerns what? The three characteristics - impermanence, s insubstantiality. So these three characteristics he comes to see.

¡§He reaches Contemplation of Dissolution by abandoning [attention to] arising.¡¨ At the ea seeing arising and falling the impediments come in, the impediments to the progress of vipa lights, feeling very happy and so on. When they arise, a yogi may think that he has attained he thinks in this way, he will not make effort to reach higher stages. He must understand tha the way to enlightenment. They are just obstacles. He has to overcome these obstacles. Wh these obstacles, he reaches the higher stages of discerning rising and falling. So there are t discernment of rising and falling, the lower stage and the higher stage. After reaching the lov ten impediments occur in the yogi. After conquering these ten impediments he reaches the h discerning rise and fall.

From there he reaches another stage where he sees only the falling, only the dissolution, disappearing of things. Only the dissolution of things appears to him clearly. That is the cont dissolution.

¡§He reaches Contemplation of Dissolution by abandoning [attention to] arising. When all appeared as terror owing to the contemplation of their incessant dissolution.¡¨ After that he s dangerous, as dangers. He is not afraid of them; he does not fear them. Still he sees them a different. Sometimes you are not afraid of something, but you recognize it as dangerous. He get afraid of them. If he gets afraid of them, then he has akusala in him and not meditation. W things just disappearing, disappearing, disappearing, he comes to see danger in disappearin

After that he becomes dispassionate towards them. When you see something is dangerou to it. You want to get away from it. So he becomes dispassionate towards them. ¡§His greed away, and he is liberated from them.¡¨ ¡¥Liberated from them¡¦ means he has gotten rid of a and delusion and has become enlightened.

¡§After he has [thus] reached the Four Noble Paths in due succession and has become es Fruition of Arahantship, he at last attains to the 19 kinds of Reviewing Knowledge.¡¨ After the each stage of enlightenment there is what we call ¡¥reviewing¡¦ - reviewing the Path, reviewi reviewing Nibb?na, reviewing the mental defilements that have been eradicated and reviewi defilements which remain. There are five kinds of reviewing after the first stage, second stag stage. But at the fourth stage, after becoming an Arahant, there are only four kinds of review mental defilements remaining. For the Arahants there are only four kinds of reviewing - revie Fruit, Nibb?na and defilements eradicated. So all together we have 19 kinds of reviewing kn

¡§And he becomes fit to receive the highest gifts from the world with its deities.¡¨ A person practices mindfulness of breathing meditation as samatha meditation and gets jh?na. Then basis for vipassan? meditation, he practices vipassan? meditation and gradually reaches the

¡§At this point his development of concentration through mindfulness of breathing, beginni and ending with looking back is completed.¡¨

In the stages ¡¥observing¡¦ means vipassan?. ¡¥Turning away¡¦ means attainment of Path enlightenment. ¡¥Looking back¡¦ means reviewing. All eight stages are complete now. ¡§This on the first tetrad in all aspects.¡¨

Do you remember the first four methods? Long, short, whole breath body and tranquilizing are the four.

¡§Now since there is no separate method for developing the meditation subject in the case tetrads, their meaning therefore needs only to be understood according to the word commen special method of practicing the other sets of four. This is because the other sets of four are practiced after a person reaches the jh?na stage by practicing the first four methods. There for he other tetrads.

In the second tetrad ¡§He trains thus ¡¥I shall breathe in.. shall breathe out experiencing h (p?ti).¡¨ That means he clearly sees, or clearly experiences, or clearly knows p?ti.

¡§Herein, the happiness is experienced in two ways: (a) with the object (That means by wa and (b) with (by way of) non-confusion.¡¨ I think ¡¥with¡¦ does not mean by way of. I think it is say ¡¥by way of¡¦.

¡§How is the happiness experienced with the object? He attains the jh?nas in which happi the time when he has actually entered upon them the happiness is experienced with the obje obtaining of jh?na, because of the experiencing of the object.¡¨ When a person obtains the fi jh?na, what is the object of that jh?na? The sign, the counterpart sign. At the moment of jh?n

object is the counterpart sign and not happiness. But here it said he is experiencing, he is kn happiness, he is knowing p?ti at that moment. So that means at the time of reaching jh?na h said to be known clearly by way of the object. That means because the object is clearly know because the object is known, p?ti is also known. It is not that p?ti becomes the object of jh?n the object itself we can say that p?ti is also known.

Footnote 62 ¡§ ¡¥With the object¡¦: under the heading of the object. The happiness include that has the object is experienced ¡¥because of the experiencing of the object¡¦. What is me a man who is looking for a snake discovers its abode, the snake is, as it were, already disco owing to the ease with which he will then be able to catch it with charms and spells.¡¨ He has the snake, but it is as good as having caught it.

¡§So too, when the object, which is the abode of happiness, is experienced, then the happ experienced too, owing to the ease with which it will be apprehended in its specific and gene characteristics.¡¨ ¡¥Specific characteristic¡¦ means its characteristic which is not shared by o states. ¡¥General characteristic¡¦ means its characteristic of impermanence, suffering and no when the object is clearly seen, p?ti is also said to be clearly seen. That is what is meant he ¡§How with non-confusion? When, after entering upon and emerging from one of the two j happiness, he comprehends with insight that happiness associated with the jh?na as liable t to fall, then at the actual time of the insight the happiness is experienced with (by way of) no owing to the penetration of its characteristics.¡¨ That is when he practices vipassan? meditat he enters into the first or second jh?na. He emerges from it. Then he takes the happiness of as an object of meditation and contemplates on it as impermanent, suffering and soulless. A really clearly sees the happiness. ¡¥Non-confusion¡¦ means he sees it as it is - as imperman as soulless and not otherwise.

Then there is a quotation from the Pa?isambhid?magga. We can skip it.

Paragraph 229 ¡§The remaining [three] clauses should be understood in the same way as is this difference here. The experiencing of bliss (sukha) must be to be through three jh?nas present in first jh?na, second jh?na and third jh?na. So here it says ¡§through three jh?nas a mental formations through four.¡¨ What is ¡¥mental formation¡¦ here? We don¡¦t have to ask explained. ¡§The mental formation consists of the two aggregates of feeling and perception. formation¡¦ means feeling and perception. So feeling and perception are called ¡¥mental form sa~kh?ra¡¦ because they arise only when consciousness arises. They depend upon conscio arising. They are said to be conditioned by citta, by consciousness or mind. ¡¥Mental format mind-formed, or formed by, or conditioned by consciousness. Here ¡¥conditioned by conscio mean feeling and perception. ¡¥Experiencing the mental formation¡¦ means experiencing fee

¡§And in the case of the clause, experiencing bliss, it is said in the Pa?isambhid? in order plane of insight here [as well]: ¡¥Bliss, there are two kinds of bliss, bodily bliss and mental bl Tranquilizing the mental formation: tranquilizing the gross mental formation; stopping it, is th
So there is experiencing bliss and tranquilizing formations. In the first jh?na, second jh?na, t there is sukha. During those jh?nas a person is said to experience bliss. ¡¥Tranquilizing the formation¡¦ means tranquilizing the gross feeling and perception.

¡§Here, moreover in the ¡¥happiness¡¦ clause feeling [which is actually being contemplated is stated under the heading of ¡¥happiness¡¦ [which is a formation] but in the ¡¥bliss¡¦ clause stated in its own form.¡¨ The P??i words are ¡¥p?tispatisamvedi¡¦ and ¡¥sukhapatisamvedi¡¦. p?tipatisamvedi, that is experiencing happiness feeling is stated under the heading of happi is says ¡¥happiness¡¦, we are to understand it to mean feeling. Do you know why he is sayin Because this second tetrad has to do with contemplation on feeling. Although it says ¡¥expe happiness¡¦, the real thing is clearly understanding or clearly knowing feeling. Feeling is des under the heading of happiness (p?t?).

The real word that is used is ¡¥happiness¡¦ (p?ti), but what we have to understand is feeling.

In the clause experiencing bliss it is stated in its own form. That means sukhapatisamvedi. to feeling. So here feeling is stated directly. So we do not have to go round here. So ¡¥exper means experiencing the feeling. ¡¥¡¦Experiencing happiness¡¦ (p?ti) also means experiencin Experiencing bliss (sukha) is stated in its own form, not under any other thing.

¡§In the two mental-formation clauses the feeling is that [necessarily] associated with perc of the words ¡¥perception¡¦ and ¡¥feeling¡¦ belong to the mind, these things being bound up mental formations.¡¨ The third clause, tranquilizing the mental formations - although ¡¥menta means feeling and perception, here it is made to mean feeling accompanied by perception. same thing. It is feeling accompanied by or associated with perception. That is why this tetra contemplation on feeling.

The Commentator is explaining this to us because we may ask about the second and clau that he is aware of p?ti which is not feeling, but it is included in the feeling contemplation. So explained that although the word ¡¥p?ti¡¦ is mentioned, but we must understand feeling, not tetrad has to do with the contemplation on feelings. This second tetrad can only be practiced jh?nas. In order to understand this you have to understand that the first jh?na, second jh?na by p?ti and the third jh?na is accompanied by sukha. The fourth jh?na also is accompanied jh?na is accompanied by upekkh?. This is the end of the second tetrad. The third tetrad and finish next week.

S?dhu! S?dhu! S?dhu!

We offer this transcription of a Dhamma class with Venerable U S?l?nanda with the hope th beneficial for your understanding of the Buddha¡¦s teachings. This transcription has not been the record of spontaneous exchanges between the teacher and students. Therefore it is pos some errors. We are certain that such errors are infrequent and minimal. Say?daw is a meti teacher and offers these teachings in this manner out of compassion for people interested in
and practice of meditation and Buddhism.

(Tape 20 / Ps: 231 ¡V 251)

Today we come to the third tetrad. The third tetrad has to do with consciousness. ¡§In the experience of the [manner of] consciousness must be understood through four jh?nas.¡¨ Her he got the words ¡¥manner of¡¦. I don¡¦t find them in the Sub-Commentary. We don¡¦t need t the manner of consciousness¡¦. We may say ¡¥experiencing consciousness¡¦. That means c consciousness. So I would leave out the words ¡¥manner of¡¦.

The next is: ¡§Gladdening the consciousness: he trains thus, making the mind glad, instilli it, cheering it, rejoicing it, I shall breathe in, shall breathe out. Herein, there is gladdening in through concentration and through insight.¡¨ So through samatha and vipassan?.

¡§How through concentration? He attains the two jh?nas in which happiness (p?ti) is prese jh?nas mean what? According to the fourfold method it means the first and second jh?nas. I the fivefold method, it is first, second and third jh?nas. Mostly the fourfold method is used in it says two jh?nas, the first and the second according to the fourfold method.

¡§At the time when he has actually entered upon them he inspires the mind with gladness, into it, by means of the happiness associated with the jh?na.¡¨ When he is in the first jh?na o jh?na, there is p?ti arising together with jh?na. When there is p?ti or happiness, his mind is g experiences that at the moment of jh?na attainment.

¡§How through insight? After entering upon and emerging from one of the two jh?nas acco he comprehends with insight and happiness associated with the jh?na as liable to destructio at the actual time of insight he inspires the mind with gladness, instills gladness into it by ma happiness associated with jh?na the object.¡¨ The person who is practicing vipassan? here h before. So he enters into jh?na first and emerges from the jh?na. Then he contemplates on with jh?na, contemplates on p?ti as liable to destruction, liable to fall because if you practice you must see the impermanence, suffering and soulless nature of things. Therefore he conte liable to fall, liable to destruction.

Student: Bhante, is p?ti vedan? or not?

Teacher: P?ti is not vedan?.

Student: This is p?ti?

Teacher: Yes, this is actual p?ti.

¡§It is of one progressing in this way that the words ¡¥He trains thus: I shall breathe in..sha out gladdening the consciousness¡¦, are said.¡¨ In this method the meditator enters into jh?n from the jh?na and contemplates here on p?ti as liable to destruction and so on. He inspires gladdens his mind thus.

¡§ ¡¥Concentrating the consciousness¡¦ means evenly placing the mind.¡¨ We have the P? ¡¥sam?daha?¡¦. ¡¥Sama?¡¦ means evenly. ¡¥?dahanto¡¦ means putting or placing. So the P?

means evenly placing. It is a synonym for sam?dhi. Sam?dhi is that mental state which keep the object. The mind is collected, not scattered, not only the mind but the other concomitants mind and the other concomitants are collected and kept on the object without being distracte function of sam?dhi.

¡§Evenly placing the mind, evenly putting it on its object by means of the first jh?na and so sam?dhi is mentioned, we take any jh?na. That is because there is sam?dhi in any jh?na.

The first jh?na has how many factors? Five factors. The fifth one is what? Ekaggat?.
That is one-pointedness of mind or unification of mind which is a synonym for sam?dhi. Sam strong form is present in all jh?nas - first, second, third and fourth.

¡§Or alternatively when, having entered upon those jh?nas and emerged from them, he co insight the consciousness associated with the jh?na as liable to destruction and to fall.¡¨ Her into jh?na, emerges from jh?na, and concentrates on jh?na consciousness.

You know what jh?na is. Technically speaking ¡¥jh?na¡¦ means the collection of the five fa factors, or three factors, or two factors. Jh?na consciousness is consciousness accompanie There are other concomitants arising together with the jh?na factors and with the jh?na cons the meditator takes consciousness as the object of vipassan?. In the previous method he ta object of vipassan?. Here he takes consciousness as the object of vipassan?.

¡§At the actual time of insight momentary unification of the mind arises.¡¨ This is important momentary unification. In P??i it is called ¡¥kha?ika sam?dhi¡¦. I think you should be familiar words ¡¥kha?ika sam?dhi¡¦. ¡¥Kha?ika¡¦ means lasting for a moment. ¡¥Kha?a¡¦ means a mo sam?dhi. So kha?ika sam?dhi is momentary concentration, momentary unification of the mi the Sub-Commentary. The translation is given in the footnotes. What is needed in vipassan? kha?ika sam?dhi, this momentary sam?dhi.

There are two kinds of sam?dhi in samatha meditation. They are mentioned at the beginni third chapter. One is neighborhood or access sam?dhi. The second one is absorption sam? kinds of sam?dhi, neighborhood sam?dhi and absorption sam?dhi. When you practice sama get neighborhood concentration. From neighborhood concentration you progress to jh?na co

In vipassan? there can be no neighborhood concentration because neighborhood implies neighbor? It is the neighbor of jh?na. But in vipassan? there is no jh?na. So there can be no access concentration in vipassan?. Instead of neighborhood concentration there is this mom concentration. This is as good as the neighborhood concentration. Concentration lasting for that is the word meaning of momentary concentration.

¡§For that too, when it occurs uninterruptedly on its object in a single mode and is not over opposition, fixes the mind immovably, as if in absorption.¡¨ The momentary concentration ca the object and not let it be distracted. That is what we call ¡¥momentary concentration¡¦.

When a person practices vipassan?, in the beginning he may have wandering of mind, goi there. He has to bring it back to the main object again and again. Then a time will come with this wandering comes less frequently until it will not come at all. The mind will not be distract even when there is distraction the meditator will catch it right away. He will not be carried aw wandering or stray thoughts for ten seconds, twenty seconds and so on. That is the time wh said to have gained the momentary concentration. That means the mind is on the main obje And even if there is wandering mind the meditator is able to catch it, is able to be mindful of it goes out. Sometimes you will be able to stop it before it goes out. The moment it is about t are aware. So you can stop it before it goes out. Such a time is called the time that a person momentary concentration. Momentary concentration is important in vipassan? meditation. It of neighborhood or access concentration in samatha meditation. With that concentration min It arises through the penetration of the characteristics of impermanence and so on. The mind matter and on their impermanent nature and others.

The next one is liberating the consciousness, freeing the consciousness. ¡¥Liberation¡¦ he different things with different jh?nas. Since it has to do with jh?nas, jh?nas are mentioned he jh?na liberates the mind from what? The first jh?na liberates the mind from hindrances. That there are hindrances in your mind, you cannot get the first jh?na. So first jh?na frees your m hindrances. The second jh?na frees your mind from what? Initial application (vitakka) and su application (vic?ra). And the third jh?na frees your mind from p?ti and so on.

¡§Or alternatively, when having entered upon those jh?nas and emerged from them, he co insight the consciousness associated with the jh?na as liable to destruction and to fall.¡¨ Firs into jh?na and emerges from jh?na. Then he comprehends the consciousness associated w to destruction and so on.

¡§Then at the actual time of insight he delivers, liberates, the mind from the perception of p means of the contemplation of impermanence.¡¨ If he contemplates on impermanence, he lib the conception of permanence. ¡§From the perception of pleasure by means of the contemp he contemplates on dukkha, then he will be able to free his mind from the perception of sukh perception of self by means of the contemplation of not self¡¨ - if he contemplates on not self able to get rid of the perception of self. ¡§From delight by means of the contemplation of disp when you contemplate on dispassion, delight will be gotten rid of. ¡§From greed by means o fading away¡¨ - ¡¥fading away¡¦ really means Magga. ¡§From arousing by means of the cont cessation¡¨ - when you contemplate on cessation, you do not arouse anything, you do not ca arise. ¡§From grasping by means of the contemplation of relinquishment¡¨ - when you conte relinquishment, then you abandon grasping. These are those liberated by different stages of meditation. This also pertains to both samatha and vipassan?.

This tetrad should be understood as dealing with contemplation of mind. The first is what?
or making clear the mind consciousness. The second is gladdening consciousness. The thir consciousness. The fourth is liberating consciousness. This tetrad has to do with the contem the third of the four foundations of mindfulness.

I told you once that whenever I come to small print, I am afraid to read it. You know the Su are actually more difficult than the Commentaries. Venerable ???amoli used the Sub-Comm explanation here. Sometimes he misunderstood a word or a whole sentence.

¡§At the actual time of insight: at the time of contemplation of dissolution. For dissolution is furthest extreme of impermanence.¡¨ ¡¥At the time of actual insight¡¦ means at the time of co dissolution. Contemplation on dissolution comes a little later in vipassan?. The first knowled vipassan? is defining mind and matter. After getting the momentary concentration, you come matter clearly. After getting the momentary concentration, you come to see mind and matter see the relationship between mind and matter or the relationship between what makes notes cause and effect. Then you come to see the impermanence of things. The next stage is see disappearing. Then the next stage is seeing dissolution. First you see arising and dissolution on you see dissolution more clearly, or dissolution becomes more prominent than arising. Th here. ¡¥The actual time of insight¡¦ means at the time of the contemplation of dissolution. ¡§D the furthest extreme of impermanence.¡¨ It is the highest stage of impermanence because a there will be nothing. Arising, going towards dissolution and dissolution itself - they are the th of existence. After dissolution the thing is gone. So ¡§Dissolution is the furthest extreme of im When you see dissolution, you will not fail to see impermanence.

¡§So the meditator who is contemplating dissolution by its means sees under the heading (He is watching consciousness and he sees) the whole field of formations as impermanent, Here ¡¥formations¡¦ means everything in the world. When we say ¡¥kamma formations¡¦, we volition. But when we say ¡¥formations¡¦, we mean everything in the world. Everything which everything which is conditioned is called ¡¥formation¡¦ here. The P??i word is sa~kh?ra. The sa~kh?ra is made by causes or produced by causes.

¡§It is this contemplation of impermanence, etc., is called relinquishment as giving up and as entering into because it gives up defilements along with aggregate producing kamma form by seeing the flaws in what is formed and by inclining toward the opposite of what is formed, it enters into that Nibb?na. Consequently the meditator who has that contemplation gives up enters into Nibb?na in the way stated.¡¨ Relinquishment will be treated later. There are two k relinquishment. We will come to that later.

¡§Herein, the contemplation of what is impermanent as only impermanent is ¡¥contemplati impermanence¡¦.¡¨ Do you see that sentence? There is something wrong here. The contemp is explained in two ways in the Sub-Commentary. Contemplation of what is impermanent is impermanence and contemplation of something as impermanent is also called ¡¥contemplat The P??i word, following the sequence in P??i, is impermanence contemplation. ¡¥Imperma means contemplation of what is impermanent and contemplation on something as imperma the same thing, but it is how words are explained in the Commentary.

¡§This is a name for insight that occurs by taking formations of the three [mundane] planes aside the supramundane] as impermanent.¡¨ Vipassan? meditation never takes the supramu cannot take the supramundane as object. That is because vipassan? must see the imperma of things. So it can only take mundane things as object.

¡§ ¡¥From the perception of permanence¡¦: from the wrong perception that occurs perceivi permanent, eternal; also the various views¡¨ - here I have to correct something. Strike out th and ¡¥various¡¦. ¡§Also consciousness and wrong view should be regarded as included unde perception.¡¨ In the Commentary it is stated as ¡¥from the perception of permanence¡¦. ¡¥Fro of permanence¡¦ really means from the perception of consciousness and from the wrong vie other two are included under the heading of perception.

¡§Likewise with the perception of pleasure and so on. ¡¥By means of the contemplation of means of contemplation that occurs in the mode of dispassion for formations.¡¨ The others a understand.

Let us go to the last tetrad paragraph 234. Here contemplating impermanence - in connec phrase the author gives us what it is that is impermanent, what is impermanence, what is the impermanence, and what is the one who contemplates impermanence. There are four things The first is the impermanent. What is the impermanent? The answer is the five aggregates. are those that are impermanent because their essence is rise and fall, and change. Their es nature is to rise, to fall and to change.

¡§Impermanence is the rise and fall and change in those same aggregates.¡¨ Why do we s aggregates are impermanent? Because these aggregates arise, disappear and they change and change is something by which we know that they are impermanent. That is why they are ¡¥impermanent¡¦ here. They rise, and fall, and change.

¡§Or it is their non-existence after having been.¡¨ That means disappearing after coming in Everything comes into being and then disappears.

¡§The meaning is, it is the break-up of produced aggregates through their momentary diss do not remain in the same mode.¡¨ I am a little concerned about the word ¡¥momentary¡¦. I lo dictionary. It has at least two meanings. The first one, the first meaning is just for a moment.
meaning of momentary is at every moment or moment to moment. Here moment to moment ¡¥momentary unification of mind¡¦ we mean for a short time. So there is a difference betwee used in one sentence and the ¡¥momentary¡¦ used in the other sentence. So in the expressi unification of mind¡¦ we mean lasting only for a moment. But here ¡¥momentary dissolution¡¦ moment dissolution, dissolving at every moment.

¡§Contemplation of impermanence is contemplation of materiality, etc., as ¡¥impermanent impermanence. One contemplating impermanence possesses that contemplation. So it is w breathing in and breathing out that it can be understood of him ¡¥He trains thus: I shall breat breathe out contemplating impermanence¡¦.¡¨ The person is the one who possesses contem So the impermanent, impermanence, contemplation of impermanence, and the one who pos impermanence - four things are differentiated here.

Footnote 65 ¡§What is called ¡¥permanent¡¦ is what is lasting, eternal, like Nibb?na. What ¡¥impermanent¡¦ is what is not permanent, and is possessed of rise and fall. He said ¡¥the fi impermanent¡¦, signifying that they are formed dhammas as to meaning.¡¨ It should be ¡¥form reality¡¦, not meaning. According to reality they are formed dhammas, they are conditioned d

The P??i word ¡¥attha¡¦ has many meanings. The obvious meaning of it is meaning. The m called ¡¥attha¡¦. It has other meanings as well like substance, reality or thing. Here the P??i ¡¥atthato¡¦ means in reality. So ¡§they are formed dhammas as to reality or in reality¡¨, not as ¡§Why? Because their essence is rise and fall and change; the meaning is that their individ have rise and fall and change. Herein, formed dhammas arising owing to cause and conditio after non-existence, their acquisition of an individual self (¡¥Individual self¡¦ means just some identity. It is not self with a capital S.), is ¡¥rise¡¦. Their momentary cessation when arisen is Their changedness due to aging is ¡¥change¡¦.¡¨ This is the explanation of the words.

¡§For just as when the occasion of arising dissolves and the occasion of dissolution [succe no break in the object (vatthu), so also there is no break in object on the occasion facing di (That means going toward dissolution. That means the middle phase of existence.), in other which is what the term of common usage ¡¥aging¡¦ refers to.¡¨

Do you understand this? You don¡¦t? What is ¡¥break in the object¡¦? When one misunders one does not understand the whole sentence. He misunderstood the P??i word ¡¥bheda¡¦. ¡ dissolution or break. It can also mean difference. What is meant here is difference, differenc There are three submoments for one big moment - the arising, going towards dissolution, ar are three submoments. During these three submoments one dhamma is said to be existing. different from the first submoment. At the third submoment which is different from the first su is no difference in the thing. The thing is still existing. A given thing, a given dhamma must e three submoments. At the first submoment or at the last submoment the thing is the same. T difference in the thing. In the same way there is no difference in the thing at the middle stag the Sub-Commentary is telling us.

¡§For just as when the occasion of arising dissolves and the occasion of dissolution [succe no break in the object¡¨ - no, this is not correct. ¡§Just as at the dissolution moment which is from the arising moment there is no difference of the thing, so also there is no difference at t aging or at the moment of presence, the middle moment.¡¨

¡§So it is proper that the aging of a single dhamma is meant, which is called ¡¥momentary without any reservation there must be no break (It should be difference.) in the object betwe of arising and dissolution, otherwise it follows that one thing arises and another dissolves.¡¨ exists for three submoments. The third submoment is different from the first submoment. An submoment is also different from the first submoment and the third submoment. Although th different the thing is the same because it is existing for these three submoments. There shou difference of object between the moments of arising, aging and disappearing. This is what th is telling us.

Student: So this is a theoretical construct about how you analyze moments.

Teacher: Yes, and how we explain moment to moment dissolution. According to Abhidhamm submoments of existence is real. Otherwise it is not real. So concepts are said not to posses phases of existence. We do not know when they come into being and when they dissolve. S of their own, no existence of their own. Concept exists only in our minds, but not in reality. W according to Abhidhamma is that which has three phases of existence. That is why consciou states are real, and material properties are real. Nibb?na is real also. Nibb?na is real, but it l beginning or end. So it is different from the other three.

Paragraph 235 ¡§Contemplating fading away: there are two kinds of fading away, that is, f destruction, and absolute fading away. Herein, fading away as destruction is the momentary formations.¡¨ Moment to moment dissolution of formations is called ¡¥fading away as destruc ¡¥dissolution¡¦.

¡§ ¡¥Absolute fading away¡¦ is Nibb?na. Contemplation of fading away is insight and it is th insight and Path are meant here.), which occur as the seeing of these two.¡¨ So contemplati can be at the vipassan? moments as well as at the Path moment.

¡§The same method of explanation applies to the clause, contemplating cessation.¡¨ So ce away here are used synonymously.

¡§Contemplating relinquishment: relinquishment is of two kinds too, that is to say, relinquis giving up, and relinquishment as entering into.¡¨ This word has two meanings - giving up and ¡§Relinquishment itself as [a way of] contemplation is ¡¥contemplation of relinquishment¡¦. word explanation.) For insight is called both ¡¥relinquishment as giving up¡¦ and ¡¥relinquish into¡¦ since [firstly] through substitution of opposite qualities it gives up defilements.¡¨ Now he a little inaccuracy. He gives up defilements together with resultant aggregates and the aggre kamma formations. There are three things - defilements, resultant aggregates and aggregat formations. These three things are abandoned, relinquished. It is through substitution of opp people want to be literal when translating and that makes it a little more difficult to understan ¡¥substitution of opposite qualities¡¦ simply means momentary abandonment.

At this moment you don¡¦t have attachment in your mind or you don¡¦t have anger in your m substituting wholesome states for unwholesome states. So long as the wholesome states ar will be no unwholesome states. This kind of abandonment is called ¡¥substitution of opposite what is popularly known as momentary abandonment.

There are three kinds of abandonment - momentary, temporary, and absolute. Temporary we get jh?nas. During jh?nas the mental defilements can be put away for some time. Their a longer than the momentary abandonment. Since the jh?nas cannot abandon the defilements together, they come back when there are conditions for them. The third kind of abandonmen moment of enlightenment, at the moment of Magga. That is the total destruction of defileme will not come back again.

Here the first one is meant through the substitution of opposite qualities. We say that vipas mental defilements. Vipassan? abandons mental defilements by the first way. It is just mome

¡§[Firstly] through substitution of opposite qualities it gives up defilements together with res aggregates with their aggregate producing kamma formations, and [secondly], through seein what is formed, it also enters into Nibb?na by inclining towards Nibb?na, which is the opposi formed.¡¨ Vipassan? is here called ¡¥giving up¡¦ and ¡¥entering into¡¦ let us say. ¡¥Giving up¡ momentarily giving up defilements, their resultant aggregates, and then aggregate producing Then it is said to enter into Nibb?na. You know that vipassan? cannot take Nibb?na as objec formations as object. So here what we are to understand is ¡§through seeing the wretchedne formed¡¨ - actually vipassan? sees the wretchedness of formations. ¡§It also enters into Nibb towards Nibb?na.¡¨ So when you see the wretchedness of formations, you want to go to the unformed, which has no wretchedness of any kind. Vipassan? is said to enter Nibb?na, but Vipassan? cannot take Nibb?na as object.

¡§Also the Path is called both relinquishment as giving up defilements and relinquishment since it gives up defilements together with resultant aggregates with their aggregate produci formations by cutting them off (That means by abandoning them all together.), and it enters its object.¡¨ When Magga arises it takes Nibb?na as its object. The Path or Magga is called and ¡¥entering into¡¦.

¡§Also both [insight and Path knowledge] are called contemplation (anupassan?) because successively (anu anu passan?).¡¨ ¡¥Anu¡¦ means again and again. ¡¥Passan?¡¦ means see again and again.

We come to the end of the fourth tetrad. This fourth tetrad deals only with pure insight whi three deal with serenity and insight.

Student: In Chinese meditation texts especially in early Zen writings there is something calle seeing¡¦. (First side of the tape ended so that the rest of the student¡¦s comments were not r

Teacher: Many people interpreted that to be samatha and vipassan?, right? ¡¥Stopping¡¦ the the mind still on the object. ¡¥Seeing¡¦ is explained as seeing the three characteristics and th essence of things.

If it means relinquishing, then vipassan? can also be called relinquishing. Then we have n case because this last tetrad deals with pure vipassan?, not samatha. The four tetrads - the with what? Samatha meditation. The Commentary explains the four attainments of jh?na, ar can change over to vipassan?. The second tetrad and third tetrad deal with what? Both sam
The fourth deals with vipassan? only. There is no jh?na. This fourth tetrad deals with what? four foundations of mindfulness, dhamm?nupassan?. The first tetrad deals with contemplatio second tetrad deals with feelings. The third tetrad deals with consciousness. And the fourth dhammas. This fourth tetrad deals with pure insight, vipassan? only. The other three deal wi and vipassan?.

Student: It is not necessary to go through jh?na, right?

Teacher: Yes, that¡¦s right. It is not necessary to go through jh?nas. Many modern authors te de-emphasize jh?nas. One author says that since the jh?nas are not mentioned in the ?n?p are not important. But when we study a Sutta, we have to follow the tradition. The tradition o Commentaries explain these four tetrads as dealing with samatha and vipassan?, with jh?na jh?nas are mentioned in the Mah? Satipa??h?na Sutta although they are not mentioned in t

There are two Suttas in the whole P??i Canon that deal with breathing meditation and mindf In the ?n?p??asati Sutta no jh?nas are mentioned. These passages are from that Sutta. The are explained with reference to jh?nas and vipassan? in the ancient Commentaries. So you do not find jh?nas in these two Suttas. In the ?n?p??asati Sutta jh?nas are not mentioned ex are implied. In the Mah? Satipa??h?na Sutta jh?nas are mentioned when the Buddha define Path. So we cannot say that jh?nas were put into the Canon later. We have no proof of that.
say that anything we do not like is an interpolation, or is added by monks, or something like be no definite proof that a portion of the Sutta was put in later. Who knows? So it is importan Suttas with the help of the ancient Commentaries. It is safe to follow them rather than going and interpreting in the way one likes and not following the ancient tradition.

Now let us look at the conclusion. First we need to look at footnote 67. There is some expl abandonment or relinquishment or giving up. ¡§And the giving up in this way is in the form o non-occurrence.¡¨ When we say that Path (Magga) eradicates defilements, we do not really eradicates defilements. What is meant is that it does not allow defilements to come up again non-occurrence. The present defilements cannot be destroyed because they are already in past defilements are already past, so we don¡¦t have to do anything about them. They are al future things are not yet come. The Path or Magga does not eradicate the present, nor the p defilements, but the arising of Magga renders them inoperative. They will not arise again. It i destroying the potential of things. It talks about this here. This subject will be talked about la the end of the book.

In paragraph 239 in the second line we have the words ¡¥clear vision¡¦ and ¡¥deliverance¡ vision¡¦ means Path (Magga). ¡¥Deliverance¡¦ means Fruition (Phala).

Then the benefits of this meditation are given. All of them come from the ?n?p??asati Sutt the story of a monk who was an Arahant and who practiced the mindfulness of breathing me he would die. He asked his companions if they had seen how an Arahant attained Nibb?na. sitting posture. Then he said I will show you. He was going to die. He knew the very momen to die. So he said that he would die or he would enter Nibb?na walking. He made a line in th he said ¡§I will go to the end of the space. When I come back and cross the line, I will die the die as he said. So those who practice ?n?p??asati meditation can even know when their life stopped or when they are going to die. This is also a benefit of ?n?p??asati meditation.

In paragraph 241 there is the explanation of three kinds of finals - final in becoming, final i final in death. With regard to final in death there is a saying that those that arise along with t consciousness preceding the death consciousness cease together with the death conscious kinds of material properties or four kinds of matter - those caused by kamma, those caused those caused by climate, and those caused by food. Those caused by kamma must disappe death consciousness. At the last submoment of death consciousness they must also disapp the material properties caused by mind cannot live after the moment of death. What we call translated as vital principle (j?vita) or vital life means that kamma-born quality in the materia That kamma-born quality in the material properties must die with death consciousness or mu death consciousness. The life of material properties is 17 times that of consciousness. Cons for only one big moment or for three submoments. So the material properties last for 17 big thought moments. Since the vital principle must dissolve or disappear at the last submomen consciousness, it must have arisen how many moments before? 16 moments before, 16 mo moment. At the end of the 17th moment the life principle must disappear. That¡¦s why here i consciousness preceding the death consciousness. If you want to read more about when th properties disappear in a life, you can read the sixth chapter of The Manual of Abhidhamma

Now we go to the Recollection of Peace. ¡¥Recollection of Peace¡¦ really means Recollect ¡§one who wants to develop the Recollection of Peace mentioned next to mindfulness of bre solitary retreat and recollect the special qualities of Nibb?na, in other words, the stilling of all as follows: ¡¥Bhikkhus, in so far as there are dhammas, whether formed or unformed (That r unconditioned.) fading away is pronounced the best of them, that is to say, the disillusionme elimination of thirst, the abolition of reliance, the termination of the round, the destruction of fading away, cessation, Nibb?na.¡¨ These words will be explained.

¡§Herein, in so far as. Dhammas [means] individual essences.¡¨ There is a long footnote h Footnotes give me a headache because first I have to find the passages in the Commentarie translation with them. The way they are written makes it very difficult to translate them. Anot that English is not my mother tongue. So it is not easy.

Dhamma comes from the root ¡¥dhar¡¦. ¡¥Dhar¡¦ means to hold. ¡§In such passages as ¡¥D concepts¡¦ even a non-entity is thus called a ¡¥dhamma¡¦.¡¨ ¡¥Dhamma¡¦ can mean anything the concepts are called ¡¥dhammas¡¦. Why are they called ¡¥dhammas¡¦? Because they are knowledge. They are carried or upheld, dhar. That kind of dhamma is excluded by saying he mean individual essences.¡¨ When it is said that dhammas mean individual essences, then t exclude concepts from being called ¡¥dhammas¡¦ here. Here ¡¥dhammas¡¦ mean those that and not concepts. ¡§That kind of dhamma is excluded by his saying ¡¥Dhammas [mean] ind

¡§The act of becoming which constitutes existingness in the ultimate sense, is essence; it thus it is an individual essence.¡¨ The P??i word ¡¥sabh?va¡¦, this word is also an important bh?va is defined. ¡¥Bh?va¡¦ means becoming. The act of becoming is bh?va. Something wh becoming is called ¡¥sabh?va¡¦. The ¡¥act of becoming¡¦ means existingness in the ultimate having three moments of existence - arising, aging and disappearing. Such things are called because they are with bh?va. So in this word ¡¥sa¡¦ means with and ¡¥bh?va¡¦ means the ac us say existence. So things which have their own existence are called ¡¥sabh?va¡¦.

In other places or in the footnote itself sabh?va is explained in another way. There ¡¥sa¡¦ m own and ¡¥bh?va¡¦ means essence or something like that. So ¡¥sabh?va¡¦ means one¡¦s ow nature. Or it means common essence or common nature. So ¡¥sabh?va¡¦ can mean differen contexts. If it is used as a substantive, then it means something that has its own becoming o has existence in the ultimate sense. In other places it may mean one¡¦s own individual natur individual essence or common essence or common nature.

There are two kinds of nature, individual and common. I am Burmese. So being Burmese essence. I am a human being. This is my common essence, common with other beings. So these things.

So here we should not translate as individual essences, but as some things which have in What is ¡¥essence¡¦? This is an abstract noun, right? It doesn¡¦t mean a substantive thing. S has an individual essence or some things which have individual essences are called ¡¥dham

Here (footnote 68) it is a long footnote. ¡§The individual essence consisting in, say, hardne earth, or touching as that of contact, is not common to all dhammas. The generality is the in common to all consisting in impermanence, etc.¡¨ Let us suppose we have earth element. Ea individual essence and general or common essence. Its individual essence is hardness or so softness is the individual essence of earth element, not shared by other elements or dhamm element is impermanent. Its impermanence is the common or general essence of it. In this w specific or individual essence and the general essence.

With regard to time Venerable ???amoli quotes the M|la ??k? in the footnote. ¡§Though tim the kind of consciousness [e.g. as specified in the first paragraph of the Dhammasangan?] a as to individual essence, yet as the non-entity before and after the moment in which those [c co-present] dhammas occur, it is called the ¡¥container-adh?karana¡¦; it is perceived (symbo state of a receptacle (?dh?ra-bh?va).¡¨ I wonder if he understood it.

First we have to have a little knowledge of Abhidhamma. In Abhidhamma it is said that on at such a time that, let us say, the first kusala citta arises. ¡¥At such a time¡¦, the words ¡¥at time¡¦ in English (In P??i it is one word) are put in the locative case. ¡¥At¡¦, ¡¥on, or ¡¥in¡¦ are locative case. The P??i word used here is samaya. ¡¥Samaya¡¦ can mean time or it can mea it means time. Why is time the location of consciousness? He is going to explain this. ¡¥Rec ¡¥container just mean location. Time is non-existent according to Abhidhamma.

¡§Though time is determined by the kind of consciousness and is non-existent as to indivi so according to reality time has no existence. So time is non-existent, but time is determined means the time when a given citta arises. It is determined by the citta. So why can time be th citta? Time is non-existent. How can it be the location of citta? The answer is when a consci (Before it arises there is nothing and after it dissolves there is nothing.) during the three pha existence it is called existent. At that time consciousness is in existence. So time is said to b location or receptacle of the consciousness. Actually there is no time. Time is not existent or according to ultimate reality. Although it is non-existent, it is said to be the location of citta. B arising of citta there is no citta and after the dissolution of citta there is no citta. That is why t said to be the location of citta. Therefore the Buddha said ¡§At such a time the first kusala ci and so on.

Student: Would the same hold true for space?

Teacher: Space is also mentioned here. Space and time are said to be non-existent accordi the translation itself is not correct here. You know you need to be very familiar with the langu looks the same but it has to be understood differently. We have the words ¡¥bh?va¡¦ and abl misunderstood here. He translated abh?va as non-entity, but what it means is non-existent. location or receptacle of citta because before the arising and after the dissolution of citta and concomitants they do not exist. So it is like a reference, the citta arises at this time or that tin

Now in the text itself the explanation of different words - fading away, disillusionment of va then ¡¥on coming to it¡¦ are used. ¡¥On coming to it¡¦ they are relinquished, they fade away a coming to it¡¦ really means on account of it or on taking it as object.

¡¥Fading away¡¦ is not Nibb?na, but Nibb?na is described with the words which can mean P??i word ¡¥vir?ga¡¦ is used here and other words as well. Vir?ga is simply translated as fad act of fading away is not Nibb?na. Nibb?na is not fading away. Nibb?na is something. Althou existence, it is . Nibb?na is something. When Magga Citta arises, it eradicates mental defile mental defilements fade away. Magga Citta only arises when it takes Nibb?na as object. If it Nibb?na as object, it cannot arise. So Nibb?na is a condition for Magga Citta (Path Conscio Nibb?na is said to be instrumental in making mental defilements fade away by Path (Magga to be understood in this way. Fading away, termination of the round, extinction, whatever it s Nibb?na is instrumental in the extinction of suffering. They are to be understood in this sens that fading away is Nibb?na, but Nibb?na is something instrumental in making defilements fa

In the middle of the footnote there are the words change-of-lineage. What the author of the was saying was that change-of-lineage immediately precedes the moment of Path. That citta ¡¥change-of-lineage¡¦. That citta takes Nibb?na as object. Nibb?na which has to be realized be seen by the moment of change-of-lineage must be one that has the profundity surpassing belonging to the three periods of time. Nibb?na is timeless. Nibb?na does not belong to the or the future. In order for Nibb?na to be realized by change-of-lineage it must not belong to a periods. That is what is meant there.

OK. Now we come to the end of upasamasati. There are other descriptions of Nibb?na. Yo paragraph 248. ¡§Bhikkhus, I shall teach you the unformed..the truth..the hard-to-see..the un lasting..the undiversified..the deathless..the auspicious..the safe..the marvellous..the intact.. unaffected..the purity..the island..the shelter¡¦.¡¨ There are more in the Sa?yutta Nik?ya. You some positive words from this and say that Nibb?na is a positive state.

Then the benefits of the contemplation on Nibb?na or the contemplation on peace are give the end of this chapter.

S?dhu! S?dhu! S?dhu!

We offer this transcription of a Dhamma class with Venerable U S?l?nanda with the hope th beneficial for your understanding of the Buddha¡¦s teachings. This transcription has not been the record of spontaneous exchanges between the teacher and students. Therefore it is pos some errors. We are certain that such errors are infrequent and minimal. Say?daw is a meti teacher and offers these teachings in this manner out of compassion for those people who a serious study and practice of meditation and Buddhism.

Chapter 9
(Tape 21 / Ps: 1-54)

Today we begin the chapter on the divine abidings (the brahm? vih?ras), chapter nine. We Commentator to give us the meanings or the definition of brahm? vih?ra, mett? and so on at the chapter. It should be done that way, but the definitions and meanings are given towards to the explanation of the words brahm? vih?ra in paragraph 105.

¡§And here it may be asked: But why are loving-kindness, compassion, gladness, and equ divine abidings? And why are they only four? And what is their order? And why are they call states in the Abhidhamma?¡¨

¡§It may be replied: The divineness of the abiding (brahmavih?rat?) should be understood of best and in the sense of immaculate.¡¨ We need to look at the P??i words ¡¥brahm?¡¦ and ¡¥Brahm?¡¦ can mean the best or immaculate. When we say the word ¡¥brahm?¡¦, the first m comes to mind is a being, a higher kind of celestial being that is called brahm?. Brahm? bein than or higher than beings belonging to the sense-sphere or belonging to the world of huma celestial beings. So the word ¡¥brahm?¡¦ came to mean the good or the best and also imma

¡§For these abidings are the best in being the right attitude towards beings.¡¨ These abidin these practices of meditation are the best because they are the right attitude towards beings loving-kindness, compassion, sympathetic joy and equanimity.

¡§And just as Brahm? Gods abide with immaculate minds, so the meditators who associat these abidings abide on an equal footing with Brahm? Gods.¡¨ Another explanation is ¡¥brah vih?ra like that of the brahm?s. ¡¥Vih?ra¡¦ means living or abiding, so abiding like that of bra said that the brahm?s in their world just practice peaceful kinds of meditation. There is nothi do other than going into jh?nas, peaceful kinds of meditation. So ¡¥brahm? vih?ra¡¦ means t brahm? gods. So they are called divine abidings in the sense of best and in the sense of imm explain it as the best way of abiding, or the best way of living, or living like that of the brahm translated as divine abidings or sometimes they are called sublime states.

There are four brahm? vih?ras or four divine abidings. They are (1) mett? (loving-kindness (compassion), (3) mudit? (gladness), (4) upekkh? (equanimity). Today we will study mett?. L explanation of mett? in paragraph 92. We should clearly understand what is meant by this w (loving-kindness).

¡§Now as to the meaning firstly loving-kindness, compassion, gladness and equanimity: it thus it is loving-kindness (mett?).¡¨ The word ¡¥mett?¡¦ is derived from a P??i root. The P??i ¡¥mid¡¦. It has the meaning to fatten. Actually here it means to be moist or something like sti because when you have love for someone, you are sort of attached or glued to that person.
(siniyhati) is the meaning.¡¨ It is moist or it is gluttonous. That is why it is called mett?. That i explanation.

Another explanation is : ¡§Also: it comes about with respect to a friend.¡¨ A friend is called

P??i. The state of a friend or the behavior of a friend is called ¡¥mett?¡¦. That is according to grammatical rules. In this second explanation the word ¡¥mett?¡¦ comes from the word ¡¥mit friend. The behavior of a friend or behavior towards a friend is called ¡¥mett?¡¦.

What is mett?? It is a kind of love, but it is not mixed with attachment or craving. It is pure, desire for the well-being of beings, for the welfare of beings.

If you have studied Abhidhamma, you will know that there are 52 mental factors or 52 ceta 52 mental factors mett? is adosa. Adosa is non-hatred or non-anger. Mett? is the opposite o opposite of hatred. It is the wholesome desire for the well-being or welfare of all beings. Nov the beginning of the chapter.

When we want to practice mett? meditation or loving-kindness meditation, what we must d the danger in hate and to review the advantage in patience. That is before doing something danger in the opposite of what we are going to do and also the benefits of the thing we are g

First we need to review the danger in hate. When we see the danger in hate or in anger, w avoid. We will want to get away from that hate or anger.

¡§To start with he should review the danger in hate and the advantage in patience. Why? I be abandoned and patience attained in the development of this meditation subject and he ca dangers and attain unknown advantages.¡¨ If he does not see any danger, he cannot aband see the advantages, he will not attain them. First the meditator has to see the danger in hate advantage in patience.

Danger and hate should be seen in accordance with such Suttas as this. There are many taught about the danger in hate and the advantage of patience. (Tape cuts away and it soun beginning anew.)

Today we begin the chapter on the divine abidings. The P??i word for divine abidings is ¡¥ The definition of that word is towards the end of the chapter. The word ¡¥mett?¡¦ or ¡¥loving-defined as that which is moist or which is gluttonous. Mett? or loving-kindness is a wholeson well-being of all beings.

Before we practice loving-kindness meditation this book says that we must do two things. the danger in hate and the other is to review the advantage in patience. If we do not see the we will not be able to abandon hate. If we do not see advantages in being patient, we will no advantages. So danger in hate and advantage in patience should be reviewed.

This we could do by reading some Suttas. The first is the danger in hate. ¡§Friends, when prey to hate and his mind is obsesses by hate, he kills living beings¡¨ and so on. When a ma kill a being or do something to injure another person and so on. So there is this danger in ha danger in anger. There are many Suttas similar to this Sutta in the Sutta Pi?aka. The referen A, 1, 216. If you want to read the original Sutta, that is the English translation, I can give you reference. ¡¥A¡¦ means A~guttara Nik?ya. The translation of A~guttara Nik?ya is named ¡¥G
There are five books or five volumes in this collection. So this is in Gradual Sayings, volume
You may read there in more detail.

¡§And the advantage in patience should be understood according to such Suttas as these

¡¥No higher rule, the Buddhas say, than patience, and no Nibb?na higher than forbearance Patience in force, in strong array:
Tis him I call a brahman¡¦.¡¨

Here a brahman means a h man. So Buddha said I call him a holy man who has patience as and who is strong in forbearance.

¡§No greater thing exists than patience.¡¨ These are from other Suttas. By reviewing, by re remembering these Suttas we can see danger in hate and advantage in patience.

After reviewing danger in hate and advantage in patience what should we do? ¡§Thereupo upon the development of loving-kindness for the purpose of secluding the mind from hate se introducing it to patience known as an advantage.¡¨

¡§But when he begins, he must know that some persons are of the wrong sort at the very loving-kindness should be developed towards certain kinds of persons and not towards certa first.¡¨ So when we practice loving-kindness meditation, we must first understand to whom w practice loving-kindness meditation. In this book it is said that ¡§loving-kindness should not b first towards the following four kinds of persons: an antipathetic person (That means a perso hate.), a very dearly loved friend, a neutral person, and a hostile person. Also it should not b specifically towards the opposite sex, or towards a dead person.¡¨ It will be explained later.

Why should it not be developed toward antipathetic persons and others? That is because persons in a dear one¡¦s place is fatiguing, It is very difficult. So we should not begin with su and other persons also. We should not radiate thoughts of loving-kindness to them in the be

It should not be developed towards persons of the opposite sex because lust can arise in practices loving-kindness towards persons of the opposite sex. It is not suitable to practice lo towards persons of the opposite sex in the beginning or maybe it is better not to practice spe one may practice to all men or to all women. That we should do. Or if we can really keep ou getting lustful thoughts or attachment, we may be able to do that. But it is very difficult espec beginning to keep these thoughts from coming up in our mind. So it is best to avoid persons sex in the beginning.

The it says that it should not be developed towards a dead person. We can send thoughts cannot get any jh?nas from that practice. The story of a young monk is given here. He was f through loving-kindness. That means he practiced jh?na through loving-kindness. He could easily. But when he practiced loving-kindness towards his teacher and tried to enter into jh? do that. So he went to another Elder and asked him why he could not do that. He said I am f jh?nas through loving-kindness meditation, but now I practice loving-kindness meditation to could not get into the jh?na.

What did the Elder say? ¡§Seek the sign, friend.¡¨ Just that. ¡¥Seek the sign¡¦ means exam the object of your meditation. ¡§He did so. Finding that his teacher had died, he proceeded loving-kindness inspired by another and attained absorption.¡¨ So he changed his object to a was living. We cannot send thoughts of loving-kindness to a person who is dead and at the s know that they are dead.

What about your parents who have died and you want to send thoughts to them? is that po is because I am doing that. I send thoughts to them. I know they are dead. So I think of them some other state, say, a state among the devas and I send thoughts to them. In that way we loving-kindness to dead persons. But if you don¡¦t know that they are dead and you are send them as living persons, it won¡¦t help.

Student: Is there a difference between sending thoughts of goodwill and attaining jh?na?

Teacher: You attain jh?na after you send thoughts. It will be explained here. In order to attai have to practice seriously and try to break the barriers. And after the barriers are broken you get the access concentration. Then you continue practicing loving-kindness and you will get Student: Even towards a person that is dead?

Teacher: Oh, no. You cannot attain jh?na, but you can send thoughts to those persons.

¡§First of all it should be developed only towards oneself, doing it repeatedly thus.¡¨ When loving-kindness, we begin with ourselves. Then there are questions and answers about prac oneself as to whether it is in accordance with the teachings in other books. That is because does not say that first you should practice loving-kindness towards yourself and then that yo other beings. It is not explicitly said. It may seem to conflict with those Texts. But the author that it does not conflict. That is because it refers to absorption. In the P??i Texts when it say pervades one direction with his heart filled with loving-kindness¡¨ and so on, that means for j absorption.

¡§But this [initial development towards oneself] refers to [making oneself] an example.¡¨ Pr towards oneself is to make ourself an example. ¡§I am happy. Just as I want to be happy, an just as I want to live and not to die, so do other beings.¡¨ So may they be happy, live long an order to make ourselves an example first we practice loving-kindness towards ourselves.

Practicing loving-kindness towards ouselves will not lead to the attainment of any absorpti if he developed loving-kindness for a hundred or a thousand years in this way..absorption w
But it is best to begin with ourselves and then to practice towards other beings.

In paragraph 10 ¡§for even if he developed loving-kindness for a hundred or a thousand ye ¡¥I am happy¡¦¡¦.¡¨ Actually it is not ¡¥I am happy¡¦ but ¡¥May I be happy¡¦. When you practic loving-kindness towards yourself, you say to yourself ¡¥May I be happy¡¦. You repeat it in yo be happy. May I be happy.¡¦ The P??i word for ¡¥I am happy¡¦ and ¡¥May I be happy¡¦ is the aha? avero homi. ¡¥Avero homi¡¦ may mean either ¡¥I am happy¡¦ or ¡¥May I be happy¡¦. He happy. When you practice loving-kindness towards yourself, you do not say ¡¥I am happy. I say ¡¥May I be happy¡¦. So it is taking oneself as an example.

¡§I visited all quarters with my mind
Nor found I any dearer than myself,

Self is likewise to every other dear;

Who loves himself should (not ¡¥will¡¦) never harm another.¡¨

When you look at all beings, there is no one dearer than yourself. For other persons it is also you love yourself, you do not harm others. So he should pervade himself with loving-kindnes

¡§After that, in order to proceed easily, he can recollect such gifts, kind words, etc., as insp and endearment, such virtue, learning, etc., as inspire respect and reverence met with in a t equivalent or a preceptor or his equivalent, developing loving-kindness towards him in the w ¡¥May this good man be happy and free from suffering¡¦.¡¨ After practicing towards ourselves towards a person. Because the book is written for monks it says it should be practiced towar towards a preceptor. Or it should be for someone who is like a teacher or who is like a prece

When I teach meditation, my sequence of sentences is: ¡§May I be well, happy and peace be well, happy and peaceful.¡¨ Only after that do I say ¡§May my parents be well, happy and is because for monks, for those who have left the home-life teachers come first before parer left behind. Teachers are like parents to a monk. We put teachers before parents. But lay pe towards parents first and teachers later.

¡§But if this bhikkhu does not rest content with just that much and wants to break down the should next after that, develop loving-kindness towards a very dearly loved friend.¡¨ After pra a revered teacher, one should practice towards a very dearly loved friend.

¡§Then towards a neutral person, as a very dearly loved friend¡¨ - ¡¥as a dearly loved frien correct. Venerable ???amoli misunderstood some words here. What is meant here is after th friend he practices towards a neutral person. Then after the neutral person he practices towa person. So first you practice towards a very dearly loved friend. When you have practiced fo gain familiarity with the practice. Then you move to a neutral person. Then after practicing to person, you move towards a hostile person if there is any.

¡§And while he does so, he should make his mind malleable and wieldy in each instance b the next.¡¨ That means not to do like we do every day. We say ¡§May I be well, happy and p friends be well, happy and peaceful; may the indifferent persons be well, happy and peacefu unfriendly persons (That means the hostile persons.) be well, happy and peaceful.¡¨ We are one sitting. But in fact what we should do is practice towards a dearly loved person for some should practice for some days towards a neutral person and then towards a hostile person.

Student: In paragraph 12 it says ¡§then towards a neutral person as a very dearly loved frier

Teacher: No, that is not so.

Student: That should be eliminated?

Teacher: ¡¥As a very dearly loved friend¡¦ - that should go. And also ¡§then towards a hostile neutral¡¨ - ¡¥as neutral¡¦ should go.

If you have no enemy, the you don¡¦t have to do that. ¡§But if he has no enemy, or he is of great man who does not perceive another as an enemy even when the other does him harm himself as follows: ¡¥Now that my consciousness of loving-kindness has become wieldy tow

I shall apply it to a hostile one¡¦.¡¨ This is because he has no hostile persons. He has no ene should not find one and practice this.

Wit regard to practicing towards a hostile person we come to some problems here. ¡§If res him when he applies his mind to a hostile person because he remembers wrongs done by th get rid of the resentment by entering repeatedly into loving-kindness [jh?na] towards any of t first-mentioned persons and then, after he has emerged each time, directing loving-kindness person.¡¨ These are the ways of getting rid of resentment. But this first way is something lik Don¡¦t you find it strange? We don¡¦t know how to practice loving-kindness meditation. We a practice loving-kindness meditation. He instructs us to enter into jh?na to get rid of resentme even practice loving-kindness yet. Here the author is saying you should go into jh?na to get resentment. I don¡¦t know why it is put at the beginning. Maybe it should go at the end. That one.

¡§But if it does not die out in spite of his efforts, then:

Let him reflect upon the saw
With other figures of such kind,
And strive, and strive repeatedly,
To leave resentment far behind.¡¨

That means to reflect upon the simile of the saw and other teachings, teachings of the Sutta admonish himself this way: ¡¥Now, you who get angry, has not the Blessed One said this: ¡§ bandits brutally severed limb from limb with a two-handled saw, he who entertained hate in h account would not be one who carried out my teaching.¡¨

I always point out this teaching. I think when Jesus said ¡§Give the other cheek¡¨, he was j this piece of advice. He may have learned these teachings when he was in India. Some peo during the lost years he went to India and learned from Buddhist monks there.

Then the others:

¡§To repay angry men in kind
Is worse than to be angry first;
Repay angry men not in kind
And win a battle hard to win.¡¨

I like this very much.

¡§The weal of both he does promote,
His own and then other¡¦s too,
Who shall another¡¦s anger know
And mindfully maintain his peace.¡¦

¡§To repay angry men in kind is worse than to be angry first. Repay not angry men in kind a hard to win.¡¨ If somebody gets angry with you and you don¡¦t get angry, reckon yourself as battle hard to win.

Then there are some other Suttas. ¡§Bhikkhus, there are seven things gratifying and helpf that happen to one who is angry, whether a man or a woman.¡¨ I hope you have read all of t things which your enemy wants you to be or not to be. Why let them get their satisfaction by is the gist of this Sutta.

¡§As a log from a pyre, burnt at both ends and fouled in the middle, serves neither for timb village nor for timber in the forest, so is such a person as this I say.¡¨ A person who gets ang stick used in cremating dead bodies. It cannot be used as timber in the village or in the fores

¡§If you are angry now, you will be one who does not carry out the Blessed One¡¦s teachin angry man in kind you will be worse than the angry man and not win the battle hard to win; y do to yourself the things that help your enemy; and you will be a pyre log.¡¨ This is the secon getting rid of resentment. This is reflecting upon the teachings of the Buddha with regard res

Then we have the third one. ¡§If his resentment subsides when he strives and makes effo is good. If not then he should remove irritation by remembering some controlled and purified person, which inspires confidence when remembered.¡¨ When you are angry with some pers things in him instead of seeing bad things in him. When we are angry with someone, we ten things in him. We don¡¦t want to see or we refuse to see the good things in him. Here the ad remember ¡§some controlled or purified state in that person.¡¨
That means to remember the good things in him. Remembering them your resentment may

Then the advice given here is that there are people who are purified and controlled as to th actions, or as to their verbal actions, or as to their mental actions. Try to find whatever is goo may be his bodily actions, or his speech, or his mind. Whatever is good in him try to see it. T of resentment.

¡§But there may be another in whom not even one of these three things is controlled.¡¨ Wh who has none of these? It is said that some person may be good in his bodily behaviour, bu Or there may be someone who is controlled in speech but not in his bodily behaviour. But w person who does not even have one of these three things? ¡§Then compassion for that pers thus.¡¨ Here instead of practicing mett? you practice compassion (karu??) towards that pers going about in the human world now nevertheless after a certain number of days he will find of] the great hells or the sixteen prominent hells. For irritation subsides too through compass

What about a person who has all three of these controlled states? ¡§Then he can rememb in that person, whichever he likes; for the development of loving-kindnesstowards such a pe

¡§And in order to make the meaning of this clear the following Sutta from the Book of Fives in full.¡¨ So he wants us to read the Sutta in full. That is in Gradual Sayings, third volume, pa

The fourth method is to admonish yourself thus:

¡§Suppose an enemy has hurt
You now in what is his domain, Why try yourself as well to hurt
Your mind? - That is not his domain.¡¨

What is ¡¥his domain¡¦ ? ¡¥His domain¡¦ means my body. He has hurt me bodily. ¡§Why try y hurt your mind?¡¨ When you get angry, your mind is also hurt. So why do you do that?

Student: So he can hurt your body, but hurting your mind is your doing.
Teacher: That¡¦s right.
¡§In tears you left your family.¡¨ That is not so. ¡§You left your family who were in tears.¡¨ them and they were crying when you left. It is not that you left with tears.
Student: Maybe both.
Teacher: No, no. Because you have thought about it thoroughly and decided to leave them. any regret or sorrow in leaving them. But your parents or your family members may not wan they may be crying. So ¡¥in tears¡¦ is describing your family, but not you.
¡§You left your family who were in tears.
They had been kind and helpful too.
So why not leave your enemy,
The anger that brings harm to you?¡¨
You left your family who were kind to you. Why don¡¦t you leave your enemy the anger that ¡§This anger that you entertain Is gnawing at the very roots
Of all the virtues that you guard -
Who is there suchh a fool as you?

Another does ignoble deeds,
So you are angry - How is this?
Do you then want to copy too
The sort of acts that he commits?

Suppose another, to annoy, Provokes you with some odious act,
Why suffer anger to spring up,
And do as he would have you do?

If you get angry, then maybe You make him suffer, maybe not;
Though with the hurt that anger brings You certainly are punished now.¡¨
That means right now you inflict yourself with anger which is suffering.
¡§If anger-blinded enemies Set out to tread the path of woe,
Do you by getting angry too Intend to follow heel to toe?

If hurt is done you by a foe
Because of anger on your part,
Then put your anger down, for why Should you be harassed groundlessly?¡¨

That means your anger is put on a wrong object. ¡§If hurt is done you by a foe because of a
- that really means because you are there the other peerson can hurt you. So actually you a hurting you.

¡§Then put your anger down, for why should you be harassed groundlessly.¡¨ ¡¥Groundles you are vexed on a wrong object. You should be angry with yourself or something like that b the cause of this hurt that is done by another person.

¡§Since states last but a moment¡¦s time
Those aggregates, by which was done
The odious act, have ceased, so now What is it you are angry with?¡¨

That is applying the Law of Impermanence here.

¡§Whom shall he hurt, who seeks to hurt
Another, in the other¡¦s absence?
Your presence is the cause of hurt;
Why are you angry, then, with him?¡¨

Yourself is the cause. This is admonishing oneself with these reflections or considerations.

Then the next one, the fifth one is: ¡§He should review the fact that he himself and others a their deeds (kamma).¡¨ That means review the Law of Kamma. ¡§Will not this kamma of you its source lead to your own harm? For you are the owner of your deeds, heir of your deeds¡¨ you get angry, you have unwholesome mental states (akusala). This akusala will give you pa because beings are owners of their deeds.

¡§And this is not the kind of deed to bring you to full enlightenment, to undeclared enlighte ¡¥Undeclared enlightenment¡¦ is the translation here of Pacceka Buddha.

Student: Pacceka?

Teacher: Yes, in Sanskrit ¡¥pratyeka¡¦. They are in some ways like Buddhas and in some wa
They are a step higher than the Arahants but lower than the Buddhas. The Buddha is called ¡¥Samm?¡¦ means rightly. ¡¥Sam¡¦ means by oneself. ¡¥Buddha¡¦ means enlightenment.

Student: How do you admonish yourself? It seems like if you were angry with yourself or so problems. It seems like there needs to be some kind of control of what you are doing. It says admonish himself.

Teacher: The verses given are how you admonish yourself. That means you talk to yourself.
meaning of the verses. I am angry with him. Since I have anger in my mind, I am hurting my
I get angry? Talking to oneself is what is meant by admonishing here.

So Pacceka Buddha - the P??i word ¡¥pacceka¡¦ means separate, so separate Buddhas. T without the help of any person. That is why they are called ¡¥Sambuddha¡¦. They are self-en But they are not called ¡¥samm?sambuddha¡¦ because they are not as great as the fully enli it is translated as ¡¥undeclared enlightenment¡¦. Maybe the word ¡¥undeclared¡¦ is used bec Buddhas do not usually live in the villages or the cities. They are ones who want to be seclu the Himalayas. They seldom visit or go to the places where human beings live. That is why t ¡¥undeclared Buddhas¡¦.

So this anger will not bring you to full enlightenment as a Buddha, or to enlightenment as a Buddha, or to enlightenment as a disciple and so on. So you talk to yourself in this way.

Also as you reflect on yourself, you reflect on the other person. Now he is angry with me. H not lead him to enlightenment as a Buddha and so on. The anger will give him painful results may be able to get rid of resentment.

The next, the sixth one is to review the special qualities of the Master¡¦s former conduct. Y of the Bodhisatta.In the Buddha¡¦s lives as a Bodhisatta he had done many noble things. By former conduct you may be able to get rid of resentment.

A number of J?takas are referred to here. The first one is the S?lavant Birth Story. Do you book here?

Student: Yes.

Teacher: You can find these J?takas in that book. ¡§When his friends rose to prevent his kin leagues being seized by an enemy king who had been incited by a wicked minister in whose had sown hate for him, he did not allow them to lift a weapon.¡¨ The other king seized him an the neck and he was left at the cemetery with the other ministers. Even though he was treate not get angry with that king. With much effort he got out of that state and went back to his pa made peace with the other king. The king whose name was S?lavant practiced patience or f other king who tried to kill him. In the same way you should not have anger towards such pe

In paragraph 28 the second story is about Khantiv?di. The Bodhisatta was a hermit at that practiced patience at that time. The king was a very cruel person at that time. The king met t asked ¡§What are you?¡¨ The hermit answered ¡§I am a monk.¡¨ Then the king asked ¡§Wha answered ¡§I am a preacher of patience.¡¨ ¡§The king had him flogged with scourges of tho hands and feet cut off, he felt not the slightest anger.¡¨ Although his hands and feet were cut feel any anger towards that king.

When the king left the hermit, a general came and asked him to get angry with the king. ¡§ king. Please get angry with the king, so he will not suffer such painful consequences.¡¨ The h ¡§People like me do not hate. People like me do not get angry.¡¨ That is what he said.

The next one is about C|?a-Dhammap?la. The Bodhisatta was a child in this story. He was father.

The next J?taka is about an elephant. The Bodhisatta was reborn as an elephant at that ti ¡§The elephant, when struck by the stout shaft,

Addressed the hunter with no hate in mind:
¡¥What is your aim? What is the reason why You kill me thus? What can your purpose be?¡¨ Actually what the elephant said was: ¡§Whose order was this?, Whose order is this?¡¨, not ¡¥ purpose be?¡¦ The elephant asked who had ordered him to be killed.

The hunter had been ordered by the queen to kill the elephant because the elephant had a that the tusk had six kinds of rays, rays of six colors. That is why the elephant was called ¡¥C ¡¥Cha¡¦ means six. ¡¥Danta¡¦ means tusk. It is not six tusks but six-colored tusks. Although t could easily kill the hunter, he did not. He practiced patience or forbearance.

The next J?taka is about a great monkey. The Bodhisatta was born as a great monkey at t monkey saved a man from a rocky chasm, a rocky pit. The man could not get out of the pit b monkey saved him. After saving him the monkey was tired. So he said to the man ¡§Let me my head on your lap.¡¨ While he was resting the man thought:

¡§Now this is food for human kind Like other forest animals
So why then should a hungry man
Not kill the ape to eat?
I¡¦ll travel independently (Actually it is I¡¦ll travel satiated.) Taking his meat as a provision;
Thus I shall cross the waste, and that Will furnish my viatcum.¡¨

So he struck the great monkey with a big rock, but the monkey was not killed. His head was climbed up a tree and said ¡§You are a very ungrateful person. As I am a Bodhisatta, I will n will not kill you. I will even show you the way out of this wilderness.¡¨ The monkey jumped fro The blood from his head dropped to the earth. Following those drops of blood the man was a the waste or wilderness.

The next J?taka is about a serpent king. The Bodhisatta was reborn as a serpent in this S but he did not use his power to kill his tormentors. This is B|ridatta.

The next is another serpent. In another life Buddha was reborn as a serpent. It is the same

In paragraph 34 the Bodhisatta was reborn as the roya n?ga, Sa~khap?la. It is a royal n?ga Buddha was reborn as a snake for many lives.

There are some people who find it difficult to accept that a person could die here and be re snake. They find it hard to believe that a human being could die and be reborn as a snake o because they are thinking of evolution. It is not evolution. It is just that a person dies here an there as a result of his kamma. It is possible.

The other day I was reading a book about past lives. In that book the author said he regres back to former lives. He was asking one patient what did you see then. So in one life the pat a dog now.¡¨ So he remembered his past life as a dog or a wolf there. It was reported in that

In Myanmar there was a monk who said that he had been a snake. As a snake he ate egg looking for an egg, a man saw him and killed him with a spear. The snake did not die quickly heap of rubbish and left to die. He died and was reborn as the son of that man. When he gre remember his past life as a snake. He remembered how he had suffered before he died afte spear. He was so apprehensive, he was so afraid of suffering that he became a monk so tha reborn as a snake again.

Such things can happen. You can find people that have been animals in their past lives. S to tell you or some just don¡¦t remember. There are people who have been reborn as animal lives.

There are so many stories. The next one is M?tuposaka. Here it is an elephant. ¡§Now it is degree improper and unbecoming to you to arouse thoughts of resentment, since you are en that Blessed One. The P??i word means that you are pointing to him as your Master. You ar your Master. It is not ¡¥emulating¡¦.You are claiming the Buddha is your Master. So we shou qualities of the Master¡¦s former conduct.

¡§He should review the Suttas that deal with the beginninglessness [of the round of rebirth have lives in the past and they will have lives in the future. This series of lives is called ¡¥the rebirth¡¦. Nobody knows or nobobody can tell when this round of rebirth begins. That is why rebirth is called ¡¥beginningless¡¦. There is no beginning although we know there is a middle middle of this round of rebirths. There will be many more rebirths and there have been millio the past. We do not know the beginning of it or the beginning of it cannot be known.

In this beginingless round of rebirths the person with whom you are angry has been your f mother, your brother, your sister and so on. So Buddha said it is very difficult in this sa?s?ra person who has not been your father, your mother and so on. So that person with whom you been your father or your mother in your past life. So it is not proper to be angry with him.

The reference is given as S., 2, 189-190. That is the Sa?yutta Nik?ya. The Sa?yutta Nik?y Kindred Sayings. So in the English translation it is in Kindred Sayings, volume 2, page 128. in the book are for the P??i Texts.

The next method is to review the advantages of loving-kindness. There are eleven advanta from the practice of loving-kindness. They will be explained in detail towards the end of the c you are angry and do not practice loving-kindness, you will not get these advantages.

The next one is the resolution into elements. You resolve that person into elements. ¡§Nov gone forth into homelessness, when you are angry with him, what is it you are angry with? Is are angry with? Or body hairs? Or nails? Or teeth? Or skin?¡¨ and so on. So you ask yourse with head hairs and so on. That is the resolution into elements.

I always say cut him into pieces. If you are familiar with the teaching of aggregates, you m angry with material aggregate, or consciousnesss aggregate, or formation aggregate?¡¨ and

The last one is to try the giving of a gift. So when you are angry with a person, give him a either be given by himself to the other or accepted by himself from the other.¡¨ You may acc by him for you or you may give him a gift. You may give him a present. That is because whe present, the mind becomes soft. So you may be able to get rid of resentment in this way.

A story is given here. ¡§As happened to the senior elder who received a bowl given to him Cittapabbata Monastery by an almsfood-eater elder who had been three times made to mov him, and who presented it with these words ¡¥Venerable sir, this bowl worth eight ducats wa mother who is a lay devotee, and it is rightly obtained¡¦, let the good lay devotee acquire me other monk maybe was a resentful monk. He made the other monk give up his lodging three

You know when you are living in a monastery which is the property of the Sa~gha, you are live. It may be a small room. But if a monk comes who is senior to you and there are no othe to him, then you have to give your place to that monk. That is because he is senior to you, h you.

So that monk went there and got his place three times, I think out of malice. So the other r bowl to him saying ¡§This bowl worth eight ducats was given to me by my mother who is a la on.

¡§A gift for taming the untamed A gift for every kind of good.¡¨

Giving accomplishes everything. That is what is said here. By giving you can do anything. It that.

We should not apply this wrongly. Especially in our countries in Asia we say ¡§Giving acco everything. So give him a bribe.¡¨ Once a car was stopped by a policeman in this country. Th driving and her grandmother was with her. The grandmother said ¡§Give him some pocket-m bribe.¡¨ Then the girl said ¡§Grandmother, it is not Myanmar. We cannot do that here.¡¨

Now we have the breaking down of barriers. ¡§When his resentment towards that hostile p allayed, then he can turn his mind with loving-kindness towards that person too, just as towa dear¡¨ and so on. After reflecting in different ways, then you will be able to get rid of resentm practice towards him too until the barriers are broken.

¡§The characteristic of it is this.¡¨ I think - can you say ¡¥indication of this¡¦? That means yo judge from this when the barriers are broken and when they are not. The P??i word is ¡¥lakk ¡¥Lakkha?a¡¦ is usually translated as characteristic. Sometimes it may be translated differen ¡¥indication¡¦ is better here. ¡§The indication of it is this.¡¨

Then there is a story about four persons. The robbers come and ask to give one person fo can yourself or any other person, you have not broken down the barriers. Only when you ca the barriers broken. If you say ¡§Take me to be killed. Do not take them.¡¨, then you are not want your own destruction. That is partiality towards others. So you have not broken the bar that. The barriers are only broken when you say ¡§Do not take any person.¡¨ You see the oth yourself. You do not find anybody to be given for the sacrifice. Only then are the barriers bro you see these four kinds of persons equally, imparitally. When the barriers are broken, you a the sign and access. Here there is no special gaining of access concentration, but when the broken, you are said to gain access concentration. After you have access concentration, you get jh?na. ¡§At this point he has attained the first jh?na which abandons five factors¡¨ and s

Then we have the Texts and the Commentary. In the explanation of the words and how to the practice of mett? meditation is given according to what is taught in the Pa?isambhid?ma 528 ways of practicing mett?. Please look at the handout today. This is how we practice met you look at the first column there are twelve kinds of persons to whom we send thoughts of the second column are the ten directions - the four cardinal directions, the four corners, and the third column are the four modes of loving-kindness - May they be free from enmity. May displeasure. May they be free from affliction. May they live happily or keep themselves happ ways we practice towards persons. We can practice mett? following this chart in 528 ways.

If you look at column one, there should be some space between #5 and #6. The first five a ¡¥non-specific pervasion¡¦. From #6 through #12 there is specific pervasion. When we say a all beings. ¡¥All breathing things¡¦ means all beings. ¡¥All creatures¡¦ means all beings. ¡¥All means all beings. ¡¥All those who have personality¡¦ means all beings. The first five mean a specification. Then for #6 we say ¡§may all women¡¨, so in that case no men are specified. T all men¡¨ and no women are specified.

When we practice loving-kindness meditation, we combine these three columns in differen ¡§May all beings be free from enmity, free from displeasure, free from affliction and live happ say ¡§May all breathing things be free from enmity, free from displeasure, free from affliction happily¡¨ and so on. Then we come to #12. ¡§May all beings in states of loss be free from en displeasure, free from affliction and live happily.¡¨

Next we combine it with directions. In P??i the word for direction comes first, but in English later. So it is a little strange. So you say ¡§May all beings in the eastern direction be free fro free from displeasure, free from affliction and live happily.¡¨ May all breathing things, may all may all persons and so on in the eastern direction be free from enmity and so on.

Following this you practice toward 48 in non-specific mode and 480 in the specific mode. S there are 528 ways of practicing mett?. We have practiced this a number of times in this cou about 45 or 50 minutes to practice all 528.

In paragraph 53 there is the explanation of the word ¡¥satta¡¦. A being is called ¡¥satta¡¦ be craving for it, has held (satta) it, has gripped (visatta) it, that is why ¡¥a being (satta)¡¦ is said being is called a ¡¥satta¡¦ because he is attached to his life.

¡§But in ordinary speech this term of common usage is applied also to those who are witho the term of common usage ¡¥palm fan (t?lavanta)¡¦ is used for different sorts of fans [in gene made of split bamboo.¡¨ A being is called ¡¥satta¡¦. Why is he called ¡¥satta¡¦? Because he h things. What about calling an Arahant a ¡¥satta¡¦? An Arahant is also called a being. An Ara who has eradicated all mental defilements. He has no attachment at all. Still he is called a ¡¥ Commentator explains ¡§In ordinary speech this term of common usage is applied also to th greed.¡¨ Although literally ¡¥satta¡¦ means a person who has attachment, it is applied both to attachment and those who do not have attachment.

The author points out the P??i word ¡¥t?lavanta¡¦ as an example. ¡¥T?lavanta¡¦ means a fa leaves. This word is used for other fans as well whether they are made of palm leaves or no made of paper or split bamboo, but still they are called ¡¥t?lavanta¡¦ in P??i. In the same wa has attachment is called ¡¥satta¡¦ and a person who does not have attachment is called ¡¥sa

Can you give me some examples in English? You know what is meant here? There is a to Palm Springs. There may be more than 29 palms now or less than 29 palms, but the city is s Palms.

I looked up the word ¡¥pen¡¦ in the dictionary. What is the original meaning of the word ¡¥p from French and Latin. The original meaning is feather. So at first pens were made of feathe pens are not made of feathers or quills but we still call them ¡¥pens¡¦. So it is usage.

In paragraph 54 there is an interesting word, ¡¥puggala¡¦. ¡§ ¡¥Pum¡¦ is what hell is called. is ¡¥put¡¦. In Sanskrit it is ¡¥put¡¦. ¡§They fall (galanti) into that, is the meaning.¡¨ The P??i wo puggala and the Sanskrit word is pudgala.

This word is interesting because it reflects a certain belief in Hinduism. According to Hindu go to hell after death if you do not have offspring, if you do not have sons and daughters. If y without having a son or a daughter, you will go to hell. That is why brahmans always point o we are the ones who are going to hell. We have no family. We have no offspring. It is a brah is why they have to be householders for some years. Even though they want to become mon householders for some years and have a family. Then they can leave the family. So those w daughters will go to hell. ¡¥Puggala¡¦ means those who are going to hell, such persons. But ¡¥puggala¡¦ came to be applied to every being.

The word for son in P??i is ¡¥putta¡¦ and in Sanskrit it is ¡¥putra¡¦. ¡¥Tra¡¦ means to protect means a person who protects you from hell because when you have a son, you won¡¦t go to protected from hell. So a son is the person who protects you from going to hell. He is called Student: That is the same word as in S?riputta?

Teacher: That¡¦s right. Later on it just meant a son. This is a Hindu belief, but the word was u as well as Buddhists. I think the others you can read by yourselves. For next week read unti first immaterial jh?na.

S?dhu! S?dhu! S?dhu!

(Tape 22 / Ps: 55 ¡V 124)

I thought that I had finished loving-kindness, but I think that I will go back a little. When you loving-kindness, first you try to see the danger in anger or in hate and also you try to see the patience. Then you practice loving-kindness first towards yourself, later towards a person wh towards a neutral person, and lastly towards an enemy. When you are able to break down th means when you have mental impartiality towards these four kinds of persons, you are said barriers. With the breaking of barriers comes access concentration. In other kinds of meditat this point you get the learning sign and at another point you get the counterpart sign. But he separate learning sign and counterpart sign. There is no special sign. When you have broke are said to have obtained the counterpart sign. At that moment you also obtain the access c you dwell on the beings and cultivate further so that you obtain jh?na. With mett? one can g jh?na with the fourfold method and the fourth jh?na in the fivefold method.

Then we have the Texts and Commentary beginning with paragraph 44. The Text given h Text found in many Suttas and also in Abhidhamma. The references given here are from Vi Abhidhamma and D?gha Nik?ya which is in Sutta Pi?aka. In Sutta Pi?aka and Abhidhamma passage again and again whenever loving-kindness meditation is described.

Then there is the explanation of the words. In paragraph 47 about the middle ¡§Just as to with oneself without making the distinction ¡¥This is another being¡¦, is what is meant. Or alt equally (sabbattat?ya),with the whole state of mind; not reserving even a little, is what is me really means here is not being distracted outside even a little. So with the whole state of min loving-kindness meditation, not to be distracted outside even a little.

Then in about the middle of paragraph 48 ¡§measureless through familiarity and through h beings as its object¡¨ - so it is called ¡¥measureless¡¦ because it is practiced again and again very familiar with that meditation, that kind of jh?na. Or it can mean it is measureless throug measureless beings as its object. Since its object is measureless, it is also called ¡¥measure Student: In paragraph 48 it says ¡§endued with loving-kindness¡¨. Is ¡¥endued¡¦ right or do t ¡¥embued¡¦?
Teacher: Endued with loving-kindness.
Student: Shouldn¡¦t it be ¡¥embued¡¦?
Teacher: Endued, yes. I think they mean the same thing. It means endowed with or embued

Then there is the description of the 528 modes of loving-kindness. That was explained las

In paragraph 53 there is the explanation of the word ¡¥being (satta)¡¦. ¡§They are held (sat (visatta) by desire.¡¨ The P??i word is just to be attached. ¡¥Visatta¡¦ means very attached to desire. So they are called ¡¥satta¡¦ in P??i. Those who have no greed are also called ¡¥satta the common term or usage for beings actually.

The example given here is t?lavanta in P??i. ¡¥T?lavanta¡¦ means palm fan, a fan made o on anything which is used to fan is called a ¡¥t?lavanta¡¦ whether it is made with palm leaves
The same name is applied to that thing.

Last time I pointed out the word ¡¥pen¡¦ in English. ¡¥Pen¡¦ really means a feather. Even th be a feather, still it is called ¡¥pen¡¦.

Do you see the word ¡¥akkhara-cintaka¡¦? ¡§However, [in the world] etymologists (akkhara not consider meaning have it that it is a mere name.¡¨ ¡¥Akkhara¡¦ means letters and ¡¥cinta fingers, so the fingers of letters. That means grammarians or etymologists. There are two ki etymologists here. One kind of etymologist did not search for the meaning of the word, the li the word. They said it is just a name given to the being. So don¡¦t worry whether it means to or whatever. So it is a mere name for them. ¡§While those who consider meaning¡¨ - there a etymologists who said it has a meaning. They said that the word comes from ¡¥sattva¡¦ in Sa called ¡¥sattva¡¦ because it has a bright principle, ¡¥sattva¡¦. This refers to the teaching of th system in Indian philosophy. Samkhya system teaches that there are three principles - the s tamas. They are given in footnote 6.

I think that I talked about ¡¥puggala¡¦ last time. ¡¥Put¡¦ means hell and ¡¥gala¡¦ means to fa falling to hell. Those who fall to hell are puggala. The Hindu belief is that you go to hell if you have any offspring.

In footnote 7 ¡§Here when the aggregates are not fully understood, there is naming (abhid of the consciousness¡¨ - I think ¡¥of the¡¦ should go. ¡§There is naming of them and conscio self (att?).¡¨ That means we do not understand the real nature of them as aggregates, we ca to these aggregates, self (att?). We understand it as att?. So ¡¥consciousness¡¦ here really understanding. We know or understand these aggregates as att?. ¡§That is to say, the phys alternatively the five aggregates.¡¨ The Sub-Commentary is explaining the word ¡¥att?bh?va word in paragraph 54. Personality (att?bh?va) is explained here. ¡¥Att?¡¦ means att? and bh something arising from it. ¡¥Something¡¦ here means the naming and knowing. Naming and Therefore it is called ¡¥bh?va¡¦. How naming and how knowing? Knowing as att?. So that is in P??i or in Sanskrit.

In paragraph 56 ¡§And here may all beings be free from enmity is one absorption.¡¨ The S said something about absorption or jh?na here. The word used is appan?. Appan? is norma absorption or jh?na. But I think if we translate it as something like application, it makes more

When we practice loving-kindness meditation, we practice in four ways. May all beings be that is one. May all beings be free from affliction, that is the second one. May all beings be f anxiety, that is the third one. May they live happily, that is the fourth one. Each one is an app

The Sub-Commentary explains that you can get jh?na just by saying this one sentence - ¡ free from enmity. May all beings be free from enmity. May all beings be free from enmity.¡¨ T ¡¥one absorption¡¦ or ¡¥one application¡¦.

In the explanation of these ¡¥free from affliction¡¦ means free from mental affliction. ¡¥Free anxiety¡¦ I think is not an accurate translation. The P??i word is anigha. That means free fro may have noticed on the sheet I gave you last week that I changed them. The second applic as ¡§May all beings be free from displeasure.¡¨ The third application is translated as ¡§may a free from affliction.¡¨ ¡¥Free from affliction¡¦ means free from bodily suffering, free from pain. displeasure¡¦ means free from domanassa or mental affliction. The fourth one is ¡§May they Literally it means may they hold themselves happily or may they maintain their bodies or the
It is all right if we just say ¡§May they live happily.¡¨ So there are four absorptions, four applic

Then there are eleven benefits to be enjoyed from the practice of loving-kindness meditati comfort, one wakes up in comfort and so on.

In paragraph 71 references are given for ¡§like fire in the case of the lay woman devotee U referred to chapter 12, paragraph 34. You will come to that later, not now, not today. On ¡¥D the Commentary the Dhammapada. If you want to read the story in more detail you may rea Legends, part 3, page 103. ¡§Like the poison in the case of the Sa?yutta Reciter the Elder C don¡¦t know this story because the Sub-Commentary did not explain this. Maybe it was very time this Commentary was written down. But now nobody knows about this Elder C|?a-S?va the case of the novice Sa~kicca¡¨ - this also is in the Commentary to the Dhammapada. You book Buddhist Legends, part 2, page 238 and the following pages.

Now we go to compassion. Compassion is karu?? in P??i. It will be explained later. ¡§One develop compassion should begin his task by reviewing the danger in lack of compassion ar compassion.¡¨ Then he practices compassion.

Compassion takes beings in suffering or beings in distress as object. So it is a little differe object of loving-kindness meditation. Loving-kindness meditation takes all beings whether th or whether they are enjoying, so all beings. Karu?? takes all beings who are in distress, who

When we want to practice karu?? meditation, we have to find a person who is in distress, mentally as well as physically. So we have to find such a person. If we cannot find such a pe we do? Then we can arouse compassion for an evil-doing person. There may be some pers though he is happy right now, he is going to suffer in his next lives. So he is the object of co We can practice to such a person.

Student: Bhante, were people so happy at that time they could not find a person in suffering

Teacher: They may be having fun right now doing evil things, but they are going to suffer the wrong doing in the next life. You can think of that and take them as the object of karu??.

Then the comparison is given to a man who is caught with stolen goods and who is conde given food and all these things, but he was not happy. In that story in paragraph 79 it says ¡§ hundred blows in sets of four.¡¨ Actually it is not in sets of four, but at every crossroads. A cr called ¡¥a set of four¡¦ because four roads meet there. So at every crossroads he was given The people give him things to eat. Although he may be eating and although he may even be going to suffer death. In the same way a person who is doing evil may be enjoying himself n suffer. So he can be the object of karu??.

Then there may be some person who does not do evil, who does profitable deeds, but he one of the kinds of ruin beginning with the ruin of health, or ruin of relatives, or ruin of proper on. That person also can be the object of karu?? meditation. A person who does not do evil meritorious deeds, good things, may be in poor health, or may have disease, or may have lo have lost his property and so on. So he can be the object of karu??.

In paragraph 81 the second paragraph it says ¡§And here too¡¨. The ¡¥too¡¦ is misplaced. T after ¡§He too deserves the meditator¡¦s compassion.¡¨ Not only the person who does evil, b compassion. ¡§He too deserves the meditator¡¦s compassion.

¡§Even with no such ruin, thus ¡¥In reality he is unhappy¡¦.¡¨ Now there is a person who do not been overtaken by any one of the ruins. So he is well off. He is in prosperity. What do yo You can still practice karu?? towards him. ¡§ ¡¥In reality he is unhappy¡¦, because he is not e suffering of the round [of becoming].¡¨ He is not exempt from suffering old age, disease and
And so such a person can be the object of karu?? meditation.

So in fact anybody can be the object of karu?? meditation, depending on how you regard t look at him. But it is better to find a person who is in real distress, who is in real suffering and karu?? towards that person. If you cannot find such a person, then you may practice toward

Here also there is the breaking down of barriers. Then one practices meditation until one g meditation can also lead to the attainment of third jh?na or fourth jh?na.

The next one is gladness (mudit?). Since it is gladness, its object must be people who are who are in happiness. Beings who are in happiness are the objects of mudit? meditation. Yo towards a dear person and so on.

In paragraph 85 it says ¡¥a boon companion¡¦. What is ¡¥a boon companion¡¦? The P??i v ¡¥So??a¡¦ means a tavern, a drinking place. So??sahaya means a drinking companion. Tha and very kind relationship towards that person. Do you use this word ¡¥boon companion¡¦?
Student: I don¡¦t think so. ¡¥Boon¡¦ is something like lucky or a gift. In French there is ¡¥bon which is a high liver or a drinker. That¡¦s French though. Actually a drinking companion make Teacher: When you practice compassion, what you do is to reflect ¡§This being indeed has misery. If only he could be free from this suffering.¡¨ That is how you practice compassion. T paragraph 78. When you practice karu??, you say ¡§May he be free from suffering. May he suffering.¡¨ That is the way of practicing compassion towards beings.

In mudit? what do you say? ¡§This being is indeed glad. How good! How excellent!¡¨ That you practice mudit?, you say ¡§He is happy. He is in prosperity. How good! How excellent!¡¨ practice mudit? meditation. When you want to practice mudit? meditation, you choose a pers happiness, who is in prosperity. Then you say ¡§He is happy. He is prosperous. How good! practice like that.

¡§But if his boon companion or the dear person was happy in the past but is now unlucky a then gladness can still be aroused by remembering his past happiness.¡¨ Or ¡§In the future h similar success¡¨ and so on. You can still practice mudit? towards that person.

Then the is breaking down of the barriers and so on. This meditation also leads to third jh? jh?na.

The last one is upekkh? (equanimity). ¡§One who wants to develop equanimity must have triple or quadruple jh?na in loving-kindness, and so on.¡¨ That is if you want to attain jh?na th meditation. First you must attain three jh?nas or four jh?nas by the practice of loving-kindnes compassion or gladness.

¡§He should emerge from the third jh?na [in the fourfold reckoning], after he has made it fa should see danger in the former [three divine abidings] because they are linked with attentio being¡¦s enjoyment (or given to attachment to beings) in the way beginning ¡¥May they be h

¡§Because resentment and approval are near, and because their association with joy is gr because they are gross due to association with joy. It is not that association with joy is gross gross. They are said to be gross because they are associated with joy. There is sukha with t said to be gross. ¡§And he should also see the advantage in equanimity because it is peace

How do you practice equanimity towards people? What do you say? It is not given here. W later. You just say ¡§Beings have kamma as their property.¡¨ Just that. It is kamma. Beings s according to their kamma. Beings have kamma as their property, as their matrix, as their rela Thinking of the law of Kamma is one way of practicing upekkh? meditation.

¡§Therefore he should arouse equanimity towards the neutral person in the way already st the neutral one¡¨ - I think ¡¥through the neutral one¡¦ should go. It should be ¡§Then he shou the barriers in each case between the three people, that is, the dear person, then the boon c then the hostile one, and lastly himself. And he should cultivate that sign, develop and repea it.¡¨ Here since he has attained three jh?nas or four jh?nas with mett? meditation and others the fourth jh?na or the fifth jh?na.

¡§But how then? Does this arise in one whom the third jh?na has already arisen on the ba kasi?a, etc.? It does not.¡¨ Not anybody who has gained jh?na with other meditation can obt jh?na or the fifth jh?na through upekkh?. He has to have gained jh?nas through mett?, karu? meditation. Then he can gain the fourth jh?na or the fifth jh?na through the last one, through meditation.

¡§Does this arise in one whom the third jh?na has already arisen on the basis of the earth, not. Why not? Because of the dissimilarity of the object.¡¨ Let us say you get the first, secon taking the earth kasi?a, the earth disk as object. Then the object of your jh?na is the earth d object of your jh?na must be beings. So there is difference of object. ¡§Because of the dissi object. It arises only in one in whom the third jh?na has arisen on the basis of loving-kindnes because the object is similar.¡¨ That is the end of the four divine abidings.

Now comes the general exposition. The first part has the meanings of mett?, karu??, mud ¡§Now as to the meaning firstly of loving-kindness, compassion, gladness and equanimity: it is loving-kindness.¡¨ The P??i word ¡¥mejjati¡¦ really means it sticks. So it is sticky.

¡§It is gluttonous (not solvent).¡¨ When you have mett?, you are as it were glued to the per gluttonous is the meaning.¡¨ , not solvent.

¡§Also: it comes about with respect to a friend (mitta), or it is behaviour towards a friend, th loving-kindness (mett?).¡¨ The first explanation takes it that mett? comes from the root ¡¥mit suffix ¡¥t?¡¦. The second one takes it that the word ¡¥mett?¡¦ comes from the word ¡¥mitta¡¦. to mett? by a grammatical rule. So mett? first is derived from a root and a suffix and secondl from a word and a suffix.

The second one is karu??. It is explained here. ¡§When there is suffering in others it cause people¡¦s hearts to be moved (kampana), thus it is compassion (karu??). Or alternatively, it others¡¦ suffering, attacks and demolishes it, thus it is compassion.¡¨ Here whether you really suffering of others is not important. It is immaterial. When karu?? arises in one¡¦s mind, it ari manner. It arises in this mode of wanting to remove suffering from others.

¡§Or alternatively, it is scattered (kiriyati) upon those who suffer, it is extended to them by thus it is compassion (karu??).¡¨ It is the desire for beings to be free from suffering, to be fre distress.

The next one is mudit?. ¡§Those endowed with it are glad (modanti), or itself is glad (moda the mere act of being glad (modana), thus it is gladness (mudit?).¡¨ Mudit? is just defined as

Next there is upekkh?. ¡§It looks on at (upekkhati), abandoning such interestedness as thi be free from enmity¡¦ and having recourse to neutrality, thus it is equanimity (upekkh?).¡¨ Eq indifference. It takes beings as object. It is just impartiality. It is not disregarding them all tog

Then there is discussion of the characteristics etc. of each one. ¡§Loving-kindness is chara as promoting the aspect of welfare.¡¨ That means actually occurring in the mode of desiring function is to prefer welfare. It is manifested as the removal of annoyance.¡¨ I just want to sa here. Its proximate cause is seeing lovableness in beings. It succeeds when it makes ill will fails when it provides (selfish) affection.¡¨ ¡¥Selfish¡¦ is put in parentheses. Is there unselfish Here what is meant is attachment. If you have attachment or lobha, you fail.

Compassion actually is desire to remove suffering from others. ¡§Compassion is character the aspect of allaying suffering. Its function resides in not bearing other¡¦s suffering. It is mar non-cruelty. Its proximate cause is to see helplessness in those overwhelmed by suffering. I makes cruelty subside and it fails when it produces sorrow.¡¨ This is very important. ¡§It fails produces sorrow.¡¨ When you practice compassion, you just practice compassion and you d sorry. That is very important.

When we see some people injured by some person for example, we are not only sorry for angry with the person who inflicted pain on them. When we do that, we are going beyond th compassion. We are getting into akusala, unwholesome mental states. Compassion is a wh highly developed wholesome mental state. When we practice compassion, we just have the free from suffering. We cannot say that we suffer with them because if we suffer with them, unwholesome mental states in our mind. We do not suffer with them. We have compassion with them. That is important in karu??. Many people confuse karu?? with this enemy, sorrow ¡§Gladness is characterized as gladness (produced by other¡¦s success). Its function resid unenvious. It is manifested as the elimination of aversion (boredom).¡¨ We were talking abou boredom on my way here. The P??i word used is ¡¥arati¡¦. ¡¥Rati¡¦ means delight and ¡¥a¡¦ non-delight in other people¡¦s, other beings¡¦ success etc. I don¡¦t think that we can call it bo Perhaps aversion also is not so good here. Can you think of another word which means non the opposite of envy actually. When you envy somebody, you are not pleased with his succe You don¡¦t take delight in his success. The word ¡¥arati¡¦ here means that, not taking delight people¡¦s success and so on. ¡§it succeeds when it makes non-delight subside, and it fails w merriment.¡¨ That is merriment with attachment.

Student: Sometimes you say sympathetic joy for gladness?
Teacher: Yes. Sympathetic joy and some also translate it as altruistic joy. Sympathetic joy m because ¡¥gladness¡¦ can mean any kind of gladness. Maybe here the translator wanted to just means gladness, but I think sympathetic joy is a better word for it.

¡§Equanimity is characterized as promoting the aspect of neutrality towards beings¡¨ and s proximate cause is seeing ownership of deeds (kamma) thus: ¡¥Beings are owners of their d theirs] is the choice by which they will become happy, or will get free from suffering, or will n from the success they have reached?¡¨ ¡¥Will get free from suffering¡¦ refers to karu?? (com not fall away from the success they have reached¡¦ refers to mudit?. When you practice muc ¡§May they not fall away from this prosperity, or this success, or this happiness.¡¨ You can s too. On the other page it said you may say ¡§This being is indeed glad. How good! How exc either way.

¡§It succeeds when it makes resentment and approval subside (Resentment is dosa and a and it fails when it produces the equanimity of unknowing.¡¨ ¡¥The equanimity of unknowing indifference of ignorance or just ignorance.

¡§The general purpose of these four divine abidings is the bliss of insight and an excellent future) existence. That peculiar to each is respectively the warding off of ill will and so on.¡¨ paragraph is not difficult to understand.

The next paragraph is the near and far enemies. Each one has two kinds of enemies, the far enemy. ¡§The divine abiding of loving-kindness has greed as its near enemy.¡¨ That is wh important when you practice loving-kindness that you do not have greed or attachment for th Sometimes they are very similar. So you may take one for the other. So the near enemy is g since both share in seeing the good things, seeing virtues.

¡§Greed behaves like a foe who keeps close by a man, and it easily finds an opportunity. S should be well protected from it. And ill will which is dissimilar to the similar greed, is its far e a foe ensconced in a rock wilderness. So loving-kindness must be practiced free from fear (f of that; for it is not possible to practice loving-kindness and feel anger simultaneously.¡¨

¡§Compassion has grief based on the home life (That is feeling sorry.) as its near enemy, in seeing failure.¡¨ Cruelty is the far enemy.

Now sympathetic joy or gladness (mudit?) - its near enemy is joy based on the home life. T becoming merry, joyful with attachment. ¡§And aversion (boredom) - or non-delight- which is similar joy, is its far enemy.¡¨ So something like envy is its far enemy. So gladness should be from fear or danger of that.

¡§Equanimity has the equanimity of unknowing based on the home life as its near enemy.¡ knowing, ignorance. It is ignorance that is not accompanied by pleasurable feeling or displea
So this ignorance is accompanied by indifferent feeling and shares in ignoring faults and virt

¡§And greed and resentment, which are dissimilar to the similar unknowing are its far ener enemies are greed and resentment. ¡§Therefore equanimity must be practiced free from fea

Each of these has two enemies, the near enemy and the far enemy. We should be careful enemy and the far enemy.

¡§Now zeal (chanda) consisting in desire to act is the beginning of all these things. Suppre hindrances, etc., is the middle. Absorption is the end.¡¨ So jh?na is the end.

¡§Their object is a single living being or many living beings, as a mental object consisting i concept.¡¨ Because beings are a concept it is called a ¡¥concept¡¦.

¡§The extension of the object takes place either in access or in absorption. Here is the ord as a skilled ploughman first delimits an area and then does his ploughing, so first a single dw be delimited and loving-kindness developed towards all beings there in the way beginning ¡¥ may all beings be free from enmity¡¦.¡¨ Then when you have gained experience with that, yo range of loving-kindness by taking two dwellings, three dwellings, four dwellings and so on, village, the district, the kingdom, one direction and so on up to one world sphere, or even be develop loving-kindness to beings in such areas.

That is why when I teach loving-kindness, I teach in two ways. The first is by way of perso well, happy and peaceful. May my teachers be well, happy and peaceful. May my parents be peaceful.¡¨ and so on. The other way is: ¡§May all beings in this building be well, happy and all beings in this area, in this city, in this county, in this state, in this country, in this world, in universe be well, happy and peaceful.¡¨ And then ¡§May all beings in general be well, happy The meditation is extended little by little.

Now the outcome, what kind of results you can get from the practice of these four divine a as the immaterial states are the outcome of the kasi?as, and the base consisting of neither p non-perception is the outcome of concentration, and Fruition Attainment is the outcome of in attainment of cessation is the outcome of serenity coupled with insight, so the divine abiding is the outcome of the first three divine abidings.¡¨ In order to be successful in the fourth one have to be successful in the first three divine abidings.

¡§For just as the gable rafters cannot be placed in the air without having first set up the sca built the framework of beams, so it is not possible to develop the fourth jh?na in these withou already developed the third jh?na in them.¡¨

In paragraph 104 it says that immaterial states are the outcome of the kasi?as. ¡¥Kasi?a¡¦ jh?na developed on the kasi?a. You take the kasi?a as the object of meditation. Then you pr and get jh?na. If you do not get r|p?vacara jh?na, then you do not get ar|p?vacara jh?nas. T the immaterial states are the outcome of the kasi?a jh?nas. ¡§The base consisting of neither non-perception is the outcome of concentration.¡¨ The ar|p?vacara jh?na is the outcome the jh?na concentration. ¡§Fruition Attainment is the outcome of insight.¡¨ When you practice vip and become enlightened, you gain Fruition Attainment. So Fruition Attainment is the outcom meditation.

¡§The attainment of cessation is the outcome of serenity coupled with insight.¡¨ There is ar called ¡¥cessation attainment¡¦. That means the cessation of mental activities. It is a very hig type of jh?na. In order to get into that jh?na you must first have all the eight or nine jh?nas. Y into first jh?na and emerge from it. Then you enter into second jh?na, third jh?na and so on the fourth ar|p?vacara jh?na. After emerging from the first jh?na, you practice vipassan?. Th the second jh?na (That is samatha or serenity meditation.) and practice vipassan? on that jh of jh?na. So here vipassan? and samatha go in a coupled way. It is stated here as the outco coupled with insight. The explanation of the attainment will be given at the end of the book.

Now questions - ¡§And here it may be asked: But why are loving-kindness, compassion, g equanimity, called divine abidings?¡¨ The P??i word for divine abiding is ¡¥brahm? vih?ra¡¦. living. Here it is translated as abiding. The word ¡¥brahm?¡¦ has two meanings here. One me and the other meaning is faultless, so immaculate. These abidings are the best because the attitude towards beings. These are the right attitudes which we should have towards beings. called ¡¥the best¡¦.

¡§And just as Brahm? Gods abide with immaculate minds, so the meditators who associat these abidings abide on an equal footing with Brahm? Gods.¡¨ The Brahmas have immacula are not contaminated by some of the mental defilements. A person who practices any one o like a Brahm?. That is because the Brahm? Gods in the world of Brahm?s always practice th abidings. They live with these four divine abidings. They have no other thing to do. So these called ¡¥brahm? vih?ra¡¦. It is the abiding like that of the brahm?s. They are called divine abi sense of the best and in the sense of immaculate. They are the best way of abiding or the fa abiding.

Why are they only four? The answer that is given is that the way of purity is fourfold. ¡§Lov is the way to purity for one who has much ill will, compassion is that for one who has much c is that one for one who has much non-delight, and equanimity is that for one who has much

¡§Also attention given to beings is only fourfold, that is to say, as bringing welfare, as remo suffering, as being glad at their success, and as unconcern, [that is to say, impartial neutrali the second.

¡§And one abiding in the measureless states should practice loving-kindness and the rest four sons, namely, a child, an invalid, one in the flush of youth, and one busy with his own a wants the child to grow up, wants the invalid to get well, wants the one in the flush of youth t long the benefits of youth, and is not at all bothered about the one who is busy with his own why the measureless states are only four as ¡¥due to paths to purity and other sets of four¡¦.

Then the order - the order is just loving-kindness, compassion, gladness and equanimity.

Now why are they called measureless? In paragraph 110 ¡§For their scope is measureless their object is beings without measure, without exception. All of them occur with a measurele their scope is measureless beings.

¡§Instead of assuming a measure such as ¡¥loving-kindness, etc., should be developed on being, or in an area of such an extent¡¦, they occur with universal pervasion.¡¨ What does tha when you practice loving-kindness towards a person, it cannot be called measureless?

The translation is a little off the mark. What is meant here or what is written by the original that even when you are practicing towards one person, it can be called measureless becaus your loving-kindness to one part of the body. That is what is meant here. ¡§Even in regard t they occur with universal pervasion without assuming a measure as ¡¥loving-kindness shoul this much part of him¡¦.¡¨ So it is not like ¡§May his head be well, happy and peaceful. May th his body be well, happy and peaceful¡¨ and so on. You take the whole being. So even with re person it can be called measureless. That¡¦s what is meant here.

The next topic is producing three jh?nas and four jh?nas. The first three can produce how Three or four. The last one can produce the fourth or the fifth, only one jh?na.

There is a discussion here with an opponent. Beginning with paragraph 112 there is an arg counterargument. The opponent pointed to a Sutta. He took the Sutta to mean that all four c be obtained by the practice of mett?, karu?? and mudit?. The form we see in that Sutta may you are not really familiar with Abhidhamma. Buddha said that after you practice loving-kind go on making this loving-kindness with vitakka and vic?ra, then without vitakka but with vic? when you read it superficially, you also may think that you can get all four or five jh?nas thro meditation and so on. That is not so.

So the author said: ¡§He should be told: Do not put it like that. For if that were so, then con of the body, etc., would also have quadruple and quintuple jh?na.¡¨ The Buddha taught abou the body also in the same way, but contemplation of the body can only produce the first jh?n jh?nas.

¡§There is not even the first jh?na in the contemplation of feeling or in the other two.¡¨ ¡¥O other two¡¦ is wrong. In its place we should say ¡§But there is not even the first jh?na in the c of feeling, let alone the second and so on.¡¨ When you practice feeling contemplation, you ca first jh?na, let alone the second, third, fourth and fifth. ¡§So do not misrepresent the Blessed adherence to the letter.¡¨ The he explained this.

In paragraph 114 about five lines down it says ¡§but the Blessed One had no confidence y bhikkhu.¡¨ That was the word about which I was talking to you. Actually the Buddha scolded ¡§So too, some misguided men merely question me and when the Dhamma is expounded [t that they need not follow me.¡¨ So that monk asked the Buddha to teach him, and he did not again he asked the Buddha to teach him. The Buddha saw that he had the capability to beco this time the Buddha taught him again. So can you give me another word like scold?

Student: Chastise?

Teacher: Chastise, yes, very good. So the Buddha chastised him. It is not that the Buddha h him. He misread the word. Actually it is the right word but with an accent. So the Buddha cha

When you read the Sutta, it seems to mean that you can practice loving-kindness meditati get first, second, third, fourth and fifth jh?nas. However what the Buddha meant there is that mett? meditation and you may get the first jh?na, second jh?na or third jh?na, but do not be that. Try to get higher jh?nas by taking other subjects of meditation, not mett? meditation. If get the fourth or fifth jh?na, you have to practice another kind of meditation, not mett? medita practice of mett? meditation you can only get the third or fourth jh?na. That is what is meant

In footnote 17 ¡§Mere unification of the mind: the kind of concentration (sam?dh?na) that i
- I think that is ¡¥not too developed¡¦ is better, not ¡¥undeveloped¡¦ because it is a little devel not developed enough.

Next we will go to paragraph 119, the highest limit of each. ¡§And while they are twofold b triple-quadruple jh?na and the single remaining jh?na, still they should be understood to be in each case by a different efficacy consisting in having ¡¥beauty as the highest¡¦, etc., for th described in the Haliddavasana Sutta.¡¨ ¡¥Beauty in the highest¡¦ is not a good translation fo is liberation with the beautiful as object. Here ¡¥liberation¡¦ means jh?nas, jh?nas which take things as object. ¡§So loving-kindness is the basic support for the liberation with the beautifu

¡§One who abides in compassion has to come to know thoroughly the danger in materialit is aroused in him when he sees suffering of beings that has as its material sign (I think ¡¥ma should go.) cause, form beaten with sticks, and so on.¡¨ ¡¥Form¡¦ means a body.

In paragraph 123 there is a lot of existent and non-existent things in that passage. What w mind is that happiness (sukha) and pain (dukkha) are said to be existent because they belon They belong to reality. Sukha as well as dukkha are among the mental factors. Sukha is plea dukkha is displeasurable feeling. They are among the 52 mental factors or mental states. Th said to be existent things.

A being is non-existent according to ultimate reality or in the ultimate sense. A being is jus combination of mind and matter or a combination of the five aggregates. When we say ¡¥a b non-existent. And when we say ¡¥sukha¡¦ and ¡¥dukkha¡¦, they are existent. If you keep that you will understand paragraph 123.

Upekkh? is not interested in the happiness of beings or in the suffering of beings. It takes beings as an object, not the happiness or the suffering of beings, not the sukha or dukkha o

A person who practices upekkh? meditation becomes skilled in taking what is non-existen as object. So it is easier for such a person to take the non-existent, the other kinds if non-ex as object, that is the base, which is non-existent as to individual essence of consciousness, reality. The third ar|p?vacara jh?na (the third immaterial jh?na) takes the non-existence of th ar|p?vacara jh?na.

Non-existence itself is non-existent. Non-existence is a concept. It is not reality. A person skilled in taking concept as object when he practices upekkh? meditation will find it easy to t non-existent or nothingness of the first ar|p?vacara consciousness when he tries to get the i

In order to get the third ar|p?vacara jh?na you have to take the absence of the first aru?p?
object. You know that the ar|p?vacara jh?nas are the immaterial jh?nas. Most of the jh?nas about are the material jh?nas. How to get the immaterial jh?nas will be described in the next Student: Immaterial jh?na is formless jh?na?

Teacher: Formless jh?na, that¡¦s right. In order to get the third formless jh?na you have to m absence of the first formless jh?na. That absence is nothing. That is just a concept. If you ar taking concept as object when you practice upekkh? meditation, then you will find it easier h nothingness as object. That is what is explained in paragraph 123. The sentences are long a is not easy to understand.

So please keep in mind that when it says ¡¥existent¡¦ here it means sukha and dukkha. An ¡¥non-existent¡¦ it means beings because beings are non-existent in the ultimate sense.

OK. The others are not difficult to understand. Footnote 20 is very good because even in th there is a mistake. In the Sinhalese edition the reading is right and he took the Sinhalese ed

You may not understand. ¡§Reading in both cases ¡¥avijjam?na-gahana-dakkha? citta?¡¨, and dakkha have two very different meanings. ¡¥Dakkha¡¦ means skill and ¡¥dukkha¡¦ mean the correct reading should be dakkha and not dukkha. There is just the difference of an ¡¥a¡ detected this. That is very good.

By the practice of these you fulfill the ten p?ramit?s. In Therav?da Buddhism there are ten fulfilled by Bodhisattas and any person. These p?ramit?s are mentioned in paragraph 124. ¡ they give gifts.¡¨ That means giving. That is the first p?ramit?. ¡§And in order to avoid doing they undertake the precepts of virtue.¡¨ That is the second p?ramit?. The first is d?na and th s?la. ¡§They practice renunciation for the purpose of perfecting their virtue.¡¨ That is the thirc ¡§They cleanse their understanding (Pa??? that is the fourth.) for the purpose of non-confus good and bad for beings. They constantly arouse energy (viriya) having beings¡¦ welfare and heart. When they have acquired heroic fortitude through supreme energy, they become pati beings¡¦ many kinds of faults. They do not deceive (That means truthfulness.) when promisir you this; we shall do this for you.¡¦ They are unshakably resolute upon beings¡¦ welfare and Resoluteness is the eighth p?ramit?. In P??i it is called ¡¥adhi??h?na¡¦, firmness or resolutic unshakable loving-kindness (That is the ninth.) they place them first [before themselves].¡¨ A means is they do favor first. The P??i word is pubbak?ri. ¡¥Pubba¡¦ means first and ¡¥k?ri¡¦ r ¡¥They do first¡¦ means that they do not wait for you to ask a favor, they do first. So ¡§Throug loving-kindness they do favor first. Through equanimity (the tenth p?ramit?) they expect no r fulfilled the [ten] perfections, these [divine abidings] then perfect all the good states classed powers, the four kinds of fearlessness, the six kinds of knowledge not shared [by disciples] a states of the Enlightened One. This is how they bring to perfection all the good states beginr giving.¡¨ These ten p?ramit?s can be fulfilled by the practice of these four divine abidings.

There is so much to talk about. I intended to go to the next chapter, but I cannot. So pleas ten for next week.

S?dhu! S?dhu! S?dhu!

Chapter 10
(Tape 23 / Ps: 1-64)

Today¡¦s chapter is on the immaterial states, that is on the formless jh?nas. We are still in concentration. This book was written on the three broad subjects of s?la (morality), sam?dhi and pa??? (wisdom). We are still in concentration. This chapter deals with four jh?nas, the a immaterial or formless states.

A person who wants to attain these immaterial states or brahm? vih?ras must have alread or five form jh?nas or material jh?nas. Without getting those jh?nas one will not be able to a immaterial states.

¡§One who wants firstly to develop the base consisting of boundless space sees in gross p danger through the wielding of sticks, etc., because of the words.¡¨ In order to go to the imm or in order to attain the formless jh?nas one needs to find fault with matter. So here he sees physical matter. That means he sees danger in the physical body.

Then he sees danger in it through the thousand afflictions beginning with eye disease and have this physical body we may quarrel with some other person. We may come to blows an this physical body is the place of many diseases beginning with eye disease, ear disease ar finds fault with the physical body.

In order to surmount that he enters upon the fourth form (r|p?vacara) jh?na with any of the beginning with the earth kasi?a and omitting the limited space kasi?a. You know there are n want to go on to the ar|p?vacara jh?nas, you cannot practice limited space kasi?a because already space and space cannot be removed. So only nine kasi?as are mentioned here, the ¡§Now although he has already surmounted gross physical matter by means of the fourth material sphere, nevertheless he still wants also to surmount the kasi?a materiality since it is counterpart of the former.¡¨ When he is in the jh?nas, he is said to be out of physical matters wants to surmount the kasi?a materiality.

Let us take the fourth jh?na. If he practices with earth kasi?a meditation, then his fourth jh earth kasi?a as object. So the fourth jh?na takes earth kasi?a or the sign of earth kasi?a wh materiality as object. So when he, let us say, hates matter, he hates any matter, whether it is the jh?na or any other matter. So he wants to surmount the kasi?a materiality.

It is like a person who sees a snake or who is pursued by a snake and he is afraid. Even he sees a rope or a crack in the earth, he is afraid of that. In the same way since this medita matter, he hates the kasi?a materiality also. So he wants to surmount the kasi?a matter too. is that it is like the man pursued by the snake.

The other similes are the dog attacked by a boar and the pis?ca goblin and the timid man. a man afraid of pis?cas. It is not a goblin and a timid man, but it is just a man who is afraid o man who is afraid of ghosts sees something in the dark. Then he thinks it is a ghost. So he i too. It is something like that.

Even those who have never seen a ghost in their life are afraid of ghosts because they ha other people about ghosts. A person who is afraid of ghosts may be afraid of a tree stump o shadow.

¡§So when he has become disgusted with (dispassionate towards) the kasi?a materiality, t fourth jh?na, and wants to get away from it, he achieves mastery in the five ways.¡¨ So he m mastery in the five ways mentioned in the earlier chapters.

¡§Then on emerging from the now familiar fourth jh?na of the fine material sphere¡¨ - so he fourth jh?na with which he is very, very familiar. He gets into the jh?na and emerges from it.

¡§He sees the danger in that jh?na in this way. ¡¥This makes its object the materiality with become disgusted¡¦, and ¡¥It has joy as its near enemy¡¦.¡¨ Now he finds fault with the fourth jh?na. He says with reference to this fourth r|p?vacara jh?na, ¡§This makes its object the ma which I have become disgusted.¡¨ That means this is a friend of my enemy, so I hate him too like that.

¡§ ¡¥It has joy as its near enemy¡¦ and ¡¥it is grosser than the peaceful liberations¡¦.¡¨ ¡¥Pe liberations¡¦ means the immaterial jh?nas or the ar|p?vacara jh?nas.

¡§There is, however, no [comparative] grossness of factors here [as in the case of the four jh?nas]; for the immaterial states have the same two factors as this fine material [jh?na].¡¨ In jh?nas one material jh?na is different from another material jh?na by the number of jh?na fa the grossness or subtleness of the jh?na factors. But here all four immaterial jh?nas have th jh?na factors. So there is no difference in the number of factors in these four immaterial stat no comparative grossness of jh?na in the four immaterial jh?nas.

¡§When he has seen the danger in that in this way and has ended his attachment to it, he attention to the base consisting of boundless spaced as peacefulness. Then, when he has s to the limit of the world sphere¡¨ - that means he enters into the jh?na. His fourth material jh? kasi?a sign as object. Then he expands this kasi?a sign in his mind. He expands the kasi?a likes to the limit of the world sphere or as far as he likes. Then he removes that sign becaus like that sign. He doesn¡¦t want to be attached to that sign. So he removes that sign by givin to the space touched by it or covered by it regarding that as or saying to himself ¡§space, sp ¡§boundless space, boundless space, boundless space.¡¨

¡§When he is removing it, he neither folds it up like a mat nor withdraws it like a cake from Actually it is from a pan. ¡¥A cake¡¦ here means a flat cake or pancake. You take a pancake spatula. It is not like that. He does not pay attention to it. He does not review it.

¡§It is simply that he does not advert or give attention to it or review it; it is when he neither to it nor gives attention to it nor reviews it, but gives attention exclusively to the space touche [regarding that] as ¡¥space, space¡¦, that he is said to ¡¥remove the kasi?a¡¦.¡¨ When he war kasi?a or the sign of kasi?a, he just stops paying attention to that sign. When he does not pa that sign, that sign disappears. In its place there is void. There is just space left. That space object for his immaterial jh?na.

¡§And when the kasi?a is being removed, it does not roll up or roll away. It is simply that it ¡¥removed¡¦ on account of his non-attention to it, his attention being given to ¡¥space, space conceptualized as the mere space left by the removal of the kasi?a.¡¨ This kind of space is c left by the removal of the kasi?a¡¦.

¡§Whether it is called ¡¥space left by the removal of the kasi?a¡¦ or ¡¥space touched by the ¡¥space secluded from the kasi?a¡¦, it is all the same.¡¨ You can call it with any name you lik the same whether it is called ¡¥space left by the removal of the kasi?a¡¦, or ¡¥space touched or ¡¥space secluded from the kasi?a¡¦. So the kasi?a sign disappears. In its place there is sp void. The meditator takes that space (It is conceptualized space.) as his object of meditation it again and again.

¡§He adverts again and again to the sign of the space left by the removal of the kasi?a as space¡¦, and he strikes at it with thought and applied thought.¡¨ That means he pays attentio again and again.

¡§As he adverts to it again and again and strikes at it with thought and applied thought the suppressed, mindfulness is established and his mind concentrated in access. He cultivates t again, develops and repeatedly practices it.¡¨ Then he attains the first ar|p?vacara jh?na.

When he attains the ar|p?vacara jh?na there is a thought process. That thought process is here in paragraph 10, the second half of the paragraph. ¡§And here too in the prior stage the three or four sensual sphere impulsions associated with equanimous feeling.¡¨ That means t four moments of javana, or impulsions, or sense-sphere consciousness. They are parikamm and gotrabh| (preliminary, access, adaptation, and change of lineage). These four moments ar|p?vacara jh?na consciousness. Next comes the immaterial or ar|p?vacara consciousness

¡§The rest is the same as in the case of the earth kasi?a. There is however, this difference immaterial sphere consciousness has arisen in this way, the bhikkhu, who has been formerl kasi?a disk with the jh?na eye, finds himself looking at only space (because the kasi?a has that sign has been abruptly removed by the attention given in the preliminary work thus ¡¥sp is like a man who has plugged an opening in a [covered] vehicle, a sack or a pot with a piec with a piece of rag of some such color as yellow, red or white and is looking at that, and ther is removed by the force of the wind or by some other agency, he finds himself looking at spa

The first ar|p?vacara consciousness takes space as an object. It is not ordinary space or g but it is the space obtained or left after the removal of the kasi?a sign.

Now comes the text. ¡§With the complete surmounting of perceptions of matter, with the d perceptions of resistance, with non-attention to perceptions of variety, [aware of] ¡¥unbound enters upon and dwells in the base consisting of boundless space.¡¨

I have not talked about ¡¥base consisting of boundless space¡¦ because it is not accurate. perceptions do we have here? There are 1. ¡¥complete surmounting of perceptions of matte disappearance of the perceptions of resistance¡¦, 3. ¡¥non-attention to perceptions of variety kind of perception is called ¡¥r|pa sa???¡¦ in the P??i Texts. ¡¥R|pa sa???¡¦ really means the jh?nas and their objects. It is a little complicated. The word ¡¥sa???¡¦ (perception) is used qu the Suttas to represent not only sa??? but all mental states. The word used is ¡¥sa???¡¦, but understand is that it means all mental states. So here ¡¥r|pa sa???¡¦ really means five mater their objects. The material jh?nas take kasi?as as their objects. Kasi?as are matter. So ¡¥pe matter¡¦ here means the five or four material jh?nas and also by play of the word ¡¥sa???¡¦ t That is explained here. First complete surmounting of perceptions of matter is explained. Pe matter is explained in two ways here.

Student: Bhante, I have a question. I thought there were only four or five jh?nas including th jh?nas.
Teacher: There are eight or nine. If you take r|p?vacara jh?nas to be four, there are eight, fo jh?nas and four ar|p?vacara jh?nas. If you take r|p?vacara jh?nas to be five, there are nine j

When it means fine material jh?nas, then it is defined as sa??? (perception) of matter. ¡¥P matter¡¦ means perception taking matter as object and here it means jh?nas. So ¡¥perceptio only sa??? but the whole jh?na.

Why does this word also signify their objects? Here the word is explained in another way.
¡¥sa???¡¦ is taken to mean a name or in this book it is translated as a label. ¡¥Sa???¡¦ can a
The word ¡¥r|pa sa???¡¦ is explained to mean something that has the name ¡¥r|pa¡¦. So they objects of jh?na. The objects of jh?nas are kasi?as - earth kasi?a, water kasi?a and so on. T called ¡¥r|pa sa???¡¦ because they are of matter and so they have the name ¡¥matter¡¦. The ¡¥matter¡¦ so they are called ¡¥r|pa sa???¡¦. The word ¡¥r|pa sa???¡¦ or ¡¥perception of matt in two ways in the Visuddhi Magga. The first one is sa??? of r|pa. The second one is someth name ¡¥r|pa¡¦. That is why in the footnote the author says ¡§This explanation depends on a ¡¥sa???¡¦ as the (subjective) perception and as the (objective) sign, signal or label perceive

Surmounting both the fine material jh?nas and their objects - that means he no longer pay objects of the five jh?nas. If he is still paying attention to them, he will not be able to surmou he wants to surmount the five or four material jh?nas. So he has to forsake all of them.

The next is what? ¡§With the disappearance of perceptions or resistance¡¨ - ¡¥perceptions means perception of something where there is something like friction. When you see an obje be friction of the visible object and your eye. These two come together. When the visible obj the avenue of your eye, it is said to strike your eye. So it is called ¡¥friction¡¦ but in the transl is called ¡¥resistance¡¦. The P??i word is ¡¥pa?igha sa???¡¦. There is resistance or friction. W be friction? There is friction between visible object and the eye, audible object and the ear, t the nose, taste and tongue, tactile object and the body. So there are five kinds of pa?igha sa r|pa sa??? (¡¥R|pa¡¦ means visible object.), sadda sa??? (sound), gandha sa??? (smell), ras pho??abba sa??? (touch). So it is sa??? associated with two seeing consciousnesses, two consciousnesses. Actually there are ten kinds of sa???.

Among the eighteen types of rootless consciousness there are ten (five pairs of two each) consciousness, hearing consciousness, smelling consciousness, tasting consciousness, and consciousness. These are called here ¡¥pa?igha sa???¡¦. ¡¥Disappearance of the perceptio ¡¥disappearance of the perceptions of friction¡¦ means disappearance of these types of cons consciousness and so on. When you have entered into the jh?na, only jh?na consciousnes again for a long period - one hour, two hours, three hours or one day, two days and so on. A seeing consciousness, no hearing consciousness and so on arise. So they are said to have

(Say?daw refers to a citta chart.)

These two are seeing consciousness. One is the result of bad kamma and one is the resu you see an ugly thing, then you see with this type of consciousness (cakkhuvi????a that is v When you see a beautiful thing, a desirable object, then you see with this consciousness (ca is vip?ka of kusala). There are two seeing consciousnesses, two hearing, two smelling, two touching. They are called ¡¥pa?igha sa???¡¦. They do not arise when you are in jh?na. That

Let¡¦s go back a little to paragraph 14 with the surmounting, with the fading away, and wit cessation. ¡§Both because of the fading away and because of the cessation, either in all asp exception, of these perceptions of matter, reckoned as jh?na, which number fifteen with the profitable, resultant and functional.¡¨ These fifteen are the five r|p?vacara kusala, the five r|p vip?ka and the five r|p?vacara kiriya.

In the footnote the numbers of the types of consciousness are given. Those numbers are a two at the end of the book. The sequence is not the same as this chart. In the footnote they and 81-85.

Now we come to paragraph 16. ¡§With the disappearance of perception of resistance¡¨ - th disappearance of sa??? accompanying the ten kinds of consciousness just shown.

Now paragraph 17 ¡§Of course, these are not to be found in one who has entered upon th either.¡¨ They do not arise in one who has entered the first jh?na. ¡§For consciousness at tha occur by way of the five doors.¡¨ When you are in jh?na, you don¡¦t see, you don¡¦t hear, you whatever. You are completely in the mental world or something like that. They don¡¦t arise e in the first jh?na.

¡§Still the mention of them here should be understood as a recommendation of this jh?na arousing interest in it.¡¨ That is are praising it: ¡¥It is good. There are no perceptions of resis this¡¦. It is something like that.

¡§Just as in the case of the fourth jh?na there is mention of the pleasure and pain already elsewhere.¡¨ So pleasure and pain are abandoned in the previous jh?na, but in the descripti jh?na they are also mentioned. That is to recommend the fourth jh?na, that it is good.

¡§And in the case of the third Path there is mention of the [false] view of personality, etc., a abandoned earlier.¡¨ When describing the third enlightened person, the Buddha said that wit the five lower fetters and three of those five are abandoned at the first stage of enlightenme mentioned again with the person who has reached the third stage of attainment, just to reco praise it. In the same way here although the perceptions of resistance are not arising when first jh?na, yet they are mentioned here to praise this jh?na.

¡§Or alternatively, though these are also not to be found in one who has attained the fine m still their not being there is not due to their having been abandoned; for development of the f sphere does not lead to fading of greed for materiality, and the occurrence of these [fine ma actually dependent on materiality.¡¨ That means that they are not there not because they are together, for only through enlightenment can these be abandoned all together. So it is not th abandoned all together that they do not arise here. They are something like pushed back.

¡§But this development [of the immaterial] does lead to the fading of greed for materiality. is allowable to say that they are actually abandoned here; and not only to say it, but to maint absolutely.¡¨ It is a way of forcing you to accept.

¡§In fact it is because they have not been abandoned already before this that it was said b One that sound is a thorn to one who has the first jh?na.¡¨ If they were really abandoned, so a thorn to the first jh?na.

¡§And it is precisely because they are abandoned here that the imperturbability of the imm attainments and their state of peaceful liberation are mentioned, and that ?l?ra K?l?ma neith hundred carts that passed close by him nor heard the sound of them while he was in an imm Once he was sitting in immaterial attainment (ar|p?vacara). Then 500 carts passed close to throwing up dust and so on. Later on his disciples came to him and asked if he had heard th He said ¡§No, I did not.¡¨

When this was told to the Buddha, Buddha said ¡§Which is more difficult or which is more did not know that 500 carts passed by him or a man who did not know while there was lightn many people were killed by lightning, and he did not know anything about that?¡¨ The man s was more difficult, more wonderful. The Buddha said that once he was like that. He was in a and there was thunder and lightning and people died. Later on a man came to him and said anything about that?¡¨ The Buddha replied that he did not. You may read this in Dialogues o volume 2, page 141. In Thus Have I Heard, translated by Maurice Walsh it is on page 258.

When one is in the immaterial state (ar|p?vacara jh?na) you will not know anything.

Student: So at a retreat you won¡¦t hear the bell?

Teacher: No.

Student: Until you get out of it?

Teacher: Yes. Before attaining it the meditator makes up his mind ¡¥I want to be or let me be for one hour, two hours¡¨ and so on.

Student: Seven days is the maximum?

Teacher: Yes, seven days.

¡§With non-attention to perceptions of variety¡¨ - ¡¥perceptions of variety¡¦ means percepti variety of objects or perceptions that are themselves varied. So it is explained in or percepti themselves varied. So it is explained in two ways: either to perceptions occurring with variety as their domain. Sometimes the word ¡¥domain¡¦ is not a good word for the P??i word ¡¥goc as their object. They take many, many different objects so they are called ¡¥perceptions of v

¡§Or to perceptions themselves various¡¨ - that means one perception is different from anc Although we are all human beings, one is still different from the other. We are all individually in the same way although sa??? is one, there are different sa???s - sa???s taking visible ob taking sounds and so on. Sa???s themselves are varied and take varied objects. That is wh called ¡¥n?natta sa??? (perceptions of variety)¡¦. In paragraph 20 you see the word ¡¥domai the word ¡¥domain¡¦, please take it to mean object.

In about the middle of the paragraph you can see that 44 kinds of perception are given. ¡§ because 44 kinds of perception - that is to say, eight kinds of sense-sphere profitable percep themselves have variety, have various individual essences, and are dissimilar from each oth complete non-attention to, non-adverting to, non-reaction to (That means not paying attentio non-reviewing of, these perceptions of variety; what is meant is that because he does not ac them attention or review them, therefore and so on.¡¨ The 44 perceptions are given in detail author does not give the numbers of the types of consciousness at the end of the book. Do y them down? The eight kinds of sense-sphere profitable perception are 1-8. The twelve kinds perception are 22-33. The eleven kinds of sense-sphere profitable resultant perception are 3 42-49. The two kinds of unprofitable resultant perception are 55 and 56. The eleven kinds of functional perception are 70-72 and 73-80. Eight kinds of sense-sphere profitable perception profitable¡¦ means wholesome. ¡¥The twelve kinds of unprofitable perception¡¦ means unwho kinds of sense-sphere profitable resultant perception are the eight k?m?vacara sobhana vip sant?ra?as which are wholesome resultants. The two kinds of unprofitable resultant percept sampa?icchana and the sant?rana which are unwholesome resultants. The eleven kinds of perception are pa?cadv?r?vajjana, manodv?r?vajjana, hasitupp?da and the eight k?m?vaca actually pointing at citta chart during this explanation.) Actually these are the 54 sense-sphe consciousnesses minus the dvipa?cavi????a. ¡¥N?natta sa???¡¦ or ¡¥perception of variety¡¦ accompanying these 44 types of consciousness.

¡§And [two things] should be understood: firstly, that their absence is stated here in two wa ¡¥surmounting¡¦ and ¡¥disappearance¡¦ because the earlier perceptions of matter and perce do not exist even in the kind of existence produced by this jh?na on rebirth, let alone when t entered upon and dwelt in that existence.¡¨ That means the earlier two kinds of perception, p matter and perceptions of resistance, do not exist in the kind of existence produced by this j that they do not exist in the r|p?vacara world in the r|p?vacara brahm?s. So in that realm the
They also do not exist when the jh?nas are entered upon and dwelt in.

¡§And secondly, in the case of perceptions of variety (the third one), ¡¥non-attention¡¦ to th because 27 kinds of perception still exist in the kind of existence produced by this jh?na.¡¨ T perception are existent in the ar|p?vacara realm. That¡¦s why here he does not say ¡¥surmo just says ¡¥non-attention¡¦. There it says ¡¥surmounting¡¦ because they are non-existent, but to be given no attention, non-attention because they are there but they are not paid attentio difference.

The 27 kinds of perception are the eight kinds of sense-sphere profitable perception (1-8), of functional perception (72 and 73-80), and the ten kinds of unprofitable perception (22-29,

¡§For when he enters upon and dwells in this jh?na, there too, he does so by non-attentio but he has not attained when he does give attention to them.¡¨ So here it is just not paying a them. It is not surmounting them.

In paragraph 22 we have a very brief account of the meaning of the words. ¡¥With the sur perception of matter¡¦, what does it mean? Abandoning of all fine material is signified. By the the surmounting of perceptions of matter¡¦ is meant the surmounting of the fine material jh?n

By the words ¡¥with the disappearance of perceptions of resistance¡¦ and so on, what is m Non-attention to all sense-sphere consciousness, to all k?m?vacara consciousness. So in fa enters into the ar|p?vacara consciousness, there are no r|p?vacara consciousnesses and no consciousnesses. Surmounting some and not paying attention to some he enters into the im the meditator is in the immaterial jh?na, there are no r|p?vacara jh?nas and no k?m?vacara Actually when one gets the ar|p?vacara jh?na the r|p?vacara jh?nas disappear.

Unbounded space is not difficult to understand. It is ¡¥unbounded¡¦ because it has neither its arising nor to its end, as to its disappearing - no arising, no disappearing. Therefore it is c ¡¥boundless¡¦.

Paragraph 24 ¡§He enters upon and dwells in the base consisting of boundless space.¡¨ N this because ¡¥base consisting of boundless space¡¦ is not an accurate translation. What do ¡¥base consisting of boundless space¡¦? It really means the first ar|p?vacara jh?na and its c first ar|p?vacara jh?na is called ¡¥?k?s?na?c?yatana¡¦. It is a long name. The word is compo ?k?s?na?ca and ?yatana. ?k?s?na?ca is derived from ?k?s?nanta. This is P??i grammar. ? have the same meaning, namely, boundless space.

Now the word ¡¥?yatana¡¦ means base in the sense of habitat here. So jh?na citta and its called ¡¥?k?s?na?c?yatana¡¦ because they have boundless space as their habitat. That mea is not the base, but something that has the base; that is what is meant by the word ¡¥?k?s?n translation of ¡¥base consisting of boundless space¡¦ is not accurate. Actually it is something boundless space as a base. ¡¥Base¡¦ here means object.

Student: So this is similar to the two senses where you talked about sa??? being both -

Teacher: Right. Because the word ¡¥?k?s?na?c?yatana¡¦ belongs to a kind of compound wh signifies something other than those denoted by the individual words, not qualified by them, possession, habitation and so on. This is P??i grammar. The individual words mean someth word means another thing connected with them but not them.

Twenty Nine Palms is a good example. There is a community called ¡¥Twenty Nine Palms California. Why is that city called ¡¥Twenty Nine Palms¡¦? Because there are 29 palms there more than 29 palms now, but that is another thing. A city called ¡¥Twenty Nine Palms¡¦ mea there are 29 palms. So the word ¡¥Twenty Nine Palms¡¦ does not mean 29 palms. It means 29 palms. So 29 is 29 and palms are palms. But when these words are used as a compound palms, but a place which has or where there are 29 palms.

In the same way ?k?s?na?ca and ?yatana here - ¡¥?k?s?na?ca¡¦ means boundless space base. But when they are compounded and when they become a compound noun, they do n a base¡¦ but they mean ¡¥something which has boundless space as a base¡¦ and ¡¥base¡¦ h is not a base, but something which has that base. That is important. So we will have to unde whenever we see ¡¥base consisting of boundless space¡¦. The other three jh?nas are also t ¡¥base¡¦ but ¡¥something that has the base¡¦.

Sometimes the word ¡¥?yatana¡¦ means habitat, where something is born, where somethi originated like the ¡¥base for the deities¡¦. Do you know the ¡¥base for the deities¡¦? What¡¦s in our countries we offer something to the deities or the spirits. We build houses for them. Th ¡¥dev?yatana¡¦. A shrine for the deities is called ¡¥dev?yatana¡¦ in P??i. ?yatana is that. ¡¥H means a place.

Student: It can also be a tree.

Teacher: Oh, yes.

In paragraph 24 ¡§That ¡¥boundless space¡¦ is a base in the sense of habitat for the jh?na is to be associated with it.¡¨ That is not accurate. We should strike out the words ¡¥whose na associated with it¡¦ and replace that as ¡¥with its associated states¡¦. So the sentence shoul sense of habitat for the jh?na with its associated states.¡¨ You will find these words in parag chapter. Please go to paragraph 49 and you will see them there.

Student: At the beginning of the paragraph?

Teacher: Yes. The P??i word is the same. He misunderstood the P??i word ¡¥dhamma¡¦. I¡¦ word ¡¥dhamma¡¦ is very difficult to translate. You cannot translate that word with one word you meet it. ¡¥Dhamma¡¦ here means just the dhamma, the states, mental states and somet but here mental states. He took dhamma to mean nature. It doesn¡¦t mean nature here. Som nature as in the words ¡¥vaya dhamma sa~kh?ra¡¦. That means the formations have the nat or the nature of disappearing. In that context the word ¡¥dhamma¡¦ means nature. But here if you are familiar with Abhidhamma, reading P??i books, you will be familiar with this word. dhamma¡¦ means associated states. So the jh?na with its associated states is called ¡¥?k?s not only the jh?na but the associated states as well are called ¡¥?k?s?na?c?yatana¡¦.

Now we have the second one, the base consisting of boundless consciousness. We will h too. When you want to get the second ar|p?vacara jh?na, you find fault with the first ar|p?va
on. You practice meditation again and again and get the second ar|p?vacara jh?na.

In paragraph 27, the Text, ¡§By completely, surmounting the base consisting of boundless by completely surmounting the first ar|p?vacara jh?na.), then you practice ¡¥unbounded con unbounded consciousness¡¦,¡¨ he enters upon and dwells in the base consisting of boundles That is a description of the second ar|p?vacara jh?na. The second ar|p?vacara jh?na takes ar|p?vacara citta as object. That is why we have here ¡¥unbounded consciousness, unboun

You want to surmount the first ar|p?vacara jh?na, but you dwell upon it. You pay attention ¡¥unbounded consciousness, unbounded consciousness¡¦. Then you surmount it.

Here the word is vi????a?c?yatana. So there is vi????a?ca and ?yatana. So vi????a?c?y vi????a, ana?ca and ?yatana. Vi????a?ca is also a compound of vi????a and ana?ca. ¡¥An and ¡¥vi????a¡¦ means consciousness. So we have boundless consciousness. Here ¡¥boun means the consciousness of the first ar|p?vacara jh?na. ¡¥?yatana¡¦ means a base in the se jh?na citta and its concomitants are called ¡¥vi????a?c?yatana¡¦ because they have boundl citta as their habitat or as their object. So it is not the base, but the jh?na and its concomitan called ¡¥vi????a?c?yatana¡¦.

Paragraph 30 ¡§For it is said in the Vibhanga: ¡¥Unbounded consciousness: he gives atten space pervaded by consciousness, he pervades boundlessly, hence unbounded consciousn passage (ta? yeva ?k?sa? vi????ena phuta?) the instrumental case ¡¥by consciousness¡¦ m the sense of accusative.¡¨ Although the case is instrumental, the meaning is not instrumenta accusative. Actually what is meant here is ¡¥not space pervaded by consciousness¡¦, but ¡¥c pervading the space¡¦. That is the actual meaning that you have to take. Literally translated i pervaded by consciousness. The actual meaning here however is consciousness pervading ar|p?vacara jh?na takes the consciousness of the first ar|p?vacara jh?na as object, not spac here ¡¥consciousness¡¦ must be understood in the accusative sense. That means he gives a consciousness which pervades the space or pervading the space. Vi????a?c?yatana is exp be understood according to the explanation that I have given.

Now the third one, nothingness. Now we come to nothingness. The third one takes the abs nothingness of the first as an object. After getting the second ar|p?vacara jh?na the meditato to the third. In order to get the third ar|p?vacara jh?na the meditator dwells on the absence o ar|p?vacara jh?na. When he gets the second ar|p?vacara jh?na, the first ar|p?vacara is gon second ar|p?vacara jh?na, the first is said to be non-existent. When he wants to get to the th jh?na, he takes that absence, the nothingness of the first ar|p?vacara jh?na as object. That nothingness. It is real nothingness. It is not like ¡¥void of permanency, happiness¡¦ and so on when the word ¡¥void¡¦ or ¡¥su??a¡¦ in P??i is used, it means it is void of permanency and so word is used as void, or secluded and so on. What is meant here is that nothingness, that no absence of the first ar|p?vacara jh?na. So he dwells on the absence of the first ar|p?vacara ¡¥void, void¡¦ or ¡¥secluded, secluded¡¦. He dwells upon it again and again until he gets the t ar|p?vacara jh?na.

There is a simile here ¡§Suppose a man sees a community of bhikkhus¡¨ and so on. Then Commentary.

¡§By completely surmounting the base consisting of boundless consciousness (That is the jh?na.), [aware that] ¡¥There is nothing¡¦, he enters upon and dwells in the ¡¥base consisting nothingness¡¦.¡¨

¡§By surmounting the base consisting of boundless consciousness - here too the jh?na is consisting of boundless consciousness¡¦ - in the way already stated, and its object is so-calle here ¡¥boundless consciousness¡¦ means the jh?na and the object of jh?na.

¡§It is its ¡¥base¡¦ in the sense of locality of the species, as Kamboj? is the ¡¥base¡¦ of hors Kamboj? is a country maybe in the northwest of India. Good horses are said to be raised the horses when you go to Kamboj?. Nowadays what do you say about horses? It is a place of v horses? Kamboj? is a country or a place where good horses are raised or where good horse same way ¡¥base¡¦ or ¡¥?yatana¡¦ is used.

The third ar|p?vacara jh?na and its concomitants are called ¡¥?ki?ca???yatana¡¦. There is ?yatana. ?ki?ca??a comes from aki?cana. The word ¡¥ki?cana¡¦ is translated as owning in t 39). Actually ¡¥ki?cana¡¦ is explained here in the Sub-Commentary as just nothing. The word two meanings. One meaning is concern, concern for something. That is called ¡¥ki?cana¡¦. C concern for anything, who has no worry is called ¡¥aki?cana¡¦ An Arahant is described as ak has no worry and because he has nothing to be concerned about. That is one meaning.

Here ¡¥ki?cana¡¦, the same word, means nothing whatsoever, not concerned, not owning.
¡¥aki?cana¡¦ and that means nothing, nothing, nothing. It means the state of having nothing nothingness, which here means nothingness or absence of the first ar|p?vacara citta. ¡¥?yat the same. Jh?na citta and its concomitants are called ¡¥?ki?ca???yatana¡¦ because they hav absence of the first ar|p?vacara citta as their habitat or as their object. The third ar|p?vacara nothingness of or the absence of the first ar|p?vacara citta as object. It is not just a base, bu that has nothingness as a base, nothingness as an object.

So these three words are the same. The P??i words for the first, second and third ar|p?vac to the same kind of compound. So in the compound they mean something other than that wh individual words. The last one is different.

The last one is called ¡¥neither perception nor non-perception¡¦. It is a very strange expres perception nor non-perception. You find fault with the third ar|p?vacara jh?na. Then you dwe ar|p?vacara jh?na saying ¡¥It is good. It is peaceful¡¦. So you take the third ar|p?vacara jh?n
you say that it is good and that it is peaceful. Then you gain the fourth ar|p?vacara jh?na.

The fourth ar|p?vacara jh?na is called ¡¥nevasa???n?sa???yatana¡¦ (neither perception n
That word is explained in two ways. Do you see the difference between #1 and #2 on the sh are nevasa???, n?sa??a? plus ?yatana. Do they look the same to you? Do you see the diffe Student: the last ¡¥A¡¦.
Teacher: The last ¡¥A¡¦, right. In #1 the last ¡¥A¡¦ is short and in #2 the last ¡¥?¡¦ is long. Very Student: And if you saw this, you would know that?
Teacher: Yes. They can mean two quite different things, the one with short ¡¥A¡¦ and the one Now #1 nevasa???n?sa??a? - ¡¥nevasa???¡¦ means having no sa??? and ¡¥n?sa??a¡¦ mea here jh?na citta and its concomitants are called ¡¥nevasa???n?sa???¡¦, not nevasa??an?sa they have no gross sa???, but they are not completely without subtle sa???. ¡¥Sa??a¡¦ mea ¡¥sa???¡¦ means something that has perception. So here jh?na citta and its concomitants ar ¡¥nevasa???n?sa??a because they do not have gross sa???. Yet they are not completely w Here ¡¥nevasa???n?sa??a¡¦ means the jh?na and its concomitants.

So in this compound ?yatana, a base, is the same as nevasa???n?sa??a. One is the adje
One qualifies the other. By ?yatana or base are meant the jh?na citta and its concomitants.
¡¥base¡¦ because they are respectively included in the mana base and the dhamma base ar

There are twelve bases taught in Abhidhamma. Two of the bases are man?yatana (mind b (dhamma base). ¡¥Man?yatana¡¦ just means types of consciousness. ¡¥Dhamm?yatana¡¦ m kinds of r|pa and others. Nibb?na is also included here.

So here nevasa??? and n?sa??a and n?sa??a and ?yatana both mean the same thing. ¡¥ citta and its concomitants and ¡¥?yatana¡¦ also means jh?na citta and its concomitants. So it This compound is different. The jh?na citta and its concomitants are called ¡¥nevasa???n?s they have no gross sa??a nor do they not have subtle sa??? and at the same time they are

This compound is different from the other three compounds. ¡§Unlike the three previous w ¡¥nevasa???n?sa???yatana¡¦ is another kind of compound where the whole compound mea individual members, one qualifying the other.¡¨

The second meaning is ¡¥nevasa??? (neither sa???), n?sa??? (nor non-sa???) ?yatana ( is called ¡¥nevasa???n?sa???yatana¡¦. The whole word means sa??? here because it is ne non-sa??? and at the same time it is a base. It cannot function as full sa??? but it is still sa? called ¡¥nevasa???n?sa???¡¦. It is sa???, but it does not function as a full-fledged sa???. A not function as full-fledged sa???, it is still sa???, a very subtle sa???. So it is called ¡¥nevasa???n?sa???yatana¡¦ and ¡¥?yatana¡¦ means the same thing.

¡§Here sa??? is called ¡¥nevasa???n?sa???yatana¡¦ because it is neither full sa??? nor n same time it is a base or it is included in the dhamma base, or it is dhamma base. But here is done in the terms of sa???, which means sa??? here is representative of n?ma, and not s we are to understand that ¡¥nevasa???n?sa???yatana¡¦ means jh?na citta and its concomit
So the explanations here are very complicated.

The whole word means sa???, but we must understand that it is not only sa??? that is me along with the other mental states.

In this fourth ar|p?vacara jh?na sa??? becomes so subtle that it cannot function as full sa?
there is still a form of subtle sa???, we cannot call it ¡¥no sa??? at all¡¦. So it is neither sa?? sa???. Then the similes are given.

Student: So the object is sa????

Teacher: No. The object of this jh?na is the third ar|p?vacara jh?na. This fourth ar|p?vacara ¡¥nevasa???n?sa???yatana¡¦. Although the word is sa???, we must understand that it mea sa??? and other mental states.

The similes given here are the smearing of oil on the bowl, and a teacher and his pupil goi
and so on.

Paragraph 52 ¡§But in this context what is perception¡¦s function? It is the perceiving of th it is the production of dispassion if [that attainment and its object are] made the objective fie insight.¡¨ What does that mean? Now perception (sa???) - sa???¡¦s function is to perceive th function here is perceiving the object. The other function is to become the object of vipassan is meant here.

¡§It is the production of dispassion if made the objective field of insight.¡¨ That means it ca dispassion if it is made the object of vipassan?. When you practice vipassan?, you can watc see sa??? arising and disappearing, so you become dispassioned towards sa???.

But it is not able to make the function of perceiving decisive, as the heat element in tepid w able to make the function of burning decisive; and it is not able to produce dispassion by trea objective field with insight in the way that perception is in the case of other attainments.¡¨ In there is heat element, but it is not able to burn or to heat. In the same way there is sa??? he cannot function in a decisive way or it cannot function fully.

¡§There is in fact no bhikkhu capable of reaching dispassion by comprehension of aggrega the base consisting of neither perception nor non-perception unless he has already done his other aggregates.¡¨ There is nobody, even if he is the Venerable S?riputta capable of reachi comprehension of aggregates. That means he must have practiced vipassan? meditation an the impermanence, suffering and soulless nature of things, of all phenomena group by group after that will he be capable of reaching dispassion, otherwise no. Even if he is Venerable S? not be able to reach. Those words are missing here. So we should insert the words ¡§There bhikkhu even if he is the Venerable S?riputta capable of reaching dispassion¡¨ and so on.

¡§And furthermore, when the Venerable S?riputta, or someone very wise and naturally gift he was, is able to do so, even he has to do it by means of comprehension by groups.¡¨ Here is something like this. One who has practiced vipassan? in the usual way (That means begin contemplating on the aggregates and so on.), such a person who is a wise one, who is as w S?riputta, should be able to do so only by comprehension of groups. So even if one has pra meditation in the usual way beginning with the comprehension of impermanence and so on even such a person has to do it by means of comprehension of groups, not comprehension One must take the whole group as an object of meditation and not the individual members.

¡§ ¡¥So it seems, these states, not having been, come to be; having come to be, they vani means of [actual direct] insight into states one by one as they arise, such is the subtlety that attainment reaches.¡¨ Even if one is an experienced practitioner of vipassan?, one can do so but one cannot observe states one by one.

¡§This meaning should be illustrated by the simile of the water on the road.¡¨ This simile is smearing the bowl with oil.

Now comes the general explanation. First is what? The first is that the ar|p?vacara jh?nas surmount the object rather than the jh?na factors. That means ar|p?vacara jh?nas have diffe than different jh?na factors. They have the same jh?na factors, two jh?na factors (upekkh? a of them have two jh?na factors. So when you want to reach the higher ar|p?vacara jh?na, yo the object and not the factors. That means you cannot eliminate jh?na factors, but you must object. That means you have to take another object. That is the first one.

The second one is in paragraph 59. It is just a simile of how one is more subtle than the ot example of a very fine piece of cloth weighing maybe one ounce, two ounces and so on is g the second is more subtle than the first, the third is more subtle than the second and so on. difficult to understand.

The next one is in paragraph 64. The fourth ar|p?vacara jh?na takes the third ar|p?vacara When you want to obtain the fourth ar|p?vacara jh?na, you say ¡§Oh this third ar|p?vacara is peaceful. It is good.¡¨ You contemplate like that. If you say that it is good and that it is peace would seem that you are attached to it, that you like it. Right? But the answer here is ¡§no¡¨. to you finding fault with the king. There is nothing to do. You just follow him.

¡§It takes this for the object since There is no other one as good,
As men depend upon a king, Whose fault they see, for livelihood.¡¨

The person cannot get away from the king because his livelihood depends upon the king. Al like him, he has to be with him. It is something like that.

Then the last one, paragraph 66, gives how one has to hold on or take as object the third mounts a lofty stair leans on its railing for a prop¡¨ - so when you climb stairs, you have to le railing. ¡§As one who climbs an airy peak leans on the mountain¡¦s very top¡¨ - so when you you have to hold onto the top. ¡§As one who stands on a crag¡¦s edge leans for support on h sometimes you have to lean on your own knees. ¡§Each jh?na rests on that below; for so it i these.¡¨ One jh?na depends upon another.

So this is the end of the fourth ar|p?vacara jh?na. I had to rush through. The explanations very involved. The word explanations also are complicated. Sometimes there is some ambig You can make a word mean something other than what the word seems to mean. For exam adjectival compound, but I may say no that it is another kind of compound and I can explain the ambiguity of many words.

You know we have lost the accents in P??i, but there were accents in the older Sanskrit, i In the older Sanskrit the accents differentiate words. One and the same word can be an adje another kind of compound. The word is the same, but the accent may be on the first word or the compound. By the accent they designate that this is the adjectival compound and not an later Sanskrit and in P??i we have lost the accents. When there is no accent, there is no wa that this is this only and not that. So there comes confusion about words. I can explain it any I am familiar with these grammatical manipulations. Many words are explained in that way in So the word ¡¥r|pasa???¡¦ is made to mean the jh?nas and also the objects. So it is truly sai a play upon words. OK.

S?dhu! S?dhu! S?dhu!

We offer this transcription of a Dhamma class with Venerable U S?l?nanda with the hope th beneficial for your understanding of the Buddha¡¦s teachings. This transcription has not been the record of spontaneous exchanges between the teacher and students. Therefore it is pos some errors. We are certain that such errors are infrequent and minimal. Say?daw is a meti teacher and offers these teachings in this manner out of compassion for those people who a serious study and practice of meditation and Buddhism.

Chapter 11
(Tape 24 / Ps: 1-83)

Today we come to chapter 11. In this chapter two kinds of meditation are treated. I¡¦m afra first one may not be popular with people in the West. It is the perception of repulsiveness in must understand that this meditation is not for not eating, not for refraining from eating. It is without greed, for eating with non-attachment. Whether you are a lay person or a monk you to keep you healthy, to keep you in good shape. So this is for eating without attachment. In of attachment we have to get the perception of repulsiveness in food.

This book is meant for monks. So monks have to practice restraint in all areas. So with reg too there should be restraint. Especially in the teachings of Therav?da Buddhism what we e important as how we eat. The way that we eat is much more important than what we eat. W arouse this perception of repulsiveness in food so that we do not get too much attached to f

Now comes the description of the development of the perception of repulsiveness in nutrin think we should translate this word as food although the P??i word ¡¥?h?ra¡¦ can mean nutri food. According to Abhidhamma ¡¥?h?ra¡¦ means nutriment. In popular usage the word ¡¥?h repulsiveness in food.

¡§Now comes the description of the development of the perception of repulsiveness in foo as the ¡¥One Perception¡¦ next to Immaterial States.¡¨ Then the author defines the P??i wor nourishes, literally it brings on, thus it is nutriment (food).

¡§That is of four kinds as physical nutriment, nutriment consisting of contact, nutriment co mental volition and nutriment consisting of consciousness.¡¨ These four things are called by in P??i, by the name of nutriment.

The first one is physical nutriment. In fact it is not a direct translation of the P??i word. The is ¡¥kabali~k?ra¡¦. You will find the word in footnote 2. So it is kabalali~k?ra ?h?ra. In the wo ¡¥kabalali~k?ra¡¦ there is the word ¡¥kabala¡¦. ¡¥Kabala¡¦ means a handful. We do not say a say a handful because we eat with our hands. When we monks eat, we pick up the food wit into a ball and put it into the mouth. This handful is called a ¡¥kabala¡¦ in P??i. The word ¡¥k came to mean food in general. It is translated as physical nutriment here.

According to Abhidhamma that which is ?h?ra is not the whole food itself, but the oja (nutr that is contained in the food. That is what is called ¡¥?h?ra¡¦ in Abhidhamma. Although phys the P??i word ¡¥kabalali~k?r?h?ra¡¦ is stated, we must understand that it means the nutritive food. The first ?h?ra is food.

Nutriment consisting of contact - contact is also called food. Contact is a mental factor. Th called food.

The next is mental volition. So volition is called food.

The last one is consciousness. In one of the Suttas Buddha said there are four kinds of fo mentioned. They are called food because they nourish something.

Then the question is: Which nourishes what? I think the first line in paragraph 2 should say ¡§But which nourishes what?¡¨, simply that.

¡§Physical nutriment (kabali~k?r?h?ra) nourishes (brings on) the materiality of the octad th nutritive essence as eighth.¡¨ You need some Abhidhamma to understand this. There are m material qualities, or material properties. There are said to be 28. These material properties groups. Some groups have eight material properties, some have nine, some have ten, some The least number of material properties contained in a group is eight. It is said according to we may find these eight material properties anywhere, in living beings or in outside things.

Here the eighth is said to be ¡§material of the octad that has nutritive essence as the eight remember the eight material qualities? The four primaries, color, smell, taste and this one ?h These are said to be found everywhere, where there is matter or material properties. These result of or, or are caused by sometimes kamma, sometimes citta (consciousness), sometim climate), and sometimes ?h?ra (nutriment). Here that caused by nutriment is needed. The ka on or nourishes the eight material properties which are cause by it (?h?ra). That is why it is nutritive essence or physical nutriment in P??i language.

The second one, contact as nutriment, nourishes the three kinds of feeling. When there is feeling. In the twelve links of Dependent Origination feeling is conditioned by what? By conta is said to nourish or bring the three kinds of feeling - pleasant feeling, unpleasant feeling and feeling. If there were no contact, there would be no feeling. So contact is said to be the cond feeling.

¡§Mental volition as nutriment nourishes (brings on) rebirth-linking in the three kinds of bec ¡¥Mental volition¡¦ means cetan?. Actually ¡¥mental volition¡¦ means kamma or sa~kh?ra in Origination, the second link (kamma formations). Mental volition is kamma formations. What brings pa?isandhi (rebirth-linking) in the three kinds of becoming. (That is sensuous becomin becoming and immaterial becoming.)

¡§Consciousness as nutriment nourishes (brings on) mentality-materiality at the moment o rebirth-linking.¡¨ This also is to be understood with reference to Dependent Origination. Cons conditions mentality-materiality or mind and matter. At the moment of rebirth there is rebirth Together with rebirth consciousness there are mental factors and also there are material pro kamma in the past. What we call ¡¥rebirth¡¦ is rebirth consciousness, its concomitants and ka Consciousness or here actually rebirth consciousness nourishes or is the condition for mind and matter¡¦ here means the mental factors and the material properties. So it is called ¡¥?h? English nutriment.

¡§Now when there is physical nutriment there is attachment, which brings peril.¡¨ That mea physical nutriment is attachment. We are attached to food. When we eat food, we get attach in physical nutriment is attachment.

¡§When there is nutriment as contact there is approaching (coming together) and that brin is the danger).¡¨

¡§When there is nutriment as mental volition there is reappearance which brings peril.¡¨ ¡¥ means rebirth in different existences which brings peril. Rebirth is the danger in mental voliti brings about rebirth. And when there is nutriment as consciousness there is rebirth-linking. T volition gives rebirth. It is something like throwing down something. That is the function of m The rebirth consciousness itself is the danger in consciousness. So rebirth-linking is the dan consciousness.

¡§And to show how they bring fear thus, physical nutriment should be illustrated by the sim child¡¦s flesh (S.2,98).¡¨ That is Kindred Sayings, Volume 2, page 68 and following pages. In Buddha said that food should be regarded as though one were eating the flesh of one¡¦s ow should be regarded as a hideless cow. Mental volition should regarded as a pit of live coals. consciousness should be regarded as a hundred spears. You have to read that Sutta to und

The first one is explained by a story, not an actual story, but a simile. Two people, a husba with a child go on a journey. They were going through a desert and lost everything. They we were hungry. So they decided to eat the flesh of their child just to get out of that wilderness. the flesh of the child, they will not feel happy. They may eat with tears and so on. In the sam should be eaten with that kind of perception, as though you were eating the flesh of your ow have to eat the flesh of your own child, there will be no attachment to that food. It is somethi

Contact as nutriment is shown by the simile of the hideless cow. A cow whose skin or hide off will be bitten by flies, mosquitoes and so on where ever it goes. Even if it goes into water those who will bite or sting it. In the same way where there is contact, there is always feeling always accompanies contact. Feeling is compared to the biting of insects and so on.

Student: Unpleasant feeling?

Teacher: Unpleasant feeling, that¡¦s right.

And volition is compared to the simile of the pit of live coals. Nobody wants to fall into the p coals. It brings suffering. In the same way mental volition throws us into a new existence. W in a new existence we suffer the dukkha inherent in that life. So mental volition is to be regar of live coals.

The last one, consciousness as nutriment, is compared to the simile of the hundred spears caught and sentenced to be executed. He is carried through the street and given a hundred hundred blows there and so on.

Out of these four kinds of nutriment or what is called ¡¥nutriment¡¦ only one will be treated first one is relevant in this chapter or for this meditation. In the footnote the explanations are hope that you have read it.

About the middle of footnote 4 ¡¥approaching¡¦ is explained as ¡§meeting, coinciding, with perversions [of perception] due to an object [being perceived as permanent, etc., when it is n that is a little incorrect. What is meant is that the ¡¥approaching¡¦ is meeting, coinciding or co contact, not with unabandoned perversions, but for those whose perversions are as yet unab

He misunderstood the P??i compound word here. It is very difficult to decide what P??i co same word may mean two different things. Here what is really meant is ¡§for those whose p are unabounded meeting with an object.¡¨ That meeting with an object is perilous since it is three kinds of suffering. When there is meeting with the object, there is contact and feeling.

¡§But of these four kinds of nutriment it is only physical nutriment, classed as what is eate chewed and tasted that is intended here as ¡¥nutriment¡¦ in this sense.¡¨ So food is intended as ?h?ra in this chapter. ¡§The perception arisen as the apprehension of the repulsive aspe nutriment is ¡¥perception of repulsiveness in nutriment.¡¨

¡§One who wants to develop that perception of repulsiveness in nutriment should learn the subject¡¨ and all these things. We should develop or arouse the perception of repulsiveness for monks. The ten ways are going for food, seeking food, ¡¥using¡¦ which means eating foo receptacle, what is undigested, what is digested, result or fruit, outflow and smearing. All the designed to help us get the sense of repulsiveness towards food.

Nowadays people say ¡§Please enjoy food. Please enjoy food.¡¨ Here we don¡¦t enjoy. If this kind of reflection, so that we don¡¦t get attached to food.

The first one is going. A monk has to go out every day for alms in the morning. So this pas monks. ¡§Even when a man has gone forth in so mighty a dispensation, still after he has pe night reciting the Enlightened One¡¦s word or doing the ascetic¡¦s work (That means meditat risen early to do the duties connected with the shrine terrace and the Enlightenment Tree te water for drinking and washing, to sweep the grounds and to see to the needs of the body, a down on his seat and given attention to his meditation subject twenty or thirty times¡¨ - twent times is not so clear. I think also the Sub-Commentary did not know exactly what is meant b that in the footnote different opinions are given.

¡§Here some say that the definition of the number of times is according to what is present-
That means one continuity after another. When you enter a cell from light, at first you canno because you come from light into darkness. After some seconds or minutes you can see. Th continuity¡¦. If you go out from the dark into the light, the same thing will happen. You will no as you go out. You have to adapt to the difference of light. In this way the time should be tak continuity after another. That is the opinion of some.

¡§But others say that it is by way of ¡¥warming the seat¡¦. If you sit for some time, the seat warm. ¡§For development that has not reached suppression of the hindrances does not rem discomfort in the act of sitting, because of the lack of pervading happiness.¡¨ Before you get concentration, you will still want to move or want to change your position every now and the of the position is what is meant by time here. That is what the authors say.

What about twenty or thirty? ¡§Then ¡¥twenty or thirty¡¦ is taken as the number already obs time of setting out on the alms round.¡¨ In fact it means taken as a number by the formerly n setting up. I will set out for alms at such a time. That is decided beforehand. According mode say I will go out at 6:30am. Until 6:30am I will be practicing meditation. It is something like th Student: Venerable Buddhaghosa preferred the last one?

Teacher: No. Another one will come.

¡§Or alternatively from ¡¥going¡¦ up to ¡¥smearing¡¦ is one turn (one time).¡¨ There are ten be made. From the first reflection to the tenth reflection you get one round, one turn, one tim the monk contemplating in these ten ways twenty or thirty times before he gets up and goes it is not clear which is meant. We can take the last one.

Student: Perhaps one way to understand it is that if the meditation subject is the breath, it is thirty breaths?

Teacher: No. It could be that when you take the breath as an object and say ¡§in one, out or two, in three, out three¡¨ until ten and that would be one. Then again you say ¡§in one, out o two¡¨ until ten and that would be two and so on.

In paragraph 7 line 3 what is a ¡¥gecko¡¦?

Student: Geckos are little animals that sometimes eat cockroaches and insects. They are lik Teacher: House lizards, right. They are small house lizards. We don¡¦t see many of them in Student: Actually one time when we had a community and we were discussing the problem suggested that we obtain geckos. That¡¦s how I know what a gecko is.

Teacher: paragraph 8 ¡§In due course, after standing in the debating lodge¡¨ - I don¡¦t know called ¡¥debating¡¦ because it is a place where a monk decides which way to go for alms rou ¡§in a lodge for thinking in the way beginning ¡¥Where must I go for alms today¡¦?¡¨ Maybe t three villages not far from the monastery. He may go to one village on one day and another day. So he decides where to go or which village to go to standing in that lodge, standing in t is translated as debating lodge. He may be debating internally which village he should go to these things. This is the repulsiveness of food with regard to going.

The next one is seeking. After going to the village a monk must go from one house to anot endured the repulsiveness of going in this way and has gone into the village, and is clothed patches, he has to wander in the village streets from house to house like a beggar with a dis and so on. It may not be so bad nowadays and also in Buddhist countries. If not all of the pe Buddhist, some may just drive us away if we go and stand in front of their houses. So you se ¡§Others treat him with harsh words such as ¡¥Go away, you bald-head¡¦.¡¨ When we were i not know which houses were Buddhist and which were not. So sometimes we stood in front Christian or Muslim. When Buddhists saw us, they would drag us to their house. They would there.¡¨ They may not drag us away, but it must have happened in the olden days when not Buddhist. That is seeking.

The third is how as to using. ¡¥How as to using¡¦ is how as to eating. Sometimes to be liter real point. Here ¡¥using the food¡¦ means eating. In eating too there is repulsiveness.

India, Sri Lanka and Myanmar are troubled countries. When you have to go from your mon on your alms rounds, you may be sweating. So your hands may be smeared with sweat. Tha ¡§After he has sought the nutriment in this way and is sitting at ease in a comfortable place o village, then so long as he has not dipped his hand into it he would be able to invite a respec

a decent person, if he saw one, [to share it;] but as soon as he has dipped his hand into it ou eat he would be ashamed to say ¡¥Take some¡¦.¡¨ That is because now the food is smeared

This is eating. The food is put in the mouth. The jaws function as a pestle. The teeth functi and so on. We have to contemplate on this when we eat. I do not know whether it would be of this. You may even want to vomit.

In footnote 13 it says ¡§Kumm?sa - jelly: usually rendered ¡¥junket¡¦, but the Vinaya Comm as made of corn.¡¨ Yava is not corn. It is barley or wheat. I don¡¦t know what ¡¥junket¡¦ is.
Student: Junket is a custard. So it is a custard made out of barley or wheat.
Teacher: Yes, barley or wheat. It is something like rice, not necessarily jelly.

Then we have as to secretions. ¡§Buddhas and Pacceka Buddhas and Wheel-turning Mon the four secretions consisting of bile, phlegm, pus and blood.¡¨ I don¡¦t know whether that is is not needed here. Instead of ¡¥only¡¦ I want to say ¡¥any¡¦. I think we should say ¡§Even Bu Pacceka Buddhas and Wheel-turning Monarchs have any one of the four secretions consist pus and blood, but those with weak merit have all four.¡¨

¡§So when [the food] has arrived at the stage of being eaten and] it enters inside, then in c secretion of bile is in excess it becomes as utterly nauseating as if smeared with thick madh ¡¥Madhuka¡¦ is also difficult to translate. It is a kind of seed which gives thick oil.

¡§In one whose secretion of phlegm is in excess it is as if smeared with the juice of n?gaba Maybe you get a sticky substance from that kind of leaf.

¡§In one whose secretion of pus is in excess it is as if smeared with rancid buttermilk; and secretion of blood is in excess it is as utterly nauseating as if smeared with dye. This is how should be reviewed as to secretion.¡¨

Then there is as to receptacle. ¡§When it has gone inside the belly and is smeared with on secretions, then the receptacle it goes into is no gold dish or crystal or silver dish and so on.

Paragraph 19 as to what is undigested. ¡¥Uncooked¡¦ here means what is undigested. We something like a fire in the stomach. That fire or that heat digests the food.

The next one is what is cooked, what has been digested. ¡§When it has been completely c bodily fires, it does not turn into gold, silver, etc., as the ores of gold, silver, etc., do [through smelting]. Instead, giving off froth and bubbles, it turns into excrement and fills the receptac digested food, like brown clay squeezed with a smoothing trowel and packed into a tube.¡¨ ¡¥ digested food¡¦ really means the later part of the intestines. ¡§And it turns into urine and fills bladder. This is how repulsiveness should be reviewed as to what is cooked.¡¨

¡§How as to fruit?¡¨ That means ¡¥How as to result¡¦. ¡§When it has been rightly cooked (T well-digested.), it produces the various kinds of ordure consisting of head hairs, body hairs, and the rest. When wrongly cooked (That means when it is not well-digested.), it produces t beginning with itch, ringworm, smallpox, leprosy, plague, consumption, coughs, flux, and so fruit. This is how repulsiveness should be reviewed as to fruit.¡¨

Then as to outflow. ¡§On being swallowed, it enters by one door, after which it flows out by in the way beginning ¡¥Eye-dirt from the eye, ear-dirt from the ear¡¦. And on being swallowed even in the company of a large gathering. But on flowing out, now converted into excrement excreted only in solitude. That is repulsiveness as to outflow.¡¨

Then there is as to smearing. ¡§At the time of using it he smears his hands, lips, tongue ar they become repulsive by being smeared with it. And even when washed, they have to be w in order to remove the smell.¡¨ That is very true. If you eat with your hands and the dishes m the smell will remain for a long time.

¡§And just as, when rice is being boiled, the husks, the red powder covering the grain, etc. smear the mouth, rim and lid of the cauldron so too, when eaten it rises up during the cookin by the bodily fire that pervades the whole body, it turns into tartar, which smears the teeth, a into spittle, phlegm etc., which respectively smear the tongue, palate etc., and so on.¡¨

Towards the end of the paragraph it say ¡§And after one has washed a certain one of thes be washed again.¡¨ Then there is footnote 17. I think that number should be moved one line one has washed a certain one of these¡¨ - then the footnote should be there after the second washed a certain one of these¡¦. Here the first ¡¥one of these¡¦ refers to the urinal orifice. Th ¡¥one of these¡¦ means the anal orifice. This is according to smearing. So we have ten ways perception of repulsiveness.

¡§As he reviews repulsiveness in this way in this way in ten aspects and strikes at it with th applied thought, physical nutriment becomes evident to him in its repulsive aspect. He cultiv again and again.¡¨ That sign - in other meditations how many signs do we have? For examp meditation? Do you remember the signs? Two signs. What is the first sign? It is translated in learning sign. That means the grasped sign actually. The other one is the counterpart sign. I one is uggaha nimitta and the second one is pa?ibh?ga nimitta.

There are two kinds of sign. For example if you practice kasi?a disk meditation, when you the disk and when with your eyes closed you can see the disk, then you are said to have got the learning sign. Later on you concentrate on that sign again and again so that it becomes that time you are said to have got the second kind of sign, the counterpart sign. So the coun much more refined than the learning sign. So there are two signs.

But here there is no such sign. ¡¥Sign¡¦ here simply means the object of meditation. The fo explains this, but it is very difficult to understand this in the footnote. It is a translation of the Sub-Commentary and it is not so understandable. ¡¥The sign¡¦ here just means the object of object of meditation here is nutriment. Although we call it ¡¥physical nutriment¡¦, actually it is nutritive essence in the food. Nutritive essence in the food is paramattha, ultimate reality. It i 28 material properties. But the aspect of repulsiveness is concept. Through contemplating o repulsiveness, you take the real thing as object. That real thing is called ¡¥sabh?va dhamma has individual essence. Dhammas that have individual essence are by nature difficult to und profound. Since in this meditation the object is profound, there can be no jh?na. Sam?dhi re access stage. So you cannot get jh?na by practicing this kind of meditation. That is because belongs to the dhammas which have individual essence, or in other words the object belong ultimate reality. So it is difficult to see. It is profound. The meditation cannot reach absorptio only reach the level of access.

That is what is meant in footnote 18. He did not translate the whole passage. Here it is giv translation of the whole passage, but some lines are omitted here, so it doesn't really seem Further down there is an inaccuracy in the translation. The Sub-Commentary gives two reas meditation cannot reach absorption with this object of meditation. The first is ¡§the occurren development is contingent only an individual essence.¡¨ That is because this meditation has with individual essence as an object. And the dhamma with individual essence is by nature nature difficult to see. That is why the sam?dhi cannot reach to the jh?na stage in this medit

Generally we say that if you want to get jh?nas, you practice samatha meditation or somet the practice of samatha meditation leads to the attainment of jh?nas. But not all kinds of sam lead to jh?na. This is one kind of samatha meditation that does not lead to jh?na. There are have already studied that do not lead to jh?na like recollection of the Buddha, recollection of so on.

¡§When a bhikkhu devotes himself to this perception of repulsiveness in nutriment, his mi retracts and recoils from craving for flavors. He nourishes himself with nutriment without van the purpose of crossing over suffering, as one who seeks to cross over the desert eats his o flesh. Then his greed for the five cords of sense-desire comes to be fully understood without through the means of the full understanding of the physical nutriment.¡¨

¡¥Full understanding¡¦ or ¡¥fully understood¡¦ really means surmounting the desire. This w the Suttas many times. The P??i word is ¡¥pari??a¡¦. We will find it in the second part of the towards the end of the book. There are three kinds of full understanding - clearly understand that things are impermanent and so on, and then the third one is abandoning, getting rid of, most cases that is what is meant when the P??i word ¡¥pari??a¡¦ is used. So here ¡¥sense-fully understood¡¦ means sense-desire comes to be overcome or abandoned. When you rea will not have attachment to food. You will be able to get rid of attachment to food when you Student: The repulsiveness makes you understand the error of desire, but it isn¡¦t repulsiven is being sought, but repulsiveness as an antidote to desire.
Teacher: That¡¦s right. If we do not see repulsiveness, we will not be able to get rid of attach

¡§He fully understands the materiality aggregate through the means of full understanding of sense-desire.¡¨ ¡¥Full understanding¡¦ should be understood in the sense of overcoming

The next one is defining of the elements or breaking down into elements, four great eleme ¡§Herein, ¡¥defining (vava??h?na)¡¦ is determining by characterizing individual essences [th ¡¥catudh?tuvava??h?na (four-element defining) is [resolvable into] ¡¥catunna? dh?t|na? vav the four elements)¡¦.¡¨ These are the grammatical explanations of the formation of words. Al included in the translation, it is not so important.

This meditation is given in two ways, in brief and in detail. It is given in brief in the Mah? S

Sutta. That is Sutta #22 in The Long Discourses. It is given in detail in the Mah? Hatthipad|p the simile of the elephant¡¦s footprint. That is in the Majjhima Nik?ya, Sutta #28. It is also giv in the R?hulov?da Sutta. It is the advice of the Buddha given to his own son R?hula. That is Nik?ya, Sutta #62. It is also given in detail in the Dh?tuvibha~ga Sutta. That is in Majjhima N #140. In these Suttas the four elements are treated in more detail.

Now we come to the Text and Commentary in brief. This Text is from the Mah? Satipa??h Foundations of Mindfulness Sutta. ¡§Bhikkhus, just as though a skilled butcher or butcher¡¦s killed a cow and were seated at the cross-roads with it cut up into pieces, so too, bhikkhus, a reviews this body however placed, however disposed, as consisting of elements: In this bod earth element, the water element, the fire element, and the air element.¡¨ This is what is taug Satipa??h?na Sutta. Then there are the word meanings.

Paragraph 30 gives us more understanding or explanation of this simile. The simile in the that without the help of this Commentary we will not understand the meaning intended there is very important. Until the cow is cut up into pieces the person cannot get rid of the notion th cow. The cow is led to the slaughtering place and it is slaughtered. Still a person has the not or a cow. He may think to himself ¡§I am taking the cow to the slaughtering ground. I am sla cow¡¨ and so on. As soon as the cow has been cut into pieces, his notion of a cow disappea of pieces or just the notion of meat arises in him. After he will think ¡§ I am selling meat¡¨ or carrying away meat.¡¨

In the same way if we do not reduce ourselves to the four elements, then we will still have being. When we have broken ourselves down into four elements, then we lose the sense of meaning intended in this simile.

¡§In the Mah? Hatthipad|pama Sutta, it is given in detail for one of not over-quick understa quick understanding, not so intelligent. These people need a little explanation in detail. It is a the R?hulov?da and Dh?tuvibha~ga Suttas. In these three Suttas the passages and explana the same.

¡§What is the internal earth element, friends?¡¨ There are two kinds of earth element, inte external. Only internal is shown here. ¡§ Whatever there is internally in oneself that is hard, l clung to (acquired through kamma).¡¨ Sometimes we want to make the meaning clear, so we are not in the original. These very words if they are not correct lead us to misunderstanding. case here. The P??i word is ¡¥up?di??a¡¦. ¡¥Up?di??a¡¦ means grasped or clung to. Here it through kamma, but clung to through attachment, by grasping. We should strike out ¡¥acqui

¡§That is hard, harsh and clung to¡¨ - and ¡¥clung to¡¦ really means existing in living beings existing in outside things such as rocks, trees and so on. That is because here the internal e explained.

Student: There is internally in oneself something that is hard? Could you explain?

Teacher: Earth element is something in us which is hard, something which has the characte softness. We will come to that later.

the 32 parts of the body are divided into earth elements and water elements. We get the fi elements. ¡§That is to say, head hairs, body hairs¡¨ and so on until what? ¡§Dung or whatev internally in oneself that is hard, harsh and clung to - this is called the ¡¥earth element¡¦.¡¨ Th definition of the earth element inside the living beings.

¡§And what is the internal water element, friends? Whatever there is internally in oneself th watery, and clung to, that is to say, bile, phlegm¡¨ and so on.

The next is the fire element. There are four kinds of fire element. ¡§Whatever there is inter oneself that is fire, fiery, clung to, that is to say, that whereby one is warmed, ages, and burn whereby what is eaten, drunk, chewed and tasted gets completely digested, or whatever els in oneself that is fire, fiery, and clung to - this is called the internal fire element.¡¨ Do you get kinds of fire elements in this passage? You will get it in paragraph 36.

¡§here is the commentary on the words that are not clear. Internally in oneself (ajjhatta? pa these words are terms for what is one¡¦s own (niyaka), since what is one¡¦s own is what is pr own self (attani j?ta?)¡¨ and so on. There is an example taken from world speech, that is fron conversation of the people. ¡§Just as in the world speech among women is called [speech] b (adhitthi)¡¨ - this is a kind of compound. Actually here is not speech among women or belong speech about or concerning women. That is called ¡¥adhitthi¡¦ in P??i. Here also the P??i wo divided into ¡¥adhi¡¦ and ¡¥att?¡¦. ¡¥Adhi¡¦ and ¡¥att?¡¦ becomes ajjhatta according to P??i gr rules. The Commentary is explaining this. The word ¡¥ajjhatta¡¦ simply means internal. If you mean internal, that is enough.

At the end of paragraph 33 ¡§Clung to: taken firmly [by kamma]; the meaning is , firmly tak adhered to, as ¡¥I¡¦, ¡¥mine¡¦.¡¨ We should strike out ¡¥kamma¡¦ and put some other words - ¡§Clung to: taken firmly [by craving etc.]; the meaning is, firmly taken, seized, adhered to, as ¡¥mine¡¦.¡¨

With regard to this word ¡¥up?di??a¡¦ it is important. Many people make mistakes with this ¡¥up?di??a¡¦. In Abhidhamma terms ¡¥up?di??a¡¦ means the result of kamma or caused by k property, let us say, is called ¡¥up?di??a¡¦, it means that it is caused by kamma. There is ¡¥u and ¡¥anup?di??a r|pa¡¦ in Abhidhamma. The word ¡¥up?di??a¡¦ normally means that which kamma and so it simply means caused by kamma. But here and in many other passages the residing in the body. That means in living beings whether it is caused by kamma, or caused or whatever, it is called ¡¥up?di??a¡¦.

In Vinaya this word is also used. For example monks are not supposed to touch women. W statue of a woman? A statue of a woman is not ¡¥up?di??a¡¦, while a living woman is ¡¥up?d not to touch a living women. If they touch with sensual thoughts, they incur some kind of offe touching a statue? Touching a statue with lustful thoughts also incurs an offense, but not so touching a real woman. This is differentiated in Vinaya with the terms ¡¥up?di??a¡¦ and ¡¥an living beings and non-living things.

Student: Can you have internal cetan??:

Teacher: Actually cetan? is always internal.
Student: Craving is not cetan?. Craving is - Teacher: Craving is attachment.
Student: Cetan? is - Teacher: Cetan? is kamma, volition. Here kamma is not meant because the four elements a all four causes. There are four causes of matter - kamma, citta (consciousness), utu (climate temperature.), and ?h?ra (food). These are the four causes of matter taught in Abhidhamma are caused by all four causes, not by kamma only. Therefore here the P??i word ¡¥up?di??a because they are caused by all four causes.

At the end of paragraph 34 ¡§Or whatever else: the earth element included in the remainin portions.¡¨ ¡¥In the remaining three portions¡¦ means the water, fire and air elements, not the parts of the body but the remaining elements.

In paragraph 35 there is the explanation of the word ¡¥?po¡¦. At the end of the paragraph ¡
It is what has the water elements characteristic of cohesion.¡¨ When we say for example ¡¥th we do not necessarily mean the earth. We mean the characteristic of earth. That means we inherent in earth which is hardness or softness. When we say ¡¥earth element¡¦, we mean h
If we say ¡¥water element¡¦, we mean cohesion or flowing. The characteristic is itself the ele why we do not need the word ¡¥what has¡¦ here. ¡§What is that? It is the water element¡¦s c cohesion.¡¨ Cohesion is the water element. The characteristic and something which has that not differentiated in this case. The characteristic itself is the element.
Student: Can we go back? Could we say that the characteristic of the earth element is textu Teacher: Texture? I don¡¦t know. Maybe not. Since we take the hardness or softness as the element is existent in water also, in fire also. There is hardness or softness in water. So hard softness does not reside in the earth only. In everything there is this hardness or softness, c temperature and distension. These four elements are found everywhere. ¡§What is that? It is element¡¦s characteristic of cohesion.¡¨ Or simply put it is cohesion. Cohesion is water eleme element is cohesion.

¡§Fire (tejo) [is definable] as heating.. What is that? It is the characteristic of heat.¡¨ Strike two words ¡¥what has¡¦. ¡§Whereby: by means of which fire element, when excited¡¨ - ¡¥exc when it is disturbed when it becomes abnormal - ¡§this body is warmed, becomes heated by fever¡¨ and so on. You have fever lasting for one day and then disappearing and then appea
and so on.

¡§Ages: whereby this body grows old, reaches the decline of faculties, loss of strength, wri grayness, and so on. Burns up: when excited, it causes this body to burn, and the person cr burning, I am burning!¡¨ That means when you have a high fever. When you have a high fev are burning inside. Such a person ¡§longs for ghee a hundred times washed and for gos?sa etc.¡¨ Sandalwood ointment is said to be cold. That is why especially women use the sandal their body.

¡§And whereby what is eaten, drunk, chewed and tasted gets completely digested: whereb etc., that is eaten or the beverage, etc., that is drunk, or the hard food consisting of flour bisc that is chewed, the mango fruit¡¨ - it should be ripe mango fruit, not just mango fruit - ¡§hone etc., that is tasted.¡¨ I think I have told you about this word in P??i. Actually it is not just tastin ¡¥tasting¡¦ means licking with your tongue and enjoying the taste. When we eat honey or mo our mouth on our tongue and let it dissolve slowly. That is how we eat honey or molasses an mango fruit. Ripe mango fruit is very soft. So you put a piece of ripe mango fruit on your tong dissolve by itself. So there are four kinds of food that we eat - that which is eaten, that which (That means liquids.), what is chewed (hard food) and what is tasted or what is licked. These kinds of food.

¡§Gets its juice, etc., extracted, is the meaning.¡¨ Sometimes you need to have a knowledg understand some of the explanations in the Commentaries. In the Indian medicine books it i food is properly digested, it becomes seven kinds of elements in the body. The P??i word ¡¥ the seven elements. Here that is translated as ¡¥its juice, gets its juice extracted¡¦. Actually t seven kinds of these in our body - blood, flesh, fat, bone, bone marrow, semen and then the called ¡¥rasa¡¦. It is chyle. Please look it up in the dictionary. The first one, ¡¥rasa¡¦, is transla juice here. It is translated as chyle in one Sanskrit-English dictionary. It is some kind of juice which is produced in the body when food is well-digested. When the food is well-digested by we eat becomes the seven kinds of things in our body.

¡§And here the first three kinds of fire element, [that is to say, ¡¥is warmed¡¦, ¡¥ages¡¦, and up¡¦,] are fourfold origin (That is caused by four causes.), while the last is only kamma - origi last one we call ¡¥digestion fire¡¦ and it is said to be caused by kamma. Not everybody has t digestion. Some have good digestion and some have bad digestion. That is caused by kamm caused by all four causes. The four kinds of fire element are the element by which the body which the body ages, by which the body burns up and by which what is eaten and so on get There are four kinds of fire element.

The air element - there are six kinds of air element. ¡§What is that? It is what has the chara distension.¡¨ There are six kinds of air element - up-going winds, down-going winds (They ar winds in the belly, winds in the bowels, winds that course through all the limbs and then in-b out-breath. How many? There are seven, but in-breath and out-breath are taken as one. So of wind element.

The method of development in brief that is the head hairs are the earth element, the body earth element and so on. You practice this meditation along with the meditation on the 32 pa ¡§Suppose two bhikkhus are reciting a Text with many elided repetitions¡¨ and so on - that explanation of how one method of development appears to one monk as redundant and the the other as not enough. When we recite Suttas, there are many repetitions. When we do no repetitions, we use what is called ¡¥peyy?la¡¦, elided repetitions. Suppose we want to say ¡§ araha? samm?sambuddho vijj?cara?asampanno¡¨ - the last word is ¡¥bhagav?¡¦. If we have again, we avoid saying it again and again by just saying ¡§Itipi so pe bhagav?¡¨. The word pu something like three dots in English. So in this example it is ¡§Itipi so pe bhagav?¡¨.

Student¡¨: In The Heart Sutra we say ¡¥until¡¦ every morning instead of repeating the whole l Teacher: That is unusual in The Heart Sutra. In P??i Suttas we use the word ¡¥pe¡¦ instead ¡§After which he goes on doing the recital with only the two end parts of the elisions.¡¨ ¡¥T means the beginning and the end. One end is the beginning and the other end is the end. Y beginning and the end.

The others are not difficult to understand. With constituents in brief - ¡§In twenty of the par the stiffened mode (That is hardness.) is the earth element.¡¨ So with regard to head hairs w hardness element in head hairs is the earth element. The cohesiveness in head hairs is the so on.

¡§In four parts what matures is the fire element.¡¨ ¡¥In four parts¡¦ means the four kinds of ¡§In what has the mode of distending is the air element.¡¨ ¡¥In six parts¡¦ means the six kinds element.

With constituents by analysis - ¡§The bhikkhu should carry out all the directions given for t thirty-two-fold aspect in the Description of Mindfulness Occupied with the Body as a meditat he must practice as described in that chapter and then at the end he must add something. ¡§ is this: there after giving attention to the head hairs, etc., as to color, shape, direction, locatio delimitation, the mind had to be fixed by means of repulsiveness.¡¨ That means he must try t of repulsiveness there and he stops there. The head hairs, body hairs are repulsive by way o of shape and so on. Here in this meditation you do not stop there, but at the end of each par attention to head hairs, etc., by way of beginning with color, etc., attention should be given a That means here that the head hairs grow on the outer skin of the head. The skin doesn¡¦t k hairs are growing on me and the head hairs don¡¦t know that we are growing on the skin and contemplate in that way. That is the defining of the four element meditation. If you stop at jus repulsiveness, then you are doing the contemplation on the parts of the body. You do that a that they don¡¦t know each other. You go through all the 32 parts that way. They are not diffi understand.

In paragraph 69 at the end ¡§So what is called bile is a particular component of this body, thought, indeterminate, void, not a living being, liquid (There should be a comma.), (Strike ou ¡§the mode of cohesion¡¨. So it reads as ¡§void, not a living being, liquid, water element, the cohesion.¡¨ Water element and the mode of cohesion are the same. This sentence recurs in So you have to correct.

In paragraph 81 ¡§That whereby one is warmed - this is a particular component of this boc thought, indeterminate, void, not a living being (There should be a comma.), (Strike out ¡¥it i element, (Strike out ¡¥in¡¦.) the mode of maturing (ripening).¡¨ The same is repeated at the e 81 and should be changed in the same way.

In paragraph 82 in the middle of the paragraph ¡§without thought, indeterminate, void, not (comma), (Strike out ¡¥it is¡¦.) air element (comma), (Strike out ¡¥in¡¦.) the mode of distendin the end of the paragraph in the same way.

¡¥Indeterminate¡¦ means neither kusala nor akusala. That is because the four elements be r|pa is aby?kata, neither kusala nor akusala. In the first chapter of Abhidhamma the dhamma kusala, akusala and neither kusala nor akusala. ¡¥Kusala¡¦ means kusala cittas and their co ¡¥Akusala¡¦ means akusala cittas and their concomitants. ¡¥Aby?kata¡¦ which is neither kusa covers all the remaining dhammas - resultant cittas, functional cittas, r|pa and Nibb?na. Whe indeterminate here, it means that it is neither kusala nor akusala.

Next week we will study up to paragraph 48 in chapter 12.

S?dhu! S?dhu! S?dhu!

(Tape 25 / Ps: 84 -126)

Today we begin in chapter 11 paragraph 84. We have not yet come to contemplation on the the four great essentials.

¡§But if his meditation is still not successful when he gives his attention to it in this way, then develop it with characteristics in brief. How? In the twenty components¡¨ - you must rememb components. There are the 32 parts of the body, four elements of fire, sic elements of air. He contemplation is to be done in brief. Among the 32 parts the first 20 are said to be character solidity. They have the characteristic of stiffenedness or solidity. In this method the yogi take components as a whole. In these 20 components the characteristic of stiffenedness is the ea characteristic of cohesion is the water element. The characteristic of maturing or ripening is element. The characteristic of distension is the air element. In this way we define the four ele 20 components.

In the remaining 12 components the characteristic of cohesion is the water element. The cha maturing is the fire element. The characteristic of distension is the air element. And the char stiffenedness is the earth element.

He defines all four elements in these components, but he does not take the components one method. In the next method he will take them one by one.

¡§In the four components (That is of the fire element.) the characteristic of maturing (ripening defined as the fire element, the characteristic of distension unresolvable (inseparable) from i element, the characteristic of stiffenedness is the earth element and the characteristic of coh water element.¡¨

¡§In the six components (That is the six kinds of air element.) the characteristic of distension defined as the air element, the characteristic of stiffenedness there too is the earth element, characteristic of cohesion is the water element, and the characteristic of maturing (ripening) element.¡¨

These elements are in everything, in living beings and outside things. The meditator defines these four elements in everything, taking them as a whole.

¡§As he defines them in this way the elements become evident to him. As he adverts to ther to them again and again access concentration arises in him in the way already stated.¡¨ The concentration. There is no absorption.

The next method is characteristics by analysis. That means going into detail. ¡§After discern etc., in the way already described the characteristic of stiffenedness in head hairs should be earth element, the characteristic of cohesion there too is the water element, the characterist (ripening) is the fire element, and the characteristic of distension is the air element.¡¦ Here th takes the components one by one and tries to define these four elements in each componen hairs, nails, teeth, skin and so on.

¡§As he defines them in this way the elements become evident to him. As he adverts and gi again and again access concentration arises in him in the way already described.¡¨ There ca concentration with this type of meditation, no jh?na or absorption concentration.

Now we have additional ways of giving attention. ¡§In addition, attention should be given to t the following ways: (1) as to word meaning, (2) by groups, (3) by particles, (4) by characteris as to how originated, (6) as to variety and unity, (7) as to resolution (separability) and non-re (inseparability), (8) as to the similar and the dissimilar, (9) as to distinction between internal external, (10) as to inclusion, (11) as to condition, (12) as to lack of conscious reaction, (13) analysis of conditions.¡¨ In these 13 ways we give attention to the four elements.

The first is the meaning of the P??i words. The P??i words are pa?havi, ?po, tejo, and v?yo explained in paragraph 87. ¡§It is earth (pa?havi) because it is spread out (pattha?a).¡¨ The is defined as something spread out. ¡§It flows (appoti) or it glides (?piyati) or it satisfies (app thus it is water (?po); it heats (tejati), thus it is fire (tejo); it blows (v?yati), thus it is air (v?yo) They are just the word explanations.

¡§But without differentiation (That means in general.) they are elements (dh?tu).¡¨ That mea called dh?tus or elements. Each one is called by its individual name (pa?havi, ?po, tejo, v?y collectively they are called dh?tus or elements.

The word ¡¥dh?tu¡¦ is made to mean here because of bearing their own characteristics, beca own characteristics, and because of grasping suffering, and because of sorting out suffering sure about the correct reading of the text in the original book. The first word you see is ?d?n teachers think that word is not necessary, or not needed here, or that it may be a wrong rea teachers say that the correct reading is ?dh?na. The Sub-Commentary comments about this clear. So the word ¡¥dh?tu¡¦ is explained as something which bears its own characteristic, o suffering, or which sorts out suffering. ¡¥Sort out suffering¡¦ here actually means to create su produce suffering. I don¡¦t know what ¡¥sorting out¡¦ means. Can it mean ¡¥to produce¡¦ or ¡¥ Student: I think so.

Teacher: So they are called elements. Actually there are many other elements in Abhidham also called an element. There are other elements like dhammadh?tu. It is a famous name in

¡§By groups: there is the earth element described under the 20 aspects (modes) beginning hairs, and also the water element described under the 12 aspects (modes) beginning with bi to these,

Color, odor, taste, and nutritive Essence, and the four elements -
From combination of these eight
There comes the common usage head hairs;
And separately from these eight
There is no common usage head hairs.¡¨

These eight are the basic unit of matter. You may reduce matter to the smallest particle. Let atom. Even the atom contains these or is a combination of these eight material particles. Th Abhidhamma teaches us. Everything which we call matter is composed of these eight mater odor, taste, nutritive essence and these four elements.

¡§Consequently head hairs are only a mere group of eight states. Likewise body hairs and th define head hair, you define as this head hair is nothing but the eight material properties and are color, odor and so on. They are inseparable material properties. You cannot separate th separate them only in your mind, only with your wisdom, but they cannot be physically separ mind you separate these eight elements one by one, you lose the usage head hair. There is like when you take the parts of a cow one by one. You lose the sense of a cow. In the same these eight material properties apart, there is no head hair, body hair, or whatever. ¡¥By gro by the group of material properties, here the group of eight material properties.

Footnote 29 ¡§ ¡¥Because of bearing their own characteristics¡¦: these are not like the Primo (pakati or in Sanskrit prakrti) and the Self (att?) imagined by the theorists, which are non-exi individual essence.¡¨ Whenever they had an occasion they rejected the idea of other sects, o other people. This was the characteristic of books written when there was much debate amo sects. As Buddhists we do not accept the Primordial Essence (prakrti). That is in the Samkh philosophy and Self is also not accepted. They always say this is just imagination in their mi have existence or individual essence. However the four primary elements have individual es real things unlike those which are not real. ¡§On the contrary these do bear their own charac is why they are elements.¡¨

Student: I think this is where Mah?y?na and Therav?da traditions differ. In the Prajnap?rami one of the points is that even the elements do not have a self or are not real. So this is an ap contradiction. I can see it as a useful description but not that it would be real itself from the M perspective. What about Therav?da?

Teacher: No. Therav?da accepts these elements as real. They have their own essence or th existence. ¡¥Existence¡¦ means having the three phases of existence - arising, staying for so disappearing. Whatever has these three is supposed to be existent. Therav?da Buddhism ta takes them as real, as ultimate reality.

In Mah?y?na nothing has its own existence. Everything is void, su??a. That is the difference

Footnote 30 ¡§ ¡¥From resolution of these eight¡¦: the eight dhammas beginning with color, w means of understanding (wisdom), are apprehendable in the ultimate sense through mutual earth is not water, water is not earth. That is an example of mutual negation. A is not B, B is ¡§But head hairs are not apprehendable in the ultimate sense through negation of color and say color is different from hair and hair is different from color because hair has color inheren you understand this by separating them in your mind one from the other, but not one from co

¡§Consequently the term of common usage ¡¥head hairs¡¦ is applied to these dhammas in th When these eight properties arise together, the designation for it is head hair, body hair and

¡§The meaning is that it is a mere conventional term. ¡¥Only a mere group of eight states¡¦ is the color, etc., which are real, as a unity by means of the concept ¡¥a head hair¡¦, not only b merely the eight states.¡¨ There is something I want to correct. ¡¥Only a mere group of eight is mentioned in the Visuddhi Magga. It is said there ¡§taking the color, etc., which are the ba concept head hair as one.¡¨ It is not ¡§real, as a unity by means of concept¡¨. This is a wrong of the word there. What it really means is the eight states, the eight material properties are a head hairs, body hairs and so on. Here the eight material properties are taken as one.

So ¡§Which are a basis for the concept head hairs, etc., which are taken as one, and not be stricken out the word ¡¥only¡¦.) they are only the eight states.¡¨ ¡¥Only¡¦ should go there inste ¡¥merely¡¦. ¡¥Not because they are only eight states¡¦ means that you look at a head hair an there are thousands and thousands of particles of matter. There are not just eight particles o there are thousands and thousands of material properties. However there are just eight kind properties. A hair consists of thousands and thousands of material properties, but if you divi kinds , you get only eight kinds of material properties.

¡§A component here that is kamma-originated is a group of ten states, [that is to say, the for together with the life faculty and sex.¡¨ So it is kamma-originated. That means if it is in living may add the life faculty and sex (male or female). In this way we get ten material properties.

¡§But it is on account of respective prominence [of stiffenedness or cohesion] that it comes t ¡¥earth element¡¦ or ¡¥water element¡¦.¡¨ In the hair all four elements are present, but when w into elements, we say that head hairs belong to earth element. It does not mean that there is element in the hair, but that that element is prominent in the hair. That is why it is called eart In fact all four elements are present everywhere.

The next is by particles. ¡§In this body the earth element taken as reduced to fine dust and p size of the smallest atom might amount to an average do?a measure full.¡¨ It is difficult to as measure. Let us say a pound of dust. ¡§That is held together by the water element measurin Being maintained by the fire element (so that it does not decay). And distended by the air el not get scattered or dissipated. Instead of getting scattered or dissipated, it arrives at the alt states of female and male sex, etc., and manifests smallness, bigness, length, shortness, to and so on.¡¨ These particles are to be contemplated on in this way. The earth element is tak fine dust.

¡§The liquid water element that is the mode of cohesion, being founded on earth, maintained distended by air, does not trickle or run away.¡¨ It is supported by the other three elements. T they stay together.

¡§And here the fire element that cooks what is eaten, drunk, etc., and is the mode of warmin characteristic of heat, being established on earth, held together by water, and distended by a this body and ensures its proper appearance. And this body, being maintained by it, shows r If we lose fire element all together, our body will decompose. It is this fire element in the bod it from putrefaction.

¡§The air element that courses through all the limbs and has the characteristic of moving an being founded upon earth, held together by water, and maintained by fire, distends this body being distended by the latter kind of air, does not collapse, but stands erect.¡¨ Everything tha is supported by the air element. If we take away air element all together, it would fall.

¡§Being propelled by the other [motile] air, it shows intimation and it flexes and extends and hands and feet, doing so in the postures comprising walking, standing, sitting and lying dow mechanism of elements carries on like a magic trick, deceiving foolish people with the male so on.¡¨ These deceive us into thinking that this is a man, this is a woman, this is an animal, human being and so on. But if you can see through them, through the appearance of beings the four elements.

As to characteristics - this passage is important. ¡§The earth element - what are its characte function, manifestation? The earth element has the characteristic of hardness.¡¨ In fact wher we also mean softness. Softness is just a degree of hardness. Hardness is reduced little by softness. Hardness and softness are pretty much the same. The characteristic of earth elem ¡§Its function is to act as foundation. It is manifested as receiving.¡¨

¡§The water element has the characteristic of trickling. Its function is to intensify. It is manife holding together. The fire element has the characteristic of heat. Its function is to mature (ma manifested as a continued supply of softness.¡¨ When there is heat, when we put something soft. So it is the continued supply of softness.

¡§The air element has the characteristic of distending. Its function is to cause motion. (That It is manifested as conveying (taking something to some place). This is how they should be characteristic, and so on.¡¨

These can be seen during meditation practice. Especially the air element is evident when yo meditation. You walk with full awareness of the lifting, moving, putting and so on. In that cas air element at work there. First you have the intention to lift your foot. There is intention whic This mental state causes some material properties to arise in your foot. There are many mo consciousness going on when you have intention to move. Each moment of consciousness properties to arise. What we call lifting is just the arising of material properties at adjacent lo According to Abhidhamma nothing moves to another place. When I move my finger, I think t but according to Abhidhamma there is nothing that moves. Caused by my mind this moveme really means arising of material properties at different moments or at different locations.

It may be like a picture in movie film. On one frame there is one picture. On the next frame t picture with a very slight difference. In the same way or similarly what happens when there i is arising of material properties at successive locations or at adjacent locations. That is also somewhat in footnote 37 - desantaruppatti.

Student: So there is no continuity. There is closeness.

Teacher: There is no one thing moving from one place to another or from one moment to an at this moment disappears at this moment. It does not go to the next moment. At the next m is created. Another thing arises.

Student: Which is close -

Teacher: Which may be identical with the one that has just disappeared. When you practice you may be able to see some of these characteristics and functions. When you pay very clo sometimes you feel that something is pushing you from behind or something is pushing your
That is the function of causing motion. The air element is something that takes your foot fron the ground up or to move forward. That is conveying. So these characteristics and others ca direct experience during intense practice of meditation.

¡§As to how originated: among the 42 components beginning with head hairs shown in the c the earth element, etc., the four consisting of gorge, dung, pus, and urine, are temperature-o only.¡¨ Later on I think we will get the four causes of matter. In paragraph 111 the four cause given - kamma, consciousness, nutrition and temperature. Now he is talking about that.

¡§The four consisting of gorge, dung, pus and urine are temperature-originated only.¡¨ That caused by temperature or climate. ¡§the four consisting of tears, sweat, spittle and snot are temperature-originated and consciousness-originated only; the fire that cooks what is eaten, kamma-originated only.¡¨ We call it stomach fire. That element is said to be caused by kamm have good kamma will have good digestion. If you don¡¦t have good digestion, blame your k

¡§In-breath and out-breath are consciousness-originated only; all the rest are of fourfold orig are caused by all four causes.) This how they should be given attention as to how originated

As to variety and unity - that means as to difference and similarity. ¡§There is variety in the s characteristics, etc., of all the elements; for the characteristic, function and manifestation of element is one, and those of water element, etc., are different.¡¨ According to characteristic different. Earth element is different from water element. Water element is different from fire on. ¡§But there is unity in them as materiality.¡¨ Although they are different as earth, water, f they are all material properties. In that way they are the same.

There is unity in them as materiality, or they are called great primaries, or they are called ele they are called states, and all of them are described as impermanent and so on, ¡§not withst that they are various according to [specific] characteristic, etc., and according to origination so on.¡¨ There is variety as well as unity among these elements. ¡¥Variety¡¦ means one is di other. Unity is that they are all r|pas, they are all great primaries, they are all elements and s

¡§All of these elements are ¡¥instances of materiality¡¦ because they do not exceed the char ¡¥being molested¡¦.¡¨ ¡¥Being molested¡¦ is the definition of the word ¡¥r|pa¡¦. Something whi by heat, cold, etc., is called r|pa in P??i. The word ¡¥r|pa¡¦ is defined as something which is heat, cold, hunger, thirst and so on.

They are called great primaries because they are the basis for the other material properties them. ¡§They are great primaries (mah? bh|ta) by reason of great manifestation and so on. manifestation and so on, means that these elements are called great primaries for the follow namely, a. manifestation of greatness, b. likeness to great creatures, c. great maintenance, alteration, and e. because they are great and because they are entities.¡¨ This may be usefu students. In the chapter on material properties there is the word ¡¥mah? bh|ta¡¦. So you may study this and understand the word.

The first one is manifestation of greatness. They manifest greatness, therefore they are calle primaries. ¡§They are manifested as great both in the continuity that is not clung to (acquire kamma).¡¨ Now we will have to strike out ¡¥acquired through kamma¡¦. Here ¡¥continuity tha means in outside things, in inanimate things. ¡¥Continuity that is clung to¡¦ means living bein through kamma¡¦ is not correct. I have told you about this P??i word ¡¥up?di??a¡¦.

¡§For their manifestation of greatness in a continuity that is not clung to is given in the Desc Recollection of the Buddha in the way beginning:

¡¥Two times a hundred thousand [leagues]
And then four nahutas as well;
This earth, this Bearer of all wealth,
Has that much thickness as they tell¡¦.¡¨

This is the dimension of the earth. The earth is said to be 200,000 and four nahutas in depth

Student: How much is that?

Teacher: So the earth is said to be 240,000 leagues deep. ¡§And they are manifested on a g continuity that is clung to, for instance, in the bodies of fishes, turtles, deities, D?nava demo on. For this is said: ¡¥Bhikkhus, there are individual creatures of a hundred leagues in the gr so on¡¦.¡¨ In the great ocean there are creatures that have very big bodies.

Next is likeness to great creatures. Here great creatures are those that are called great beca magic power. So magicians are called great creatures here. ¡§Just as a magician turns wate crystal into crystal, and turns a clod that is not gold into gold, and shows them, and being hi spirit or a bird, shows himself as a spirit or a bird so too, being themselves not blue-black, th themselves into blue-black materiality and so on.¡¨ These elements are not blue, nor black, n make us believe they are blue, or black, or red and so on. They deceive us into believing wh real.

Student: It seems to me what you have just said is the Mah?y?na point of view that the grea us into thinking that they are real. I don¡¦t see the difference.

Teacher: They themselves are not blue-black, but we take them to have shape, to have form

Student: To be real.

Teacher: To be real in the conventional sense. But according to Abhidhamma what is real is and the particles of matter mentioned in the books. So according to Abhidhamma a cup is n particles which are contained in the cup are real. They have their own existence. A cup has its own because it is just a concept. So here ¡¥great creatures¡¦ are magicians. They can ma they can turn things into other things.

The word ¡¥mah? bh|ta¡¦ - there is something like word play in footnote 38. The word ¡¥abh| real. And ¡¥abh|ta¡¦ means something wonderful or a miracle. The word ¡¥mah? bh|ta¡¦ is ta two meanings. So a magician is a man who has so many unreal things and he is a man who He is a man who create wonders.

In about the middle of the footnote ¡§The deception lies in causing the apparent individual es blue-black, etc., though they themselves have no such individual essences of blue-black, et causing the appearance of what has the aspect of woman and man, etc., though they thems individual essences of woman, man and so on. Likewise their undemonstrability, since they or outside each other though they rely upon each other for support. For if these elements we each other, they would not each perform their particular functions, owing to mutual frustratio were found outside each other, they would be already resolved (separate), and that being so of them as unresolved (inseparable) would be meaningless. So although their standing place still each one assists the other by its particular function, the functions of establishing, etc., w becomes a condition for the others as conascence condition and so on.¡¨ ¡¥Conascence co helping together while arising together. These conditions are from the 24 causal conditions t book of Abhidhamma.

In fact the sentences of the footnote beginning with ¡§Likewise their undemonstrability¡¨ and the next paragraph, paragraph 99. There in the Visuddhi Magga it says ¡§They have no stan inside him or outside him and yet they have no standing place either inside him or outside hi have no standing independently of him, so too, these elements are not found to stand either each other yet they have no standing independently of one another.¡¨ These are really sepa stand or exist in the other, but they have no standing independently of one another because one another. So there is dependence upon one another but they are not used so that there of one from the other.

¡§Thus they are also great primaries (mah? bh|ta) in being equal to the great creatures (mah the spirits because they have no thinkable standing place [relative to each other].¡¨

¡§And just as the great creatures known as female spirits (yakkhin?) conceal their own fearf pleasing color, shape, and gesture to deceive beings, so too, these elements, conceal each characteristic and function classed as hardness, etc., by means of a pleasing skin color of w men¡¦s bodies, etc., and pleasing shapes of limbs and pleasing gestures of fingers, toes and they deceive simple people by concealing their own functions and characteristics beginning do not allow their individual essences to be seen.¡¨ If we do not concentrate, if we do not rea these elements, we will not know or we will not see their true characteristics and so on. So I see their characteristics we will always be deceived by them into believing this is a man, this so on.

Student: What does it mean ¡¥conceal their own fearfulness¡¦ (with regard to the yakkhin?) ?

Teacher: The female spirits or ghosts may assume another form so that they do not look fea stories in the J?takas where female spirits entice people and then eat them. Although the fe yakkhin? are supposed to be of very fearful appearance, they may change their form. They beautiful girl in order to entice you and then they will eat you.

¡§Great maintenance: this is because they have to be sustained by Great Requisites. For th great primaries (mah? bh|ta) since they have become (bh|ta), have occurred, through the m clothing, etc., which are great (mahant) [in importance] because they have to be found every alternatively, they are great primaries (mah? bh|ta) since they are primaries whose maintena

¡¥Great alteration¡¦ means great change. The sentence (in paragraph 102) should read: ¡§W un-clung-to or clung-to they are the Great Alterations.¡¨ That means whether they belong to whether they belong to living beings, they are great alterations, they are great changes.

¡§Herein, the great alteration of the unclung-to (That means outside things.) evidences itself emergence of an eon.¡¨ This word appears in another context also. He made the same trans nine paragraph 32 it says ¡§He was sprinkled with medicinal charms resembling the fire that of an eon.¡¨ Here also it should be the end of an eon, not emergence. The P??i word here is time of the destruction of the world you see this change very clearly. Everything is destroyed alteration of the un-clung-to (lifeless things) evidences itself in the end of an eon and that of in the disturbances of the elements [in the body].

We believe that these four elements should be well balanced. If there is too much of the ear water element and so on, you get sick. In Myanmar there is a native medical practice which the basis of their practice. They always explain with reference to these elements. If you eat f sticky, it will cause constipation for example. They say this food has the earth element as its property. If you eat something which is bitter, you will get a lot of wind element. It promotes So they base their medical practice on these four elements. They divide food into those whic element as prominent property or water element as prominent property. They treat patients appropriate for the disease. They always say food is medicine and medicine is food.

The verses are the explanation of the destruction of the world. We will come to that later too chapter. Then there are four verses that describe the alteration in living beings.

¡§The bite of Wooden-mouths can make
The body stiff; to all intent,
When roused is its earth element,
It might be gripped by such a snake.¡¨

They believe that there are snakes whose bite can cause your body to be stiffened. Also the of snakes that can make your body like water element and so on. So when you are bitten by is disturbance of the elements in your body. And so your body alters. They are great primari have become the basis of great alterations.

Paragraph 103 ¡§Because they are great and because they are entities: great (mahant) bec effort to discern them, and entities (bh|ta) because they are existent; thus they are great prin bh|ta) because they are great (mah?) and because they are entities (bh|ta).¡¨

¡§Again, they are elements (dh?tu) because of bearing (dh?ra?a) their own characteristics, b (?d?na) suffering and because of sorting out (producing) (?dh?na) suffering and because no exempt from the characteristic of being elements. They are states (dhammas) owing to bear own characteristics and owing to their so bearing (dh?ra?a) for the length of the moment app them.¡¨ The Sub-Commentary explains the word ¡¥dh?ra?a¡¦ as not bearing but just as exist the length of the moment appropriate to them. Citta is called an element and r|pa is called an exists for only one moment. R|pa has 17 moments of life. That is why it says ¡§for the length appropriate to them.¡¨ If it is citta or cetasikas, it has only one moment of life, one moment o
If it is r|pa, it has 17 moments of life.

Then we have as to resolution (separability) and non-resolution (inseparability). ¡§They are p unresolvable (inseparable) since they always arise together in every single minimal material of the bare octad and others.¡¨ ¡¥Bare octad¡¦ means those mentioned in this chapter, parag odor, taste, nutritive essence and the four elements. They are called the bare octad. ¡§But th resolvable (separable) by characteristic.¡¨ They are different according to characteristic. ¡§Th how they should be given attention ¡¥as to resolution (separability) and non-resolution (insep

¡§As to the similar and dissimilar: and although they are unresolved (inseparable) in this way two are similar for heaviness, and so are the last two in lightness.¡¨ Earth and water are hea air are light. ¡§The first two are dissimilar to the last two and the last two to the first two. This they should be given attention ¡¥as to the similar and dissimilar¡¦.¡¨

¡§As to distinction between internal and external: the internal elements are the [material] sup physical bases of consciousness (That means eyes, ears and so on.), for the kinds of intima material faculties. They are associated with postures, and they are of fourfold origination (Th by four things.) The external elements are of the opposite kind.¡¨ The external elements are four causes but just by one, temperature. They are not associated with posture. They are no consciousness and so on.

¡§As to inclusion: kamma-originated earth element is included together with the other kamm elements because there is no difference in their origination.¡¨ They are similar in being kamm ¡§Likewise the consciousness-originated is included together with other consciousness-origi
They are grouped together.

¡§As to condition: the earth element, which is held together by water, maintained by fire and air, is a condition for the other three great primaries by acting as their foundation¡¨ and so on help each other and they do their own functions. So they are conditions for each other.

As to lack of conscious reaction - that means that they have no consciousness, no understa ¡§Here too the earth element does not know ¡¥I am the earth element¡¦ or ¡¥I am a condition foundation for the three great primaries¡¦. And the other three do not know ¡¥The earth elem for us by acting as our foundation¡¦. And similarly in each instance. This is how they should b attention ¡¥as to lack of conscious reaction¡¦.¡¨ They are non-cognizing things. They do not h consciousness. They do not have thinking.

¡§As to analysis of conditions: there are four conditions for the elements.¡¨ This is important. four conditions or four causes for the elements or the material properties. They are kamma, nutriment and temperature.

¡§Herein kamma alone is a condition for what is kamma-originated, not consciousness and t consciousness, etc., alone are the respective conditions for what is consciousness-originate others. And kamma is the producing condition for what is kamma-originated; it is indirectly d condition for the rest.¡¨ You will have to use the knowledge of Pa??h?na to understand this. are 24 conditions mentioned. ¡¥The producing condition¡¦ means that which produces. There condition among the 24 conditions mentioned in Pa??h?na. In footnote 40 ¡§The term ¡¥pro refers to causing origination, though as a condition it is actually kamma condition.¡¨ Among t mentioned in Pa??h?na it is kamma condition. Here it is said to be producing condition. The

¡§For this is said ¡¥Profitable and unprofitable volition is a condition, as kamma condition, fo resultant aggregates and for materiality due to kamma performed.¡¨

It is indirectly decisive support condition for the rest. Decisive support condition has the wide application of the 24 conditions. If you cannot explain a certain thing by the other conditions, to the decisive support condition. It is very wide, so you can include everything in that. Strict decisive support only applies to those that are mental, to cittas and cetasikas, not r|pa. So h have direct decisive support. That is why it says indirect decisive support. That means decis condition not mentioned in Pa??h?na but decisive support that is mentioned in some of the

The Sub-Commentary gives some of the passages from some of the Suttas, but those Sutta That¡¦s why there are blanks between the parentheses. Until this time nobody has been able quotations in the Sub-Commentary. ¡§ ¡¥With a person as decisive support¡¦ ( ) and ¡¥With decisive support¡¦ ( ) in the Suttas the decisive support condition can be directly understood the Suttas in the sense of ¡¥absence without¡¦.¡¨ That means not arising without. Without it s not arise. That is the condition for that. If I cannot exist without you, you are my decisive sup condition. It is something like that, so not arising without. The others are also explained in th knowledge of Pa??h?na is needed. So I think I will skip this.

¡§And when these elements have been made to occur through the influence of the conascen

With three in four ways to one due,
And likewise with one due to three;
With two in six ways due to two - Thus their occurrence comes to be.¡¨

Please have in mind the four elements - one, two, three, four. What it is explaining here is th dependent upon the other three. Let us say one is dependent upon two, three and four. Two one, three and four. Three is dependent upon one, two and four. Four is dependent upon on is like that. And then two, three and four depend upon one. One, three and four depend upo four depend upon three. One two and three depend upon four. There is mutual dependency here. Then you take one and two and they are dependent upon three and four. Three and fo one and two. So you get all these things.

Paragraph 115 ¡§At the time of moving forward and moving backward, the earth element am condition for pressing (pushing). That, seconded by the water element, is a condition for esta foundation. But the water element seconded by the earth element is a condition for lowering are lowering down, there is the prominence of water element. ¡§The fire element seconded b a condition for lifting up.¡¨ When you lift your foot up, the fire element and air element are pro that time. When the foot is going down, the heaviness or something like that is prominent. W body or your foot up, there is lightness. You see the prominence of a given element when yo or when you put it down.

¡§As he gives his attention to them ¡¥as to word meaning¡¦, etc., in this way the elements be him under each heading. As he again and again adverts and gives attention to them access in the way already described.¡¨ Only access concentration, no absorption is attained with thi subject. ¡§And this concentration too is called ¡¥definition of the four elements¡¦ because it a who defines the four elements owing to the influence of his knowledge.¡¨

Next are the benefits of this meditation. What are the benefits you will get from the developm concentration - these benefits are given in detail from paragraph 120 onwards. The first ben blissful abiding here and now. That is the first one. ¡§For the development of absorption con provides the benefit of a blissful abiding here and now for the Arahants with cankers destroy concentration, thinking ¡¥We shall attain and dwell with unified mind for a whole day¡¦.¡¨ The Noble Ones enter into jh?na to enjoy happiness. That happiness is called ¡¥happiness here absorption concentration has this benefit.

The next one is what? ¡§When ordinary people and Trainers develop it, thinking ¡¥After eme exercise insight with concentrated consciousness¡¦, the development of absorption provides benefit of insight.¡¨ They make the jh?na the basis of insight. So it gives the benefit of insigh insight as benefit.

¡§So too does access concentration as a method of arriving at wide open [conditions] in cro [circumstances].¡¨ That means in this sa?s?ra (Sa?s?ra is explained as being a very crowde some wide place when you get the access concentration. That means you get a little happin peacefulness when you get concentration. You get a good chance there. In footnote 45 ¡§Th existence in the round of rebirths, which is a very cramped place, is crowded by the defileme and so on.¡¨ This is what is meant here. You get some moments that are free from the ment as craving and so on.

The next paragraph, paragraph 122, is a little complicated. The development of concentratio knowledge as benefit. The development of absorption concentration can give the benefits of When a person has attained all eight attainments (That means the eight jh?nas.), he may wa knowledge. If he wants to get the direct knowledge, what must he do? He enters into the eig Then he makes one of them, actually the fourth jh?na, the basis of direct knowledge. He ent and then emerges from that jh?na. After emerging from that jh?na he wishes that he get son Here it says ¡§Having been one, he becomes many.¡¨ That means I am one, but I want to be create many resemblances of himself like C|?a Panthaka did. The meditator may wish for th Then he practices meditation and then he gets the direct knowledge. That is what is explain paragraph, but it is difficult to understand. That is the meaning. After getting all eight attainm (jh?nas) if he wants the direct knowledge, he enters into one jh?na as the basis for direct kn jh?na is the fourth jh?na. Emerging from that jh?na he makes a wish such as ¡§having been many.¡¨ And as a result of his meditation he will get the direct knowledge. ¡¥Direct knowledg case the ability to make himself into many persons. The other abhi??as may be attained dep wish.

¡§When ordinary people have not lost their jh?na, and they aspire to rebirth in the Brahm? W be reborn in the Brahm? World¡¦, or even though they do not make the actual aspiration, the of absorption concentration provides them with the benefits of an improved form of existence that for them.¡¨ That means development of concentration can lead you to get a better existe in a better existence as brahm?s and so on. So it has this benefit.

The last one in paragraph 124 is that development of concentration has the attainment of ce

Those who have attained to the third stage of enlightenment and Arahants can enter into the cessation. During this attainment of cessation all mental activities are suspended for as long wishes. The maximum period for human beings is seven days. For seven days or one day th statue. There is no mental activity. That state of being without mental activity is said to be ve It is the highest form of happiness in this world. The development of concentration can give We come to the end of this chapter.

Chapter 12

Chapter 12 deals with the supernormal powers, direct knowledge. We have a glimpse of dire previous chapter. In this chapter the different kinds of direct knowledge are explained. In this are a lot of stories. What we should note is that there are five kinds of direct knowledge. In p they are listed as 1. Performing some kinds of miracles, 2. The knowledge of the Divine Ear hearing sounds far away, hearing sounds that cannot normally be heard.), 3. The knowledge Minds (That means reading other people¡¦s minds.), 4. The knowledge of Recollection of Pa knowledge of Passing Away and Reappearance of Beings. These are called direct knowled

If the meditator wants to achieve the supernormal powers, he must achieve the eight attainm jh?nas) on each of the eight kasi?as ending with the white kasi?a. That is the first eight kasi last two are left out. What are the last two? Space and light. Space is left out because it car basis for attaining immaterial jh?nas. The Sub-Commentary explains that the light kasi?a is same as white kasi?a. In the Visuddhi Magga only eight kasi?as are mentioned. The sub-Co can also take the light kasi?a, that it is included in the white kasi?a.

You have to make yourself very familiar with the kasi?as and the jh?nas. There are 14 ways familiar with these jh?nas. That is in the order of the kasi?as, in the reverse order of the kasi on. So you enter into jh?na on this kasi?a, and then the next jh?na on this kasi?a, and the n kasi?a. Then again you enter into first jh?na on this kasi?a and then first jh?na on another ka It is in order to make you very familiar with the jh?nas and the kasi?as that you have to go in ways.

At the end of paragraph 10 the Giribha??avahana offering is mentioned and there is a footn word for an island and a lamp is the same. It is the word ¡¥d?pa¡¦. He took d?pap|j? to mean
It is a light offering. During that festival lights are offered at different places ¡§starting with th Cetiyagiri and extending over the whole island and up to a league in the sea.¡¨ That is light o festival, not island offering.

There are many stories in this chapter. Some of the stories have been given already in the c have read. Many may be new to you. I want to give you the page numbers of some stories if more detail. At the end of paragraph 28 a reference is given for the Dhammapada Comment book Buddhist Legends, you may read part 2, page 238. At the end of paragraph 29 no refe have the reference. Please read Buddhist Legends, part 3, page 179. Then at the end of pa read Middle Length Sayings, first volume, page 396. At the end of paragraph 33 the referenc Buddhist Legends, part 2, page 246. For the next paragraph the reference can be found in B part 3, page 103. For paragraph 35 the story may be found in Buddhist Legends, part 1, pag the first reference can be found in Buddhist Legends, part 3, page 319. The second referenc Legends, part 3, page 327. The third reference in this paragraph may be found in Buddhist L page 256. The last reference in this paragraph may be found in Buddhist legends, part 3, pa end of paragraph 42 you may find that reference in Buddhist legends, part 2, page 59. these references.

At the end of paragraph 41 it says ¡§made of the seven gems.¡¨ Actually it is made of the se things. The seven precious things are gold, silver and other jewels.

In the part that we have covered the ten kinds of success power (iddhi) are given. All of ther interesting. So if you have time please study it again. There is one thing that is very interesti paragraph 26 ¡§A distinction brought about by the influence of knowledge either before the a knowledge or after it or at that moment is called success by intervention of knowledge.¡¨ If a to become an Arahant in that life, he will not die without becoming an Arahant. The knowled which he is going to acquire in that life protects him from being killed even though an attemp life. That is a very strange thing. If you are going to become an Arahant, you will not die with an Arahant. Nothing can cause you to be killed.

The first story is of Venerable Bakkula. In this story he was swallowed by a fish. His mother in the river and he was swallowed by a fish. The fish was caught by a fisherman and sold to wanted to cook the fish, so she cut it open and found the child still alive there. So he did not stomach of the fish because he was destined to reach enlightenment in that life. That¡¦s why killed. Normally he would not survive being swallowed by a fish.

The next story is about Venerable Sa~kicca. While he was in the womb, his mother died. As those days they tried to cremate the body. When they cremate the body, they use sticks. Or child. He made a noise. When they heard the noise, they cut open the belly of the woman ar was named Sa~kicca because he was injured by the stick which is called in P??i sa~ku. Tha called Sa~kicca.

So many stories are given. There is also the story of Bh|tap?la. Also those who are in attain harmed. Such stories begin in paragraph 30. Venerable S?riputta was in attainment and so him. It is a similar case with Venerable Sa?j?va and so on. I think we had reference to the d some weeks back and also to Samm?vati. They are to us miracles.

These miracles are caused by the intervention of concentration or the intervention of knowle These are interesting stories. Some are not caused by any concentration or any meditation. can fly is also called a success or miracle. They got that ability just by birth, just by being bo bird. So they can fly and we cannot. So these ten kinds of success are mentioned in the first chapter. OK.

S?dhu! S?dhu! S?dhu!

Chapter 12
(Tape 25 / Ps: 1-44)

Chapter 12 deals with the supernormal powers, direct knowledge. We have a glimpse of dire previous chapter. In this chapter the different kinds of direct knowledge are explained. In this are a lot of stories. What we should note is that there are five kinds of direct knowledge. In p they are listed as 1. Performing some kinds of miracles, 2. The knowledge of the Divine Ear hearing sounds far away, hearing sounds that cannot normally be heard.), 3. The knowledge Minds (That means reading other people¡¦s minds.), 4. The knowledge of Recollection of Pa knowledge of Passing Away and Reappearance of Beings. These are called direct knowled

If the meditator wants to achieve the supernormal powers, he must achieve the eight attainm jh?nas) on each of the eight kasi?as ending with the white kasi?a. That is the first eight kasi last two are left out. What are the last two? Space and light. Space is left out because it can basis for attaining immaterial jh?nas. The Sub-Commentary explains that the light kasi?a is same as white kasi?a. In the Visuddhi Magga only eight kasi?as are mentioned. The sub-Co can also take the light kasi?a, that it is included in the white kasi?a.

You have to make yourself very familiar with the kasi?as and the jh?nas. There are 14 ways familiar with these jh?nas. That is in the order of the kasi?as, in the reverse order of the kasi
on. So you enter into jh?na on this kasi?a, and then the next jh?na on this kasi?a, and the n kasi?a. Then again you enter into first jh?na on this kasi?a and then first jh?na on another ka It is in order to make you very familiar with the jh?nas and the kasi?as that you have to go in ways.

At the end of paragraph 10 the Giribha??avahana offering is mentioned and there is a footn
word for an island and a lamp is the same. It is the word ¡¥d?pa¡¦. He took d?pap|j? to mean
It is a light offering. During that festival lights are offered at different places ¡§starting with th Cetiyagiri and extending over the whole island and up to a league in the sea.¡¨ That is light o festival, not island offering.

There are many stories in this chapter. Some of the stories have been given already in the c have read. Many may be new to you. I want to give you the page numbers of some stories if more detail. At the end of paragraph 28 a reference is given for the Dhammapada Comment book Buddhist Legends, you may read part 2, page 238. At the end of paragraph 29 no refe have the reference. Please read Buddhist Legends, part 3, page 179. Then at the end of par read Middle Length Sayings, first volume, page 396. At the end of paragraph 33 the referenc

Buddhist Legends, part 2, page 246. For the next paragraph the reference can be found in B part 3, page 103. For paragraph 35 the story may be found in Buddhist Legends, part 1, pag the first reference can be found in Buddhist Legends, part 3, page 319. The second referenc Legends, part 3, page 327. The third reference in this paragraph may be found in Buddhist L page 256. The last reference in this paragraph may be found in Buddhist legends, part 3, pa end of paragraph 42 you may find that reference in Buddhist legends, part 2, page 59. these references.

At the end of paragraph 41 it says ¡§made of the seven gems.¡¨ Actually it is made of the se things. The seven precious things are gold, silver and other jewels.

In the part that we have covered the ten kinds of success power (iddhi) are given. All of ther interesting. So if you have time please study it again. There is one thing that is very interesti paragraph 26 ¡§A distinction brought about by the influence of knowledge either before the a knowledge or after it or at that moment is called success by intervention of knowledge.¡¨ If a
to become an Arahant in that life, he will not die without becoming an Arahant. The knowled which he is going to acquire in that life protects him from being killed even though an attemp life. That is a very strange thing. If you are going to become an Arahant, you will not die with an Arahant. Nothing can cause you to be killed.

The first story is of Venerable Bakkula. In this story he was swallowed by a fish. His mother in the river and he was swallowed by a fish. The fish was caught by a fisherman and sold to wanted to cook the fish, so she cut it open and found the child still alive there. So he did not stomach of the fish because he was destined to reach enlightenment in that life. That¡¦s why killed. Normally he would not survive being swallowed by a fish.

The next story is about Venerable Sa~kicca. While he was in the womb, his mother died. As those days they tried to cremate the body. When they cremate the body, they use sticks. Or child. He made a noise. When they heard the noise, they cut open the belly of the woman ar was named Sa~kicca because he was injured by the stick which is called in P??i sa~ku. Tha called Sa~kicca.

So many stories are given. There is also the story of Bh|tap?la. Also those who are in attain harmed. Such stories begin in paragraph 30. Venerable S?riputta was in attainment and so him. It is a similar case with Venerable Sa?j?va and so on. I think we had reference to the d some weeks back and also to Samm?vati. They are to us miracles.

These miracles are caused by the intervention of concentration or the intervention of knowle

These are interesting stories. Some are not caused by any concentration or any meditation. can fly is also called a success or miracle. They got that ability just by birth, just by being bo bird. So they can fly and we cannot. So these ten kinds of success are mentioned in the first chapter. OK.

S?dhu! S?dhu! S?dhu!

(Tape 26 / Ps: 45 - 118)

Up until paragraph 45 the ten kinds of success were described. Among them the first one is by resolve is actually mentioned in the clause ¡¥kinds of supernormal power (success)¡¦¡¨- it Texts - ¡§but (2) success as transformations and (3) success as the mind-made [body] are n as well.¡¨ In the clause ¡¥kinds of supernormal power or supernormal success¡¦ we should ta three of the kinds of success mentioned above.

Now the Commentator goes on explaining the other clauses in the Text. ¡§To the kinds of su the components of supernormal power, or to the departments of supernormal power.¡¨ That of supernormal power.

¡§He directs, he inclines, his mind: When that bhikkhu¡¦s consciousness has become the ba knowledge in the way already described, he directs the preliminary work consciousness with attaining the kinds of supernormal power, he sends it in the direction of the kinds of superno leading it away from the kasi?a as its object.¡¨ In order to do a supernormal thing first the me into jh?nas. He makes the fourth jh?na of the fourfold method the basis of supernormal . pov knowledge. The bhikkhu¡¦s consciousness has become the basis for direct knowledge in the described. ¡§He directs the preliminary work consciousness with the purpose of attaining the supernormal power.¡¨ After entering into the fourth jh?na, he emerges from the fourth jh?na. preparation work for the supernormal knowledge. ¡¥Preliminary work consciousness¡¦ mean (sense-sphere) consciousness. ¡§He sends it in the direction of the kinds of supernormal po he inclines his mind towards that.

¡§Inclines: makes it tend and lean towards the supernormal power to be attained.¡¨ These ar explanations, so they are repetitive. ¡§He: the bhikkhu who has done the directing of his min The various: varied, of different sorts. Kinds of supernormal power: departments of superno paccanubhoti - paccanubhavati (alternative form).¡¨ Sometimes it cannot be translated into E language because the two words are just variations. The second word is just a variation of th There is no difference in meaning. Paccanubhoti and paccanubhavati are the same. In the fi should be short, not long. The only difference between the words is that one is ending in ¡¥b other is ending in ¡¥bhavati¡¦. It is just a grammatical peculiarity. ¡§The meaning is that he m with, realizes, reaches.¡¨

The Commentator is going to show us one by one the supernormal powers a monk may per show that variousness, it is said: ¡¥Having been one, [he becomes many; having been many Actually this Text has not been given in full in the Visuddhi Magga because the Commentato readers already know this passage. We are lucky that the translator gives us the full Text he the brackets appear.

¡§Having been one, [he becomes many; having been many, he becomes one.¡¨ That means will create many likenesses of himself, hundreds or thousands. "He appears and vanishes. H through walls, through enclosures, through mountains, as though in open space. He dives in earth as though in water. He goes on unbroken water as though on earth. Seated cross-legg space like a winged bird. With his hand he touches and strokes the moon and sun so mighty wields bodily mastery even as far as the Brahm? World.¡¨ This is taken from the D?gha Nik?

Now the Commentator will explain one by one. ¡§Herein, having been one: having been nor effect to the supernormal power.¡¨ A monk is only one, but here he is going to make likeness is going to create images. ¡§He becomes many: wanting to walk with many or wanting to do to ask questions with many, he becomes a hundred or a thousand. But how does he do this?
the four planes, (2) the four bases (roads), (3) the eight steps, (4) the sixteen roots of superr and then he (5) resolves with knowledge.¡¨ Here ¡¥planes¡¦ means stories, as in one story, tw and so on. The P??i word used is bh|mi. ¡¥Bh|mi¡¦ can mean planes of existence as well as building.

¡§The four planes should be understood as the four jh?nas.¡¨ The four jh?nas are said to be the four stages for the supernormal power. Four jh?nas here is according to the fourfold met

¡§For this has been said by the General of the Dhamma.¡¨ That means the Elder S?riputta. V was called ¡¥the General of the Dhamma¡¦ by other monks.

¡§What are the four planes of supernormal power?¡¨ This is taken from the Pa?isambhid?ma reference in the middle of paragraph 49.

¡§And he reaches supernormal power by becoming light, malleable and wieldy in body after blissful perception and light perception due to the pervasion of happiness and pervasion of b why the first three jh?nas should be understood as the accessory plane since they lead to th supernormal power in this manner. But the fourth is the natural plane for obtaining supernor means he enters into first jh?na, second jh?na, third jh?na and fourth jh?na. ¡§The fourth jh?

natural plane for obtaining supernormal power.¡¨ That means the fourth jh?na is the basis fo power. Without entering into and emerging from the fourth jh?na, nobody can exercise the s ¡¥The four planes¡¦ mean the four jh?nas, the four material jh?nas.

¡§The four bases (roads) should be understood as the four bases of success.¡¨ The P??i wo roads to power. Here ¡¥roads¡¦ means just causes of.

¡§For this is said: ¡¥What are the four bases for success? Here a bhikkhu develops the basis to power) that possesses both concentration due to zeal and the will to strive; he develops t success (road to power) that possesses both concentration due to energy and the will to stri the basis for success (road to power) that possesses both concentration due to [natural puri consciousness and the will to strive; he develops the basis for success (road to power) that concentration due to inquiry and the will to strive.¡¨ ¡¥Inquiry¡¦ really means pa??? (knowledg inquiring. The P??i word is v?ma?s?. The Sanskrit word is m?ma?s?. ¡¥M?ma?s?¡¦ means ¡¥investigation¡¦ does not necessarily mean just to investigate, but it means to investigate an correctly. It is the name for pa???.

¡§These four bases for success lead to the obtaining of supernormal power.. to the fearlessn supernormal power¡¨ and so on. What are these four? Did you get four? Zeal is one thing. T chanda. It is just the will-to-do. Chanda has two meanings - sometimes it is just the will-to-d sometimes it is the desire for sensual things. Here it is just the will-to-do, not the desire for s things. The first one is chanda. The second one is energy (viriya). The third is consciousnes the fourth is inquiry or pa???. These four are called ¡¥iddhip?da, roads to power or causes o person has to develop these four qualities in order to get supernormal power.

¡§And here the concentration that has zeal as its cause, or has zeal outstanding, is concentr zeal.¡¨ That means zeal which is prominent. ¡§This is a term for concentration obtained by g to zeal consisting in desire to act.¡¨ It is just the desire to act. It is not attachment to sensual

¡§Will (formation) as endeavor is will to strive.¡¨ This is the word explanation. ¡§This is a term energy of right endeavor accomplishing its fourfold function.¡¨ Among the 37 constituents of there are the four great efforts. Here they are called ¡¥right endeavor¡¦. They are trying to ge akusala that has arisen in the past, avoiding akusala, getting kusala, and developing kusala akusala there are two kinds of endeavor and also with regard to kusala there are two kinds o ¡§Possesses: is furnished with concentration due to zeal and with the [four] instances of the strive.¡¨

¡§Road to power (basis for success): The meaning is the total of consciousness and its rema

[except the concentration and the will], which are, in the sense of resolve, the road to (basis concentration due to zeal and will to strive associated with the direct knowledge consciousn are themselves termed ¡¥power (success)¡¦ either by treatment as ¡¥production¡¦ or in the se ¡¥succeeding¡¦ or by treatment in this way, ¡¥beings succeed by its means, thus they are su enriched, promoted¡¦.¡¨ It is still hard to understand this passage. This phrase, ¡¥road to pow words, ¡¥road¡¦ and ¡¥power¡¦. In P??i the words are ¡¥iddhi¡¦ and ¡¥p?da¡¦. ¡¥Iddhi¡¦ means concentration. Here they are called ¡¥iddhi (success or power)¡¦. ¡¥P?da¡¦ really means thei basis is what? Consciousness and its remaining concomitants. It is not accurate here. It sho remaining consciousness and its concomitants. In order to understand this you have to unde power consciousness. When a person achieves this power, there arises in his mind a kind o kind of consciousness is called ¡¥supernormal power consciousness¡¦. Along with that cons mental factors, many mental factors. Among them the two, concentration and energy, are ca
The consciousness and the other mental factors are called ¡¥road¡¦ or ¡¥power¡¦ (p?da). By ¡¥iddhip?da¡¦ is meant the supernormal power consciousness and its concomitants.

¡§The meaning is,¡¨- ¡¥total is not a good here and there is no ¡¥total¡¦ in the original - ¡§con and its concomitants [except the concentration and the will],¡¨ - ¡¥will¡¦ here means actually chanda - ¡§which are, in the sense of resolve,¡¨ - in the sense of basis, not in the sense of re the sense of basis the road to the concentration due to zeal and will to strive associated with knowledge consciousness.¡¨

Student: Will to strive?

Teacher: ¡¥Will to strive¡¦ means -

Student: Citta?

Teacher: No. it is energy or effort. ¡¥Will to strive¡¦ really means striving.

Student: Viriya?

Teacher: The word used here is not simply viriya. There are two compound words used here padh?na sa~kh?ra. ¡¥Chanda sam?dhi¡¦ means sam?dhi caused by chanda and chanda is means striving, striving formation. That means viriya (energy or effort). They are explained i ¡§Will as endeavor is will to strive.¡¨ It is not chanda here. It is viriya. Concentration and ene called ¡¥iddhi¡¦ here and consciousness and the other remaining concomitants are called ¡¥ ¡¥iddhip?da¡¦ means the direct knowledge consciousness and the concomitants and then co
This is just the word explanation.

¡§Or alternatively: it is arrived at by means of that thus that is a road; it is reached, is the me That meaning is arrived at.

¡§Iddhip?da = iddhiy? p?da (resolution of compound) this is a term for zeal, etc., according a Iddhip?da is made to mean the four things - will-to-do, energy, consciousness, and inquiry o

Student: What is the P??i word for consciousness?

Teacher: Citta. Next paragraph 54 ¡§The eight steps should be understood as the eight begi Actually there are only four roads to success, but here concentration is combined with each,

¡§If a bhikkhu obtains concentration, obtains unification of mind, supported by zeal, then the concentration; the concentration is not the zeal. The zeal is one, the concentration is anothe two here, zeal and concentration. In the next sentence we have energy and concentration. I consciousness and concentration. Last we have inquiry and concentration. So we have eigh them eight causes. These eight steps one has to perform, by just trying to get into jh?na and

In paragraph 55 we have the sixteen roots. ¡§The mind¡¦s unperturbedness should be under modes, for this is said.¡¨ Here the sixteen modes are given. ¡§What are the sixteen roots of s (power)?¡¨ Undejected consciousness, this is one. Unelated consciousness, this is another. consciousness is another and so on. There are sixteen all together.

In about the middle of the paragraph ¡§Consciousness rid of barriers is not perturbed by the defilement.¡¨ Here ¡¥consciousness with barriers¡¦ means the distractions that come in betw sam?dhi. It is not moments of sam?dhi following one after the other. There are something lik moments of sam?dhi. When a person¡¦s sam?dhi is not yet good, he will have these distract between the sam?dhi moments. If it is like that, it is called ¡¥consciousness with barriers¡¦. If is one uninterrupted flow, it is called ¡¥consciousness rid of barriers¡¦. Here ¡¥consciousness consciousness accompanied by concentration, concentrated consciousness.

Paragraph 56 ¡§Of course, this meaning is already established by the words ¡¥When his con etc., too, but it is stated again for the purpose of showing that the first jh?na, etc., are the thr planes¡¨ - let us strike out ¡¥three¡¦. There is no word for ¡¥three¡¦ in the original and it does here. There are four planes, not three. So the first jh?na, etc., are the planes of success to s power, bases of, steps of and roots of success to supernormal power. In order to show that again.

¡§And the first-mentioned method is the one given in the Suttas, but this is how it is given in Pa?isambhid?magga.¡¨ There are two kinds of treatment. The one is given in the Suttas and in the Pa?isambhid?magga. The Pa?isambhid?magga is said to be later than the Suttas. It i Venerable S?riputta. If that is true, it may not be so much later than the Suttas. The Pa?isam something like a Commentary, but not exactly a Commentary. It resembles a Commentary o Suttas. Venerable Buddhaghosa has very great respect for that book, the Pa?isambhid?mag about meditation, he always quoted from the Pa?isambhid?magga. So we have many quota Magga from the Pa?isambhid?magga. Today we will find many quotes. ¡§So it is stated aga avoiding confusion in each of the two instances.¡¨

Paragraph 57 ¡§He resolves with knowledge.¡¨ These words also appear in paragraph 48. ¡§ accomplished these things consisting of planes, bases (roads), steps, and roots, of success power), then he attains jh?na as the basis for direct knowledge and emerges from it.¡¨ Here describing how one goes about it until one reaches the direct knowledge consciousness. Wh to do? He obtains jh?na as the basis for direct knowledge and emerges from it. So first he a jh?na, second jh?na, third jh?na, and the fourth jh?na. Then he makes that a basis for direct emerges from it.

¡§Then if he wants to become a hundred, he does the preliminary work thus ¡¥let me becom become a hundred¡¦.¡¨ That is the second stage. That is called ¡¥the preliminary work¡¦. Tha k?m?vacara consciousness, not by r|p?vacara consciousness. Then he enters into jh?na an r|p?vacara consciousness arises. Then he emerges from jh?na and does the preliminary wo hundred, let me become a hundred¡¦. He does this with cittas belonging to the sense-sphere again attains the jh?na.¡¨ Again he enters into jh?na, the fourth jh?na, as a basis for direct k he emerges from it and resolves. So he makes a determination then. ¡§He becomes a hund the resolving consciousness.¡¨ That ¡¥resolving consciousness¡¦ really means direct knowle stages. First there is the basic jh?na. Then there is preliminary work. And again there is bas last there is direct knowledge. So there are four stages.

¡§If he does not succeed in this way, he should do the preliminary work again, and attain, er resolve, a second time. For it is said in the Sa?yutta Commentary that it is allowable to attai twice.¡¨ He may try once or twice.

¡§Herein, the basic jh?na consciousness has the sign as its object.¡¨ ¡¥Sign¡¦ means the cou object of jh?nas is the counterpart sign. The object of basic jh?na consciousness is the cour

¡§But the preliminary work consciousnesses have the hundred as their object or the thousan Preliminary work is done by k?m?vacara consciousness. So the counterpart sign is not the c cittas. If he wants to become a hundred, then a hundred is the object. If he wants to become a thousand is the object.

¡§And these latter are objects as appearances, not as concepts.¡¨ ¡¥Appearances¡¦ means v as visible objects and not as concepts.

¡§The resolving consciousness has likewise the hundred as its object or the thousand as its ¡¥Resolving consciousness¡¦ really means direct knowledge consciousness. So it has a hun its object.

¡§That arises once only, next to change-of-lineage [consciousness], as in the case of absorp already described.¡¨ It is said that the direct knowledge consciousness arises only once and Jh?na consciousness at the first attainment arises only once and then disappears. Later on wants to spend some time with jh?na only, he enters into that jh?na. At that time jh?na citta succession for one hour, two hours, or the whole day. This direct knowledge consciousness is actually a kind of fourth jh?na consciousness. It is not the same as the fourth jh?na consc is reckoned as fourth jh?na consciousness. The difference is that direct knowledge consciou the counterpart sign as object. It takes the hundred appearances or the thousand appearanc may be as object. That is the difference.

Student: It takes the same object as the k?m?vacara consciousness?

Teacher: Same as the preliminary consciousness, right. Here the preliminary consciousness thousand as object. The direct knowledge consciousness also takes that object.

This page is important for Abhidhamma students when they read the ninth chapter. In the ni direct knowledge is treated very briefly. Students may take something from here.

Student: I¡¦m not understanding the difference between appearance and concept. Appearan concept.

Teacher: ¡¥Appearance¡¦ means - you know paramattha (ultimate reality). What it takes is so When we see something, we actually see color. We see with our eyes the color. Then we th shape. That is we think that we see them or we see with manodv?r?vajjana mentally the sha we really see is the visible data. In the same way what the preliminary consciousness takes data, not the concept of a man, or a monk, or something like that.

¡§Normally one, he adverts to [himself as] many or a hundred or a thousand; having adverte knowledge ¡¥Let me be many¡¦. He becomes many like the Venerable C|?a Panthaka. Here respect only to the preliminary work. Having adverted, he resolves with knowledge is said w knowledge of the direct knowledge (abhi???). Consequently he adverts to many. After that h last one of the preliminary work consciousnesses.¡¨ Instead of ¡¥with¡¦ it should be ¡¥after¡¦ t preliminary work consciousnesses. There are four or three moments of preliminary work con there is direct knowledge consciousness. So it is not with the last one, but after the last one attains the direct knowledge consciousness.

¡§After emerging from the attainment, he again adverts thus ¡¥Let me be many¡¦, after which means of the single [consciousness] belonging to the knowledge of direct knowledge¡¨ - so t consciousness arises only once - ¡§which has arisen next to the three, or four, preparatory c that have occurred (¡¥Preparatory consciousness¡¦ means preliminary consciousness.), and resolve ¡¥owing to its making the decision¡¦.¡¨ The last one is called ¡¥resolve¡¦. ¡§This is how should be understood here.¡¨ In a thought process for abhi??? there will be four or three k?n moments and then the fourth jh?na. That fourth jh?na is called ¡¥abhi???¡¦ or ¡¥direct knowl life-continuum follows. It is so powerful that just by arising once it can create miracles.

¡§like the Venerable C|?a Panthaka is said in order to point to a bodily witness of this multip ¡¥Bodily witness¡¦ really means direct witness. It is not hearsay. ¡§That must be illustrated by
I think that I have told this story many times. C|?a Panthaka was born very dull. He could no four line stanza for four months. It is said that he learned one line in one month. Then when next line, he lost the first one. After the fourth month he had nothing. So his brother said ¡§Y in this dispensation.¡¨, and expelled him from the monastery. Now his brother was an Arahan seemed to be angry with him. Actually he was not useless. He was going to be an Arahant a The elder brother was not as wise as the Buddha. His opinion was that his younger brother he could not learn even four lines of a stanza. If he could not learn, he would not be able to order to practice you have to know something. You have to learn something from the teache said ¡§You are useless in this dispensation.¡¨ But the Buddha would turn him into a very use

He became an Arahant. The next day when the others went to take a meal at An?thapi??ika behind. At that time he was an Arahant. The Buddha wanted to let other people know that h Arahant. At the end of the water-offering ceremony the Buddha covered his bowl. That mean the hand of the Buddha or the one who accepts. It is symbolic. It is like we do now at the wa ceremony. The ceremony is done before eating here in the story. In Sri Lanka they still do th people bring food to the monastery or invite monks to their houses. They offer food to the m of the monks does this ceremony. Then the monks eat. But in our country (Myanmar) the ce eating. There is a difference of customs.

Here the Buddha did it before eating. When the gruel was being given out at the end of the c covered his bowl. He did not accept the gruel. ¡§J?vaka asked ¡¥What is it, Venerable Sir?¡¦ bhikkhu at the monastery¡¦.¡¨ So there is one bhikkhu left. Somebody was sent to take him to at that time -

¡§Now, having multiplied himself
Up to a thousand, Panthaka Sat in the pleasant mango wood Until the time should be announced.¡¨

He was waiting. He had created himself into a thousand monks. When the people went there So they went back and reported to the Buddha ¡§The monastery is crowded with bhikkhus. I them the lord is (which of them is C|?a Panthaka).¡¨

¡§Then the Blessed One said ¡¥Go and catch hold of the hem of the robe of the first one you
¡§The Master calls you¡¨ and bring him here¡¦. He went and caught hold of the robe of the El That means he managed to take hold of the Elder and not one of the created images. Even the robe of one of the images, all the images would disappear and just Venerable C|?a Pant
The man happened to take hold of the robe of the Elder himself. ¡§At once all the creations

So Venerable C|?a Panthaka went there and took the meal. Then the Buddha left him to giv he became an Arahant, he was endowed with the supernormal knowledge and all of the jh? repeat all of what the Buddha had taught. It is not mentioned in this book, but in the Dhamm it is mentioned that the Buddha left him to give a Dhamma talk. He gave a good talk, basing whole of the Tipi?aka.

Student: Which he could now memorize?

Teacher: Right. This is the story of Venerable C|?a Panthaka. We will have many stories too

¡§The many who were created there were just like the possessor of the supernormal power created without particular specification.¡¨ If there is specification, they will appear as specifie is no specification, all the creations will be doing as the monk does. If he is sitting, they will a sitting. If he is walking, they will all be walking. However here Venerable C|?a Panthaka did Here the jh?na is entered. Then there is emergence from the jh?na and resolution. Next the Then he emerges and resolves again and again. ¡§May some be walking, may some be sitti reciting.¡¨ It is something like that. The meditator has to be very familiar with entering into an from jh?na.

Paragraph 68 ¡§The same method of explanation applied to the clause having been many, h there is this difference. After the bhikkhu has thus created a manifold state, then he again th only I will walk about, do a recital, ask a question¡¦ or out of fewness of wishes he thinks ¡¥T monastery with few bhikkhus. If someone comes, he will wonder ¡§Where have all these bhi alike come from? Surely it will be one of the Elder¡¦s feats?¡¨ and so he might get to know a Meanwhile wishing ¡¥Let me be one only, he should attain the basic jh?na and emerge. The preliminary work thus ¡¥Let me be one¡¦, he should again attain and emerge and then resolv one¡¦. He becomes one simultaneously with the resolving consciousness.¡¨ If he wants to be has to enter into jh?na and emerge and make resolution. Simultaneously with the direct kno he becomes one again.

¡§But instead of doing this, he can automatically become one again with the lapse of the pre
That is he makes a resolution ¡§May there be a thousand monks for one hour or two hours¡¨ one hour or two hours they will all disappear. If he wants the creations to disappear before t he has to enter into jh?na and get the direct knowledge consciousness.

¡§He appears and vanishes.¡¨ So he can appear before people or he can vanish from the vie

¡§Now this possessor of supernormal power who wants to make an appearance makes dark makes revealed what is hidden, or he makes what has not come into the visual field come in How? If he wants to make himself or another visible even though hidden or at a distance, he basic jh?na and adverts thus ¡¥Let this that is dark become light¡¦ or ¡¥Let this that is hidden
and so on.¡¨

¡§But by whom was this miracle formerly performed? By the Blessed One. For when the Ble invited by C|?a Subhadd? and was traversing the seven league journey between S?vatthi an palanquins created by Vissakamma (That is a god or celestial being.), he resolved in suchw S?keta saw the inhabitants of S?vatthi and citizens of S?vatthi saw the inhabitants of S?keta alighted in the center of the city, he split the earth in two and showed Av?ci (the hell), and he sky in two and sowed the Brahm? World.¡¨ It is Buddha¡¦s miracle letting people in this city s another city, like letting people in San Francisco see people in Los Angeles without going th

¡§This meaning should also be explained by means of the Descent of the Gods (devorohana One, it seems, had performed the Twin Miracle and had liberated 84,000 beings from bonds did the Past Enlightened Ones go to when they had finished the Twin Miracle¡¦?¡¨ This is a s with how the Buddha taught the Abhidhamma to the celestial beings. In his seventh year Bu Tavati?s? heaven after he had performed the Twin Miracle. I think later on we will know wha is. He went up to Tavati?s? heaven and took up residence there for the rains. That means h there for three months by human reckoning. He taught Abhidhamma there to the deities of 1

¡§At the time for wandering for alms he created an artificial Buddha to teach the Dhamma.¡¨ told you about this story. This is what Therav?da Buddhists believe. We believe that the Buc Tavati?s? heaven and taught Abhidhamma non-stop to the celestial beings there. When it w alms, he left a created image and went to Uttarakur|s (northern kur|s) it is said. He took food Anotatta. There Venerable S?riputta met him. Then the Buddha would tell him in brief what Abhidhamma he had taught. Buddha taught the deities for three months.

Many people who saw the Twin Miracles did not leave that place because the Buddha just d yearning to see the Buddha again. Buddha simply disappeared from their field of vision. The waiting there for the Buddha to come back. At the end of the Vasa Venerable Mah? Moggall Buddha and asked where he would descend into the world of human beings. The Buddha to appear at Sa~kassa. On the specified day the Buddha came back to the human world. That the three month rainy season retreat for monks. So it was on the full moon day of October th the world of human beings. There was a very grand descent into the human world. He came made of gold, silver and crystal. In Myanmar to commemorate that event we have the festiva believed that when Buddha came down to the human world it was dark. Instead of offering h offered him lights. In order to commemorate that we have the festival lights on the full moon In Sri Lanka they offer lights at Vesak, the full moon day of May.

There are other stories. One is of hiding himself or hiding others by miraculous powers. Para whom was this miracle formerly performed? By the Blessed One. For the Blessed One so ac clansman Yasa was sitting beside him, his father did not see him.¡¨ Yasa was a clansman w during the night. He went to where the Buddha was. It was just after the Buddha had given t met the Buddha there and the Buddha taught him. He became a Sot?panna and also he bec morning Yasa¡¦s father came to that place. He asked the Buddha ¡§Did you see my son?¡¨ E see him. Just sit down.¡¨ Then the Buddha taught him Dhamma and he became a Sot?pann Yasa to him. So he hid Yasa with supernormal power so that the father did not see him. Tha father saw the son, he would not be able to listen to the Dhamma. He would not be able to b ¡§Likewise, after traveling 2000 leagues to meet [king] Mah? Kappina and establishing him i Non-return and his 1000 ministers in the fruition of Stream Entry, he so acted that Queen Ar followed the king with a 1000 women attendants and was sitting nearby, did not see the king It is the same miracle. That story you may read in Buddhist Legends, part 2, page 167. The detail there.

¡§Furthermore, this was performed by the Elder Mahinda.¡¨ The Elder Mahinda was the son brought Buddhism to Sri Lanka. ¡§He so acted on the day of his arrival in Tambapa??i Islan the king did not see the others who had come with him.¡¨ He went with five persons, but whe king, he did not let him see the other persons.

¡§Furthermore, all miracles of making evident are called an appearance, and all miracles of are called a vanishing. Herein, in the miracle of making evident both the supernormal power of the supernormal power are displayed.¡¨ So power and person evident and power and pers can be illustrated with the Twin Miracle; for in that both are displayed thus: ¡¥Here the Perfe the Twin Miracle, which is not shared by disciples¡¦.¡¨ Only the Buddhas can do the Twin Mir produces a mass of fire from the upper part of his body and a shower of water from the lowe body¡¨ and so on. It is called ¡¥Twin Miracle¡¦ because both fire and water are produced from comes out of the upper part and water comes out of the lower part, or fire may come out of o come out of the other eye. It is called the ¡¥Twin Miracle¡¦. In footnote 15 it says ¡§The only Tipi?aka to mention the Twin Miracle is the Pa?isambhid?magga¡¦.¡¨ In the other books it is it is mentioned again and again in the Commentaries.

¡§In the case of the miracle of making unevident only the supernormal power is displayed no the supernormal power. That can be illustrated by means of the Mahaka Sutta (in the Sa?yu Brahmanimantanika Sutta (in the Majjhima Nik?ya). The passage from Sa?yutta Nik?ya is g don¡¦t have to give you a reference number. The Brahmanimantanika is Sutta 49 of The Mid Here Venerable Mahaka did a miracle. A fire came out from the gaps in the fastenings and f burned hay without burning the upper robe. He put the upper robe on the hay. Then he reso hay burn and not the upper robe.

Another one is when the Buddha met the Brahm?. The Brahm?¡¦s name was Baka. He thou himself vanish from the sight of all others. In that Sutta it is said that he was not able to do th Buddha said ¡§I will do it.¡¨ So Buddha disappeared from all the Brahm?s. In order that all th that he was there he said this verse:

¡§I saw the fear in [all kinds of] becoming.
Including becoming that seeks non-becoming;
And no becoming do I recommend;
I cling to no delight therein at all.¡¨

When he uttered this stanza, everybody knew that he was there, but nobody could see him.

¡§He goes unhindered through walls, through enclosures, through mountains, as though in o through walls is beyond walls¡¨ and so on.

Here an interesting piece of information is in paragraph 89 with regard to the Elder Tipi?aka had some different opinions about how to perform the direct knowledge. He said: ¡§Friends, attaining the space kasi?a [jh?na]? Does one who wants to create elephants, horses, etc., a kasi?a jh?na or a horse kasi?a jh?na, and so on? Surely the only standard is mastery in the and after the preliminary work has been done on any kasi?a, it then becomes whatever he w other bhikkhus said: ¡§Venerable Sir, only the space kasi?a has been given in the Text, so it be mentioned.¡¨ There was a little difference of opinion between that Elder and the other mo the Elder Tipi?aka based his opinion on his experience. The others have much respect for th said that the space kasi?a is in the Texts so it should be mentioned. Then the Text is given.

Paragraph 91 ¡§What if a mountain or a tree is raised in this bhikkhu¡¦s way while he is trave resolving; should he attain and resolve again? - There is no harm in that. For attaining and r is like taking the Dependence in the Preceptor¡¦s presence.¡¨ When you become a monk, yo dependent upon the Preceptor. He will teach you everything. He is like a father to you. When with our preceptor, we say I regard you as my Preceptor. But sometimes we cannot live with five years. We have to move to another place. Let us say I live with my Preceptor for one ye to go to another place for study or practice. When I go to another place, I have to approach a a teacher of Texts or a teacher of meditation. Then I have to regard him as my teacher. That ¡¥Dependence¡¦. One may say: ¡§Reverend Sir, may you be my teacher. May you be one or called ¡¥taking Dependence¡¦. When you live with your Preceptor, you don¡¦t have to take De there is the Preceptor. In the same way here when you have done the attaining and resolvin sense in doing that again. So this only monks can understand. Even though you pick up a V it, there will still be something you pick up a Vinaya book and read it, there will still be somet don¡¦t understand. Taking dependence in the Preceptor¡¦s presence really means when livin you don¡¦t have to take Dependence. You don¡¦t have to formally regard another person as y

¡§And because this bhikkhu has resolved ¡¥Let there be space¡¦ there will be only space the the power of his first resolve it is impossible that another mountain or tree can have sprung u made by temperature.¡¨ ¡¥Temperature¡¦ means utu, climatic conditions. ¡§However, if it has another possessor of supernormal power and created first, it prevails¡¨ and so on.

¡§He dives in and out of the ground. Here it is rising up out of that is called ¡¥diving out¡¦ and sinking down into that is called ¡¥diving in¡¦.¡¨ He is normally an obtainer of the water kasi?a
This is what a monk must do to perform this miracle.

Paragraph 95 on unbroken water - this is walking on water. ¡§Here water that one sinks into called ¡¥broken¡¦, the opposite is called ¡¥unbroken¡¦. But one who wants to go in this way s earth kasi?a [jh?na] and emerge.¡¨ You have to enter into the appropriate jh?na. ¡¥The appr means that you have to practice the appropriate kasi?a in order to get jh?na. For example y water seem hard, unbroken, or unyielding. So you have to enter the earth kasi?a jh?na. Oth be able to do that.

Seated cross-legged he travels in the air. ¡§Like a winged bird: like a bird furnished with win
P??i Texts it always says winged bird. The Commentators explain that there may be some b wings. So it is said here winged bird. That means a bird which has wings and which can fly.
do this should attain the earth kasi?a and emerge¡¨ and so on. ¡§Here is the text: ¡¥Seated c travels in space like a winged bird: he is normally an obtainer of the earth kasi?a attainment

Paragraph 100 ¡§And a bhikkhu who wants to travel in space should be an obtainer of the d the way there may be mountains, trees, etc., that are temperature-originated (that are create conditions), or jealous n?gas, supa??as, etc., may create them.¡¨ Supa??a is spelled with or Supa??as are garudas. Garudas are mythical birds. It is the vehicle of Vishnu, one of the go They may create them.. ¡§He will need to be able to see these. But what should be done on should attain the basic jh?na and emerge, and then he should do the preliminary work thus space¡¦; and resolve.¡¨

¡§But the Elder [Tipi?aka C|?a Abhaya] said ¡¥Friends, what is the use of attaining the attain mind concentrated? Hence any area that he has resolved thus ¡§Let it be space¡¨ is space.¡ thus, nevertheless the matter should be treated as described under the miracle of going unh walls¡¨ and so on. So this Elder did not find any favor with Venerable Buddhaghosa and othe

¡§With his hand he touches and strokes the moon and sun so mighty and powerful.¡¨ So he hand and stroke the sun and moon. ¡§This supernormal power is successful simply through the basis for direct knowledge; there is no special kasi?a attainment here.¡¨ Any jh?na will d

In paragraph 104 we have the words ¡¥clung to¡¦. In the Sub-Commentary it is explained tha mean just those born of kamma and those belonging to the living body, those belonging to t beings.

¡§Here the Elder Tipi?aka C|?a N?ga said ¡¥But, friends, why does what is clung to not beco too? When a bhikkhu comes out through a keyhole, does not what is clung to become small body big, does it not become big, as in he case of the Elder Mah? Moggall?na?¡¨

That opinion is also rejected by Venerable Buddhaghosa. Paragraph 117 ¡§So it was with re enlarged form created during this taming of Nandopananda that is was said ¡¥When he mak it not then become big, as in the case of the Elder Mah? Moggall?na? Although this was sai observed ¡¥He enlarges only what is not clung to supported by what is clung to¡¦. And only t here.¡¨ The opinion of the Elder C|?a N?ga was also not accepted by the monks.

When the monk creates a body that is bigger than his normal body, then there is enlargeme here is: does he enlarge what is clung to or what is not clung to. Does he enlarge the r|pa bo or does he enlarge r|pa born of others? The answer is that he does not enlarge or he canno born of kamma, but the mind-born material properties he can enlarge by the power of his mi the material properties born of temperature can be enlarged.

Here the reference is given to Venerable Mah? Moggall?na and a long story follows where V Moggall?na tamed the royal n?ga named Nandopananda. Here the Elder Mah? Moggall?na n?ga, maybe a dragon or a snake. Have you read the story? The n?ga did not like a monk fl above him. He was angry. So he coiled around Mount Meru seven times and covered it with and his disciples went there, some of the disciples said ¡§Formerly when we reached this pla Mount Meru. What has happened?¡¨ Buddha said ¡§There is a n?ga. He does not like you.¡¨ ¡§Let me tame him. Let me tame him.¡¨ But the Buddha did not allow the other monks to tam Venerable Moggall?na said ¡§Let me tame him.¡¨ The Buddha said ¡§Go.¡¨ Buddha knew tha Moggall?na alone was able to tame that serpent because he was very powerful. So in order Moggall?na turned himself into a n?ga, twice the size of that n?ga. Then he coiled himself a fourteen times. Then he put pressure upon him so that he was crushed between the mounta monk-serpent.

So when Venerable Mah? Moggall?na did that, did he enlarge the material property born of do? The answer is what? ¡§He enlarges only what is not clung to supported by what is clung is correct here.¡¨ So he enlarges only those born of mind or caused by mind and those caus climatic conditions. They are supported by what is clung to. What is clung to is what is born is the translation of the explanation given in the Sub-Commentary as a footnote.

At the end of footnote 20 ¡§It should be taken that it is the consciousness-born matter that is the influence of the supernormal power, and the temperature-born is enlarged pari passu.¡¨ passu¡¦? It is a foreign word.

Student: It might mean ¡¥in passing¡¦, not as a consequence but along with. The P??i word i means following that. So ¡¥along with¡¦ is close to that. One can enlarge only matter born of When consciousness-born matter is enlarged, the temperature-born matter is also enlarged, enlarge kamma-born r|pa. Kamma-born matter is caused by kamma in the past, so nothing kamma-born material properties. With regard to consciousness-born material properties we Even if we don¡¦t have jh?na, our appearance is different when we are happy from when we caused by citta (consciousness). So we can enlarge consciousness-born material properties

OK. I think that is all we will do today. Next week we will begin with paragraph 119 and go o chapter. We will have a description of how the world ends and how the world begins, the Bu

S?dhu! S?dhu! S?dhu!

Chapter 13
(Tape 27 / Ps: 1-27)

So chapter 13 is the chapter on direct knowledge. ¡¥The divine ear element¡¦ simply means now the turn for the description of the divine ear.¡¨ Then the translator gave the Text. It is go we do not see the Text, we would not be able to understand the explanations given.

¡§[The Text is as follows: ¡¥He directs, he inclines his mind to the divine ear element. With th element, which is purified and surpasses the human, he hears both kinds of sounds, the divi those that are far as well as near¡¦.¡¨

¡§¡¥Herein, with the divine ear element: it is divine here because of its similarity to the divine deities have as the divine ear element the sensitivity that is produced by kamma consisting i and is unimpeded by bile, phlegm, blood, etc., and capable of receiving an object even thou it is liberated from imperfections.¡¨ Deities have ears too. The sensitivity in their ears is so fre imperfections, so free from impediments that they can hear sounds far away. Also they do n like blood, bile, phlegm and so on. So their ears are much more sensitive than human ears.

¡§And this ear element consisting in knowledge, which is produced by the power of this bhik development, is similar to that, so it is ¡¥divine¡¦ because it is similar to the divine.¡¨ Here the Commentary is explaining the word ¡¥divine¡¦. The P??i word is dibba. Here the P??i word is ¡¥Dibbasota¡¦ literally means divine ear. But here what is really meant is not divine ear. It is t which is similar to the divine ear. ¡§So it is ¡¥divine¡¦ because it is similar to the divine.¡¨

Then there is another explanation. ¡§Furthermore, it is ¡¥divine¡¦ because it is obtained by m abiding and because it has divine abiding as its support.¡¨ Here ¡¥divine abiding¡¦ means jh?

Student; Is it the brahm? vih?ras?

Teacher: No. No. Although ¡¥brahm? vih?ra¡¦ is translated as divine abiding even in this boo abiding¡¦ does not mean brahm? vih?ras. It just means the four jh?nas. ¡§And because it has its support.¡¨ If you do not have the four jh?nas, then you cannot get this direct knowledge.

In our P??i books there are three kinds of abiding. The first one is dibba vih?ra. Then there i vih?ra. And the last one is Ariya vih?ra. There are three kinds of abiding - dibba vih?ra, brah Ariya vih?ra. ¡¥Dibba vih?ra¡¦ means jh?nas. ¡¥Brahm? vih?ra¡¦ means loving-kindness, com ¡¥Ariya vih?ra¡¦ means Fruit attainment. After becoming an Ariya a person enters into that at and again to enjoy it. Here ¡¥divine abiding¡¦ means jh?nas and not the four divine abodes.

¡§And it is an ¡¥ear element¡¦ in the sense of hearing and in the sense of being soulless.¡¨ T ¡¥element¡¦ or dh?tu is defined as something that is without a soul, that is soulless. The Co explaining the word ¡¥sota dh?tu¡¦. It is called ¡¥sota¡¦ because it hears in the sense of heari called ¡¥dh?tu¡¦ because it is without a soul. Sometimes dh?tu is explained as something wh soul, which is just a phenomenon, that is not an entity. ¡§Also it is an ¡¥ear element¡¦ becaus the ear element in its performance of an ear element¡¦s function. With that ear element¡¨ -

Student: Actually it is the mind?

Teacher: It is actually knowledge (pa???), pa??? associated with mindfulness.

Student: So direct knowledge -

Teacher: All direct knowledge is pa???. ¡§Which is purified: which is quite pure through havi imperfection. And surpasses the human: which in the hearing of sounds surpasses, stands b element by surpassing the human environment.¡¨ That means it is beyond the normal range

¡§He hears both kinds of sounds: he hears the two kinds of sounds. What two? The divine a sounds of the deities and of human beings, is what is meant.¡¨ Here ¡¥sounds¡¦ means the s That is why it is said ¡§This should be understood as partially inclusive¡¨, not other sound bu speech sounds. ¡§Those that are far as well as near: what is meant is that he hears sounds even in another world sphere, and those that are near, even the sounds of the creature livin This should be understood as completely inclusive.¡¨ This includes everything - sounds of ar insects, sounds of germs, and of other things.

¡§But how is this [divine ear element] aroused?¡¨ What follows is how to practice. ¡§The bhik jh?na as basis for direct knowledge and emerge. Then with consciousness belonging to the concentration he should advert first to the gross sounds in the distance normally within rang little by little) the sound in the forest of lions, etc., or in the monastery the sound of a gong, t of a drum, the sound of a conch, the sound of recitation by novices and young bhikkhus reci vigor.¡¨ If you go to a Burmese monastery, you can still hear young monks and novices recit hear from a distance everyone learning aloud. They are memorizing actually. (One should li of their ordinary talk such as ¡¥What, Venerable Sir?¡¦, ¡¥What, friend?¡¦, etc., the sound of b sound of wind, the sound of footsteps, the fizzing sound of boiling water, the sound of palm the sun, the sound of ants, and so on. Beginning in this way with quite gross sounds, he sho advert to more and more subtle sounds. He should give attention to the sound sign of the so means the sound.) in the eastern direction, in the western direction, in the northern direction southern direction, on the upper direction, in the lower direction, in the eastern intermediate the western intermediate direction, in the northern intermediate direction , and in the souther direction. He should give attention to the sound sign of gross and of subtle sounds.¡¨ ¡¥Sour means the sound or here the gross or subtle aspects of sound.

¡§These sounds are evident even to his normal consciousness.¡¨ That means not yet the dir consciousness but this is evident to his normal consciousness. If you pay attention to these hear them normally. ¡§But they are especially evident to his preliminary work concentration That is when he is doing this. After emerging from the jh?na, he adverts to these sounds. ¡§ attention to the sound sign in this way, [thinking] (Let us strike out ¡¥thinking¡¦.) Now the divi element will arise.¡¨ He makes this mistake always. He misunderstood the P??i idiom. What is ¡§When the divine ear element is about to arise, then mind-door adverting arises¡¨ and so Now the divine ear element will arise. Instead of that we should say ¡§When the divine ear e arise, then mind-door adverting arises making one of these sounds its object.¡¨ He is descri process of direct knowledge. When direct knowledge is about to arise, first there is mind-doo ¡§When that (mind-door adverting) has ceased, then either four or five impulsions impel.¡¨ T sense-sphere consciousness.

Student: Why the mind-door and not the five senses?

Teacher: These are out of the range of the five senses. It is going to be direct knowledge tho which comes through mind-door, not through five sense doors. ¡§Four or five impulsions imp or four of which are of the sense-sphere and are called preliminary work, access, conformity change-of-lineage, while the fourth or the fifth is the fine material sphere absorption conscio direct knowledge consciousness.) belonging to the fourth jh?na.¡¨ So direct knowledge cons actually fourth jh?na consciousness, but not the ordinary fourth jh?na consciousness. Ordina consciousness takes the object of meditation like a kasi?a and so on. Here it takes sound as it is the divine ear element.

¡§Herein, it is the knowledge arisen together with the absorption consciousness that is called element.¡¨ The ¡¥divine ear element¡¦ really means knowledge or pa???.

¡§After that [absorption has been reached, the divine ear element] becomes merged in that Sometimes it is unfortunate that the same word has two very different meanings. The word f same word can mean stream or flow. Here it should be ¡§The divine ear element becomes r knowledge or that flow of knowledge.¡¨ The same word is used here in two different senses. word used is ¡§falls into the stream of knowledge, into the flow of knowledge.¡¨

¡§When consolidating it, he should extend it by delimiting a single finger-breadth thus ¡¥I wil within this area¡¦ (a very small area), then two finger-breadths, four finger-breadths, eight fin a span, a ratana (= 24 finger-breadths).¡¨ We understand ratana as from the elbow to the tip
It is about 18 inches. A ¡¥span¡¦ means the distance between the thumb and the little finger. sounds within the area - ¡§a span, a ratana, the interior of the room, the verandah, the buildi surrounding walk, the park belonging to the community, the alms-resort village, the district, a the [limit of the] world sphere or even more. This is how he should extend it by delimited sta

¡§One who has reached direct knowledge in this way hears also by means of direct knowled the basic jh?na any sound that has come within the space touched by the basic jh?na¡¦s obj sounds he doesn¡¦t have to get into basic jh?na again and do the preliminary work. He does that.

¡§And in hearing in this way, even if there is an uproar with sounds of conches, drums, cymb up to the Brahm? World he can, if he wants to, still define each one thus.¡¨ Although all the s together he can define each one: ¡§This is the sound of the conches, this is the sound of the
on. This is the divine ear. By the power of the divine ear element a person can hear sounds reach of the human ear.

Now penetration of mind - ¡§As to the explanation of knowledge of penetration of minds, [the follows: ¡¥He directs, he inclines his mind to the knowledge of penetration of minds (reading penetrates with his mind the minds of other beings, of other persons, and understands them understands [the manner of] consciousness¡¨ - actually it is the types of consciousness - ¡§a as affected by greed, and understands [types of] consciousness unaffected by greed as una and so on. ¡¥Affected¡¦ really means associated with. These are the 16 kinds of consciousne these also in the Mah? Satipa??h?na Sutta in the contemplation of mind or consciousness.

Towards the end of paragraph 8 is the word explanation of the P??i word ¡¥cetopariya¡¦. Firs ¡¥pariya¡¦ is explained. ¡§It goes all round, thus it is pariya or penetration. That means the de
The meaning is that it delimits. ¡§The penetration of the heart is ¡¥penetration of minds¡¦.¡¨ I just cetaso pariya?. We can say the penetration of mind is the penetration of minds, which is Actually it cannot be translated. ¡§It is penetration of hearts and that is knowledge, thus it is penetration of minds (cetopariya???a).¡¨ ¡¥Ceto¡¦ means mind. ¡¥Pariya¡¦ means delimiting o ¡¥???a¡¦ means knowledge. ¡§[He directs his consciousness] to that, is what is meant.¡¨

¡§Of other beings: of the rest of beings, himself excluded. (¡¥Of other beings¡¦ means not of other persons: this has the same meaning as the last, the wording being varied to suit those teaching [in another way], and for the sake of elegance of exposition.¡¨ Sometimes words ar they are synonyms, again and again so that listeners could understand.

¡§With his mind the minds: with his consciousness of other beings. Having penetrated: havin round. He understands: he understands them to be of various sorts beginning with that affec That means with greed, without greed and so on.

¡§But how is this knowledge to be aroused? That is successfully done through the divine eye to get the knowledge of the divine eye.), which constitutes its preliminary work.¡¨ So the know eye or the divine eye element is a preliminary to this penetration of minds.

¡§Therefore the bhikkhu should extend light, and he should seek out another¡¦s [type of] con keeping under observation with the divine eye the color of the blood present with the matter heart as its support.¡¨ Footnote 5 ¡§The ¡¥matter of the heart¡¦ is not the heart-basis, but rath heart as the piece of flesh described as resembling a lotus bud in shape outside and like a k inside.¡¨ Here ¡¥heart¡¦ does not mean the heart-base which is one of the material properties the whole heart.

¡§For when consciousness accompanied by joy is present, blood is red like a banyan fig frui consciousness accompanied by grief (domanassa - unpleasant feeling) is present, it is black rose-apple fruit.¡¨ Please put ¡¥ripe¡¦ before rose-apple. Do you have rose-apple fruits in this you seen them? Their color is a mixture of black and purple.

Student: So it is more like a plum?

Teacher: Yes.

Student: Yes, I have a tree at home.

Teacher: It¡¦s a little sour. So here we should have a ripe rose-apple fruit. ¡§When a conscio serenity is present, it is clear like sesamum oil. So he should seek out another¡¦s consciousn under observation the color of the blood in the physical heart.¡¨ He looks into the heart and l color of the blood in the heart. ¡§This matter is originated by the joy faculty.¡¨ So when he se red, then he knows that mind is accompanied by joy and so on. ¡§This is originated by the g is originated by the equanimity faculty and so consolidates his knowledge of penetration of h

¡§It is when it has been consolidated in this way that he can gradually get to understand not (all types) of sense-sphere consciousness but (all of) those of fine material and immaterial c (r|p?vacara and ar|p?vacara) consciousness as well by tracing one consciousness from and seeing the physical heart¡¦s matter. For this is said in the Commentary: ¡¥When he wants to consciousness in the immaterial moods, whose matter can he observe?¡¨ Because there is n ¡§Whose material alteration [originated] by the faculties can he look at? No one¡¦s. The prov possessor of supernormal power is [simply] this, namely, wherever the consciousness he ac knows it according to these 16 classes.¡¨ ¡¦16 classes¡¦ means those given in paragraph 8 - by greed, those not accompanied by greed and so on. ¡§But this explanation [by means of th for one who has not [yet] done any interpreting.¡¨ ¡¥Interpreting¡¦ really means contemplating ¡¥Interpreting¡¦ may be misleading. Here it means abhinivesa. It is reflecting or contemplatin

In footnote 6 ¡§Of one who has not done any interpreting (abhinivesa) reckoned as study for knowledge.¡¨ I think it is not ¡¥study¡¦ but striving for direct knowledge. It is not just studying practicing for direct knowledge. He left out some words that are important. Please add after knowledge¡¦ ¡§A beginner is what is meant.¡¨ That should be added. ¡§A rather special use o abhinivesa, perhaps more freely renderable here as ¡¥practice¡¦.¡¨ Right. I think that is neare original meaning.

¡§As regards [the manner of consciousness affected by greed (That means associated with eight [manners of] (eight types of) consciousness accompanied by greed should be understo consciousness affected by greed. The remaining profitable and indeterminate [manners of] o four planes are unaffected by greed.¡¨ You will need the citta chart. There are 12 types of ak consciousness and 8 are accompanied by greed, and 2 are accompanied by anger, and the by ignorance only. So 8 are accompanied by greed. The remaining profitable and indetermin consciousness (There are other types of consciousness) are unaffected by greed.

¡§The 4, namely, the 2 consciousnesses accompanied by grief and the 2 consciousnesses a uncertainty (That means doubt.) and agitation are not included in this dyad, though some eld too.¡¨ It is a little difficult to understand here. Among the 12, 8 are associated with lobha or r? the word ¡¥r?ga¡¦ is used. So 8 are associated with r?ga (greed), but 4 are not associated w these 4 are not included in this dyad. This is explained here. The Sub-Commentary also exp so convincing. In the Sub-Commentary it is said that these 4 types of consciousnesses are n greed, but since greed can be a condition for these 4 types of consciousness to arise, there suspicion for those who do not know Abhidhamma that they may be accompanied by greed. included in those accompanied by greed or those not accompanied by greed. They are left o together. ¡§The four, namely, the 2 consciousnesses accompanied by grief and the 2 consci respectively by uncertainty and agitation are not included in this dyad, though some elders in too.¡¨ I think we should side with some elders. It¡¦s easier. Some elders said they should be those unaffected by greed because they are not accompanied by greed.

¡§It is the 2 consciousnesses accompanied by grief that are called consciousness affected b means the two dosa m|la cittas. ¡§And all profitable and indeterminate consciousness in the unaffected by hate. The remaining 10 kinds of unprofitable consciousnesses are not include though some elders include them too. Affected by delusion.. unaffected by delusion: here or that accompanied by uncertainty and that accompanied by agitation, are affected by delusio [without being accompanied by the other 2 unprofitable roots].¡¨ The last 2 types of consciou 12 are affected by delusion. What are unaffected by delusion? ¡§the 2, namely, that accomp and that accompanied by agitation, are affected by delusion¡¨ - that means they are affected
- ¡§without being accompanied by the other two unprofitable roots.¡¨

¡§But [all] the 12 kinds of unprofitable consciousnesses can also be understood as consciou delusion since delusion is present in all kinds of unprofitable consciousnesses.¡¨ The 12 type consciousness, all 12 of them are accompanied by delusion. We can say in two ways here. delusion¡¦ can mean only 2, the last 2, because they are affected by delusion only. But if we ¡¥affected by delusion only¡¦, then we can take all 12. ¡§[All] the 12 kinds of unprofitable con also be understood as consciousness affected by delusion since delusion is present in all ki unprofitable consciousnesses. The rest are unaffected by delusion.¡¨ ¡§Cramped is that attended by stiffness and torpor. (That means you are sleepy.) Distracted by agitation. Exalted is that of the fine material and immaterial spheres (r|p?vacara and ar|p?

Unexalted is the rest. Surpassed is all that in the three [mundane] planes (k?m?vacara, r|p? ar|p?vacara). Unsurpassed is the supramundane (lokuttara). Concentrated is that attained to attained to absorption (the 2 kinds of concentration). Unconcentrated is that not attained to e Liberated is that attained to any [of the 5 kinds of] deliverance, that is to say, deliverance by of opposites [through insight], by suppression [through concentration], by cutting off [by mea by tranquilization [by means of Fruition], and by renunciation [as Nibb?na].¡¨ So there are 5 k deliverance. The first one is momentary. The second one is temporary. The third one is total fourth one is stilling. Let us say that first you put out a fire. Then you pour some more water it is really extinguished. That is done by tranquilization. By ¡¥renunciation¡¦ means when a p enlightenment, Nibb?na is the object there. Taking Nibb?na as object, enlightenment consci mental defilements. There it is by renunciation because at the enlightenment moment everyt given up. ¡§Unliberated is that which has not attained to any of the 5 kinds of liberation.¡¨

¡§So the bhikkhu who has acquired knowledge of penetration of hearts understands all thes consciousness, namely] consciousness affected by greed as affected by greed¡¨ and so on.
possess supernormal knowledge read the minds of other people.

Now we have the recollection of past lives. ¡§As to the explanation of knowledge of recollect

[the Text is as follows: ¡¥He directs, he inclines, his mind to the knowledge of recollection of
¡¨ and so on.

About the middle of paragraph 13 ¡§Herein, to the knowledge of recollection of past life [mea concerning recollection of past life. Past life is aggregates lived in the past in former births. T explanation. ¡§ ¡¥Lived¡¦ [in that case means] lived out, undergone¡¨ - the Commentary expla word ¡¥undergone¡¦ is arisen again and again - ¡§arisen and ceased in one¡¦s own [subjecti This is one explanation of the words ¡¥past life¡¦. ¡¥Past life¡¦ means aggregates lived in the means aggregates which have arisen in one¡¦s own continuity.

Now there is a second explanation. ¡§Or alternatively, [past life] is mental objects¡¨ - no. Pas phenomena, not just mental objects. The P??i word used is dhamma. ¡¥Dhamma¡¦ does no is all phenomena. In the first explanation only the aggregates are taken. ¡¥Past lives¡¦ mean aggregates. In this explanation ¡¥past lives¡¦ means all past things - aggregates, Nibbana an thing. It is wider in scope than the first one. ¡§Or alternatively, [past life] is all phenomena liv ¡¥lived¡¦ means what? ¡§In that case it means lived by living in one¡¦s [objective] resort.¡¨ Do understand that?

Student: I don¡¦t understand ¡¥resort¡¦.

Teacher: Right. ¡¥Living in one¡¦s resort¡¦ just means remembered, taken as an object.

Student: It¡¦s memory?

Teacher: Yes. ¡§Which has been cognized and delimited by one¡¦s own consciousness, or c consciousness, too¡¨ - here also we have to make some changes. After ¡¥too¡¦ there should word ¡¥in¡¦ should start with a small ¡¥I¡¦, ¡§in the case of recollection of those [past Enlighte who have broken the cycle, and so on.¡¨ It is a full stop there. Then there is a capital ¡¥T¡¦ fo sentence. ¡§These last are only accessible to Enlightened Ones.¡¨

The second explanation is that ¡¥lived¡¦ here is just taken as object, so it is like remembered remembered by oneself as well as by others. Let us say somebody can remember his past l your past life. That means the past life which you can take as an object. In that case you can people too, but you cannot remember what other people experienced. That is one kind.

The other is ¡¥cognized by another¡¦s consciousness, too¡¦. That is ¡§in the case of recollect [past Enlightened Ones]¡¨ - that means Arahants and Buddhas - ¡§who have broken the cyc last are accessible only to Enlightened Ones.¡¨ That means only the Buddhas have such kn cannot remember what is experienced by other persons. They can remember their own exp Suppose I can remember my past life. Then I can tell you that I had such a father and such cannot remember what my father experienced or thought in that life. Buddhas can remembe Buddha talked about the J?takas, he talked about his experiences as well as other people¡¦s

¡§Recollection of past life: the mindfulness (memory) by means of which he recollects the pa recollection of past life. Knowledge is the knowledge associated with that mindfulness¡¨ and ¡§Manifold: of many kinds; or that has occurred in many ways. Given in detail is the meanin the continuity lived here and there, taking the immediately previous existence as the beginni backwards].¡¨ So one begins with the immediately preceding life and goes backward. ¡§ He recalls it, following it out by the succession of aggregates, or by death and rebirth-linking.¡¨

¡§There are 6 kinds of people who recollect this past life. They are: other sectarians (non-Bu ordinary disciples, Great Disciples, Chief Disciples, Pacceka Buddhas, and Buddhas.¡¨

Student: So anybody.

Teacher: Yes, anybody. That is why jh?nas and supernormal knowledge are not found in Bu to our books. So those who are not Buddhist can have this kind of knowledge, but there is a ¡§Herein, other sectarians recollect only as far back as 40 eons but not beyond that.¡¨ They ¡§Why? Because their understanding is weak for lack of delimitation of mind and matter.¡¨ B practice vipassan?. ¡§Ordinary disciples recollect as far back as 100 eons and as far back a because their understanding is strong. The 80 Great Disciples recollect as far back as 100,0 Chief Disciples recollect as far back as an incalculable age and 100,000 eons. The Pacceka as far back as two incalculable ages and 100,000 eons. For such is the extent to which they minds back respectively].¡¨ The P??i word used here is abhinih?ra. That means accumulatin example if you want to become one of the Great Disciples, you have to accumulate p?ramis 100,000 eons. Since you have accumulated for 100,000 eons when you become a Great Di all these lives, all these eons, not beyond that. It is something like if you have lived here for year, you cannot remember beyond that. It is something like that. So it is not ¡¥they can con back respectively]¡¦. It should be ¡§For such is the extent to which they have accumulated th perfections.¡¨

¡§Again other sectarians only recollect the succession of aggregates; they are unable to rec [only] to death and rebirth-linking, letting go of the succession of aggregates.¡¨ When you re life, then you can recollect from this moment backwards to rebirth in this life, and then you c rebirth to death in the previous life and so on. Ordinary persons can go back gradually, not ju relinking and then to the death in the previous life. But Buddhas can do all that.

Here it is said that other sectarians are like blind people unable to descend upon any place t ¡§They go as the blind do without letting go of their sticks (so going little by little).¡¨

¡§Buddhas, however, have nothing to do either with succession of aggregates or with tracing rebirth-linking; for whatever instance they choose in many millions of eons, or more or less, to them. So they go, and so they descend with the lion¡¦s descent wherever they want.¡¨ Tha jump anywhere it wants. They don¡¦t have to go one by one. It is called ¡¥lion¡¦s descent¡¦, ¡§ want, even skipping over many millions of eons as though they were an elision in a text.¡¨ W text, you can use peyy?la. Sometimes when we recite the texts, we use peyy?la because we it in full. It is like the Heart Sutra.

Student: And so forth.

Teacher: We say the word in the beginning and then the word at the end. ¡§And just as an a master of archery expert in hair-splitting Sarabha~ga (He was a Bodhisatta, the Buddha in o lives.) always hits the target without getting . held up among trees, creepers, etc., on its way neither gets held up nor misses so too, since Buddhas go in this way their knowledge does n intermediate births or miss; without getting held up or missing, it seizes any instance require Paragraph 22 is the explanation of how to go about getting the recollection of a past life. On jh?na. Then one emerges from basic jh?na and then one adverts to his most recent act of si purpose. Then you go back little by little, next to the preparation of the seat, to the entry into lodging, to the putting away of the bowl and outer robe and so on. You recollect your actions the time you sit down backward - to the time of eating, to the time of returning from the villag wandering for alms in the village, to the time of entering the village and so on.

¡§While this much, however, is evident even to his normal consciousness it is especially evi preliminary work consciousness.¡¨ If you recall this with normal consciousness, you can see the preliminary work consciousness you see more vividly. ¡§but if anything there is not evide again attain the basic jh?na, emerge and advert.¡¨ So you should do it again. ¡§By so doing evident as when a lamp is lit. And so in reverse order too, he should advert to the things dor day back, and on the third, fourth and fifth day, and in the ten days, and in the fortnight, and as a year.¡¨ Then for 10 years, 20 years and so on. ¡§For a wise bhikkhu is able at the first a remove the rebirth-linking¡¨ - ¡¥remove¡¦ means open or something like that - ¡§and make th mentality-materiality at the death moment his object.¡¨ So it goes back to the death in the pre

Then a simile is given where it says if you don¡¦t see it, don¡¦t giver up. Try it again and agai

S?dhu! S?dhu! S?dhu!

(Tape 28 / Ps: 28 ¡V 129)

We are on paragraph 28 the contraction and expansion of the world cycle. That means the c rebirth of the world cycle. This is Therav?da Buddhist cosmology.

¡§Herein, one birth is the continuity of aggregates included in a single becoming starting wit rebirth-linking and ending with death.¡¨ ¡¥One birth¡¦ means one life beginning with relinking death. ¡§So too with two births, and the rest.¡¨ When a monk gets this direct knowledge, he birth, two births, three births and so on.

¡§But in the case of many eons of world contraction, etc., it should be understood that the ec contraction is an eon of diminution (Actually it is the destruction of the world.) and the eon of expansion is an eon of increase (the beginning or reforming of the world). Herein, what supe contraction is included.¡¨ What does the word ¡¥supersede¡¦ mean? To replace? What is me follows the contraction. There are four periods - the world being destroyed, the world remain destroyed state, the reforming or becoming a new world, and then remaining as a new world periods.

¡§Herein, what follows the contraction is included in the contraction since it is rooted in it (Th because it comes after it.); and so too what follows the expansion is included in the expansi four of the world eons or four incalculables of the eons.

¡§What four? The contraction, what follows the contraction, the expansion, what follows the are four. They are called ¡¥incalculables¡¦ because there is no saying how many millions and they are.

¡§Herein, there are three kinds of contraction (That means destruction.) destruction due to w due to fire, destruction due to air.¡¨ There are three causes of destruction of the world.

¡§There are three limits to the destruction: the ?bhassar? (Streaming-Radiance) Brahm? Wo Subhaki?ha (Refulgent-Glory), and that of the Vehapphala (Great Fruit). When the eon cont all below ?bhassar? [Brahm? world] is burnt up by fire. When it contracts owing to water, it is by water up to the Subhaki?ha [Brahma World]. When it contracts owing to air, it is all demo to the Vehapphala [Brahm? World].¡¨

If you look at this chart, you will find these worlds. This is the diagram of the 31 planes of ex taught in Buddhism in Abhidhamma. At the bottom we have #1 Niraya. That is hell. #2 Tirac world. #3 Petti-visaya is hungry ghosts. #4 is Asura-k?ya. They are a kind of ghost, not the s Manuss? is human beings. Above human beings there are six Deva Worlds. Above the Dev Worlds. The first plane is called the first jh?na world. They are 1. Brahma-p?risajja, 2. Brahm Mah?-brahm?. The next ones (4. Paritt?bh?, 5. Appam???bh?, 6. ?bhassar?) are the secon Paritta-subh?, 8. Appam?na-subha, 9. Subhaki?h? are third jh?na plane. Vehapphala, Asa?
Atappa, Sudass?, Sudass?, Akani??ha all belong to fourth jh?na plane.

When the world is destroyed by fire, the ?bhassar? is the limit there. When the world is dest then Paritt?bh?, Appam??abh? and ?bhassar? are destroyed. Its limit is Subhaki?h?. When by air, it goes up to or reaches to 10. Vehapphala. These three planes (first jh?na plane, sec third jh?na plane) are subject to destruction by air. Up through the first jh?na plane is destro Up through the second jh?na plane is destroyed by water. Up through the third jh?na plane destroyed by air or wind. The upper worlds are not destroyed when the lower worlds are des

¡§In breadth it is always one of the Buddha fields that is destroyed. For the Buddha fields ar kinds, that is, the field of birth, the field of authority, and the field of scope.¡¨ ¡§Herein, the field of birth is limited by the 10,000 world-spheres (That means something like universes.) that quaked on the Perfect One¡¦s taking rebirth-linking, and so on.¡¨ It is said tha takes conception in his mother¡¦s womb, the 10,000 world-spheres quake, or shake, or trem his birth, his enlightenment and so on. This is called the field of birth.

The second one is the field of authority. ¡§The field of authority is limited by a hundred thous world-spheres.¡¨ That is not right. It is a million million, not a hundred thousand million. ¡§Th authority is limited by the million million world-spheres where the following safeguards (paritt are efficacious.¡¨ That means the power of the parittas extends to these million million world say the parittas here and the power of the parittas will pervade the million million world-sphe

¡§That is the Ratana Sutta (The Jewel Sutta), the Khandha Paritta (Khandha Sutta is for sna on.), the Dhajagga Paritta (It is found in the Sa?yutta Nik?ya. When you are afraid of someth the Dhajagga Sutta.), the ???n??iya Paritta (It is found in the D?gha Nik?ya. That is for prot ghosts, demons and so on.), and the Mora Paritta (That is for protection from being imprison means peacock. Once Buddha was reborn as a peacock. The hunters tried to snare him. It i this Sutta and so he was able to escape being caught for many many years.

¡§The field of scope is boundless.¡¨ The third field is boundless, immeasurable. We cannot s million million world-spheres or whatever. It is boundless, ¡§as far as he wishes it is said. Th knows anything anywhere that he wishes. So one of these three Buddha fields, that is to say authority is destroyed.¡¨ When the world is destroyed, the field of authority is destroyed. Tha million million world-spheres. ¡§But when that is being destroyed, the field of birth also gets (because that is included in the field of authority). And that happens simultaneously (at the s when it is reconstituted, that happens simultaneously.¡¨ These world-spheres in the field of a destroyed at the same time and are reconstituted at the same time.

¡§Now it should be understood how its destruction and reconstitution come about thus.¡¨ Thi genesis. Whenever you see a hundred thousand million, please correct to a million million. ¡ down-pour all over the million million world-spheres. People are delighted, and they bring all sow them. But when the sprouts have grown enough for an ox to graze, then not a drop of ra even when asses bray.¡¨ What is that? Actually he misunderstood the P??i idiom here. Wha says here is ¡¥the rain bringing the bray of asses¡¦. That means making noises as asses do. may be thunder, but not a drop of rain falls. The noise of thunder may be similar to the noise or donkeys. ¡§Rain is withheld from then on. This is what the Blessed One referred to when an occasion comes when for many years, for many hundred years, for many thousand years thousand years, there is no rain¡¦.¡¨ That is found in A?guttara Nik?ya (Gradual Sayings), Vo In that Sutta Buddha talked about seven suns rising at the end of the world.

In paragraph 34 ¡§Deities come to know that at the end of a 100,000 years there will be the eon.¡¨ Actually it is the destruction of an eon, not emergence. Also a few lines down ¡§They announcement, ¡¥Good sirs, good sirs, at the end of a 100,000 years from now there will be (not emergence) of an eon¡¦.¡¨

¡§When human beings and earth deities hear their words, they mostly are filled with a sense become kind to each other and make merit with loving-kindness, etc., and so they are rebor world.¡¨ At the end of the world every being dies and they are reborn in the Brahm? World.

¡§There they eat divine food, and they do the preliminary work on air kasi?a and acquire jh? are reborn in the Deva World. Then from there they are reborn in the Brahm? World. ¡§Othe reborn in a [sense-sphere] divine world through kamma to be experienced in a future life. Fo being traversing the round of rebirths who is destitute of kamma to be experienced in a futur means there may be some beings who could not do anything to be reborn in that life, that is deva. But every being has a store of kamma in the past. And so as a result of that store of k reborn in the Deva World. Then from the Deva World they go up to the Brahm? World. Since be destroyed - human world, animal world, deva world and even the Brahm? World is to be to be reborn out of reach of this destruction. So it is said that every being just before the des be reborn in the Brahm? World. Let us say there is a proclamation that in 100,000 years the destroyed. So people get afraid. They become good to each other. They practice meditation are reborn as devas. From there they find that they will be reborn as Brahm?s.

¡§However, at the end of a long period, after the withholding of the rain, a second sun appea second sun appears. ¡§And this is described by the Blessed One.¡¨ This is in the same Sutta means seven suns. The name of that Sutta is Sattasuriya. ¡¥Satta¡¦ means seven and ¡¥sur seven suns.

¡§Now when that has appeared, there is no more telling night from day. As one sun sets the
There is always day, no night. ¡§The world is uninterruptedly scorched by the suns. But ther in the eon-destruction sun as there is in the ordinary sun.¡¨ Buddhists believe that there are deities of the sun, the moon and so on. But for the second sun which arises for the destruct there is no guardian deity.

¡§Now when the ordinary sun is present, thunder clouds and mare¡¦s-tail vapors cross the sk that? Is it a usual expression in English? I cannot find the P??i word for this English word in The P??i word is dh|masikh?. ¡¥Dh|ma¡¦ means vapor or smoke. ¡¥Sikh?¡¦ means fire.

¡§Beginning with the rivulets the water in all the rivers except the Five Great Rivers dries up. second sun comes up, the water in the small rivers dries up, but not the water in the five gre are talking about India. It is believed that there are five great rivers in India - the Ganges, Ya (Jumma), Sarabhu, Sarassati, and Mah?. These are the five great rivers. For America it wou Mississippi. So the water in these five great rivers has not yet dried up.

¡§After that, at the end of a long period, a third sun appears. And when that has appeared, t dry up too.¡¨ So there is a third sun, fourth sun, fifth sun, sixth sun. Then what happens whe sun arises? ¡§And the million million world-spheres are the same as this one. After that, at th period, a seventh sun appears. And when that has appeared, the whole world-sphere togeth million other world-spheres catches fire.¡¨ When the seven suns arise, then everything catch ¡§Even the summits of Sineru (That means Mount Meru, the mountain believed to be at the cycle.), a 100 leagues or more high, crumble and vanish into space. The conflagration mour the realm of the Four Kings (That means the devas.). When it has burnt up all the golden pa palaces, and the crystal palaces there, it invades the Realm of the Thirty-three. And so it go to the plane of the first jh?na. When it has burnt three [lower] Brahm? Worlds, it stops there ?bhassar? World. As long as any formed thing (formation) the size of an atom still exists, it out; but it goes out when all formed things have been consumed.¡¨ So nothing is left. ¡§And that burns ghee and oil it leaves no ash.¡¨

Student: Inaudible.

Teacher: It is equally authoritative as other Suttas, but not all things mentioned here are fro In the Sutta the Buddha said that at some time a second sun would appear and so on. The by the Commentators. They may or may not be the explanation given by the Buddha. Mayb later by the Commentators.

So the world goes like that. ¡§The upper space is now all one with the lower space in a vast Then at the end of a long period a great cloud arises, and at first it rains gently, and then it r ever heavier deluges, like lotus stems, like rods, like pestles, like palm trunks, more and mo pours down upon all the burnt areas in the million million world-spheres till they disappear. T (forces) beneath and all around that water rise up and compact it and round it, like water dr leaf. How do they compact the great mass of water? By making gaps; for the wind makes g there.¡¨ This is the reforming, the reconstitution of the world. The world is destroyed. It rema destroyed state for many eons. Then the world forms again.

At the beginning of the forming of the word there is a great rain. Then it flows down on the b the million million world-spheres. The water is formed in the air into something like a ball. ¡¥ means made the water round like the water drops on a lotus leaf.

¡§Being thus compressed by the air, compacted and reduced, it gradually subsides. As it si Brahm? World reappears in its place.¡¨ So it is the beginning of the world again.

¡§Then the beings that were reborn first in the Brahm? World of Streaming Radiance (?bhas with the exhaustion of their life span.¡¨ So the first beings in the present world were those w means who died) from the Streaming Radiance realm of Brahm?s and later were reborn he the first human beings in the present world. They fell from there ¡§with the exhaustion of the when the merit is exhausted, and they reappear here. They are self-luminous and wander i because there is no sun or moon yet. They have radiance of their own and go about with th

¡§On eating the essential humus, as is told in the Aga??a Sutta (That is Sutta #27 in the D? are overcome by craving.¡¨ There is something like a cream on the earth. When you boil mil there was something like cream on the earth. So one man was curious about that and took is said that the taste was very good. So they were overcome by craving. ¡§They busied the lumps of it to eat. Then their self-luminosity vanishes, and it is dark.¡¨ So this is the downfall beings. ¡§They are frightened when they see the darkness. Then in order to remove their fe courage, the sun¡¦s disk appears full fifty leagues across.¡¨ The sun is said to be fifty league about 400 miles across. ¡§They are delighted to see it, thinking ¡¥We have light¡¦, and they s appeared in order to allay our fears and give us courage, so let it be called ¡§Sun (suriya)¡¨¡ word ¡¥sura¡¦ means to be courageous. So ¡¥suriya¡¦ means that which gives courage. So w there was light and people were not afraid. So the sun was called ¡¥suriya¡¦.

¡§Now when the sun has given light for a day, it sets. Then they are frightened again, thinkir the light we had¡¦, and they think ¡¥How good if we had another light!¡¦. As if knowing their th moon¡¦s disk appears, 49 leagues across.¡¨ So the difference between the sun and moon is because if you look from here, they appear just about the same size.

¡§On seeing it they are still more delighted, and they say ¡¥It has appeared, seeming as if it (chanda), so let it be called ¡§Moon (canda)¡¨¡¦.¡¨ So chanda is changed to canda. ¡§So they ¡¥Moon (canda)¡¦.¡¨ Moon is canda in P??i. It is derived from chanda which means desire. B of the desire of the people the moon disk appeared. That is why it is called ¡¥desire (canda) something like that.

¡§After the appearance of the moon and sun in this way, the stars appear in their constellatio night and day are made known, and in due course, the month and half month, the season, a

¡§On the day the moon and sun appear, the mountains of Sineru (Mount Meru), of the World Himalayas appear too.¡¨ So on the day that the moon and sun appear all the mountains app appear on the full-moon day of the month of Phagguna (March), neither before nor after.¡¨ M like the beginning of the appearance of sun, and moon, and mountains, and rivers.

Student: Is it also the end of the rainy season?

Teacher: It is summer there. March is the beginning of summer. It is very hot.

Student: When is the rainy season?

Teacher: Let me see. The rains come about May although we do not call it rainy season yet. when millet is cooking and bubbles arise, then simultaneously, some parts are domes, som flat, so too, there are mountains in the domed places, seas in the hollow places, and contine the flat places.¡¨

¡§Then as these beings make use of the essential humus, gradually some become handson they eat something, and so their appearance become different.

¡§The handsome ones despise the ugly ones. Owing to their contempt the essential humus vanishes.) and an outgrowth from the soil appears. (Another thing appears for them.) Then t same way and the bad?lat? creeper appears (maybe a sweet creeper). That too vanishes in without red powder or husk that ripens without tilling appears.¡¨ You don¡¦t have to till. You d take off the husk. It is ready-made, ¡§a clean sweet-smelling rice fruit.¡¨

¡§Then vessels appear. They put the rice into the vessels, which they put on the tops of stor appears spontaneously (They don¡¦t have to make a fire. A fire just appears automatically.) a cooked rice resembles jasmine flowers. It has no need of sauces and curries, since it has wh want to taste.¡¨ This is very good. Right?

¡§As soon as they eat this gross food, urine and excrement appear in them. Then wound ori them¡¨ - male and female appear and so on and so on. This is the beginning of the world ac teachings of the Buddha.

At that time they do not grow any food. They just go to trees, pluck the fruit and take it. Later a lazy man. So he stole something. When he stole something, the fruits on the trees disappe things deteriorated.

Later some people stole something from other persons. There was some unruliness so they elected someone to be their king. That person happened to be our Bodhisatta. Since he was majority, he was called Mah? Sammata. That king was called Mah? Sammata. ¡¥Sammata¡ agreed to by all people. ¡§Since he was lord of the fields, he was called Khattiya.¡¨ ¡¥Khattiy warrior caste, warrior noble. ¡§Since he was lord of the fields, he was called ¡¥Khattiya¡¦.¡¨ ¡¥ means warrior caste, warrior noble. ¡§Since he promoted others¡¦ good righteously and equi king.¡¨ Now the P??i word for king is r?ja. Here it is derived from the root ra?ja which means king is a person who pleases his people. He makes people pleased so he is called a r?ja, a Bodhisatta was called Mah? Sammata, Khattiya or R?ja. ¡§This is how he came to be known the Bodhisatta himself is the first man concerned in any wonderful innovation in the world. S Khattiya circle had been established by making the Bodhisatta the first in this way, the Brahm other castes were founded in due succession.¡¨

Buddhism does not recognize the supremacy of the Brahman caste. In Buddhist books you caste put above the Brahman caste. In Hinduism the Brahman caste comes first and the Wa They have the stratification of human society into four groups - priests or Brahmans, kings a merchants, and ordinary people.

¡§Herein, the period from the time of the great cloud heralding the eon¡¦s destruction up till t the flames constitutes one incalculable, and that is called the ¡¥contraction¡¦.¡¨ That is the de period. ¡§That from the ceasing of the flames of the eon of destruction up till the great cloud rehabilitation, which rains down upon the million million world-spheres constitutes the secon and that is called ¡¥what follows the contraction¡¦. That from the time of the great cloud of re up till the appearance of the moon and sun constitutes the third incalculable, and that is call ¡¥expansion¡¦. That from the appearance of the moon and sun up till the reappearance of th eon of destruction is the fourth incalculable, and that is called ¡¥what follows the expansion¡ this stage, the last, the fourth stage. ¡§This, firstly is how the destruction by fire and reconsti should be understood.¡¨

Then there is destruction by water. It is interesting here. ¡§There is this difference, however. former case a second sun appeared, in this case a great cloud of caustic waters appears.¡¨ rain. It could be acid rain because it destroys everything. When the world is destroyed by wa is destroyed up through the three second jh?na planes or including the three second jh?na p world is destroyed by air, it includes the three third jh?na planes.

In paragraph 64 the author gives the reason for the world¡¦s destruction, why there is the de world. ¡§The [three] roots of the unprofitable are the reasons.¡¨ Lobha, dosa and moha are t any one of the roots of the unprofitable become conspicuous, the world is destroyed accordi more conspicuous, it is destroyed by fire. When hate is more conspicuous, it is destroyed by some say that it is destroyed by fire when hate is more conspicuous, and by water when gre conspicuous.¡¨ So there is a difference of opinion. ¡§And when delusion is more conspicuou by wind.¡¨

¡§Destroyed as it is in this way, it is destroyed for seven times.¡¨ There are three causes of d fire, water and air. The world is destroyed seven times by fire and the eighth time it is destro Then the world is destroyed another seven times by fire and the eighth time by water and so 64th world is destroyed by air. So it is seven times by fire and one time by water, seven time one time by water, seven times by fire and one time by water and so on. When you reach th of air has come. That is explained in paragraph 65.

The person who possesses direct knowledge sees all these world-spheres. ¡§Now when a b recollecting eons is recollecting his former life, then of such eons as these he recollects man contraction and expansion. How? In the way beginning ¡¥There I was..¡¦¡¨ There I was rebor having such a name, belonging to such a clan and so on. ¡§So named: [such forenames as]
Of such a race (¡¥Race¡¦ means clan.) [such family names as] Kacc?na, say, or Kassapa. T recollection of his own name and clan (surname) in his past existence. But if he wants to rec appearance at that time, or whether his life was a rough or refined one, or whether pleasure prevalent, or whether his life span was short or long, he recollects that too.¡¨

¡§Here with such an appearance, means fair or dark. Such was my food.¡¨ These are all det recollect. ¡§And passing away from there, I reappeared elsewhere.¡¨ So wherever he was re remember his past life by the power of his direct knowledge.

In paragraph 70 it explains in another way phrases like ¡¥there I was reborn¡¦, ¡¥passing aw ¡¥I appeared elsewhere¡¦, ¡¥I appeared here¡¦, and so on. The first explanation takes the tex general. If it says ¡§There I was reborn, and passing away from there I reappeared elsewhe refers to any eon in any life. In the second explanation the monk goes back gradually from o another. Then he may stop anywhere he likes and come back again.

This is what is meant here in paragraph 71. ¡§Furthermore, the words ¡¥there I was¡¦ refer to of one who has cast back retrospectively (That means going back gradually one by one.) as and the words ¡¥and passing away from there¡¦ refer to his reviewing after turning forward a go back from this life which is #1 to life #2, #3, #4, #5, #6 and so on. Let us say we go back Then we come back through lives #10, #9, #8, #7, #6, #5 and so on.

¡§Consequently the words ¡¥I appeared elsewhere¡¦ can be understood to be said with refer his reappearance next before his appearance here.¡¨ That means if this life is said to be #1, before it is said to be #2. It is something like that. ¡¥And passing away from there¡¦ refers to life from this life going backward. ¡§ ¡¥I appeared elsewhere¡¦ can be understood to be said the place of his reappearance.¡¨ ¡¥I appeared elsewhere¡¦ means I appeared in the immedia life.

¡§The words ¡¥there too I was¡¦, etc., are said in order to show the recollection of his name, there in the place of his reappearance next before this appearance.¡¨ So in the second expla was reborn and so named¡¦ refers to the third, fourth, fifth lives and so on in the past. And th reappeared elsewhere¡¦ refers to the second life from this life. ¡¥I reappeared here¡¦ means this life. So there is this life, immediate past life and former past lives. Anywhere he wants to can remember. This is the recollection of past lives.

The next one is the divine eye - knowledge of passing away and reappearance of beings. Th
By this direct knowledge a person can see beings passing away from one existence and bei existence. The Text is given in full from the D?gha Nik?ya. Towards the end of paragraph 72 words in italics "T¡§ the knowledge of the passing away and reappearance: cut|pap?ta???iy ca ????ya (resolution of compound).¡¨ It cannot be translated. [The meaning is] for the kind means of which beings¡¦ passing away and reappearance is known.¡¨ By this direct knowled dying from one life and being reborn in another life.

In paragraph 73 the definition of divine or the P??i word ¡¥dibba¡¦ is given. Earlier we had th element. Here we have the divine eye element. The word ¡¥divine¡¦ is defined similarly. By t abiding we should again understand the jh?nas and not the four brahm? vih?ras. You will fir ¡¥divine abiding¡¦ about eight or ten lines down in the paragraph. ¡§Also it is ¡¥divine¡¦ becau obtained by means of divine abiding (jh?nas), and because it has divine abiding as its suppo ¡¥divine¡¦ because it greatly illuminates by discerning light. And it is ¡¥divine¡¦ because it has range through seeing visible objects that are behind walls, and so on.¡¨ This explanation is g the meaning of the root given in the grammatical treatises. That is why it says ¡§All that shou understood according to the science of grammar.¡¨ That means we should understand this w is said in the grammatical treatises.

In Sanskrit there is a book called ¡¥Dh?tupata¡¦. That means a list of roots and meanings. It composed by Panini. He was a very famous Sanskrit grammarian, the most famous of the S Almost everybody follows him. Even in our books there are some references to it. In that list meaning of the root here is given as eliminating, given as having a great range and so on. F given in the Dh?tupata, the explanation is given here. ¡§All that should be understood accor science of grammar.¡¨ That means according to the grammatical books.

Next is the definition of the word ¡¥eye¡¦. ¡§It is an eye in the sense of seeing. Also it is an ey is like an eye in its performance of an eye¡¦s function¡¨ and so on.

Now let us look at footnote 17. ¡§He cannot see them with the divine eye.¡¨ It is said here tha beings passing away and reappearing. He cannot see them with the divine eye actually at th the moment of disappearance. ¡§But it is those who being on the verge of death (That mean to die.), will die now that are intended as ¡¥passing away¡¦ and those who have taken rebirth just reappeared that are intended by ¡¥reappearing¡¦.¡¨ That means one sees a little before o after relinking, not exactly at the moments of death or relinking. At the moments of death an cannot see. The explanation is given in the footnote from the Sub-Commentary. ¡§He canno divine eye - with the knowledge of the divine eye - because of the extreme brevity and extre material moment in anyone.¡¨ Actually it should read ¡¥because of the extreme brevity and e the matter of some beings¡¦. The matter in human beings may be gross, and so it is not diffic the matter in some beings, like brahm?s, is very subtle. That is why they are referred to as fi brahm?s. Their matter is extremely subtle. And also the moments of death and rebirth are so cannot be seen even with the knowledge of divine eye.

¡§Moreover it is present materiality that is the object of the divine eye.¡¨ It is said that the obj divine eye or the direct knowledge of the divine eye is the present matter. ¡§And that is by pr condition.¡¨ That means it (that materiality) must have arisen before the divine eye arises. It arisen before the divine eye and still be existing at the moment of the arising of the divine e cannot be the past appearance of matter.

¡§And there is no occurrence of exalted consciousness without adverting and preliminary wo is the exalted consciousness, mahaggata consciousness. It cannot arise without the adverti preliminary work. ¡§Nor is materiality that is only arising able to serve as object condition, no is dissolving." So the material properties at the moment of arising and at the moment of diss serve as the object. ¡§Therefore it is rightly said that he cannot see with the divine eye mate moments of death and reappearance.¡¨ At the moments of death and at the moments of relin them.

¡§If the knowledge of the divine eye has only materiality as its object, then why is it said tha beings? It is said in this way since it is mainly concerned with instances of materiality in a be continuity.¡¨ There should be a full stop there. ¡¥Some say¡¦ should come after ¡¥or¡¦. ¡§Or s because materiality is a reason for apprehending beings. Some say that this is said accordin usage.¡¨ What he really sees is r|pa (materiality). He does not see a being actually. ¡¥Being¡ matter both, combined. What the divine eye sees is the present matter. This matter cannot b being because matter is a part of a being. So it is said in the Texts that he sees ¡¥beings¡¦. S materiality is the reason for apprehending beings. When we apprehend beings, when we se the material properties in them. That is why it is said that he sees beings. Actually what he s beings, mind and matter together, but the material properties. So he cannot see them at the and rebirth, but a little before death and a little after rebirth.

Paragraph 78 says ¡§Faring according to their deeds.¡¨ I would like to say ¡¥faring according instead of deeds. ¡§Faring according to their kamma; moving on in accordance with whateve accumulated. Herein, the function of the divine eye is described by the first expressions beg ¡¥passing away¡¦. But the function of knowledge of faring according to kamma is described b expression.¡¨

In the passages appearing in the P??i Suttas with phrases such as ¡¥it surpasses the huma purified and superhuman¡¦, and ¡¥he sees beings passing away and reappearing¡¦ and so on refer to the divine eye. That is the function of the divine eye. ¡§but the function of knowledge according to kamma is described by this last expression.¡¨ ¡¥The last expression¡¦ means fa their kamma. So in this last passage we have functions of two direct knowledges, the divine beings dying and reappearing. Although one is dependent upon the other, they are two diffe

First he sees the beings with the divine eye. Then he sees their kamma, faring according to ¡¥Faring of beings according to their kamma or deeds¡¦ means he sees the kamma of them. beings in the Deva World. Then he thinks ¡§Why are they reborn in this happy state?¡¨ then kamma. When he sees their good kamma, then there is the direct knowledge of seeing bein reappearing. Before that it is just the function of the divine eye. The direct knowledge of divi direct knowledge of seeing beings dying and reappearing are two different functions.

¡§The order in which that knowledge arises is this.¡¨ This is how the knowledge arises. ¡§He attention in this way, ¡¥After doing what deeds do these beings undergo this suffering?¡¦ The has that kamma as its object arises in him in this way ¡¥It was after doing this¡¦.¡¨ First he se beings. That is the function of divine eye. Later on he sees their kamma and that is the funct knowledge of beings dying and reappearing.

Paragraph 80 ¡§There is no special preliminary work for this. And as in this case, so too in th knowledge of the future.¡¨ The divine eye is the basis for this knowledge, the knowledge of s dying and reappearing. No special preliminary work is needed. It is also true for knowledge o ¡§for these have divine eye as their basis and their success is dependent on that of the divin

Then he sees beings who are ill-conducted in body and so on. Their moral conduct is not pu Noble Ones - this is important. ¡§Beings desirous of harm for Noble Ones consisting of Budd Buddhas, and disciples, and also of householders who are Stream Enterers¡¨ - here the me of Buddhas, Pacceka Buddhas, disciples down to householders who are Stream Enterers. ¡§ the worst accusations.¡¨ ¡¥Worst accusations¡¦ really means the worst offense with regard to say ¡§You are not a monk¡¨, then you are accusing him with the worst accusation, with the w are not a monk¡¦ means you have broken the most important rules. If you say ¡§You are not have no monkshood in you¡¨, you are accusing him of the worst offense. ¡§With denial of the qualities they abuse and upbraid them is what is meant.¡¨

¡§Herein, it should be understood that when they say, ¡¥They have no asceticism, they are n revile them with the worst accusation.¡¨ Here ¡¥asceticism¡¦ does not mean all asceticism, bu being a monk, the state of being a sama?a. ¡¥Sama?a¡¦ here is translated as ascetic. Actua monk, a bhikkhu. If you say ¡§You have no state of a bhikkhu¡¨ or ¡§You are not a bhikkhu¡¨ accusing him with the worst accusations. You are saying that he has broken one of the four rules.

¡§And when they say, ¡¥They have no jh?na, or liberation, or Path, or Fruition, etc., they rev denial of their special qualities.¡¨ So you do not recognize them as possessing jh?na, liberat Phala and so on. ¡§And whether done knowingly or unknowingly it is in either case reviling o is weighty kamma resembling that of immediate result, and it is an obstacle both to heaven ( Deva World.) and to the Path. But it is remediable.¡¨

Then a story is given here. I think I have told this story many times to you. ¡§An Elder and a it seems, wandered for alms in a certain village. At the first house they got only a spoonful o The Elder¡¦s stomach was paining him with wind.¡¨ When we have an ache in the stomach, v wind. What do you call that? Colic? Pain in the stomach?

Student: Gas.

Teacher: It is called gas, oh. The Elder had this ailment. ¡§He thought ¡¥This gruel is good fo drink it before it gets cold¡¦.¡¨ Then it says ¡§People brought a wooden stool to the doorstep. correct. There were no people involved in this story. ¡§He sat down on a big piece of wood t brought to make a doorpost¡¨ is what is meant. When you make a doorpost, you bring in a lo on a big piece of wood which people had brought to make a doorpost.

¡§He sat down and drank it. The other was disgusted and remarked ¡¥The old man has let h better of him and has done what is shameful for us.¡¨ It is not ¡¥what he should be ashamed ¡¥what is shameful for us¡¦. I am ashamed of him. It is something like that. He cannot wait un suitable place to drink the rice gruel. He was so hungry that he was not ashamed to do this.
thinking of the young monk.

¡§The Elder for alms and on return to the monastery, he asked the young bhikkhu ¡¥Have yo Dispensation, friend?¡¦ - ¡¥Yes, Venerable Sir, I am a Stream Enterer.¡¦ - ¡¥Then, friend, do n higher Paths; one whose cankers are destroyed (That means an Arahant.) has been reviled reviled the Arahant in his thoughts. ¡§The young bhikkhu asked for the Elder¡¦s forgiveness restored to his former state.¡¨ When you ask forgiveness from him, you get rid of that offense

¡§So any other one who reviles a Noble One¡¨ - you should put ¡¥any other¡¦ between ¡¥so¡¦ any other one who reviles a Noble One¡¨ - then we should strike out ¡¥even if he is one hims in the text - ¡§ should go to him; if he himself is senior, he should sit down in the squatting po get his forgiveness in this way ¡¥I have said such and such to the venerable one; may he for junior, he should pay homage, and sitting in the squatting position and holding out his hands he should get his forgiveness in this way, ¡¥I have said such and such to you, venerable sir; the other has gone away, he should get his forgiveness either by going to him himself or by such as a co-resident.

¡§If he can neither go nor send, he should go to the bhikkhu who lives in that monastery, and the squatting position if they are junior, or acting in the way already described if they are sen should get forgiveness¡¨ and so on. We should do this especially when we practice meditatio an obstacle to our attainment through meditation.

¡§If it is a bhikkhu who wanders alone and it cannot be discovered where he is living or wher should go to a wise bhikkhu and say ¡¥Venerable sir, I have said such and such to the vene and so. When I remember it, I am remorseful. What shall I do¡¦? He should be told ¡¥Think n the Elder forgives you. Set your mind at rest¡¦. Then he should extend his hands palms toge direction taken by the Noble One and say ¡¥Forgive me¡¦.¡¨

¡§If the Noble One has attained the final Nibb?na (That is if the Noble One has died.), he sh place where the bed is, on which he attained the final Nibb?na, and should go as far as the ask forgiveness. When this has been done, there is no obstruction either to heaven or to the as he was before.¡¨ That means he gets free from the offense.

¡§Wrong in their views: having distorted vision. Acquirers of kamma due to wrong view¡¨ and here is said to be of very grave consequences. ¡§Acquirers of kamma due to wrong view: th the various kinds acquired through wrong view, and also those who incite others to bodily ka in wrong view. And here, though reviling of Noble Ones has already been included by the m misconduct, and though wrong view has already been included by the mention of mental mis understood, nevertheless, that the two are mentioned again in order to emphasize their grea Reviling Noble Ones is verbal misconduct and the wrong view is mental misconduct. They a misconduct. They are mentioned again because the Buddha wanted to show their greatness because they are very grave akusala.

¡§Reviling Noble Ones is greatly reprehensible because of the resemblance to kamma with this is said ¡¥S?riputta, just as a bhikkhu possessing virtuous conduct, concentration and un here and now attain final knowledge, so it is in this case, I say; if he does not abandon such thoughts and renounce such views, he will find himself in hell as surely as if he had been ca there.¡¨ If he has wrong view, he cannot be reborn in a happy destiny. That is what is meant is nothing more reprehensible than wrong view, according as it is said ¡¥Bhikkhus, I do not s so reprehensible as wrong view.¡¨

¡§On the break up of the body on the giving up of the clung-to aggregates¡¨ - that means cau ¡¥Clung-to¡¦ means caused by kamma. ¡§After death: in the taking up of the aggregates gen that.¡¨ That means after death there is rebirth. ¡§Or alternatively, on the break up of the body interruption of the life faculty (That means on the cessation of the life faculty.), and after dea the death consciousness.¡¨

Student: I have a question about the section just before this part. Is it saying delusion has gr consequences than greed or hate, or is wrong view greed or hate?

Teacher: Delusion accompanies every unwholesome mental state, every unwholesome con wrong view, there is also delusion. They arise together.

Student: So are we talking about greed, hate and delusion at the same time or are we talkin about delusion in this passage, wrong view?

Teacher: Wrong view, delusion, not greed and hatred. Then there is explanation of the word on. They mean destiny and places of woe and so on.

Paragraph 93 ¡§Or alternatively, the animal generation¡¨ - I think we should say ¡¥animal kin animal kingdom is indicated by the mention of states of loss¡¨ and so on.

Paragraph 94 ¡¥the bright side¡¦ means happy destiny, heavenly world. They are word expla is a world in the sense of crumbling and disintegrating.¡¨ The word ¡¥loka¡¦, the word for wor that which is crumbling and disintegrating. That is why it is called ¡¥loka¡¦. ¡¥Loka¡¦ means c disintegrating. ¡§This is the word meaning.¡¨

¡§Thus with the divine eye, etc., is all a summing-up phrase; the meaning here in brief is this divine eye..he sees.¡¨ Then how to practice to get the divine eye is given.

Paragraph 96 ¡§However, while he is seeing what is visible, the turn of the preliminary work upon the light disappears.¡¨ First he enters into jh?na and does the preliminary work. When preliminary work, the light appears. With that light, the light of the kasi?a, he sees what is vis he sees what is visible, the preliminary work disappears. When the preliminary work disappe light and so he does not see anything. There is something like a dilemma here. The Comme must do it again and again so that the light becomes strong and doesn¡¦t disappear. Then th with a grass torch is given.

Let¡¦s go to the general section. In this section the different kinds of objects of the seven dire are given. In paragraph 104

¡§The sage has told four object Triads
By means of which one can infer Just how these seven different kinds Of Direct Knowledges occur.¡¨

The objects of direct knowledge are described with reference to the triads given in the first b Abhidhamma. They are explained in footnote 20. The first one is k?m?vacara. In the footnot object¡¦. You need to understand this. ¡¥Exalted object¡¦ means mahaggata object. ¡¥Measu means lokuttara. That means Magga, Phala, and Nibb?na. Then Magga is taken again here The others are self-explanatory - past, future, present, internal, external. ¡¥Non-classifiable¡ concept (pa??atti).

There are triads in the first book of Abhidhamma. The later books follow the order of the tria aggregates and others with reference to these triads. There are 22 triads. Among them there that deal with objects. They are taken from them. Then the Commentator explained which o which direct knowledge.

¡§The knowledge of Supernormal Power, occurs with respect to seven kinds of object, that i a limited or exalted (That means k?m?vacara or mahaggata.), a past, future, or present, and external, object.¡¨ So there are seven kinds. So if you look at #1 on the sheet you have 1-7. detailed explanation follows.

Paragraph 109 ¡§Knowledge of the Divine Ear Element occurs with respect to four kinds of say, as having a limited (k?m?vacara), and a present, and an internal or external, object.¡¨ T explanation.

Then we have Knowledge of Penetration of Minds (minds of other persons). How many? Th objects - limited (k?m?vacara), exalted (mahaggata), measureless (lokuttara), Path (Magga) present and external. In this paragraph there is an interesting thing. ¡§And here an ordinary know a Stream Enterer¡¦s consciousness, nor does a Stream Enterer know a Once Returne Arahant¡¦s consciousness.¡¨ Lower persons cannot know the consciousness of higher perso means a puthujjana. A puthujjana does not know a Stream Enterer¡¦s consciousness, and a not know the consciousness of a Once Returner and so on. ¡§But an Arahant knows the con others.¡¨ That is because he is the highest. ¡§And each higher one knows the consciousness him.¡¨

¡§How does it have a present object?¡¨ With regard to penetration of mind three kinds of pre
- present by moment, present by continuity and present by extent. ¡¥Present by moment¡¦ m of existence (arising, presence and dissolution). That is present by moment. ¡¥Present by co is included in one or two rounds of continuity. That is present by continuity. ¡§When someon
